PREFACE

TO THE QUARTO EDITION.

THE advantages which a biographical work offers to the reader, are ſo numerous and ſo important, that it is hoped every endeavour to enlarge the knowledge of mankind, and impartially to develope the character of thoſe who have contributed to the happineſs or to the calamities of the world, will be received by the public with indulgence and candor. More minute than hiſtory, biography regards the perſon, the acquirements, and the conduct of the individual, and curſorily paſſes over thoſe more general details of public tranſactions which are more properly the object of the hiſtorian's reſearch. While in the hiſtory of nations, and in the political changes of ſtates, the reader views the conſequences of ſucceſsful intrigue, of diplomatic dexterity, or of military prowеſs, it is in the details of private and of domeſtic life where he ſeeks for inſtruction, and for the minute documents which may conduct his footſteps, and hold out the lamp of experience to warn him againſt the dangers of ill-directed paſſions, or of miſguided ambition.

In the following work, every character, it may generally be ſaid, has been included which might have ſtrong claim on the notice of poſterity, either from public notoriety, or from laſting celebrity. Thoſe who have benefited their fellow creatures by their exertions, either in the walks of ſcience and literature, or in the improvement of the polite arts, in the extenſion of commerce, or in the uſeful labors of induſtry; or thoſe who, in the field of honor, have fought with ſuperior valor for the glories and for the independence of their parent ſtate, all are ſtrongly intitled to the gratitude of mankind.

With these sentiments he commits, to the judgment of the public, his biographical labors, as a companion to the CLASSICAL DICTIONARY, in anxious confidence, that they will not be deemed unworthy of the same flattering patronage, and of the same extensive circulation, with which that work has so long and so liberally been honored.

March 8th, 1808.

IN offering to the public this octavo edition of his UNIVERSAL BIOGRAPHY, the author thinks it necessary to say, that he has attempted to compress his subject into a more compendious form, without however losing any part of what is most interesting and important in the account of the life of each individual mentioned. A few of those characters among foreign nations, whose labors and actions appeared not of sufficient consequence, or of striking notoriety, to engage and to fix the particular attention of a native of England, have occasionally been passed over; and the omission, it is hoped, will not be regarded as depreciating the general utility, or the real value of the work. The names also that occur in the ancient classics have not been all inserted in this edition, as the author has in the Classical Dictionary given a more copious and more satisfactory account of them, than could have been with propriety introduced into the following pages in their present epitomized form.

UNI-

UNIVERSAL BIOGRAPHY,

AA, Peter Vander, a bookſeller of Leyden, who, under the title of Galerie du Monde, publiſhed, in 66 vols. fol. an atlas of 200 charts, as explanatory of the various voyages made between the 13th and the cloſe of the 17th century. He was ſtill living in 1729.

AAGARD, Nicholas and Chriſtian, two brothers, born at Wiburg in Denmark, in the beginning of the 18th century. The eldeſt, diſtinguiſhed for the acuteneſs of his philoſophical writings, died 1657, and the other, known for his poetical talents, died 1664.

AALAM, an aſtrologer of the ninth century at the court of Adado Daula.

AALST, Everard, a Dutch painter, born at Delft 1602. His talents were diſplayed with peculiar ſucceſs in the repreſentation of ſhields and military accoutrements, of dead birds, &c. He died in 1658. His nephew William became his rival, and in his travels through France and Italy he obtained the patronage of the great, and particularly of the grand duke of Tuſcany. His fruit and flower pieces are moſt admired. He died in Holland in 1679, aged 59.

AARON, elder brother of Moſes, ſon of Amram, of the tribe of Levi, was born A. M 2434. He was the friend and the aſſiſtant of his brother, and as being more happily gifted with the powers of eloquence, he attended him in all his interviews with Pharaoh in Egypt, and in his conferences with the people of Iſrael. Though he offended God by making a calf of gold, as the repreſentative of the divinity, he was permitted to become the firſt high prieſt. He died in his 123d year, without being permitted to enter the promiſed land.

AARON RASCHID, a caliph of the Abaſſides, diſtinguiſhed by his conqueſts, and the eccentricity of his character. Valiant in battle, he ſhowed himſelf inhuman and perfidious towards the conquered. He deſerves our admiration for the patronage which he afforded to literature and to the arts. He was eight times victorious in battle, and eight times paid his adoration at the tomb of the prophet. Charlemagne reſpected his character, and Aaron in token of friendſhip preſented to the European prince a clock, the mechaniſm and conſtruction of which were regarded among the prodigies of the age. He died A. D. 809, in the 23d year of his reign.

AARON SCHASCOU, a rabbi of Theſſalonica, celebrated for his writings.

AARON, a Britiſh ſaint, put to death with his brother Julius, during Diocleſian's perſecution, and buried at Caerleon in Wales.

AARON, a preſbyter and phyſician of Alexandria in the eighth century, who wrote 30 books or pandects on medicine in the Syriac language. He is the firſt author who makes mention of the ſmall-pox, and of the meaſles, diſeaſes which were introduced into Egypt by the conqueſts of the Arabians about 640.

AARON, Hariſcon, a Caraite rabbi who was known as a phyſician at Conſtantinople in 1224, and who wrote a learned commentary on the pentateuch, beſides annotations on the Old Teſtament, a Hebrew grammar, &c.

AARON, Hacharon or Poſterior, a learned rabbi, born in Nicodemia in 1346. He wrote on the law of Moſes, and on the cuſtoms of his nation.

AARON, Iſaac, an interpreter of languages at the court of Conſtantinople under the Commeni. He abuſed the confidence repoſed in him, and recommended to Andronicus, the uſurper of his maſter's throne, to put out the eyes and cut off the tongue of his enemies, a puniſhment afterwards inflicted on himſelf by Iſaac Angelus 1203.

AARON-BEN-CHAIM, the chief of the Jewiſh ſynagogues at Fez and Morocco in the beginning of the 17th century, wrote commentaries on Joſhua, the law, the prophets, &c.

AARON BEN-ASER, a rabbi in the fifth century, to whom the invention of the Hebrew points and accents is attributed. He wrote a Hebrew grammar.

AARON, a levite of Barcelona, who wrote 613 precepts on Moſes, printed Venice 1523. He died 1292.

AARSENS, Francis, a celebrated ſtateſman, ſon of the regiſter of the United Provinces. He was early initiated in politics; and at the court of France, where he was ambaſſador of Holland, he acquired the knowledge and the arts of negociation under Henry IV. and his miniſters Villeroi, Roſni, Silleri, &c. He afterwards was employed in the ſame capacity at Venice, and in other Italian ſtates, and he was one of thoſe who negociated in England for the marriage of William of Orange with the daughter of Charles I. A perſuaſive eloquence and the arts of diſſimulation were united in Aarſens with an impoſing appearance of bluntneſs, and rendered him at once dangerous and ſucceſsful, ſo that Richelieu, who knew and employed his abilities, acknowledged that he ſhared with Oxenſtiern of Sweden, and Viſcardi of Montſerat the honor of being the moſt conſummate politician of his age. He died in an advanced age, and left behind him an account of all the embaſſies in which he was engaged.

AARSENS or AERTSEN, Peter, ſurnamed Longo from his tallneſs, was born at Amſterdam 1519, where he alſo died in his 66th year. Though brought up like his father to the profeſſion of a ſtocking-maker, he was at laſt permitted, by the entreaties of his mother, to follow the bent of his genius, and at 18 he began to ſtudy painting, architecture, and perſpective. He excelled in repreſenting the utenſils of a kitchen, and his painting of the Virgin for an altar piece at Amſterdam was highly eſteemed, and alſo another in which he repreſented the crucifixion with the executioner in the act of breaking with an iron bar the legs of the two thieves. This laſt was torn to pieces in a public inſurrection 1566, and the ferocious populace were with difficulty prevented from murdering the artiſt. He left 3 ſons who alſo engaged in his profeſſion.

AARTGEN or AERTGEN, the ſon of a woolcomber at Leyden, who, after following his father's occupation, turned his thoughts to painting, in the proſecution of which he acquired reputation. He was habitually intemperate, and as he never touched his pencil on Mondays, he devoted thoſe days to feſtivity and drunkenneſs. He was drowned in the canals of the city in the night as he amuſed himſelf in playing through the ſtreets on the german flute.

ABA, brother-in-law to Stephen, the firſt chriſtian king of Hungary, defeated Peter who had ſucceeded his uncle on the throne, and after he had baniſhed him to Bavaria, he uſurped the crown 1041 or 1042. He diſgraced himſelf by his cruelties, and was ſacrificed to the reſentment of his offended ſubjects 1044.

ABAFFI, Michael, ſon of a magiſtrate of Hermanſtad, roſe by his abilities to the ſovereignty of Tranſylvania, in 1661. He aſſiſted the Turks, and became formidable to the emperor of Germany.

ABAGA or ABAKA, a king of Tartary whoſe ambaſſadors were introduced in 1724 to the eccleſiaſtical ſynod of Lyons. He conquered Perſia, and proved a formidable neighbour to the Chriſtians who had ſettled at Jeruſalem. He died 1282.

ABANO, vid. APONO.

ABAS, Schah, ſeventh king of Perſia, of the race of the Sophis, was brave and active, and enlarged the boundaries of his dominions. He took conjointly with the Engliſh forces 1622 the iſland of Ormus, which had been in the poſſeſſion of the Portugueſe 122 years. He died 1629 in the 44th year of his reign.

ABAS, Schah, the great grandſon of the preceding, ſucceeded his father in 1642 in his 13th year. He took Candahar from the Moguls, and reſiſted the attacks of 300,000 beſiegers. He was cut off by the lues venerea in his 37th year, Sep. 25, 1666.

ABASSA, an officer who revolted againſt Muſtapha I. emperor of the Turks, and afterwards was employed againſt the Poles 1634 at the head of 60,000 men. The cowardice of his troops robbed him of the victory, and he was ſtrangled by order of the Sultan.

ABASSA, a ſiſter of Aaron Raſchid, whoſe hand was beſtowed by her brother on Giafar, on condition that ſhe abſtained from the marriage rights. The promiſe was forgotten, and the huſband's life was ſacrificed by the tyrant, and Abaſſa reduced to poverty. There are ſtill extant ſome Arabic verſes which beautifully celebrate her love and her misfortunes.

ABASSON, an impoſtor, who, under the character of the grandſon of Abbas the great, obtained the patronage of the court of France and of the grand ſeignior by whoſe orders he was at laſt beheaded.

ABATE, Andrew, a painter of Naples, engaged in the ſervice of the Spaniſh king. He died 1732. His fruit pieces and landſcapes were admired.

ABAUZIT, Firmin, born at Uzes 1679, fled from the perſecution which attended his parents on account of their profeſſion of proteſtantiſm, and retired to Geneva. As he had early loſt his father, his education was promoted by the care of his mother, who had the happineſs to diſcover that the ſmall remains of her ſhattered fortune were amply compenſated by the improvement of her ſon. Abauzit, diſtinguiſhed for his ſuperior progreſs in every branch of polite learning, but particularly mathematics and natural hiſtory, became the friend of Bayle, of Jurieu, and Baſnage, and was honored with the friendſhip of St. Evremond and the correſpondence of Newton; and invited by William III. by offers of liberal patronage to ſettle in England, but the remembrance brance of Geneva, the asylum of his infant years, made him decline the generosity of the monarch. Though he chose rather to assist his friends than solicit fame in his own person, he republished Spon's history of his favorite city, which he enriched with two dissertations, and other valuable explanations. As he grew in years, he continued to encrease in fame, and he was flattered by Voltaire and Rousseau. He was an Arian in religion, and died 1767.

Abbadie, James, D.D. a celebrated protestant minister born at Nay in Berne 1654, or according to others 58. After improving himself in France and Holland, he settled at Berlin, at the solicitation of the elector, where he enforced the duties of religion and morality, and gained by persuasive eloquence the favor of the prince and people. After his patron's death, he was patronised by king William, whose cause he supported by his pen, and was made minister of the Savoy, and afterwards advanced to the deanry of Killaloe in Ireland. He died in London 1727. Well informed as a writer, and eloquent as a preacher, he was universally respected. His writings were mostly on divinity. Besides his treatise on the Christian religion, he published a defence of the revolution, and an account of the late conspiracy in England, compiled from the materials furnished by the earl of Portland, and by Trumbull.

Abbas, Halli, a physician, and one of the Persian magi, who followed the doctrines of Zoroaster. He wrote A.D. 980, a book called Royal Work at the request of the caliph's son, to whom it was dedicated. It was translated into Latin by Stephen of Antioch, 1127.

Abbas, the uncle of Mahomet, opposed the ambitious views of the impostor, but when defeated in the battle of Bedr, he was not only reconciled to his nephew but he warmly embraced his religion, and thanked heaven for the prosperity and the grace which he enjoyed as a mussulman. He served the cause of Mahomet at the battle of Honain by recalling his dismayed troops to the charge, and inciting them boldly to rally round their prophet who was near expiring under the scymetars of the Thakesites. His son, of the same name, became still more celebrated by his knowledge of the koran. Abbas was regarded with such veneration that the caliphs Omar and Othman never appeared before him without dismounting from their horses. He died in the 32d year of the hegira; and 100 years after, Abulabbas Saffah his grandson, investing himself with sovereign power, laid the foundation of the dynasty of the Abbasides, which continued to be transmitted in his family from father to son 524 years, during a succession of 37 caliphs, till they were dispossessed by the Tartars. Abbas Abdallah, the grandson of Abbas the uncle of the prophet, was also distinguished as a teacher of the sacred book; as, before he was 10 years of age, he was said to have received inspiration from the angel Gabriel.

Abbassa, vid. Abassa.

Abbategio, Marian d', an ecclesiastic of the 14th century, made governor of Aquila.

Abbatissa, Paul, a famous Sicilian poet, born at Messina, 1570. He translated into Italian verse Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, and Ovid's Metamorphoses.

Abbiati, Philip, an historical painter of Milan, who died 1715, aged 75.

Abbon, a monk of St. Germain des Près, who was present at the siege of Paris by the Normans at the close of the 9th century. He wrote an account of this event in 1200 verses in execrable Latin, but, however, valuable for its fidelity and impartial minuteness.

Abbon, de Fleury, an ecclesiastic of Orleans, who became abbot of Fleury, and supported with energy the rights of the monastic order against the intrusions of the bishops. He was employed by king Robert to appease Gregory V. who wished to place the kingdom of France under an interdict. He was killed in a quarrel between the French and Gascons, 1004, whilst he endeavoured to introduce a reform in the abbey of Reole in Gascony. Besides canons explaining the duty of kings and subjects, there is a volume of his letters extant, printed 1687, folio.

Abbot, George, archbishop of Canterbury, son of a clothworker, was born at Guildford in Surrey 1562. After receiving his education at the grammar school in his native town he became a member and fellow of Baliol college in Oxford, where he soon distinguished himself as a preacher. He was chosen master of University college in 1599, installed dean of Winchester, and after serving three times with dignity and moderation the office of vice chancellor, he was consecrated bishop of Lichfield and Coventry 1609. He was the second of the Oxford divines whom king James appointed to translate the new testament, except the epistles; and he was employed to establish and cement an union beween the churches of England and Scotland. After a rapid translation to the see of London he was, on the death of Bancroft 1610, raised to the primacy, and in this high situation he maintained a noble character. The evening of his life was darkened by a melancholy event, which his enemies wished to convert to his degradations. As he amused himself with a crossbow in the grounds of lord Zouch in Hampshire, where he retired for recreation every summer, he accidentally killed the park keeper by an arrow which he aimed at a deer. This homicide was attended with a settled melancholy in the archbishop, who as an atonement for the accident granted an annuity of 20l. to the widow, and ever after once a month observed the fatal day, Tuesday, in penitence and prayer. His conduct however was misrepresented, and though James remarked that "an angel might have miscarried in this sort," a commission was directed to enquire whether he was incapacitated from performing the duties of his office. He was honorably restored to his functions, the king passed a pardon and a dispensation by which he was cleared from all scandal, irregularity, or infamation. From infirmity he was unable to attend the council, though he was present at the last illness of the king, and he assisted at the coronation of Charles I. By the intrigues of Buckingham he was disgracefully dismissed from the powers of primate, and ordered to withdraw to Canterbury, while the episcopal authority was exercised by commission by five prelates. He was however soon after restored to his full prerogative; but neither the threats of his enemies, nor the enmity of Laud and Buckingham, could prevail against his determinate zeal in support of the rights of the subject, and the liberty of conscience. He did not long preserve the royal favor, he died at Croydon on the fifth of August 1633, in his 71st year, and was buried in the church of Holy Trinity at Guildford, where a stately monument was erected over his grave by his brother Maurice. In his general character Abbot was moderate and inoffensive; though a rigid calvinist, he recommended to his clergy rather to gain the public esteem by morality than claim it as due to their office. He was benevolent and humane, and among other acts of charity he endowed with an income of 300l. a year, a hospital at Guildford. His publications were chiefly divinity, besides treatises occasioned by the situation of the times.

ABBOT, Maurice, youngest brother of the archbishop, was employed in the direction of the East India company's concerns respecting the Molucca Islands, which were in the hands of the Dutch. He was employed in 1624 in establishing the settlement of Virginia, and he was the first person on whom Charles I. conferred the honor of knighthood. He was elected representative for London, and in 1638 was mayor of the city. He died 1640. His son George was of Merton college, where he took the degree of LL.B. 1630, and during the civil wars he defended Caldecote Hall, in Warwickshire, against the attacks of prince Maurice and Rupert. He died 1648, aged 44. He published a paraphase on Job, 1640,—Vindiciæ Sabbati 1641,—brief notes on the Psalms 1651.

ABBOT, Robert, DD. eldest brother of the two preceding was born at Guildford, and educated at Baliol college. He was elected master of his college 1609, and he enforced obedience, regularity, and temperance in his society. His eloquence as a preacher recommended him to further patronage; he was appointed chaplain to the king, and regius professor of divinity at Oxford. Laud was one of those who felt the severity of his oratory, and in a discourse in which the preacher inveighed against the arts of the puritans and the friends of the Romish church, the eyes of the audience were fixed upon the future archbishop, and created confusion and shame. On the vacancy of Salisbury 1615, the king nominated Abbot to the see, and he was consecrated by his brother at Lambeth. The infirmities of a sedentary life however checked the intended improvements and reformation of the new prelate. He died March 2d, 1617, in his 58th year, and was one of the five bishops who in six successive years were installed at Salisbury. He was buried in his cathedral. His writings were principally controversial, and some of his MSS. were presented to the Bodleian by Dr. Corbet, who married one of his daughters, and was rector of Haseley, Oxfordshire.

ABBT, Thomas, the German translator of Sallust, and the admired author of a treatise "on merit," and of another "of dying for one's country," was born at Ulm and died at Buckeberg 1766, aged 28.

ABDALCADER, a Persian, who was greatly revered for his learning, his piety, and the sanctity of his manners. His prayers breathed the spirit of Christianity; "Almighty God, said he, in his devotions, I never forget thy bounty; my adoration is perpetually directed to thee, deign therefore sometimes to remember and pity my infirmities."

ABDALLAH, father of Mahomet, was a slave and a driver of camels, who however possessed such merit that his hand was solicited in marriage by the fairest and the most virtuous of the women of his tribe. He was then in his 75th or 85th year, but so universally admired that on the night of his nuptials 100 young females expired in despair. His wife, though long barren, at last became mother of Mahomet.

ABDALLAH, son of Zobair, was proclaimed caliph of Mecca and Medina, after the expulsion of Yesid. He was besieged in Mecca by the successor of Yesid in Syria, and put to death 733.

ABDALLAH, a son of Yesid, celebrated as a mussulman lawyer in the 7th century.

ABDALLAH, son of Abbas, endeavoured to raise his family on the ruins of the Ommiades. He was defeated by his rivals, and afterwards perfidiously murdered 754.

ABDALMALEK, son of Marvan, was 5th caliph of the Ommiades, and began to reign 685. He surpassed his predecessors in military exploits, and extended his power as far as Spain in the west, and India in the east. He was called Abulzebab, because his breath was so offensive that it killed the very flies that settled on his lips. He reigned 21 years, and was succeeded by Valid the eldest of his 16 sons.

ABDALMALEK,

ABDALMALEK, the laſt of the caliphs of the race of the Samanides, was dethroned and murdered by Mahmoud 999, after a ſhort reign diſgraced by effeminancy.

ABDALRAHMAN or ABDERAMES, vid. ABDERAMES.

ABDAS, a biſhop in Perſia, who, by demoliſhing a pagan temple of the ſun, excited the public indignation. He was the firſt victim of a perſecution, which called for the interference of Theodoſius the younger in favor of the Chriſtians, and which during 30 years produced carnage, and deſolation, between the Roman and Perſian empires.

ABDEMELEK, king of Fez and Morocco, was dethroned by his nephew Mahomet, but, he afterwards defeated Sebaſtian king of Portugal, who had landed in Africa to ſupport the uſurper. The two African monarchs and Sebaſtian fell on the field, 1578.

ABDERAMES, a caliph of the race of the Ommiades. He was invited into Spain by the Saracens who had revolted from Joſeph, and after he had conquered the whole kingdom he aſſumed the title of king of Corduba. He died 790, after reigning 32 years.

ABDERAMES, a Saracen general of the caliph Heſcham, who penetrated into Aquitain and Poitou, and was at laſt defeated by Charles Martel near Poitiers, 732.

ABDERAMES, a petty prince in the kingdom of Morocco, who murdered Amadin his predeceſſor and nephew, and was himſelf after a long reign aſſaſſinated by a chieftain whoſe death he meditated, 1505.

ABDIAS, a native of Babylon, who pretended to be one of the 72 diſciples of our Saviour. He wrote a legendary treatiſe called Hiſtoria certaminis Apoſtolici, full of contradiction and abſurdity.

ABDISSI, a patriarch of Aſſyria, who paid homage to pope Pius IV. 1562, and extended the power of the Romiſh church in the eaſt.

ABDON, a Perſian, who ſuffered martyrdom in ſupport of chriſtianity under Decius, 250.

ABDULMUMEN, a man of obſcure origin, who ſeized the crown of Morocco, by deſtroying the royal family, and extended his dominions by the conqueſt of Tunis, Fez, and Tremecen. He meditated the invaſion of Spain, when death ſtopped his career 1156. His ſon Joſeph II. carried his views of ambition into effect.

ABEILLE, Gaſpard, a native of Riez in Provence, 1648. His wit procured him the friendſhip of Luxembourg, who at his death recommended him to Conti, and Vendome. His animated converſation proved agreeable to his patrons, and his witticiſms were attended with peculiar effect when delivered with all the grimace of a wrinkled and deformed countenance artfully diſtorted, to expreſs the moſt ludicrous ejaculations. He was at the head of a priory, and had a place in the French academy. Beſides odes and epiſtles he wrote ſeveral tragedies, one comedy, and two operas, in a ſtile languid and unintereſting. He died at Paris 1718.

ABEILLE, Scipio, brother of the preceding, publiſhed an excellent hiſtory of the bones, 12mo. 1685, beſides ſome poetry and a treatiſe relative to the employment which he held in the army, in 12mo. 1669. He died 1697.

ABEL, ſecond ſon of Adam, was cruelly maſſacred by his brother Cain, becauſe his ſacrafice was accepted by the Almighty with greater favor than that of his murderer.

ABEL, king of Denmark, and ſon of Valdimar II. quarrelled with his eldeſt brother Eric, and murdered him to uſurp his throne 1250. He was killed in battle two years after, during an inſurrection of the Friſons.

ABEL, Frederick Gottfried, a native of Halberſtadt, who abandoned divinity for the purſuit of medicine, and took his doctor's degree at Koningſberg 1744. He publiſhed a poetical tranſlation of Juvenal in German 1788 and after practiſing in his native town died there 1794 aged 80.

ABEL, Charles Frederick, an eminent muſician whoſe performances on the viol digamba were much admired. He died 1787.

ABELA, John Francis, a commander of the order of Malta, known by an excellent work called Malta illuſtrata, in four books in fol. 1647.

ABELARD, Peter, a native of Palais near Nantes in Britany, born 1079, who became celebrated for his learning and his misfortunes. After being the pupil and friend of William de Champeaux, a famous profeſſor of philoſophy at Paris, he declared himſelf his rival, and opened a ſchool at Melun, which he afterwards removed to Cabeil, where the diſplay of his abilities drew numbers of pupils. Illneſs however, interrupted his career, and after two years ſpent with his family in Britany he returned to Paris, and by the ſuperiority of his mental powers he had the intereſt to gain the profeſſorial chair which the ſucceſſor of Champeaux reſigned to become the pupil of this famous logician. After violent ſtruggles with Champeaux and his partiſans, Abelard retired to Laon, where he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of divinity. Here he brought on himſelf the reſentment of Anſelm, who delivered lectures on theology, and he again retired to Paris, where his explanations of Ezekiel gathered around him crowded audiences. Naturally vain of his perſon, which was graceful and engaging, and not unconſcious of the reputation which his learning had acquired, he liſtened to the applauſes of one ſex, and received with avidity the admiration and the praiſes of the other. Amongſt thoſe whoſe favors he he could gain, he ſelected Heloiſe, whom her uncle Fulbert, a canon of Paris, was ambitious to render as ſuperior to her ſex in learning as ſhe was in perſonal charms. With this view Abelard was perſuaded to board in the houſe, and he was now entruſted with the education of the object of his heart whoſe improvement he was exhorted to promote by compulſion and even by ſtripes. The moments intended for mental inſtruction were ſoon devoted to love, and, as he ſays himſelf, our ſtudies now furniſhed us with that privacy and retirement which our paſſion deſired. Abelard now forgot the duties of his public life for the company of Heloiſe; his lectures were delivered with remiſſneſs, and ſoon his pupils ceaſed to frequent his ſchool. The paſſion of the lovers however was unveiled to the public eye, but Fulbert alone remained unconſcious of the guilt of the preceptor until the ſituation of the unfortunate Heloiſe at laſt filled him with reſentment. Abelard fled from the houſe, and perſuaded ſoon after Heloiſe to retire to his ſiſter's houſe in Britany, where ſhe gave birth to a ſon, whom ſhe called Aſtrolabus. The indignation of the uncle was pacified by offers of marriage from Abelard, and Heloiſe, though actuated by the ſingular wiſh of being the miſtreſs rather than the wife of the man ſhe loved, with difficulty conſented. The nuptial bleſſing was pronounced in private; but whilſt Fulbert wiſhed the union to be publicly known, Heloiſe diſdained to acknowledge it, and even ſolemnly denied it with an oath. Her conduct irritated Fulbert, and Abelard removed her from his purſuit to the convent of Argenteuil, where ſhe aſſumed the religious habit but not the veil. This however incenſed the reſentment of her family, who ſeemed to dread further treachery from the lovers, and ruffians were hired, who in the dead of night introduced themſelves into the unſuſpecting huſband's chamber and inhumanly deprived him of his manhood. Abelard fled upon this to a cloiſter, where he concealed his confuſion from the public eye by aſſuming the habit of St. Denys. Here the immorality of the monks rouſed his indignation, and after he had wandered on the territories of the count of Champagne, he retired to a ſolitary place in the dioceſe of Troyes, where he built an oratory, which he called the Paraclete. His reputation and his misfortunes here drew around him a number of pupils, and by his eloquence the ſolitude of his reſidence was converted into a popular aſſemblage of theologians and philoſophers. New perſecutions however again awaited him; St. Bernard attacked him with ſuch virulence, that he left Troyes and fled to the abbey of Ruis in the dioceſe of Vannes, where the monks had elected him their ſuperior. It might however be ſome conſolation to him in his misfortunes to dedicate the Paraclete to the reſidence of Heloiſe and her ſiſter nuns, who had been driven from Argenteuil. He had ſcarcely entered upon his office at Ruis than the monks, whoſe morals he wiſhed to reform, began to perſecute him, and even to attempt his life by poiſon. His writings on the Trinity likewiſe brought upon him the accuſation of hereſy from the archbiſhop of Sens, and as he demanded to make his defence, a council was aſſembled, in which Lewis VII. aſſiſted, and St. Bernard appeared as the accuſer. Abelard terrified at the ſolemnity of the ſcene, inſtead of defending himſelf, declared, that he appealed to Rome, and immediately left the aſſembly. His conduct was conſidered as a proof of his guilt; and pope Innocent II. was ſolicited by the council to condemn his writings to the flames, and his perſon to perpetual impriſonment. The ſentence however was delayed by the interceſſion of Peter abbot of Clugni. Abelard was received again into the boſom of the church and even reconciled to his perſecutor St. Bernard. In the peaceful retreat of Clugni, in the friendſhip of Peter, who had received the melancholy wanderer with hoſpitality, the huſband of Heloiſe forgot his misfortunes, and in his intercourſe with the monks he exemplified the virtues of humility and reſignation, which he frequently enforced to them with the eloquence of youth. He died ſoon after at the abbey of St. Marcellus on the Saon near Chalons, April 21ſt, 1142, aged 63, and his remains were claimed by the unfortunate Heloiſe, who depoſited them in the Paraclete, and who, while ſhe paid honor to his memory as the founder of her houſe, ſtill remembered him with the keenneſs of anguiſh as the former object of her love. She ſurvived him till the 17th May 1163, and was buried in the ſame tomb, where her bones ſtill repoſe, though removed to a different part of the church; and an inſcription and monument, raiſed by madame de Courcy, the abbeſs, in 1780, point out the venerated ſpot. The loves of Abelard and Heloiſe have been immortalized by the pen of Pope; but the genius of the poet however brilliant cannot throw a veil over the failings of the man. If we execrate the conduct of Abelard to Heloiſe while in the houſe of Fulbert, we cannot but contemplate with encreaſed indignation the indifference with which he treats in his letters the affections and the friendſhip of the abbeſs of the Paraclete. Whilſt he languiſhed during the decline of life under the unmanly vengeance of Fulbert, he forgot that Heloiſe once, virtuous had ſacrificed her honor and happineſs to his paſſion. The writings of Abelard are moſtly on divinity or logical ſubjects, but his letters excite intereſt from the ſenſibility, and the elegance which Heloiſe has infuſed into them. A voluminous life of theſe two lovers has been publiſhed in Engliſh by Berrington.

ABELL, John, an Engliſh muſician known for for a fine countertenor voice, and for his ſkill on the lute. He quitted England, where he had been patroniſed by Charles II., and went to Warſaw where he was invited to court. He evaded the invitation, till obliged to attend in conſequence of a ſecond order, he found himſelf in the midſt of a large hall, ſeated in a chair which was ſuddenly drawn up oppoſite a gallery, where the king appeared with his nobles. At the ſame inſtant a number of bears were let looſe below, and the terrified muſician was ordered by the king to chuſe either to ſing or be let down among the ferocious animals. Abell choſe to ſing, and afterwards declared he never exerted himſelf with ſuch ſucceſsful powers before. He returned to England, where he publiſhed a collection of ſongs dedicated to William 1701. The time of his death is unknown. He is ſuppoſed to have had ſome ſecret by which he preſerved the natural powers of his voice to his laſt moments.

ABELLA, a female writer born at Salerne, in the reign of Charles of Anjou. Among other books on medicine ſhe wrote a treatiſe de atrâ bili.

ABELLI, Lewis, a native of Vexin Francois, made biſhop of Rhodes. After three years' reſidence he abdicated his epiſcopal office, and choſe privacy at St. Lazare in Paris, in the boſom of literary eaſe. He died there 1691 in his 88th year. He publiſhed among other works Medulla theologica, in a ſtyle harſh and inelegant.

ABENDANA, Jacob, a Spaniſh Jew who died 1685, prefect of the ſynagogue in London. He wrote a Specilegium, or Hebrew explanation of ſelect paſſages in the ſcriptures.

ABENEZRA, Abraham, a Spaniſh rabbi, ſurnamed the wiſe, great, and admirable, for the extent of his learning. Though ſkilled in geometry, aſtronomy, and poetry, he preferred the explanation of the ſcriptures. His commentaries are highly valued, and alſo his Jeſud mora, in which he recommends the ſtudy of the Talmud. He died 1174, aged about 75.

ABENGNEFIL, an Arabian phyſician of the 12th century, wrote de virtutibus medicinarum & ciborum, fol Venice 1581.

ABENMELEK, a learned rabbi who wrote in Hebrew a commentary on the bible, Amſterdam, 1661, in fol. tranſlated into Latin in 4to. and 8vo.

ABERCROMBIE, ſir Ralph, an Engliſh general celebrated for his bravery. He in 1760 obtained a lieutenancy in the third of dragoon guards, and two years after he became captain of the third regiment of horſe, and in 1773 lieutenant colonel of that corps. He earneſtly ſtudied the duties of the military profeſſion; and in the revolutionary war of France, he was one of the officers employed to ſupport the Auſtrians, and in the famous action on the heights of Cateau he conducted himſelf with ſuch bravery that he was particularly noticed in the diſpatches of the commander in chief. Ever foremoſt in feats of danger or glory, ſir Ralph was ſlightly wounded at the affair of Nimeguen; and in the winter of 1796 when the treachery of the Dutch rendered the continuance of the Engliſh troops no longer neceſſary in Holland, he had the care of the retreat of his brave countrymen. After ſupporting the honor of the Britiſh arms in the Weſt Indies as commander in chief and reducing ſeveral of the enemy's colonies, he was made a knight of the bath, governor of the Iſle of Wight and forts George and Auguſtus, and raiſed to the rank of lieutenant general. During his reſidence in Ireland as commander in chief, his whole time was laudably devoted to the health and diſcipline of his troops, and to the re-eſtabliſhment of concord and mutual attachment among the native Iriſh. In the attack made on Holland, at the landing at the Helder, and in the ſubſequent actions, he evinced judicious arrangement and military ſkill, ſo that even the French themſelves were eager to admire and commend him. In the Egyptian expedition, the popularity of the veteran chief marked him as deſtined to gather freſh laurels for his country. After a long delay on the ſhores of the Mediterranean, ſir Ralph landed at Aboukir, in ſpite of the obſtinate oppoſition of the French, eighth March 1801, and advanced boldly towards Alexandria. On the 21ſt March a bloody battle was fought between the two armies, and the French, who had attempted to ſeize the Engliſh by ſurpriſe, found themſelves unable to withſtand the impetuoſity of their opponents, and retired diſmayed and conquered. This brilliant victory however was dearly bought; ſir Ralph, whilſt animating his troops, received a muſket ball in the hip, and died ſeven days after on board the fleet. His remains were conveyed to Malta, and there interred in the great church, where a noble monument with a becoming inſcription records his ſervices. The honors of the peerage were granted to his widow and to his children.

ABERCROMBY, Thomas, M.D. a native of Forfar, who after ſtudying medicine at St. Andrew's and Leyden, became phyſician to James II. by renouncing the proteſtant religion. The revolution ſoon after diſmiſſed him from the court, and he applied himſelf to celebrate the martial atchievements of Scotland, in 2 vols. fol. in the 1ſt of which he is fabulous and diſguſting, but in the 2d. learned and inſtructive. He died 1726 aged 70.

ABERNETHY, John, a diſſenting miniſter, born at Coleraine in Ireland, 1680. He removed to Scotland where he eſcaped the miſeries which his family endured at the ſiege of Derry; and after he had finiſhed his ſtudies at Glaſgow and obtained the degree of M.A. he returned to Ireland, and was appointed miniſter of the diſſenting congregation of Antrim.

His attempts to convert the catholics in his neighbourhood met with ſucceſs; but the concerns of religion were for a while diſregarded whilſt he purſued with more zeal than prudence the views of the Belfaſt nonconformiſts, a ſociety whoſe meaſures would have eventually proved dangerous to the tranquillity of the country. Abandoned by his congregation he retired to Dublin, where he became the paſtor of a ſmall ſociety in Wood Street, and for ten years diſplayed moderation in opinions and exemplary manners. He died of the gout 1740 in the 60th year of his age. He left ſeveral volumes of ſermons much eſteemed, publiſhed 1748, with an account of his life.

ABGARUS, a king of Edeſſa, famous for the letter which he is ſaid to have ſent to our Saviour, and for the anſwer he received. This legend, firſt divulged by Euſebius, who aſſerted that he copied it from the public records of Edeſſa, has been ſufficiently refuted by Spanheim, Du Pin, and Lardner, though ſupported by Cave and Pearſon as founded on fact.

ABGILLUS, ſon of the king of the Friſii, was ſurnamed Preſter John. He was in the Holy land with Charlemagne, and he is the reputed author of a hiſtory of his journey and that of Charlemagne into the eaſt.

ABIATHAR, ſon of Abimelech, was the high prieſt of the Jews, and the friend of David. After that monarch's death he eſpouſed the cauſe of Adonijah, in conſequence of which he was depoſed by Solomon and ſent into baniſhment 1014 B. C.

ABIGAIL, wife of Nabal, averted by her ſubmiſſive demeanour the vengeance which her huſband's inſolence towards David had brought upon him. The monarch, ſtruck with her beauty, married her after Nabal's death 1057 B.C.

ABIJAH, ſon of Rehoboam, was king of Judah after his father 958 years before Chriſt. He made war againſt Jeroboam and defeated him, and was ſucceeded by Aſa one of his 22 ſons.

ABIOSI, John, an Italian phyſician and aſtronomer, at the beginning of the 16th century, author of a dialogue on aſtrology.

ABLANCOURT, vid. PERROT.

ABLE or ABEL, Thomas, a chaplain at the court of Henry VIII. His attachment to the cauſe of Catharine, brought upon him the reſentment of the tyrant. He was accuſed as concerned in the affair of the holy maid of Kent, and ſentenced to die on pretence of denying the king's ſupremacy 1540. His writings are now loſt.

ABNER, ſon of Ner, was Saul's uncle, and his faithful general. After the monarch's death, he wiſhed to place Iſhboſheth on the throne, but afterwards followed the cauſe of David. He was perfidiouſly ſlain by Joab, and buried by his maſter, who honored his remains with an epitaph, 1048 B. C.

ABOUBEKER, vid. ABUBEKER.

ABOUGEHEL, one of the enemies of Mahomet and of his religion. Though his ſon Acramas became a convert to the tenets of the impoſtor, yet his father was for ever ſhut out from paradiſe; and ſo violent is the reſentment of the muſſulmans againſt this firſt enemy of their prophet, that they call the fruit coloquintida, or cucumis aſininus in contempt, the melon of Abougehel.

ABOU-HANIFAH, ſurnamed Al-nooman, a celebrated doctor among the muſſulmans, born in the 80th year of the hegira. Though he was impriſoned at Bagdat by the caliph, and though he died in his confinement, yet his learning, his virtues, and moderation found partizans in the eaſt, and 335 years after his deceaſe the ſultan Melikſhah erected a mauſoleum in the city where his remains were depoſited; and there were not wanting enthuſiaſts who declared that his name was enrolled in the old teſtament, and that his birth had been foretold as well as that of the prophet.

ABOU-JOSEPH, a learned muſſulman, appointed ſupreme judge of Bagdat by the caliphs Hadi and Aaron Raſchid. He ſupported the tenets of Abou-hanifah, and maintained the dignity of his office by impartiality. When one day reproached for his ignorance of one of the cauſes brought before him, for the deciſion of which he received an ample allowance, he jocoſely replied, that he recived in proportion as he knew; but, ſays he, If I was paid for all I do not know, the riches of the caliphat itſelf would not be ſufficient to anſwer my demand.

ABOULAINA, a muſſulman doctor, celebrated for his wit. When Moſes, ſon of the caliph Abdalmalek, put to death one of his friends, and afterwards ſpread a report that he had eſcaped, Aboulaina, ſaid in the words of the lawgiver of the Hebrews, Moſes ſmote him and he died. The ſentence was reported to the prince, and Aboulaina was ſummoned to appear. Inſtead of dreading the threats of the tyrant, he boldly replied in the words of the following verſe in Exodus, Wilt thou kill me to-day as thou killeſt the other man yeſterday? The ingenuity of the expreſſion diſarmed the anger of Moſes, who loaded him with preſents.

ABOU-LOLA, an Arabian poet, born at Maora in 973. Though he loſt his ſight in the 3d year of his age by the ſmall-pox, yet his poetry was animated, and his deſcriptions beautiful and intereſting. He became a brahmin, and died 1057.

ABOU-NAVAS, an Arabian poet, whoſe merit was protected at the court of Aaron Raſchid.

ABOU-RIHAN, a geographer and aſtronomer, who who employed 40 years of his life in travelling through the Indies.

ABRABANEL, Isaac, a Jew of Lisbon, who pretended to be descended from David king of Israel. He was employed by Alphonso V. king of Portugal; but on the accession of John II. he shared the disgrace of the ministry, and fled to Spain, where he applied himself to literature. His fame recommended him to Ferdinand and Isabel, but when the Jews were banished from Castille, he yielded to the storm, and found an asylum at the court of Ferdinand of Naples, but upon the defeat of the next monarch Alphonso by the French, he retired to Corfu, and at last to Venice, where he died in 1508, in his 71st year. His writings are chiefly commentaries or explanations of scripture, but they contain violent invectives against christianity.

ABRAHAM, the patriarch, was born at Ur in Chaldea, A.M. 2004. He lived at Haran in Mesopotamia with his father Terah who was an idolater, and there he was informed by God that he should be progenitor of a great nation. Despairing of raising children by Sarah he had a son, Ishmael, by Hagar his Egyptian slave, and afterwards was promised by the message of an angel, that his wife, though 90 years old, should bear him a son, and his name was by divine command changed from Abram, into Abraham, or the father of a great multitude. The promised son, Isaac, was born in due time, and the rites of circumcision established; but no sooner had Isaac reached his 25th year than God to try the fidelity of the father, demanded the sacrifice of his favorite son. Abraham obeyed, and seized the knife to slay his son, when an angel stopped his hand, and substituted a ram for the burnt sacrifice. After Sarah's death Abraham married Keturah, by whom he had six sons. He died in his 175th year.

ABRAHAM, Nicholas, a learned Jesuit in the diocese of Toul in Lorraine, for 17 years divinity professor at Pont a Mousson, where he died 1655, aged 66. His writings were on theological subjects.

ABRAHAM, Ben-chaila, a Spanish rabbi, skilled in astrology. He prophesied that the coming of the Messiah expected by the Jews would be in 1358. He died 1303, author of a treatise on the figure of the earth.

ABRAHAM, Ufque, a Jew of Portugal, though Arnaud considers him as a christian. He undertook with Tobias Athias to translate the bible into Spanish in the 16th century; but though accuracy seems to pervade the whole, yet it is justly viewed as a compilation from preceding Chaldee paraphrases and Spanish glossaries.

ABRAHAM, an emperor of the Moors of Africa in the 12th century, was dethroned by his subjects, and his crown usurped by Abdulmumen.

ABROSI, John, an Italian physician, wrote a dialogue on astrology, 4to, Venice 1494.

ABRUZZO, Balthasar, a Sicilian philosopher and civilian, who died 1665, aged 64.

ABRUZZO, Peter, a Neapolitan architect, in the 17th century. His taste and genius were displayed in the beautiful edifices he erected in Italy.

ABSALOM, son of David, was distinguished for his personal acquirements, his popularity, and his vices. He became the murderer of his brother Ammon, and headed a rebellion against his father. He was slain by Joab, and his death was bitterly lamented by David, about 1030 B. C.

ABSALOM, archbishop of Lunden in Denmark, is celebrated as the minister, the favorite, and the friend of Waldemir. He displayed his abilities in the cabinet, in the field, and as commander of the fleet. To these great qualities he added the virtues of a most humane and benevolent heart. He died 1202.

ABSTEMIUS, Laurentius, a native of Macerata, in the march of Ancona, who lived at the time of the revival of learning in Europe, and was patronised by the duke of Urbino. His writings were chiefly explanations of difficult passages, besides a collection of 100 fables after the manner of Æsop, &c. in which he frequently lashes the immorality of the clergy.

ABUBEKER, father-in-law of Mahomet, was elected his successor, in opposition to Ali the son-in-law of the prophet. He supported with energy the fabric erected by the impostor, and reduced several of the Arabian tribes who wished to abandon the new doctrines to return to the religion of their fathers. Afterwards Abubeker turned his arms against foreign nations, and by the valor of his active general Khaled he defeated an army of 200,000 men whom the Greek emperor Heraclius had sent to ravage Syria. His victories however were of short duration, a slow fever wasted his vigor, but before he died he appointed for his successor Omar, and after a reign of two years and six months he expired in his 63d year. He was buried in the tomb of Mahomet.

ABUCARA, Theodore, the metropolitan of Caria 869, abjured the tenets of Photius, and wrote several treatises against the Jews and Mahometans.

ABUDHAHER, the father of the Carmatians in Arabia, not only opposed the religion of Mahomet but plundered and insulted the temple of Mecca, and carried away the black stone which was superstitiously believed to have fallen from heaven. He died 953.

ABULFARAGIUS, Gregory, son of a Christian physician, was born at Malatia near the source of the Euphrates. He followed his father's profession sion but afterwards studied the eastern languages and divinity, and was ordained bishop of Guba in his 20th year, from whence he was translated to Lacabena and Aleppo. He wrote an Arabic history divided into dynasties, which is an epitome of universal history from the creation to his own time, published with a Latin translation 1663, by Dr. Pococke. He died 1286.

ABULFEDA, Ismael, succeeded his brother as king of Hamath in Syria 1342. When a private man he published in Arabic an account of the regions beyond the Oxus, edited by Grævius with a Latin translation, London 1650, and by Hudson, Oxford 1712. Abulfeda, who had passed some part of his life in England, died in 1345, aged 72.

ABULGASI-BAYATUR, khan of the Tartars, was descended from the great Zingis. After a reign of 20 years, during which he was respected at home and abroad, he resigned the sovereignty to his son, and retired to devote himself to literature. He wrote a genealogical history of the Tartars, truly valuable, as the only Tartar history known in Europe. It has been translated into German and French. He died 1663.

ABULOLA, vid. ABOULOLA.

ABU-MESLEM, a mussulman governor of Khorasan, who in 746 transferred the dignity of caliph from the family of the Ommiades to that of the Abbasides, and by that revolution occasioned the death of above 600,000 men. Almansor, whom he had supported by his services, threw him into the Tigris, 754.

ABUNDIUS, bishop of Come in Italy, assisted at the council of Constantinople, as representative to Leo, and died 469.

ABUNOWAS, an Arabian poet, patronised by Aaron Raschid. He died 810.

ABU-OBEIDAH, a friend and associate of Mahomet. He extended his conquests over Palestine and Syria, and died 639.

ABU-SAID-EBN-ALJAPTU, a sultan, the last of the family of Zingis-khan. After his death 1335, the empire was torn by civil discord.

ABUSAID MIRZA, a man of enterprize, who during the civil dissensions between Uleg Beg and his sons, placed himself at the head of an army, and at last was killed in an ambush, 1468, aged 42.

ABUTEMAM, a poet in high repute among the Arabians. The liberality of the caliphs who patronised him was the constant theme of his muse. He was born at Yasem between Damascus and Tiberias about 846.

ABYDENE, wrote an history of Chaldea and Assyria, of which only a few fragments have been preserved by Eusebius.

ACACIUS, surnamed LUSCUS, from having but one eye, was the founder of the sect of the Acaciani. When elevated to the episcopal dignity, he opposed Athanasius, and hastened the banishment of Liberius from Rome. He was himself deposed by the council of Sardica, and died 365. He wrote the life of Eusebius whose pupil and successor he was at Cæsarea.

ACACIUS, patriarch of Constantinople, 471, established the superiority of his see over the eastern bishops. He was opposed by pope Felix, but secure in the protection of Zeno, he derided the thunders of Rome. He died 489.

ACACIUS, bishop of Berea in Syria, persecuted Chrysostom and Cyril of Alexandria, and assisted at the council of Constantinople 381, in which were present 150 bishops. He died 432, very old.

ACACIUS, bishop of Amida on the Tigris, sold the sacred vessels of his churches to ransom 7000 Persian slaves, which generous action produced a peace between the Persian king and Theodosius the younger.

ACCA, bishop of Hexham, author of treatises on the sufferings of the saints, and other divinity works, was a great patron of learned men, and contributed much to the embellishment of his cathedral. He died at Hexham 740.

ACCARISI, James, a native of Bologna, professor of rhetoric at Mantua, published some learned works and died 1654.

ACCETTO, Reginald, an Italian, author of a thesaurus of the Italian tongue, died at Naples 1560.

ACCIAIOLI, Donatus, a native of Florence, who distinguished himself by his learning. Besides several treatises, he wrote commentaries on the ethics of Aristotle, and translated some of the lives of Plutarch. He died 1478 in his 50th year, at Milan. His daughters were portioned for marriage at the public expence, as a mark of the gratitude of the country to the virtues of the father.

ACCIAIOLI, Renatus, a noble Florentine who conquered Athens, Corinth, and Bœotia in the beginning of the 11th century. As he had no male issue by Eubois his wife, he divided his conquests, and gave Athens to the Venetians, Corinth to Theodorus Palæologus who had married his eldest daughter, and Bœotia to his natural son Antony, who afterwards seized Athens, of which his successors were dispossessed by Mahomet II. 1455.

ACCIAIOLI, Zenobio, a learned ecclesiastic of Florence, who for 19 years was librarian to Leo X. at Rome. Besides treatises and sermons, he published a collection of Politian's epigrams, and died 1537.

ACCIAIOLI, Magdalen, a native of Florence, celebrated for her beauty, but more for the powers of her mind. She was in great favor with Christina duchess of Tuscany, and wrote verses in a very pleasing stile. She began a heroic poem on the persecutions of David, but died before its completion 1610.

ACCIUS ZUCCHUS,

Accius Zucchus, an Italian poet of the 16th century, who paraphrased some of the fables of Æsop.

Accolti, Benedict, a lawyer of Florence, but originally of Arezzo, secretary to the republic. Besides an account of the great men of his time, he has written an account in three books of the war of the Christians against the Infidels, for the recovery of the Holy Land, from which Tasso has drawn the foundation of his Jerusalem delivered. He died 1466 aged 51.

Accolti, Francis, brother to Benedict, acquired an extensive reputation by the clearness of his judgment, the graces of his eloquence, and his knowledge of jurisprudence. He aspired to the purple, but Sixtus VI. in refusing it, flattered him with the compliment that such a promotion would deprive his pupils and the world of the advantages of his instruction. He died in 1470, author of some ill-digested law books, and incorrect translations of St. Chrysostom. As he was a native of Arezzo he is sometimes called Aretin. Vid. Aretin.

Accolti, Peter, a son of Benedict, patronised by the popes, and raised to the dignity of cardinal. He defended in his treatises the right of the pope over the crown of Naples, and died at Florence 1549, aged 52. His brother Benedict, duke of Nepi, distinguished himself by his Virginia, a comedy, and some small poems.

Accolti, Benedict, a man of violent passions, who conspired with five others to murder Pius IV. on pretence that he was not lawfully elected. He suffered capital punishment, 1564.

Accords, Stephen Tabourot, Seigneur des, an advocate in the parliament of Dijon, who distinguished himself by writing some sonnets, and other light pieces of poetry. His "Bigarrures" and "les Touches," though filled with wit and humor, yet contain indelicate passages, under the name of acrostics, rebuses, leonine verses, &c. He died 1561, aged 46.

Accurse, Francis, a native of Florence, professor of law at Bologna. Though surnamed the idol of lawyers, his glossary, printed at Lyons, in 6 vols. fol. 1627, is both inelegant and incorrect. He died about 1229, aged 78.

Accurse, Marius Angelo, a native of Aquila in the 16th century, eminent for his critical and literary abilities. His Diatribæ on ancient and modern authors, are valuable. He also published Ammianus Marcellinus, besides notes on Ovid, Solinus, Ausonius, and other classics.

Acerbo, Francis, a native of Nocera, author of some inferior poems at Naples, 1666.

Acesius, bishop of Constantinople, maintained at the council of Nice, that those who had committed any sin after being baptised, ought not to be again admitted into the church, though they might repent. Constantine told the austere prelate, Acesius, make a ladder for yourself and go to heaven alone.

Ach Van or Achen, John, an eminent historical painter born at Cologne. He died 1621, aged 55.

Achards, Eleazer Francis des, a native of Avignon. He was nominated bishop of Halicarnassus by Clement XII. and soon after sent to China as apostolic vicar to settle the disputes of the missionaries. After four years of labor and danger, he died at Cochin in 1741, aged 62. A tedious account of his mission had been published in three vols 12mo.

Achaleu, a British sovereign in the 6th century. When driven from his dominions he took refuge in Wales. He is mentioned with some commendation by Owen in his Cambrian biography, for having with his brother Arthanad performed a difficult journey up the Maelwg hills in Cardiganshire to avenge their father's death.

Achery, Dom Luc d', a native of St. Quintin in Picardy, author of several valuable publications, particularly editions of the Fathers. He died at Paris 1685, aged 76.

Achillini, Alexander, a Bolognese physician known by his publications on anatomy and medicine, published at Venice 1568 in folio. He gave the name of hammer and anvil to two of the auditory bones, and died in his 40th year 1512.

Achillini, Philotheus, a relation of the preceding, who wrote "il viridario," a respectable poem to honor the memory of Italian genius, and recommend morality. He died 1538.

Achillini, Claude, grand nephew of Alexander, was distinguished for his knowledge of medicine, theology, and jurisprudence. He was a professor of law at Parma, Ferrara, and Bologna, and gained the applauses of the sovereign pontif, and wrote a well known sonnet on the conquests of Lewis XIII. in Piedmont, which procured from Richelieu the liberal present of a chain of gold worth 1000 crowns. He died at Bologna 1640 in his 66th year.

Achmet I. emperor of Turkey son and successor of Mahomet III. made war against the Hungarians, and died 1617, aged 30.

Achmet II. succeeded his brother Solyman III. 1691, on the throne of Constantinople, and died in 1695.

Achmet III. son of Mahomet IV. was placed on the throne by the heads of a faction which had deposed his brother Mustapha II. He granted a friendly asylum to Charles XII. of Sweden, after the battle of Pultowa, and the kindness and the hospitality which marked the whole of his intercourse with that unfortunate ADAM, St. Victor, an eccleſiaſtic at Paris, who publiſhed ſome theological treatiſes. He died 1177.

ADAM, Scotus, a monkiſh writer born in Scotland, and educated at the monaſtery of Lindisferna now Holy Iſland, ſouth of Berwick, at that time famous for the learning of its profeſſors. ADAM, John, a Jeſuit of Bourdeaux, who wrote ſeveral treatiſes againſt the new diſciples of St. Auſtin, He died 1684.

ADAM, d'Orleton, a native of Hereford, biſhop of Wincheſter. He was intriguing and turbulent, and it is ſaid that the life of Edward II. was ſacrificed to this ambiguous expreſſion which he uſed: Edwardum regem occidere nolite timere bonum eſt, which, with and without punctuation after nolite, will admit of two very different meanings.

ADAM, John, a Jeſuit of Limoſin, profeſſor of philoſophy, wrote ſeveral works on theological ſubjects, and died at Bourdeaux 1684.

ADAMS, Sir Thomas, a native of Wem in Shropſhire, who after receiving his education in Cambridge, became a draper in London, and was lord mayor of London 1645. He was well acquainted with the privileges of the city, but his partiality to the royal cauſe rendered him ſuſpicious, and the republicans ſearched his houſe for the unfortunate Charles. His affection was afterwards transferred to the ſon, to whom during his exile he ſent as a preſent 10,100l. He accompanied Monk to Breda, to congratulate the monarch on his reſtoration, and for his loyalty he received the honor of knighthood and a baronetcy. He erected and nobly endowed a ſchool at his native place, founded the Arabic profeſſorſhip at Cambridge, and at his ſole expence printed the goſpel in Perſian, which he diſtributed in the eaſt. He died in his 81ſt year 1667, of the ſtone, and after death his body was opened and a calculus of the extraordinary weight of 25 ounces extracted, which is ſtill preſerved in the laboratory of Cambridge.

ADAMS, Thomas, fellow of Brazen Noſe, was tutor to perſons of rank during Cromwell's uſurpation, and officiated as chaplain to ſir Samuel Jones of Shropſhire, and to lady Clare of Northamptonſhire. He publiſhed "proteſtant union, or principles of religion," a valuable work, and died Dec. 11th, 1670.

ADAMS, Richard, a member of Brazen Noſe, miniſter of St. Mildred, Bread Street, from which he was ejected 1662. He wrote a few ſermons, and aſſiſted in the completion of Pool's annotations, and in the editing of Charnock's works and died 1698.

ADAMS, William, D. D. fellow and afterwards maſter of Pembroke college Oxford, was the friend of Dr. Johnſon, and diſtinguiſhed for the urbanity of his manners and the extent of his learning. He wrote ſome tracts and ſermons, and acquired celebrity by the manner in which he attacked the tenets of Hume. It was during this controverſy that the hiſtorian obſerved that he was the only perſon who maintained the diſpute with the manners of a gentleman. He died 1789, beloved by the ſociety over which he preſided for fourteen years.

ADAMSON, Patrick, a native of Perth, who, after ſtudying at St. Andrew's, travelled into France, as tutor, and with difficulty eſcaped the maſſacres of Paris. On his return to Scotland he was appointed miniſter of Paiſley, and afterwards by the intereſt of lord Moreton, he was raiſed to the archbiſhopric of St. Andrew's In this elevated ſituation, though ſurrounded with difficulties, James VI. ſupported him, and ſent him as his ambaſſador to England, where his eloquence and his addreſs gained him admirers, and raiſed ſuch a tide of popularity in favor of the young king his maſter, that the jealouſy of Elizabeth forbade him again to aſcend the pulpit while at her court. In 1584 he was recalled home, and ſo violent was the irritation of the preſbyterians againſt him, that, at a provincial ſynod, he was accuſed and excommunicated. His life became thus a ſcene of perſecution; even the monarch grew deaf to his petitions, and alienated the revenues of his ſee in favor of the duke of Lenox, ſo that Adamſon had to add to the indignities offered to his office, the more poignant ſufferings of indigence in the midſt of a ſtarving family. He died 1591, in his 48th year. A 4to. volume of his works was publiſhed, containing tranſlations of ſome of the books of the bible into Latin verſe.

ADDISON, Lancelot, D.D. ſon of a clergyman of the ſame name, born at Maulds Meaburne in Weſtmoreland, was educated at Queen's college Oxford, where his ſatirical reflections on the pride, ignorance, and hypocriſy of his ſuperiors in an oration 1658, cauſed ſuch irritation that he obtained forgiveneſs only by a public recantation on his knees. He was afterwards chaplain at Dunkirk and at Tangier, and in conſideration of his ſervices, he was preferred to the living of Milſton and a Sarum prebend, and in 1683 to the deanry of Lichfield and the archdeaconry of Coventry. He died April the 20th 1703, aged 71, and was buried at Lichfield. He wrote ſeveral valuable treatiſes, among which were his hiſtorical obſervations while reſident in Africa,—an account of the preſent ſtate of the Jews, &c.

ADDISON, Joſeph, ſon of Dr. Lancelot Addiſon, was born May 1ſt, 1672, at Milſton near Ambroſbury, Wiltſhire, of which his father was rector. He appeared ſo weak and ſo unlikely to live that he was chriſtened the the ſame day. After paſſing through the rudiments of his education under Mr. Naiſh, of his native place, Mr. Taylor of Saliſbury, and Mr. Shaw of Lichfield, he was placed at the Charter-houſe under Dr. Ellis, where his intimacy began with ſir Richard Steele. At Oxford he entered at Queen's college and two years after, 1689, was elected demy of Magdalen. His academical hours were not here devoted to bacchanalian orgies, or diſgraceful intrigues; but the powers of the mind were cultivated and improved, and the frequent compoſition of Latin verſes produced ſuch correctneſs of ſtile and elegance of diction that the Muſæ Anglicanæ alone would give celebrity to the name of Addiſon. In his 22d year, he addreſſed ſome verſes to Dryden, and tranſlated part of Virgil's fourth georgic on the bees. As his friends increaſed with his popularity, the ſtudent was gradually converted into the courtier and he was introduced by Congreve to Montague chancellor of the exchequer, a man who in diſcerning merit did not wiſh it to be forgotten that flattery is a tribute paid to power. By the advice of Montague, Addiſon laid aſide his intention of taking orders; and ſtudying the temper of the times, he publiſhed a poem addreſſed to king William, and two years after celebrated the peace of Ryſwick in Latin verſes, which paved the way to a penſion of 300l. a year, and claimed the ſtill more honorable merit of being, in the opinion of Smith, the beſt Latin poem ſince the Æneid. Raiſed now to eaſy circumſtances, he travelled to Italy, and with the eyes and the genius of a claſſical poet ſurveyed the monuments and the heroic deeds of ancient Rome, which he deſcribed in his famous epiſtle to lord Halifax, the moſt elegant if not the moſt ſublime of his productions. He wrote here alſo his dialogues on medals, and according to Tickell ſome acts of his Cato; and after a reſidence of two years returned to England 1702. He publiſhed his travels, with a dedication to lord Somers, and ſo great was its popularity that the book roſe to five times its original price before it could be reprinted. When the victory of Blenheim was obtained, Godolphin looked out for a poet equal to celebrate the glory of his country, and Addiſon was recommended by Halifax; and ſoon after, when he had read to his patron what he had written, as far as the ſimile of the angel, he was appointed commiſſioner of appeals. On the following year he accompanied Halifax to Hanover, and was the next year made under-ſecretary of ſtate. When the duke of Wharton went as viceroy to Ireland, Addiſon accepted the place of his ſecretary, and, with a ſalary of 300 pounds a year as keeper of the records of Birmingham, he made a rule as Swift obſerves, of never returning to his friends, out of politeneſs, the fees due to his office. During his reſidence in Ireland the firſt paper of the Tatler was publiſhed by Steele, April the 22d, 1709, unknown to him, though he ſoon diſcovered by the inſertion of a remark on Virgil, which had originated in himſelf, who the author was. The Tatler was ſucceeded in about two months by the Spectator, a ſeries of eſſays of the ſame nature, but written with leſs levity, and upon a more regular plan, and publiſhed daily. In 1713 the Cato was produced on the ſtage, and was the grand climacteric of Addiſon's reputation. The laſt act was compoſed with haſte, and a houſe was aſſembled by the intrigues of Steele to judge of the merits of his friend's performance. As the nation was at that time heated by party ſpirit, the production was conſidered as political craft. The whigs applauded every line which extolled liberty, as a ſatire on the tories; and the tories reechoed every clap to ſhew that the ſatire was unfelt. When the play was printed, the queen expreſſed a wiſh it might be dedicated to her, but as Addiſon had promiſed it elſewhere, as a man of honor he could not retract, and Cato appeared without a patron; but ſuch was its popularity, that it was tranſlated into ſeveral languages, and introduced upon ſome of the other theatres of Europe. During the repreſentation of Cato, Steele publiſhed another daily paper called the Guardian, to which Addiſon contributed much of his aſſiſtance. In this publication his papers were diſtinguiſhed by a hand; in the Spectator they are marked by one of the letters which compoſe the name of the muſe Clio. Succeſs in literature did not render Addiſon indolent or conceited, and Steele has attributed to him the comedy of the Drummer. Political diſcuſſions occaſionally engaged the attention of Addiſon, and on temporary topics he wrote the preſent ſtate of the war,—the whig examiner,—the trial of count Tariff; pamphlets which diſappeared with the ſubjects which gave them birth. Some time after, an attempt was made to revive the Spectator, and 80 numbers were publiſhed, of which a fourth part was by Addiſon; and theſe papers, perhaps more valuable than the others, for the religious and moral topics which they diſcuſs, were collected to form an 8vo. volume. On the death of queen Anne, Addiſon who had been appointed ſecretary to the regency, was officially required to announce to the elector of Hanover his acceſſion to the Engliſh throne. He was however ſo overpowered by the greatneſs of the event, that the lords grew tired while waiting for the niceties of his expreſſions, and Southwell one of the clerks of the office, was directed to cloſe the diſpatches, which he immediately completed in the common ſtyle of buſineſs, not a little elated that he could do what ſeemed ſo difficult for the gigantic powers of Addiſon. He publiſhed the Freeholder twice a week, from December 23d, 1715, to the papal chair November 1154, and he received on his elevation the congratulations of Henry II. of England, who thus paid homage to a man who a few years before had left his kingdom as a mendicant. Henry received the papal permiſſion when he undertook the conqueſt of Ireland. In his government of Rome, Adrian was jealous of his power; he repreſſed the inſurrections of the conſuls, and he rendered the king of Sicily ſubmiſſive to his temporal authority. The emperor of Germany likewiſe acknowledged his power, and after holding the ſtirrup whilſt his ſpiritual maſter mounted on horſeback, he owned his dependence on the ſee of Rome. Yet in the midſt of proſperity, Adrian felt the oppreſſive weight of greatneſs, and in a familiar converſation with his countryman John of Saliſbury, he complained that an elevated ſituation is not always the parent of happineſs. He died September 1ſt, 1559, in the fourth year and tenth month of his pontificate, and was buried in St. Peter's church.

ADRIAN, V. a native of Genoa, raiſed to the pontificate in 1276. He died 38 days after.

ADRIAN, VI. a native of Utrecht, of obſcure birth. His abilities gradually raiſed him to conſequence; he was preceptor to the emperor Charles V. and was elected pope in 1522, but died after a ſhort and turbulent reign of one year.

ADRIAN, de Caſtello, born at Cornetto in Tuſcany of obſcure parentage, was employed by the popes as legate in Scotland and England. By the friendſhip of Morton the primate, and the patronage of Henry VII., he was raiſed to the biſhopric of Hereford, and afterwards of Bath and Wells. He chiefly reſided at Rome, where he conſpired againſt pope Leo X. in expectation of being raiſed to the pontificate. He was fined 12,500 ducats, and forbidden to leave Rome; but afterwards fled from the city. The time of his death is unknown. Polydore Virgil who ſhared his friendſhip has beſtowed the higheſt encomium upon his character.

ADRIANI, John Baptiſt, a noble of Florence, ſecretary to the republic, and diſtinguiſhed as a ſtateſman and a man of letters. He died 1579 in his 68th year. He wrote an hiſtory of his own times in continuation of Guicciardini's, valuable for its candor and authenticity, and highly commended by the indefatigable Thuanus.

ADRIANI, Marcellus, a native of Florence, who left a manuſcript tranſlation of Plutarch, and of Demetrius Phalereus. He died 1604.

ADRICHOMIA, Ornelia, a nun in Holland, of the Auguſtine order, who publiſhed a poetical verſion of the pſalms in the 16th century.

ADRICHOMIUS, Chriſtian, a native of Delft, who died at Cologne in 1585 in his 52d year. He was for ſome time director of the nuns of Barbara; and publiſhed a deſcription of Judæa, called Theatrum terræ ſanctæ, with a chronicle of the old and new teſtament, fol. 1593.

ADSON, an abbot of Luxeuil, in 960, author of the miracles of Saint Vandalbert, third abbot of the place.

ÆGEATES, John, a prieſt of the Neſtorian ſect, who about 483, wrote a treatiſe againſt the council of Chalcedon, and an eccleſiaſtical hiſtory from the reign of Theodoſius to that of Zeno.

ÆGIDIUS, Peter Albienſis, a writer ſent by Francis I. to examine and to give an account of the moſt celebrated places of Aſia, Greece, and Africa. He died in his 65th year, 1555. He publiſhed an account of his travels, beſides other works.

ÆGIDIUS, Athenienſis, a Grecian phyſician in the 8th century, who publiſhed ſeveral learned treatiſes, eſpecially de pulſibus, & de venenis.

ÆGIDIUS, de Colonna, divinity profeſſor at Paris, called from his learning Doctor fundatiſſimus. His works are now forgotten. He died 1316.

ÆGINETA, Paulus, a phyſician of Ægina in the 7th century, who firſt was acquainted with the cathartic powers of rhubarb.

ÆGINHARD, a German, ſecretary to Charlemagne. He retired from the active ſcenes of life after the loſs of Imma his wife, whom ſome have called daughter of the emperor, aſſerting that ſhe conveyed her huſband on her ſhoulders from her houſe through the ſnow, that his eſcape might not be traced by the jealouſy of her father. Æginhard is the author of a valuable life of Charlemagne, beſides annals from 741 to 839, and letters. He died 840.

ÆLFRED, vid. ALFRED.

ÆLST, a Dutch painter, vid. AALST.

ÆMIMANI, Jerome, a noble Venetian, one of the founders of the regular clerks of Saint Maiul, in the 16th century.

ÆMILIUS, Paulus, a native of Verona, invited into France by Lewis XII. by the advice of Poncher biſhop of Paris, and engaged to write a Latin hiſtory of the French monarchy. The work, which employed 18 or according to others 30 years of his life, is divided into ten books, from the reign of Pharamond to the fifth year of Charles VIII. in 1488. The whole is written with judgment and preciſion as the author was delicate even to a fault in the choice and collocation of his words. He died in 1529.

ÆNEAS, Gazeus, author of a dialogue on the immortality of the ſoul, and the reſurrection, printed Greek and Latin, 1560 and 1655, was a platonic philoſopher of the fifth century, converted to chriſtianity.

ÆNEAS, Sylvius, a native of Corſigny in Sienna,

Sienna, of the family of Piccolimini. He roſe to conſequence by his abilities, and was employed as ſecretary to the council of Baſil, an aſſembly which he defended againſt the uſurpation of Rome. He was afterwards engaged in ſeveral embaſſies to Trent, Frankfort, and the imperial court, and ſo high was his reputation that the emperor Frederic crowned him with the poetical laurel. His elevation to the rank of cardinal, as a reward for his ſervices, was followed in 1458, by his election to the papal chair, on the death of Callixtus, and by the publication of a bull which condemned and renounced all that he had ſaid or written in the defence of the council of Baſil, and exhorted the members of his church to reject Æneas Sylvius, and ſubmiſſively to receive Pius II. the name which he aſſumed. The character of firmneſs and dignity which he had maintained in private life, he diſplayed at the head of the church. He expelled tyrants, ſupported the election of princes, and everywhere eſtabliſhed and confirmed, the temporal power of Rome over the chriſtian world. He died in his 59th year, 1464. His works, which conſiſt of letters—of memoirs of the council of Baſil—of two books on Coſmography—of Euryalis and Lucretia, a romance—of a poem on the crucifixion—of a hiſtory of the Bohemians —of memoirs of his own life, &c. were printed at Helmſtadt, 1700, fol.

AERTZEN, vid. ARSENS.

ÆRIUS, a preſbyter of Sebaſtia, who is ſuppoſed by ſome to be the founder of the preſbyterians. He ſeparated from the church, becauſe Euſtathius was raiſed to the biſhopric of Sebaſtia in preference to himſelf, about 385.

ÆTHERIUS, an architect in the ſixth century, raiſed to the confidence of Anaſtaſius I. He is ſuppoſed to have built the wall which extended from Selembria to the ſea, to check the inroads of the barbarians of the north.

ÆTIUS, a Syrian, who from a menial ſervant was made biſhop by Eudoxus the patriarch of Conſtantinople. He was the founder of a ſect called the Ætians, which adopted the the tenets of the Arians, and beſides maintained that faith alone without good works, was ſufficient for ſalvation. He floriſhed 336.

ÆTIUS, a phyſician of Amida in the fifth century. His work called Tetrabiblos, in Greek, is divided into 16 books, containing the opinions of preceding phyſicians.

AFFLITTO, Matthew, an able civilian, born at Naples 1443. He wrote various books on the civil and canon law, and died 1553.

AFRICANUS, Julius, wrote a chronicle of which ſome fragments remain, beſides a letter to Origen, cenſuring the hiſtory of Suſannah as a romance, and another to reconcile the apparent contradictions of the genealogies of St. Matthew and St. Luke.

AGAPETUS, I. was made pope 535. He died at Conſtantinople the following year. The ſecond of that name was elected pope 946, and died 965.

AGAPETUS, a deacon of Conſtantinople, who wrote a valuable letter to the emperor Juſtinian on the duties of a Chriſtian prince.

AGAPIUS, a Greek monk of mount Athos, in the 17th century. He wrote a treatiſe in modern Greek, in favor of tranſubſtantiation.

AGARD, Arthur, an Engliſh antiquary, born at Toſton in Derbyſhire. He was deputy chamberlain in the Exchequer office, which afforded him the means of conſulting valuable books and records, and his enquiries on political and conſtitutional ſubjects were afterwards made public by Mr. Hearne, among the papers of the antiquarian ſociety, to the eſtabliſhment of which he himſelf contributed. He died 1615, in his 75th year, and was interred in Weſtminſter abbey.

AGATHEMER, Orthonis, wrote a Greek compendium of geography, edited by Hudſon, Oxford 1703.

AGATHON, a native of Palermo, elected to the papal chair 679. In his time the Eutychians or Monothelites were condemned at the council of Conſtantinople. He died 682.

AGELIAS, Anthony, biſhop of Acerno in Italy, publiſhed commentaries on the pſalms, and ſome of the prophets, 1608.

AGELNOTH, archbiſhop of Canterbury, refuſed to crown Harold king, though he had enjoyed the patronage of his father Canute. He died 1038, after being ſeventeen years in the ſee of Canterbury.

AGGAS, Robert, called Augus, a landſcape painter, one of whoſe pieces is ſtill preſerved in the hall of the paper-ſtainers' company. He died in London, 1679, aged 60.

AGILA, king of the Viſigoths in Spain, was murdered by his nobles 554.

AGILULF, duke of Turin, was appointed on the death of Antharic king of Lombardy, his ſucceſſor, and married his widow Theudelinda. He died 616, after a reign of 25 years, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Adalnald.

AGLIONBY, John, D. D. a native of Cumberland, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and known for his great learning. He was head of St. Edmund's Hall, chaplain to James I. and one of thoſe who tranſlated the new teſtament. He died at Iſlip, where he was rector, 1610, in his 43d year. His ſon, of the ſame name, was dean of Canterbury, an honor which he enjoyed but a few months, and died 1643.

AGNELLUS, an abbot of Ravenna, in the ninth century, often confounded with a biſhop of Ravenna of the ſame name, in the ſixth century. Agnellus wrote an hiſtory of the lives of the prelates of Ravenna.

AGNESI, Maria Gaetana, a learned Italian lady, born at Milan, and made in conſequence of her great merit, mathematical profeſſor to the univerſity of Bologna, by Be-AILHAUD, John, a French surgeon of Cadenet in Provence, who acquired some celebrity by the selling of a purgative powder which he declared capable to cure all diseases. He died in a good old age 1756.

AILLY, Peter d', born of an obscure family, rose to the highest honors in the service of Charles VI. and was made chancellor of the university of Paris, and afterwards bishop of Puy and Cambray. He labored to heal the wounds which existed in the Romish church, and presided over the council of Constance, and shared their guilt when they condemned John Huss to the flames. He was rewarded with a cardinal's hat, and the office of legate to the holy see, and died 1419. His works on theological subjects were published at Strasburg.

AILRED, or ETHELRED, author of a genealogy of English kings,—of a life of Edward the confessor, &c. was abbot of Revesly in Lincolnshire, and flourished about the middle of the 12th century.

AIMOIN, a benedictine of Aquitaine in the 11th century, author of a puerile history of France in five books, found in the third volume of Duchesne's collection.

AINSWORTH, Henry, a nonconformist, known for his learning and for the commentaries which he wrote on the holy scriptures. As attached to the tenets of the Brownists, he fled to Amsterdam, where, with Johnson, he erected a church of which he became the minister. This union however was soon productive of a quarrel, Johnson was violent, and he was banished by the congregation; and Ainsworth afterwards shared his fate, and retired to Ireland. He soon after returned to Amsterdam, where he died, as it is supposed, a violent death. He had found a diamond of great value, and he asked of the Jew to whom it belonged, no other reward but a conference with the rabbis of his synagogue, concerning the prophecies relating to the Messiah. The Jew had not interest sufficient to fulfil his wishes, and in his disappointment he caused Ainsworth to be poisoned, in the beginning of the 17th century. His treatises were admired for their ingenuity and so great was his name that Dr. Hall, bishop of Exeter, wrote against him and refuted his arguments in favor of the Brownists.

AINSWORTH, Robert, was born at Woodyale four miles from Manchester 1660, and educated in the grammar school in Bolton, of which he afterwards became master for a few years. From thence he retired to London, and opened a school at Bethnal Green, at Hackney, and other places, where his pupils were numerous and respectable. His great application procured him a comfortable competence, and he some time after retired to the enjoyment of literary ease. In 1714 a plan was proposed to the booksellers for the compilation of an English and Latin dictionary after Faber's plan, and Ainsworth was invited to the undertaking, and the book was published in 4to. in 1736, dedicated to Dr. Mead. The second edition was improved by Patrick, and published 10 years after. The other publications by Ainsworth, were a treatise on grammar,—and other small classical compositions,—besides some specimens of English and Latin poetry. He died at London 1743, in his 83d year, and was buried in Poplar church yard, under an inscription written by himself.

AIRAULT, Peter, an advocate of Paris, born at Angers, where he also died 1601, aged 65. As a magistrate he behaved with integrity, and was deservedly called the rock of the accused. He left ten children. He wrote some treatises, especially on the power of fathers, &c.

AIRAY, Henry, a native of Westmorland, patronised by Bernard Gilpin, the northern apostle. He was of St. Edmund Hall, and afterwards of Queen's, Oxford, of which he was elected provost 1598. He was vice chancellor of the university, and died 1616, aged 57. He was a strict Calvinist, and was author of some theological pieces.

AIRAY, Christopher, a native of Clifton, Westmorland, student of Queen's college, Oxford, and afterwards vicar of Milford, Hants. He published a logical treatise and other pieces, and died at Milford 1670, aged 61.

AISTULFE, a king of the Lombards, after his brother Rachis. He laid siege to Rome, from which he was driven in disgrace, by Pepin king of France, at the solicitation of pope Stephen III. He was killed in hunting, 756.

AITON, William, a native of Lanarkshire, known as a botanist and gardener in the royal gardens at Kew, to which he was appointed 1759. This high patronage was due to his merit, and, under his attentive eye and directing hand, Kew soon exhibited the most curious and valuable plants, collected from every part of the world by the munificence of his patron. He published in 1789 an useful catalogue of the plants of the gardens, called Hortus Kewensis, and died of that dreadful distemper a schirrous liver, 1793, after enjoying the friendship and esteem of men of rank, of virtue, and literary eminence. The king appointed his son his successor.

AITZEMA, Leovan, a noble of Dorcum in Friezland, employed as representative of the Hanseatic towns at the Hague. He wrote in Dutch in seven volumes fol. an history of the United Provinces,—and an history of the peace of Munster, continued by other hands to 1692. He died at the Hague 1669, aged 69.

AKAKIA, Martin, a native of Chalons, professor of medicine at Paris. He was surnamed Harmless, which he altered to the Greek word Akakia. He published translations of of Galen's writings, and died 1551. His ſon, of the ſame name, was phyſician to Henry III. and wrote medical treatiſes de morbis muliebribus,—conſilia medica, &c. and died 1588, aged 89.

AKBAR, a ſultan of the Moguls, after his father Hemayun, 1556. He enlarged his dominions by the conqueſt of Bengal, Caſhmere, and Scindi, and died by ignorantly taking poiſon which he had prepared for the deſtruction of his enemies, 1605.

AKENSIDE, Mark, M.D. ſon of a butcher of Newcaſtle upon Tyne, was educated in his native town, and, at the age of 18, went to Edinburgh to ſtudy divinity. Here his intentions changed; but he no ſooner applied himſelf to medicine, than he honorably replaced the contribution which he had received from the fund eſtabliſhed to promote the education of diſſenting miniſters. In 1741 he went to Leyden, and on taking his degree three years after, he publiſhed a much admired diſſertation on the growth of the human fœtus. His genius unfolded itſelf in his early years, and his greateſt work, the pleaſures of the imagination, was publiſhed in 1744. Dodſley, to whom it was offered for ſale at a high price, ſeemed reluctant till he conſulted Pope, who adviſed the bookſeller not to make a niggardly offer, as it was no every-day writer. The publication was attacked by Warburton, as a note on the firſt book maintained, that ridicule is the teſt of truth, and though defended anonymouſly by Dyſon, Akenſide had the ſenſe or timidity to omit the objectionable paſſage in another edition. He publiſhed ſome odes afterwards, and attacked lord Bath under the title of Curio, as the betrayer of his country; but the philippic was afterwards expunged. He firſt practiſed as phyſician at Northampton, afterwards at Hampſtead, and then at London, where his friend Dyſon ſupported his appearance by an allowance of 300l. a year. His abilities began now to recommend him; he publiſhed ſeveral medical treatiſes, eſpecially on Dyſenteries, &c. read the Gultonian lectures, and was elected fellow of the college of phyſicians, and phyſician to the queen. His hopes however were cut ſhort by a putrid fever, which terminated his life 23d June, 1770, in his 59th year. He was buried in St James's church, Weſtminſter. Akenſide poſſeſſed great powers of mind; his poem was publiſhed before he was 23 years old, and afterwards altered and reviſed; but ſo excellent was the original conſidered, that it is printed ſeparately with the corrections, to ſhow that whatever comes from the hand of a maſter is never devoid of elegance or dignity.

AKIBA, a learned rabbi, who quitted the obſcure life of a ſhepherd, and at the age of 40, through his love for his maſter's daughter, who eſteemed learned men, devoted himſelf to literature. He joined himſelf to Barchonebas the falſe Meſſiah, and was, with his ſon Pappus and his family, flayed alive by the Romans, 135.

ALABASTER, William, a proteſtant, born at Hadleigh in Suffolk, and educated at Trinity, Cambridge. He went to Cadiz with Eſſex, and became canon of St. Paul's. He wrote a Hebrew lexicon Pentaglotton, folio, and ſome theological tracts, beſides Roxana, a Latin tragedy performed at Cambridge. He died 1640.

ALAGON, Claude, a native of Provence, who fooliſhly attempted to introduce the Spaniards into Marſeilles, for which he was put to death in 1705.

ALAIN, de Liſle, a divine of Paris, ſurnamed the univerſal doctor. His works were printed folio, 1653. He died 1294.

ALAIN, John, a Dane, author of a treatiſe on the origin of the Cimbri, and other works, died 1630, aged 61.

ALAIN, Chartier, ſecretary to Charles VII. of France, was born 1386. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his writings, particularly his chronicle of Charles VII.

ALAIN, Nicholas, ſon of a cobler at the beginning of the 18th century, known as the writer of ſome comedies. His Epreuve Reciproque is ſtill admired on the ſtage.

ALALEONA, Joſeph, a native of Macerata, profeſſor of civil law at Padua. He wrote ſome admired treatiſes, and died 1749, aged 79.

ALAMANNI, Lewis, a native of Florence, who oppoſed the power of Julius de Medicis at Florence. The conſpiracy was diſcovered; one of the accomplices was puniſhed with death, and he himſelf ſaved his life by flight. The election of Julius to the popedom by the name of Clement VII. ſeemed to forbid his reſtoration to his country; but the ſucceſs of Charles V. at Rome, and the confinement of the pontiff in the caſtle of St. Angelo, encouraged the Florentines to break their chains; the Medici were baniſhed, and Alamanni recalled. Again baniſhed, he found an aſylum in the French court, and was employed as ambaſſador by Francis I. to Charles V. who received him with coldneſs, and in anſwer to his eloquent addreſs, repeated the ludicrous verſes which he had written againſt him. Alamanni vindicated himſelf, and by the dexterity of his ſpeech, he changed the emperor's diſpleaſure into admiration and eſteem. After being employed in another embaſſy to Genoa, he died at Amboiſe 1566, in his 66th year. His poems and other compoſitions in Italian are highly commended. His ſon Baptiſt was almoner to the queen, and biſhop of Bazar and Maion, and died 1581, author of ſome letters and other pieces.

ALAMOS, Balthazar, a Spaniſh writer, in the ſervice of Anthony Perez, the ſecretary of ſtate under Philip II. He ſhared his maſter's diſgrace, but afterwards was made counſellor of the council of the Indies, and honored with knighthood. He died in his 88th year. He publiſhed an excellent tranſlation of Tacitus 1614, beſides aphoriſms much admired.

ALAMUNDIR, a king of the Saracens 509, whom the biſhops of his age endeavoured to convert to Chriſtianity.

ALAN, ALLEN, ALLYN, William, a native of Roſſal in Lancaſhire, educated at Oriel college, and made principal of St. Mary Hall in his 24th year. As he was a warm defender of the pope, he left his preferment in England on the acceſſion of Elizabeth, and retired to Louvain, where he ſupported the tenets of his religion by his writings. His great application endangered his health, and his phyſicians adviſed him to return to England; but here, neither Lancaſhire, nor Oxford, nor London could long conceal the author of virulent attacks againſt the eſtabliſhed religion of his country, and he fled with difficulty to Douay. Here he was conſidered the champion of the catholic cauſe, and he was raiſed to the dignity of cardinal, and the archbiſhopric of Mechlin. His reſentment kept pace with his elevation; in 1586 he publiſhed a book to explain the pope's bull, for the excommunication of Elizabeth, and to excite the people of England to revolt againſt their lawful ſovereign, and eſpouſe the cauſe of Philip of Spain, and ſeveral thouſand copies of this unnatural compoſition were ſent on board the Armada, but were happily deſtroyed with the projects of the tyrant. Elizabeth indeed complained of the indignity by Dr. Dale ſent as ambaſſador to the Low Countries; but the duke of Parma received the meſſenger with ſupercilious indifference. Alan died at Rome 1594, aged 63. His publications were moſtly on controverſial or political ſubjects, one particularly in anſwer to lord Burleigh.

ALAN, of Lynn in Norfolk, a divine known as the author of uſeful indexes to various books. He wrote a book called Moralia Bibliorum, &c. in the 15th century.

ALAND, ſir John Forteſcue, was deſcended from ſir John Forteſcue lord chancellor under Henry VI. After being honored with a degree at Oxford, and called to the bar, he was made ſolicitor to the prince of Wales, and afterwards to George I. and the next year 1716-7, raiſed to the dignity of a baron of the exchequer. In his judicial capacity, he diſplayed integrity of heart and firmneſs of conduct; but his ſervices were neglected, and either from private reſentment, or miſrepreſentation, he was the only judge whoſe patent was not renewed on the acceſſion of George II. This apparent diſgrace however was momentary, he was reſtored the following year to his profeſſion, and he continued to dignify the bench till 1746, when he reſigned, and as a reward for his long ſervices for 30 years, he was created a peer of Ireland. Sir John aſſumed the name of Aland in compliment to his wife, of the Aland family at Waterford. He was remarkable for a ſmall, ſhort, flat noſe, which however was made to diſappear in his portrait, either by the adulation or the dexterity of the pencil of ſir Godfrey Kneller. This deformity once expoſed him to the ſarcaſm of a barriſter, whom he cenſured for treating his cauſe rather obſcurely:—My lord, replied the undiſmayed lawyer, if you will have patience I will make it appear as plain as the noſe in your lordſhip's face. His writings were on judicial ſubjects, and are held in eſteem. He died 1746.

ALARD, a prieſt of Amſterdam, author of ſome learned works, ſelectæ ſimilitudines, or collationes, ex bibliis, 3 vols 8vo. Paris 1543. He died at Louvain 1531.

ALASCO, John, a Roman catholic biſhop, uncle to the king of Poland. He became afterwards a convert to the proteſtant principles and came to England under Edward VI, but the reign of Mary drove him to the continent where he died 1560. He was much eſteemed by the learned of the times, and particularly by Eraſmus, whoſe library he bought.

ALAVA, Diego Eſquivel, a learned biſhop born at Vittoria in Biſcay. He was at the council of Trent, and publiſhed a work on councils and the regulations neceſſary to reform the Chriſtian religion. He died 1562.

ALBAN, St. a native of Verulam, the protomartyr of England. He travelled in his youth to Rome, and ſerved as a ſoldier in Diocleſian's army for ſeven years. On his return to England he renounced the pagan religion and during the perſecution of Diocleſian he was martyred for the Chriſtian faith 286 or 296, or ſeven years later according to Uſher. Offa, king of the Mercians, built a ſtately monaſtery over him from which the modern town of St. Alban's receives its name.

ALBANI, Francis, ſon of a ſilk merchant at Bologna, forſook his father's profeſſion for painting. He was the ſchool-fellow and afterwards the pupil of Guido, by whom he was introduced to the Carracis; and after he had ſtudied amongſt the monuments of Rome for ſome years he returned to Bologna, where he married for his ſecond wife Doralice a woman of matchleſs beauty, and of ſuperior underſtanding. In her he found a moſt perfect model, and the Venus, the Nymphs and the Graces, which came from his pencil, poſſeſſed all her charms, and though remarkable for too much uniformity yet they were univerſally admired. She became mother of twelve children, who equally inherited her perſonal accompliſhments, and were made by the fond father the originals of his cupids in the moſt playful and enchanting attitudes. He died in his 82d year 1660. His pieces are highly eſteemed, and are diſperſed in the cabinets of Europe. His brother John Baptiſt, was his pupil, and excelled as a landſcape painter. He died 1668.

ALBANI, John Jerome, a learned civilian, made cardinal 1570. He wrote treatiſes on eccleſiaſtical affairs, &c. and died 1591.

ALBANI, Alexander, a Roman cardinal, who died 1779, aged 87. He was a man of great merit, well acquainted with the records and monuments of antiquity.

ALBANY, John duke of, a Scotch nobleman in the ſervice of Francis I. of France. He was entruſted by that monarch with an army of 10,000 men to attack Naples, but the battle of Pavia obliged him to return to France, where he died, 1536.

ALBATEGNIUS, an Arabian aſtronomer, who died 929. He wrote a treatiſe on the knowledge and the obliquity of the zodiac of the ſtars.

ALBEMARLE, Monk duke of, vid. MONK.

ALBEMARLE, Anne Clarges, ducheſs of, daughter of a blackſmith, was brought up as a milliner, and retained the vulgarity of her manners in her higheſt elevation. She was firſt the miſtreſs of general Monk when confined in the tower, and afterwards his wife; but ſo clear was her underſtanding, that ſhe was often conſulted in the greateſt emergencies; and there is little doubt, but that by bribery, ſhe filled up the liſt of privy counſellors which was preſented to the ſecond Charles on his landing. Her animoſity was ſo great againſt Clarendon that ſhe prevailed upon her huſband to join in the ruin of his former friend. The virulence of her temper was ſuch that the general was often forced to comply under her threats, as he dreaded her more than the cannon's mouth.

ALBEMARLE, Keppel Lord, a native of Guelders, one of the favorites of William III. In the laſt of queen Anne's wars he was made commander of the Dutch forces, and was defeated by Villars at Denain, 1712, and made priſoner. He died ſix years after.

ALBERGATI, Capacelli Marquis, a native of Bologna, who devoted the firſt years of his life to licentiouſneſs, and at the age of 34 began to make amends for ill-ſpent hours, by the ſevereſt application. Nature had endowed him with great talents, and the knowledge of the world had enriched his mind with ſalutary reflections, ſo that at the age of 40 he burſt upon the public not only as a dramatiſt, elegant, correct, and ſublime, but as an actor lively, intereſting, and judicious. He was called the Garrick of Italy, and diſplayed his abilities with effect, and acquired deſerved reputation by the wit and facetiouſneſs of his compoſitions. He died 1802. His works were publiſhed together 1783 in 12 vols. 8vo.

ALBERGOTTI, Francis, an ancient civilian born at Arezzo. At Florence he was raiſed to the honor of nobility, and deſerved the name of "the teacher of ſolid truth". His treatiſes on the Digeſt and the Code are now little known. He died at Florence 1376.

ALBERIC or ALBERT, a canon of Aix in Provence, who not being able to accompany the firſt Cruſaders, wrote from the beſt authorities an account of their adventures from 1095 to 1120 under the title of Chronicon Hieroſolymitanum, two vols. 8vo, 1584.

ALBERIC, a French monk of Cluny, biſhop of Oſtia, and a cardinal, was legate in England, Scotland, France, &c. and died 1147.

ALBERINI, Rodiana, a lady born at Parma 1530, diſtinguiſhed for her poetical works both in Latin and in Italian.

ALBERONI, Julius, ſon of a gardener in the ſuburbs of Placentia, worked with his father till his 14th year, but afterwards being admitted to the meaner employments of the cathedral he was ordained prieſt. At that time the poet Campiſtron the favorite of the duke of Vendome, was plundered in his way to Rome, and in his diſtreſs he found a hoſpitable aſylum in the houſe of the new eccleſiaſtic, who ſupplied him for his journey. The kindneſs was not forgotten; Campiſtron mentioned the generous treatment to the duke, and Alberoni ſoon after gained his protection, by diſcovering to him in the wars of Italy, the places, where the inhabitants had concealed their corn. Obliged to fly he followed the army, and when Vendome was placed at the head of the military forces in Spain, his abilities were employed to negotiate between the duke and the princeſs of Urſino, whoſe intrigues had gained an aſcendancy over the Spaniſh monarch. He behaved with ſuch dexterity, that he became the favorite of the princeſs; and aſſumed the character of agent of the duke of Parma to the court of Madrid, and employed his influence to fix a daughter of that houſe on the throne of Spain. The taſk was dangerous, but the princeſs of Urſino was ſoothed into compliance with the repreſentation that the intended queen was given to pleaſure, and of a weak character which could eaſily be governed. Alberoni uſed all poſſible diſpatch in this delicate affair, the princeſs of Urſino had already changed her mind, and a courier was ſent to ſtop the negotiation, but the miniſter forbade his appearance on pain of death, the treaty was ſigned and Philip V. received his new queen. The conſequent diſgrace of the princeſs of Urſino made room for Alberoni, the beauty and the wit of the queen were made, with the king, ſubſervient to the elevation of the favorite, who became prime miniſter, and was raiſed to the purple. His abilities gave vigor to the nation, and in a little time infuſed ſuch a ſpirit of activity and enterprize that after a lethargic repoſe of a century, Spain roſe to the hardihood and heroic deeds of her forefathers. Madrid became the center of negotiation, and of intrigue, and the cardinal formed the deſign of ſeizing Sardinia and Sicily, of replacing the the pretender on the Engliſh throne by the hands of Charles XII. and the czar of Ruſſia, whilſt in the eaſt the Turks were to arm againſt Germany, whoſe ſceptre in Italy was to be broken, whilſt the duke of Orleans was to deprived of the regency of France. Theſe vaſt projects however were defeated by Orleans, who with George I. declared war againſt Spain 1719, and made it one of the conditions of the peace, that the cardinal ſhould be baniſhed from the court. Alberoni, yielding to the ſtorm, retired to Rome, where he was baſely accuſed of correſpondence with the infidel Turks, and confined for one year. He however ſtill retained ſome ſhare of influence at Madrid; but his old age was tarniſhed by the attempt to deſtroy the independence of the little republic of St. Marino. He died at Placentia 1752, in his 8 th year, with the character of a great and ambitious ſtateſman. His teſtament politique was publiſhed at Lauſanne 1753.

ALBERT I. ſon of Rodolphus, was choſen emperor of Germany, after the defeat of his competitor Rodolphus of Naſſau. He was killed by his own nephew John duke of Swabia 1308, leaving five ſons and ſix daughters.

ALBERT II. emperor of Germany, was called grave or magnanime, and he poſſeſſed the milder virtues which render a prince popular and beloved. He died 1439, aged 45.

ALBERT, archduke of Auſtria, ſixth ſon of the emperor Maximilian, was at firſt a cardinal and archbiſhop of Toledo; but in 1583 he was made governor of Portugal, and ſome time after governor of the Low Countries. He reduced Calais, Ardres, and other towns; and afterwards undertook the ſiege of Oſtend, which laſted three years, three months, and three days, and which, when taken 1604, was only a heap of aſhes, after the ſlaughter of more than 100,000 men. The archduke had reſigned the purple in 1598 to marry Elizabeth daughter of Philip II. of Spain, and he obtained as her portion the ſovereignty of the Netherlands. He made peace with the Dutch in 1609, and the laſt years of his life were uſefully devoted to the happineſs of the people. He died 1621, aged 62.

ALBERT I. ſon of Otho prince of Anhalt, was made elector of Brandenburg 1150. After converting vaſt foreſts into cultivated lands, where he built churches and towns for the comfort of grateful ſubjects, he died univerſally regretted 1168.

ALBERT V. duke of Bavaria, ſurnamed the Magnanimous, was a wiſe and enlightened prince, and died 1579, aged 50.

ALBERT VI. duke of Bavaria, was known for his learning, and died at Munich 1666.

ALBERT, Charles d', duke of Luynes, was the deſcendant of a noble family of Florence who ſettled in France. He was much noticed by Henry IV. and roſe from inferior offices to be the favorite of Lewis XIII. His power was ſo great that the kingdom obeyed him as their ſovereign; but his tyranny became ſo odious, that, when he died of a fever in the camp of Longueville 1621, the ſoldiers plundered his tent, ſo that there could not be found a cloth to cover the remains of the royal favorite.

ALBERT, Joſeph d', of Luynes, was ambaſſador from the emperor Charles VII. in France. He wrote Le Songe d'Alcibiade—Timandre inſtruit par ſon genie, &c. publiſhed 1759 in 8vo.

ALBERT, king of Sweden, ſucceeded to the throne on the depoſition of Magnus II. by his rebellious nobles 1363. He was taken priſoner 1387 by Margaret queen of Norway and Denmark, who had liſtened to the intrigues of his diſaffected barons; and died an exile at Mecklenburgh, 1412.

ALBERT, of Brandenburg, ſurnamed the Alcibiades of Germany, ſon of Caſimir margrave of Culembach, was diſtinguiſhed by his oppoſition to the views of Charles V. againſt whom he made war with other ſtates. A reconciliation was of ſhort continuance, he provoked the reſentment of his late allies by retaining in his hands the plunder of the eccleſiaſtical ſtates, and in a battle fought by the rival powers he was ſeverely wounded. He was afterwards deprived of his poſſeſſions by the decree of the diet, and died 1558.

ALBERT, Eraſmus, a native of Frankfort, preacher to Joachim II. elector of Bradenburg. He was the pupil of Luther, and he aſſiſted his cauſe by collecting the greateſt abſurdities of the conformities of Saint Francis with Jeſus Chriſt, which he publiſhed in German and Latin. This ſatirical work, to which Luther wrote a preface, highly promoted the cauſe of the reformation. Albert died at New Brandenburg, 1551.

ALBERT, Krantz, author of the hiſtory of Saxony and of the Vandals, and of a chronicle of Charlemagne up to 1504, was divinity profeſſor at Hamburgh, and died 1517.

ALBERT, called the Great, was born at Lawingen in Swabia, and put on the Dominican habit after viſiting Pavia, Cologne, and Paris, where he read lectures with reputation. He was called to Rome by pope Alexander IV. and appointed maſter of the ſacred palace, and afterwards raiſed to the archbiſhopric of Ratiſbon. A life of eaſe was, however, his delight, and the croſier was ſoon reſigned for the monaſtic habit. His ſtudies were eagerly purſued in his retirement, and his great knowledge ſoon paſſed among the vulgar and illiterate for magic and enchantment. Albert not only labored in queſt of the philoſopher's ſtone, but he was ſaid to have formed a human head of braſs, which like an oracle guided all his actions. His works were voluminous, without containing much information, tion, published at Lyons 1615 in 21 vols. folio. Some treatises of an unchaste or licentious tendency have been falsely ascribed to him, such as the master of sentences—&c. He died at Cologne, 1280, in his 87th or according to others his 75th year.

ALBERT, Jane d', daughter of Margaret of Navarre, was married at the age of 11, to the duke of Cleves, but this union was annulled by the pope, and in 1548 she gave her hand to Antony duke of Vendome, and five years after gave birth to a son who became Henry IV. of France. In 1555 she was made queen of Navarre on her father's death. She was present at Paris at the nuptials of her son with Margaret of Valois, and died there suddenly as it is supposed in consequence of poison, 1572, in her 44th year. She had written some works.

ALBERTET, a mathematician and poet in the 13th century, whose amorous verses were perfidiously published after his death by one of his friends, to whom he had entrusted the care of committing them to the flames.

ALBERTI, Cherubino, an Italian painter and engraver of eminence, who died 1615 aged 63.

ALBERTI, Giovanni, brother of the preceding, was equally eminent in the perspective, and in historical pieces. He died 1601, aged 43.

ALBERTI, Dominico, a native of Venice, whose musical powers were displayed in London in the suite of the Spanish ambassador, and also at Rome, and other places on the continent. In 1737 he set to music Metastasio's Endymion, and published other things.

ALBERTI, Andrew, was author of a treatise on perspective, 1670.

ALBERTI, John, a German lawyer surnamed Widman Stadius. His knowledge of the oriental languages enabled him to abridge the alcoran, and illustrate it with learned notes; a work which procured him the chancellorship of Austria. He also published a beautiful edition of the New Testament in Syriac, at the expence of the emperor.

ALBERTI, Leander, a dominican of Bologna, who wrote a history of Italy 4to,—biographical memoirs—the history of Bologna—and that of illustrious Dominicans, &c. He died 1552, aged 74.

ALBERTI, Leon Baptista, a Florentine, author of a valuable work on architecture in 10 books. He was well acquainted with painting and sculpture, and was employed by pope Nicolas V. in ornamenting the buildings which he erected. He died 1485.

ALBERTI-ARISTOTILE, called also Ridolfe Fioravente, a celebrated mechanic of Bologna in the 16th century, who is said to have removed one of the steeples of his native city, with all the bells to the distance of 35 paces. In Hungary, he built a remarkable bridge, and he was also employed in erecting churches in Russia.

ALBERTINI, Francis, a Calabrian Jesuit, author of some theological works in two vols. fol. and a treatise, in which he asserts that brute animals have their guardian angels. He died 1619.

ALBERTINO, Edmund, a Calvinist minister of Chalons-sur-Marne, wrote a treatise against the eucharist. He died 1652.

ALBERTINO, Francis, a Florentine, author of a book on the wonders of ancient and of modern Rome, &c. in the 16th century.

ALBERTINUS, Nussatus, an Italian, author of a history of the emperor Henry VII. and of some poetical pieces, &c.

ALBERTUS, archbishop of Mentz, formed a conspiracy against the emperor Henry V. He was imprisoned four years, but he was so popular that the inhabitants rose up in arms and restored him to liberty. He died 1137.

ALBI, Henry, author of an interesting history of illustrious cardinals, besides several lives, was a Jesuit of Bolene in the Venaissin, and died at Arles, 1659.

ALBICUS, was made archbishop of Prague by Sigismund king of Bohemia. His partiality to John Huss, and the followers of Wickliff, have exposed him to the censures of the catholics. He wrote three treatises on medicine.

ALBINUS, Bernard, a celebrated physician, born at Anhalt. He studied at Leyden, and after travelling over the Low Countries and France for improvement, he was raised to a professor's chair at Frankfort on Oder, and 22 years after enjoyed the same dignity at Leyden. He died 1721, aged 69. He wrote numerous medical treatises.

ALBINUS, Bernard Sigfred, son of the preceding, was professor of medicine at Leyden, and surpassed all former masters in the knowledge of anatomy. He published three volumes folio in 1744, 1749, and 1753, with elegant plates of the muscles, ligaments, and bones of the human body. He married in his 73d year, and died 1771, aged 88. His brother, Christian Bernard, professor at Utrecht, distinguished himself by his history of spiders and insects, with engravings.

ALBINUS, Eleazar, was author of a natural history of birds, with 30 copper plates colored.

ALBINUS, Peter, an historian and poet of the 16th century, professor at Wittemberg, and author of some esteemed historical treatises especially the chronicles of Misnia his native country.

ALBIS, Thomas, or White, a catholic priest and eminent philosopher of Essex. He was intimate with Hobbs of Malmesbury, and in their dissertations it was often acknowledged that White was superior. He died 1676, aged 94.

ALBIZI, Bartholomew, a native of Rivano in Tuscany, author of the conformity of Saint Francis with Jesus Christ, a performance in which he equals the saint to the son of God. He died at Pisa in 1401.

ALBOIN or ALBOVINUS, succeeded his father Audoin as king of Lombardy. From Pannonia where he had first settled, he advanced towards Italy and caused himself to be proclaimed king of the country in 570, and made Pavia the capital of his new dominions. He was assassinated by order of his wife Rosamond whom he had insulted by sending her wine in the skull of her father Gunimond.

ALBON, James d', a French general, known as mareschal St. André. He distinguished himself in the campaigns of 1552 and 1554, at the retreat of Quesnoy, and at the battles of Renti and St. Quintin. He was a Calvinist, and at last favored the party of the Guises. He was shot at the battle of Dreux, 1562.

ALBON, Camille, a descendant of the preceding, was born at Lyons, and died at Paris 1788 aged 35. He published various treatises, &c. which possess some merit.

ALBORNOS, Gles Alvarez Carillo, a native of Suena, archbishop of Toledo. He resigned his preferment when raised to the rank of cardinal, and taking up arms, he reduced Italy to the obedience of the church, and recalled the pope from Avignon to Rome. He founded the college of Barcelona, and retired to Viterbo, where he died 1367.

ALBORNOS, Diego Philip, an ecclesiastic of Carthagena in Spain, author of a Spanish book called Elements of politique.

ALBRET, a noble and illustrious family in France, which has given generals and statesmen to the kingdom. Charles commanded the French forces at the battle of Agincourt against Henry V. of England, and he perished in the field.

ALBRICUS, a native of London, known as a learned philosopher and physician. He studied at Oxford about 1217, and travelled for improvement.

ALBUCASA or ALBUCASSIS, an Arabian physician of the 11th century, who wrote some valuable tracts on medicine.

ALBUMAZAR, an Arabian physician of the ninth century, known also as an astrologer and author of—de magnis conjunctionibus, annorum revolutionibus, ac eorum perfectionibus—et introductio ad astronomiam.

ALBUQUERQUE, Alfonso, a native of Lisbon, whose great genius laid the foundation of the Portuguese power in India. He was sent by Emanuel king of Portugal in 1503, with his brother Francis to form an establishment in the east; and by his spirited bravery, he gained large possessions on the coast of Cochin. His return to Europe was attended by the death of his brother, who perished in the voyage, but private sorrow gave way before public concerns, and Albuquerque in 1508, invested with new power by his sovereign sailed back to India. In his way he plundered the coast of Arabia, and with a corps of only 470 men, he undertook the siege of Ormuz, an island at the entrance of the Persian gulf, subject to a king of its own, and defended by numerous forces; and after some months' obstinate resistance, the place submitted to the conqueror, and the king in despair became tributary to Portugal. When the Persian monarch demanded the tribute which Ormuz paid to his superior power, Albuquerque threw down bullets and arms before the ambassadors and exclaimed, to their consternation, Those are the tributes which my master consents to pay. His arms were now directed against Goa, which he subdued; but the dissensions of his officers checked for a while the career of his triumphs. He retired from his new conquest, but unbroken by misfortune, and the ingratitude of his countrymen, he soon returned to Goa, which after the loss of 3000 of its defenders, again submitted to him. His power was now extended over the whole coast of Malabar, and therefore he sailed towards the east, and made the island of Sumatra Malacca, and the neighbouring cities tributary to the Portuguese government. On his return to Goa, he meditated fresh conquests, when he suddenly fell sick, and died 1515, in his 63d year. In him were happily united the valor of a hero, and the more amiable virtues of mildness and humanity. On his death-bed he had the mortification to learn, that the monarch whom he had so faithfully served had the ingratitude to recall him by the appointment of a successor.

ALBUQUERQUE, Blaise, son of Alphonso, was born in 1500. The merit of his father and the regret of Emanuel for the loss of the conqueror of the east, raised him to the first honors of the state, and to the rank of nobility. He published an account in Portuguese of his father's victories, Lisbon, 1576.

ALBUQUERQUE COELHO, Edward, a nobleman in the service of Philip IV. of Portugal, who wrote a journal of the war of the Brazils begun in 1630. He died at Madrid 1658.

ALCASAR, Louis d', a Jesuit of Seville author of a commentary on the apocalypse and other works. He died 1613, aged 59.

ALCENDI, James, an Arabian physician about the year 1145.

ALCHABITIUS, author of treatises on the judgment of the stars,—on optics,—on the conjunction of the planets, printed Venice 1491, and Seville 1521, was an Arabian astrologer of the 12th century.

ALCHINDUS, an Arabian physician and astrologer, who flourished before the 12th century, and wrote several tracts often quoted.

ALCIAT

ALCIAT, Andrew, a native of Milan, who after ſtudying the law at Pavia and Bologna was advanced to the profeſſor's chair at Avignon. Francis I. prevailed on him to remove to Bourges, where his lectures on law were frequented and admired. His abilities however were too great to be loſt in a diſtant country, and therefore the duke of Milan invited him back to his native town, and welcomed his return by the grant of a large ſalary and the dignity of ſenator. Alciat labored with indefatigable zeal in the ſervice of ſcience, and at Pavia, at Bologna, and afterwards at Ferrara, his lectures were delivered to crowded and applauding auditors. The pope, Paul III. treated him with kindneſs, and the emperor raiſed him to the rank of count palatine and ſenator, and Philip king of Spain gave him a gold chain as a mark of his favor. He died at Pavia 1550, aged 58. It was his intention with his immenſe wealth, to found and endow a college; but the inſolence of ſome ſtudents to his perſon irritated him, and he adopted for his heir his diſtant relation Francis Alciat. His publications were chiefly on law, beſides notes on Tacitus, and ſome emblems which have been juſtly commended for their elegance, purity, and the flow of genius which they diſplay.

ALCOCK, John, an Engliſh divine born at Beverley, and raiſed in 1471 to the ſee of Rocheſter, and afterwards tranſlated to Worceſter and Ely. His great learning recommended him to the king's favor, by whom he was appointed preſident of Wales, and chancellor of England. He was the founder of Jeſus college Cambridge, and wrote ſeveral theological tracts, and died 1500. He was buried at Kingſton upon Hull in the chapel, which, beſides the grammar ſchool, he had erected there, and liberally endowed.

ALCUINUS or ALBINUS; Flaccus, a native of Yorkſhire, educated by venerable Bede and Egbert archbiſhop of York. He was made abbot of Canterbury, and afterwards paſſed to the continent on the invitation of Charlemagne. He inſtructed his royal patron in rhetoric, logic, divinity, and mathematics, and labored to diffuſe through Europe the learning and the genius which he ſo eminently poſſeſſed. With difficulty he obtained permiſſion to retire from court, to the abbey of St. Martin at Tours, where he devoted the reſt of life to ſtudy, and the duties of religion. He died 804, and was buried at Tours, and a Latin epitaph of 24 verſes of his own compoſition was placed on his grave. His writings, moſt of which are extant, are numerous, in a ſtile elegant and ſprightly.

ALCYONIUS, Peter, an Italian, for ſome time corrector of the preſs for Aldus Manutius, and author of ſome learned publications. He tranſlated ſome of Ariſtotle's treatiſes, and was ſeverely cenſured by Sepulveda for inaccuracy. In his work on baniſhment he diſplayed ſuch a mixture of elegant and barbarous words, that he was ſuſpected of largely borrowing from Cicero's treatiſe de Gloriâ; and it is ſaid, that to avoid detection, he burnt the only extant manuſcript of Cicero, which had been given by Bernard to the library of a nunnery, of which Alcyonius was phyſician. At Florence he was promoted to a profeſſor's chair, but he removed to Rome, where he loſt all his property, during the inſurrection of the Colonnas. When the imperial troops took the city 1527, he eſpouſed the cauſe of the pope, and though wounded, he joined him in the caſtle of St. Angelo, and afterwards in bold and elegant language he arraigned, in two orations, the injuſtice of Charles V. When the ſiege was raiſed, he abandoned the pope, and, with a fickleneſs that deſerves the name of ingratitude, he retired to the houſe of cardinal Pompeius Colonna, where he fell ſick and died a few months after. Alcyonius has been in ſome inſtances highly applauded for his many accompliſhments, though his vanity and abuſive language have tarniſhed his private character.

ALDANA, Bernard, a Spaniard, governor of Lippa on the confines of Turkey, which in a fit of panic, he ſet on fire 1552. He was pardoned by the interference of Mary of Bohemia, and afterwards behaved with great valor at Tripoli.

ALDEBERT, an impoſtor in France in the 8th century, who, by pretended viſions, raiſed himſelf to a biſhopric. He aſſerted that he had a letter written by our Saviour which had been brought to him by St. Michael.

ALDEGRAEF, Albert, a painter and engraver of Zouſt in Weſtphalia, born 1502. His nativity was highly admired.

ALDERETTE, Bernard and Joſeph, Jeſuits of Malaga at the beginning of the 17th century, in their features and voice very much alike. They were authors of antiquities of Spain, 4to.—a book on the Caſtilian language, 4to.

ALDEROTI, Thadeus, a Florentine known for his great abilities as a phyſician. He ſet ſo high a value upon his ſkill, that only princes and prelates could be admitted as his patients. He died 1295, aged 80.

ALDHELM, or ADELM, Saint, an Engliſh divine during the heptarchy. He was related to the king of the Weſt-Saxons, by whom he was raiſed to the biſhopric of Shireborne over the counties of Devon, Cornwall, Dorſet, and Wilts. He travelled in France and Italy, and he is ſaid to be the firſt Engliſhman who ever wrote in Latin, and introduced poetry into the iſland.

ALDHUN, a biſhop of Holy iſland, who left his habitation becauſe infeſted by the Danes, and retired to Durham, where he built the cathedral, and died 1018.

ALDINI,

ALDINI, Tobias, a phyſician of Ceſena, author of a botanical work printed at Rome 1525, in fol.

ALDOBRANDIN, Sylveſter, a native of Florence, profeſſor of law at Piſa, baniſhed for his oppoſition to the Medicis. He died at Rome 1558, aged 58. His ſon Hippolytus became pope.—Another ſon, John, was made cardinal 1570, and died at Rome three years after.

ALDRED, abbot of Taviſtock, and afterwards biſhop of Worceſter, 1046. He was a great favorite of Edward the confeſſor, and his influence produced a reconciliation between that monarch and Griffith king of Wales, and alſo with Swayne ſon of Godwin, who had invaded the kingdom. He was the firſt Engliſh biſhop who viſited Jeruſalem, and after his return he was raiſed to the ſee of York. On the death of Edward he crowned Harold, and afterwards the conqueror, whoſe eſteem he enjoyed. It is ſaid that he died with grief in ſeeing the north of England deſolated by the ravages of Harold and Canute ſons of Swayne, 1068.

ALDRIC, Saint, biſhop of Mans, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his learning, and collected the decrees of the popes, &c. He died 856.

ALDRICH, Robert, a native of Burnham in Buckinghamſhire, educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge. He was elected maſter of Eton and provoſt, and in 1537, raiſed to the biſhopric of Carliſle. Leland, who enjoyed his friendſhip, has commended his learning and piety. He wrote epigrams, &c. and died 1555, at Horncaſtle in Lincolnſhire.

ALDRICH, Henry, a native of Weſtminſter, educated under Buſby, and admitted at Chriſt church. He was made canon in 1681, and at the revolution he replaced Maſſey the popiſh dean of Chriſt-church. In this ſituation he ſupported diſcipline, and encouraged learning. He publiſhed with Dr. Sprat, Clarendon's hiſtory, not however without being charged by Oldmixon with improper interpolations. To his liberality as well as his taſte, Chriſt-church is indebted for the erection of three ſides of Peckwater quadrangle, Trinity college for its elegant chapel, and the pariſh of All Saints for its beautiful church. He was author of a compendium of logic, and ſeveral other uſeful publications; and he edited ſeveral of the Greek claſſics, for the benefit of the ſtudents of his ſociety. He alſo paſſes as the compoſer of thoſe popular catches, "Hark the bonny Chriſt church bells," and a ſmoking catch. He was rector of Wem in Shropſhire, and died at Chriſt church, 1710.

ALDRINGER, a native of Luxembourg, who from a common ſoldier was raiſed to be a general of Ferdinand II. His abilities were exerted in raiſing the ſiege of Conſtance, but he fell at Landſhut in Bavaria 1634.

ALDROVANDUS, Ulyſſes, a native of Bologna, profeſſor of phyſic and philoſophy. His inquiries into the hiſtory of nature were ſo ardent that he viſited the moſt diſtant countries in ſearch of minerals, plants, metals animals, and birds, but his reſources at laſt failed, and he ended his days in an hoſpital a Bologna, at the great age of 80, and after ſurviving the loſs of his ſight, 1605. About ſi large volumes folio, containing the hiſtory o birds and inſects, were publiſhed during hi life, and the work was continued on the ſam ſcale after his death.

ALDRUDE, counteſs of Bertinoro, is celebrated in Italy for her courage and her elo quence. When Ancona was beſieged by th Venetians, and the emperor Frederic I. i 1172, ſhe pitied the ſituation of the diſtreſſe inhabitants, and with heroic intrepidity flew to their relief, at the head of her friends, an ſupported by William Degli Adelardi, of Fer rara. Her troops were animated by her elo quence and her example, and the enemy fle at her approach. The hiſtory of that memo rable ſiege has been publiſhed by Buon-Com pagnono of Florence.

ALDUS, Manutius, a native of Baſſano, il luſtrious as a correct printer, and as the re ſtorer of the Greek and Latin languages t Europe. He wrote a Greek grammar, an publiſhed learned notes on Horace, Homer &c; and his editions of the claſſics are admire for neatneſs and elegance. He died at Ve nice 1516. For his ſon, &c. vid. MANU TIUS.

ALEANDER, Jerome, was born in a ſmal village of Iſtria, and recommended himſelf b his great abilities to pope Alexander VI. an Lewis XII. and taught belles letters at Pari He was afterwards in the ſervice of Leo X. a Rome, and nuncio of the holy ſee, in the die of Worms, againſt the doctrines of Luther the burning of whoſe books he procured though he could not ſilence his preaching. O his return to Rome he was made archbiſhop o Brindiſi by Clement VIII. and a cardinal b Paul III. He died 1542.

ALEANDER, Jerome, great nephew of th preceding, was born at Friuli. He was diſtinguiſhed as an antiquarian, a poet, and a lawyer, and died at Rome 1631, in conſequenc of an exceſs of eating, at the table of one o his friends. He was one of the original mem bers of the academy of Humoriſts.

ALEGAMBE, Philip, a native of Bruſſel who attended the duke of Oſſuna, when Spaniſh viceroy of Sicily, and entered into th ſociety of the Jeſuits at Palermo. After ſtudying divinity at Rome, he retired to Grat where his abilities raiſed him to the profeſſori chair. He afterwards, as tutor to the prince of Eggemberg's ſon, travelled through Germany, France, Spain, Portugal, and Italy and obtained offices of truſt near his patron ar and in the college of the Jesuits. He died at Rome of a dropsy, 1652. The few books which he wrote were in high estimation.

ALEGRE, Yves d', an officer of an ancient family in the service of the kings of France. He was killed at the battle of Ravenna, 1512.

ALEMAL, Lewis, archbishop of Arles, and a cardinal, was born at the castle of Arbent, 1390. He was employed as legate to Sienna, to procure the removal of the council of Pavia to Sienna; but at the council of Basil, where he presided, his opposition to Eugenius IV. was followed by his degradation and excommunication. He was restored to his honors by Nicholas V. and sent as legate into Germany. He died 1450, and was canonized.

ALEMAN, Mateo, a Spaniard, born near Seville. He was near 20 years in the service of the court of Philip II. and then employed himself in writing the history of Gusman d'Alfarache, a romance, which has been through more than 30 editions in Spain, and has been translated into most of the languages of Europe.

ALEMBERT, John le Rond d' an illustrious philosopher, born at Paris 16th Nov. 1717. He was exposed as a foundling, and from the church, near which he almost perished, he received the name of le Rond. His father at last listened to the cries of nature, and had the satisfaction soon to learn that his son's abilities were brilliant, and his improvement unusually rapid. As the flashes of his genius were early displayed, he was encouraged by his friends to seek reputation in studying the law; but that pursuit as well as medicine was quickly abandoned, and retirement and geometry seemed his only ambition. In the house of his nurse, whose poverty did not diminish the flow of his affections, he passed 40 years, and refused to quit this humble dwelling for the splendor of a palace. Frederic of Prussia, whose friendship he enjoyed through life, wished to invite him to Berlin with the most liberal offers, but he refused; and when the empress Catharine solicited him to take the care of the education of her son, with the promise of a pension of a hundred thousand livres, he declined the princely offer in firm but respectful terms, and devoted the strong powers of his mind to the service of his country. His labors were usefully exerted on philosophical subjects. He examined the power of fluids on the motion of bodies, he wrote a discourse on the general theory of the winds, which obtained the prize medal at Berlin in 1746, he solved the problem of the precession of the equinoxes, and explained the rotation of the terrestrial axis; and in these and other numerous philosophical works, he enriched science with new facts, and explained the various phænomena of nature in the most interesting point of view. Few but select were the friends to whom this great man was known; and it must be considered as not the least striking part of his character, that he who was flattered by the learned, courted by the great, and admired by princes, did not pay his adoration to power; but he dedicated his work to the count d'Argenson and his brother, two men who had been banished from the court, but who in their prosperity had seen and respected the philosopher, and rewarded his genius by the grant of a small pension. He was of so refined a taste, that it has been said, that what he expressed on every subject, could by no other man have been expressed with greater elegance, more precision, or stricter propriety. To him, we are to ascribe the plan of the Encyclopedie; and he adorned this stupendous work, by writing the preliminary discourse, so deservedly admired for the masterly record which it unfolds, concerning the rise, progress, connexions, and affinities of all the branches of human knowledge, and the gradual improvement of the arts and sciences. The friends of d'Alembert could not, however, perceive in the philosopher and his coadjutors in the encyclopedie, the supporters of virtue and morality; and latter times have too fatally, too bitterly proved that a work, which, in explaining the mysteries of philosophy, disarms providence of her powers of benevolence and government, and obscures the views of salvation, which religion holds forth to her votaries, but ill deserves the applauses of mankind. He also published a dissertation on the fall of the Jesuits, and his opuscules or memoirs, in nine volumes, contained among other things the solution of problems in astronomy, mathematics, and natural philosophy. He died 29th Oct. 1783, still in full possession of all his faculties, leaving behind him a high character for learning and disinterestedness, in which however, it must be confessed were united, profound dissimulation affected candor, and imposing moderation.

ALEN, John Van, a Dutch painter of Amsterdam, eminent in representing birds, landscapes, and still life. He died 1698, aged 47.

ALENIO, Julius, a Jesuit of Brescia, who was missionary in China for 36 years. He died 1649, and left several works in the Chinese language on theological subjects.

ALEOTTI, John Baptist, an Italian, who, from the mean occupation of carrying bricks and mortar to workmen, rose to eminence as an astrologer and geometrician. He was concerned in the hydrostatic controversies about the inundations so frequent at Bologna, Ferrara, and Romagna, and died 1630.

ALES or HALES, Alexander d', a native of England, who taught philosophy and divinity at Paris, where he was much admired, and called the irrefragable doctor. His works are now little known. He died 1245.

ALES, Alexander, a native of Edinburgh, who opposed the tenets of Luther, which he afterwards afterwards eagerly embraced, when he had ſuffered perſecution for his religion, and ſeen the firmneſs with which his countryman Patrick Hamilton was burnt to death by Beaton archbiſhop of St. Andrew's for proteſtantiſm. He came back to London from Germany, when Henry VIII. aboliſhed the papal power in England, and he there enjoyed the friendſhip of Cranmer, Cromwell, and Latimer. He afterwards was appointed to a profeſſorial chair at Frankfort upon Oder, and died at Leipſic, 1565, in his 65th year. His were on converſial ſubjects.

ALESIO, Matthew Perez d', a native of Rome ſkilful in the exerciſe of the pencil as well as of the graver. His moſt curious piece is the coloſſal Saint Chriſtopher in freſco, in the great church of Seville, the calf of whoſe leg is an ell in thickneſs. He died in 1600.

ALESSI, Galeas, an architect of Peruſia, whoſe plans were the reſult of a fertile genius. He decorated many of the towns of Spain, France, and Germany with palaces, churches, and extenſive baths. He died 1572, in his 72d year.

ALETINO, Benedetto, a profeſſor in the Jeſuits' college at Naples, who, in 1688, refuted the Carteſian ſyſtem, and undertook to re-eſtabliſh the philoſophy of Ariſtotle, as more congenial to the catholic faith. He died 1719.

ALEXANDER, biſhop of Hierapolis in the fifth century, maintained after Neſtorius, that there were two natures in Chriſt. He was baniſhed.

ALEXANDER, a biſhop of Alexandria, who oppoſed the tenets of Arius. He died about 325.

ALEXANDER, a biſhop of Jeruſalem, known for his virtues and his ſufferings. He was expoſed to the perſecutions of Severus and alſo of Decius, and died in priſon 251. He wrote ſome letters.

ALEXANDER, an abbot of Sicily in the 12th century, author of a hiſtory of Roger king of Sicily.

ALEXANDER, an Engliſh abbot, who boldly ſupported the rights of his maſter Henry II. at the court of Rome, for which he was tyrannically excommunicated by Pandulph the papal legate 1217. He wrote victoria a Proteo,—de eccleſiæ poteſtate,—de ceſſatione papali,—de poteſtate vicariâ, &c.

ALEXANDER, ſucceeded his brother John Albert as king of Poland 1501. He died five years after aged 45.

ALEXANDER, I. king of Scotland, aſcended the throne 1107 after his brother Edgar, and merited by his ſeverity the appellation of "the fierce", though in private life he had been diſtinguiſhed for meekneſs, and moderation. He had the good fortune to ſuppreſs the inſurrections raiſed againſt him, and died 1124.

ALEXANDER II. king of Scotland 1214 after his father William the Lion, was engaged in war with John of England, whoſe dominions he invaded. Peace was reſtored to the two kingdoms in 1221, by the marriage of Alexander with the ſiſter of Henry III. He died 1249, aged 51.

ALEXANDER III. king of Scotland, ſon of the preceding, ſucceeded his father 1249 when eight years old. He married Margaret daughter of Henry III. He was ſucceſsful in the defeat of the Norwegians who had invaded his kingdom, and he aſſiſted his father-in-law againſt his rebellious barons. He was killed in hunting 1285.

ALEXANDER I. biſhop of Rome, 109, after Saint Evariſtus, died 119. He is mentioned as a ſaint and a martyr in the catholic calendar.

ALEXANDER II. pope, ſucceeded 1061 His elevation was oppoſed by the imperial court, and Cadalous, biſhop of Parma, was appointed, under the title of Honorius II. Alexander, however, though of diſſolute manners, prevailed, and baniſhed his rival from Rome. He died 1073.

ALEXANDER III. pope, was a native of Sienna, and was raiſed to the papal chair after Adrian IV. 1159. His election, though acknowledged by England and France, was diſputed by the emperor Frederic, who cauſed Victor to be nominated in his room at Pavia. Alexander for a while yielded to the ſtorm; but ſoon after the death of Victor, he was acknowledged as the lawful pontiff, and was reconciled to the emperor at an interview at Venice. Alexander died at Rome 1181, beloved and reſpected.

ALEXANDER IV. biſhop of Oſtia, was raiſed to the papal chair at the death of Innocent IV. 1254. He died at Viterbo 1261.

ALEXANDER V. pope, was born of mean parents at Candia near Milan. While begging his bread from door to door, an Italian monk noticed his engaging manners, and procured his admiſſion into his order. After diſtinguiſhing himſelf at Oxford and Paris, he was made biſhop of Vicenza, and then archbiſhop of the Milaneſe, and raiſed by Innocent VII. to the purple, and named legate in Lombardy. He was elected pope at the council of Piſa 1409, but died the next year not without ſuſpicion of poiſon adminiſtered by his favorite cardinal Coſſa. He was a man of great firmneſs, and in his character liberal and munificent.

ALEXANDER VI. pope, a native of Valencia in Spain, originally called Roderic Borgia. The elevation of his uncle Calixtus III. to the pontificate paved the way to his greatneſs; and on the death of Innocent VIII. his intrigues inſured him the papal chair, though he was infamous for his debaucheries, as the adulterous adulterous father of four ſons and one daughter. Theſe children followed the example of their diſſolute father, and became monſters of profligacy. The two eldeſt, the duke of Candia and Cæſar, diſputed about the inceſtuous favors of their ſiſter Lucretia, and the hoary father himſelf is ſaid to have encreaſed the abomination by a horrid commerce with his own daughter. Though thus devoted to the groſſeſt licentiouſneſs, Alexander found means to create intrigues in the courts of Europe, and to convert their diſſenſions to the enriching of his favorite Cæſar. His death, which happened 8th Aug. 1503, was ſuch as might be expected to conclude an infamous life. The great opulence of cardinal Corneto and others, were ſtrong temptations, and they were invited to a banquet, but by ſome miſtake the poiſon intended for them was taken by the guilty pontiff and his ſon. The pope immediately expired, but Cæſar ſurvived the accident ſome years to periſh by the hands of an aſſaſſin.

ALEXANDER VII. pope, a native of Sienna, who gradually roſe through the offices of inquiſitor, legate, biſhop, and cardinal, to the papal chair 1655, on the death of Innocent X. Thus elevated by diſſembled humility to the head of the church, he ſhowed himſelf little in great things, and great in little ones. In his conduct towards men of letters he was liberal and munificent, and he embelliſhed Rome with ſome ſplendid buildings. He died 1667, aged 68.

ALEXANDER VIII. pope, was a native of Venice, and became biſhop of Breſcia and Freſcati, and cardinal, and in 1689 ſucceeded to the papal chair on the death of Innocent XI. He died two years after, 1691, aged 82.

ALEXANDER, Neckam, a native of Saint Alban's, who after ſtudying in England, France, and Italy, gave public lectures at Paris, at that time the moſt celebrated univerſity in Europe. He returned to England, where he died 1227 abbot of Exeter. His works, written in elegant language, have never been publiſhed, but remain in manuſcript.

ALEXANDER, Noel or Natalis, an eminent writer born at Rouen in Normandy. For 12 years he taught philoſophy at Paris, and, as a dominican friar, propagated the doctrines of his order from the pulpit; but afterwards devoted himſelf to eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, and was created a doctor of the Sorbonne in 1675. Colbert ſaw his abilities, and intruſted him with part of the education of his ſon. His eccleſiaſtical hiſtory is chiefly admired for its accuracy, moderation, and fidelity, in 24 vols. 8vo. or 8 vols. fol. Though for a little while perſecuted by the pope for ſome of his opinions, yet he was beloved and reſpected, and died of a decay of nature in his 86th year 1724.

ALEXANDER, William, a native of Scotland, who wrote plays on the ancient models of Greece and Rome. After being flattered by the poets of the age, he became a regular attendant on the court of James VI., was knighted, and in 1621 received a grant of Nova Scotia, which he propoſed to colonize at his own expence. The death of James prevented the creation of baronets to the number of 150, who were to contribute to ſupport his views, though Charles I. in ſome degree purſued the intentions of his father by granting patents of knight baronet to the chief promoters of the ſettlement. The original ſcheme was defeated, and ſir William ſold his property in Novia Scotia to the French. He died 12th February 1640 in his 60th year. His poetical works appeared in three vols. fol. three years before his death.

ALEXANDER, de Medicis, firſt duke of Florence in 1530, was the natural ſon of Lorenzo de Medicis, and nephew to pope Clement VII, and became odious by his cruelty, the debauchery of his manners, and his incontinence. He was murdered by his relation Lorenzo, who had gained his confidence by promiſing him an interview with a woman of whom he was enamored. He died in his 26th year, 1537.

ALEXANDER, Farneſe, duke of Parma, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the wars of Flanders and of France, and died of a wound which he received at the ſiege of Rouen, 1592.

ALEXANDER, Farneſe, uncle to the preceding, was a cardinal, engaged in different embaſſies in France, Germany, and Flanders, and afterwards retired to Rome, where he lived in great ſplendor, the friend of the indigent, and the patron of the learned. He died 1589, aged 69.

ALEXANDER, a Norman, nephew to Roger biſhop of Saliſbury in the reign of Henry I. and Stephen. By the intereſt of his uncle he was made biſhop of Lincoln, and he rebuilt his cathedral, which had been deſtroyed by fire, and added to its ſecurity by making the roof of ſtone. He built the caſtles of Banbury, Sleaford, and Newark for his defence, and founded two monaſteries which he liberally endowed, and died 1147.

ALEXANDER, of Paris, a poet of the 12th century, who introduced in a poem on Alexander the Great, verſes of 12 ſyllables, which from him have been called Alexandrines.

ALEXANDER, Nicholas, a benedictine of St. Maur, known for his charitable character. He is author of two uſeful works, "Phyſic and Surgery for the Poor," publiſhed 1738, "and a Botanical and Pharmaceutical Dictionary," 8vo. He was born at Paris, and died at St. Denys 1728.

ALEXANDER, Newſki, grand duke of Ruſſia, born 1218, ſignalized himſelf by a victory which he obtained over the northern powers on the banks of the Neva. The spot where the victory had been won was consecrated for a monastery by Peter the Great, where the bones of the saint were deposited with religious pomp, and which is become the mausoleum of the sovereigns of Russia. There is an order of knighthood instituted in honor of the saint, consisting of about 135 knights.

ALEXANDRINI, Julius de Neustain, a native of Trent, physician and favorite of Maximilian II. He died 1590 in his 84th year, author of some medical treatises in prose and verse.

ALEXIS, William, a benedictine monk of Lyra, author of some poems of considerable merit, in 1500.

ALEXIS, a Piedmontese, who applied himself to study, with the determination of not revealing the discoveries he might make in philosophy. After 57 years of travels, he saw a poor man die of a disorder which might have been removed, if he had imparted his knowledge to the surgeon, and with such remorse was he visited, that he retired from the world, and set in order, for the benefit of mankind, the result of his researches, which were afterwards published under the name of his secrets, at Basil 1536, and dispersed through Europe.

ALEXIS, Michaelovitch, son of Michael, czar of Russia, succeeded to the throne at the age of sixteen, and distinguished himself by his wars against the Turks, the Swedes, and Poles. Under him the laws of the empire were printed for public information, and no longer trusted to the incorrectness of manuscripts; commerce was encouraged, and manufactures of silk and linen were introduced. He died in his 46th year 1677, and was succeeded by his son the famous czar Peter.

ALEXIUS, Petrovitch, only son of Peter the Great and Eudocia Lapukin, was born 1690. His early youth was neglected in the hands of women, and of ignorant priests; but when in his eleventh year, he was intrusted to the care of baron Huysen, the instructions of this meritorious man were counteracted by the intrigues of Mentshik of one of the czar's ministers. The young prince, permitted to indulge every passion by the example of the most debauched, grew unprincipled and vicious, and soon converted the contempt he felt for restraint upon the character of his father. This mutual hatred between the czar and his son was fomented by the arts of enemies, and at last Alexius renounced all his rights to the succession, that he might spend in a convent the remains of a life already shortened by intemperance. He was afterwards betrayed by his Finlandish mistress, and conveyed to Petersburg, where he was tried by secret judges and condemned to death 1719. This cruel conduct of the father has been palliated by his panegyrists, who attribute the death of the prince to an apoplectic fit, brought on by his irregularities.

ALEXIUS or ALEXIS I. Commenus, born at Constantinople 1048, was nephew to the emperor Isaac Commenus. He usurped the throne in 1081, and distinguished himself by his wars against the Turks, and other northern invaders. He received with coldness the crusaders; but intimidated by their numbers, he signed a treaty of peace with them, and promised them support. He died in his 70th year 1118. His daughter, Anna Commena, has written a Greek account of his reign; but her history is a panegyric on the virtues of her father.

ALEXIUS II, Commenus, succeeded his father Michael on the throne of Constantinople 1180, in his 12th year. His tender age was the cause of tumults, and he was murdered with his mother Mary two years after by Andronicus, who usurped the throne.

ALEXIUS III. Angelus, dethroned his brother Isaac Angelus 1195, and put out his eyes. An effeminate life rendered him despised at home and abroad; he was defeated by the Turks and Bulgarians, and his capital was soon besieged and taken 1203, by an army of Venetians and French crusaders, headed by Alexius the son of the deposed monarch. Alexius received from Theodore Lascaris the same cruel punishment which he had inflicted on his brother, and the young conqueror placed his blind father from the dungeon on the throne, and reigned with him as Alexius IV.; but his elevation was succeeded by a rebellion, and his life was sacrificed to the fury of the people 1204.

ALEXIUS IV. Vid. ALEXIUS III.

ALEXIUS V. Ducas Murtzuphle, or Mourzouffle, from his black eyebrows, an officer at the court of Isaac Angelus and Alexius IV. who murdered his master, and usurped the throne. He was attacked by the crusaders, who took his capital, and after putting out his eyes threw him down from the top of Theodosius' pillar, 147 feet high, and killed him, 1264, after a reign of only three months, of extortion and cruelty. The conquerors elected two emperors; Baldwin appointed by the Latins, and Theodore Lascaris by the Greeks.

ALEYN, Charles, an English poet who published in 1631, in stanzas of six lines, two poems on the battles of Cressy and Poictiers, and seven years after another poem on Bosworth field, besides the history of Euryalus and Lucretia, translated from Æneas Sylvius. He died in 1640, and was buried in St. Andrew's church Holborn.

AL-FARABI, a mussulman philosopher in the 10th century, remarkable for the generality and greatness of his talents. He was killed by robbers in Syria in 954.

ALFARGAN, Ahmed Ebn Cothair, or Alfraganius, an Arabian aſtronomer of the ninth century, author of an introduction to aſtronomy.

ALFONSO, Vid. ALPHONSUS.

ALFORD, Michael, author of "Britannia illuſtrata" — "Annales Eccleſiaſtici Britannorum," and other works, was an Engliſh Jeſuit, born in London, and educated at Rome and in Spain. He was in England as Jeſuits' miſſionary for above 30 years, and died at St. Omer's 1652, aged 65.

ALFRED, the Great, fifth and youngeſt ſon of Ethelwolf, king of the weſt Saxons, was born at Wantage in Berkſhire 849. His father ſent him early to Rome, where he was confirmed, and, according to ſome, privately anointed king by pope Leo IV. who ſaw and admired his manly character. After the death of his brother, Alfred mounted the throne of England in his 22d year, in 871, at a time when the kingdom was a prey to domeſtic diſſenſions, and to the invaſion of the Danes. His valor was ſoon called into the field; battles were followed by battles; but after a dreadful overthrow Alfred concealed his misfortunes for a year, under the dreſs of a peaſant, till the ſucceſs of one of his chiefs, in defeating a body of the Danes, drew him from his retirement. He examined the falſe ſecurity of the enemy's camp, he was admitted into the preſence of the chief under the diſguiſe of a harper, and returned to his friends to inſpire them with courage and lead them to victory. The Danes were totally routed at Eddington; and Guthrum their chief, deſpairing of further oppoſition, conſented to renounce paganiſm, and was preſented at the font by his conqueror. From that period the kingdom became more ſettled, and though the Danes occaſionally repeated their predatory attacks, the mind of Alfred was not ſhaken from its noble purpoſe of enlightening his ſubjects, and giving ſtability to their independence, and protection to their property. He publiſhed laws to the number of 51, and not only divided his dominions into counties, and other ſmaller ſubdiviſions, but he made each houſeholder reſponſible for the behaviour of his family. As the tythings conſiſted of ten families, each became a pledge for the peaceful conduct of the reſt, ſo that the whole kingdom was but a large family eager to preſerve the public ſecurity, while they enſured domeſtic concord. As a man of letters, Alfred gained reputation, he not only tranſlated and wrote ſeveral books, particularly Boethius' conſolations of philoſophy; but that learning might find an aſylum in England, he endowed ſeveral ſchools in the kingdom, and founded, or according to others reſtored, the univerſity of Oxford, and filled the profeſſorial chairs with men of taſte, genius, and erudition. In his own conduct he was a pattern of regularity, ſo that he divided the 24 hours of the day into three equal portions, one of which was ſet apart for religious duties, the other for repoſe, recreation, and literature, and the third for the affairs of the ſtate. To his wiſdom England may look back with gratitude for the firſt beginning of her naval greatneſs. Alfred not only built ſhips, and enured his ſubjects to the toils and dangers of the ſea, but he had the boldneſs to attempt to diſcover the north-eaſt paſſage. Though by profeſſion and the circumſtances of the times a ſoldier, the humane monarch, who had been perſonally engaged in 56 battles, viewed with deteſtation the ſcenes of carnage which ambition or the love of plunder might exhibit, and conſidered his glory as better cemented by the peaceful occupations of his ſubjects than by war, and by the promotion of induſtry and mutual confidence than by the uſe of arms. After a reign of above 28 years, devoted to the happineſs of his people, this magnanimous prince died on the 28th of October 900, and was buried in Wincheſter cathedral. Hiſtory does not preſent a man more amiable in his public and private character, or whoſe virtues entitled him to a throne, more than this great and benevolent hero. He left by his queen Elſwitha two ſons and three daughters, and was ſucceeded by his ſecond ſon, Edward, ſurnamed the elder.

ALFRED or ALURED, ſon of Ethelred by Emma daughter of Richard duke of Normandy, was ſent by his father to the Norman court, during the invaſion of the Danes. After Canute's death he landed in England, and might have ſucceeded in the expulſion of Harold, if not thwarted by the arts of Godwin. He fell into the hands of his enemies, who cruelly put out his eyes, and confined him in Ely monaſtery, where he was murdered 1037, in his 34th year.

ALFRED, a learned benedictine monk of Malmeſbury, made biſhop of Exeter in the 10th century. He was intimate with St. Dunſtan, and wrote ſeveral learned books, particularly the life of Adelmus,—the hiſtory of Malmeſbury abbey, &c.

ALFRED, of Beverley, an hiſtorian. Vid. ALREDUS.

ALFRED, an Engliſhman, ſurnamed the Philoſopher, much reſpected at Rome. He died 1270, and left four books on the meteors of Ariſtotle,—one on vegetables,—and five on the Conſolations of Boethius.

ALFRIDE, or ELFRID, the natural ſon of Oſwy king of Northumberland, fled to Ireland, or as ſome ſuppoſe to Scotland, to avoid the perſecution of his brother Egfrid, whom he had ſucceeded on the throne. Afterwards the two brothers met to decide their fate by arms, Egfrid was ſlain, and Alfride aſcended the vacant throne 686, and deſerved the applauſes of his ſubjects by his benevolence. He died 705.

ALGARDI, Alexander, an architect and sculptor of Bologna, pupil to Lewis Carraci, and intimate with Dominichino. He died at Rome 1654. There is at Bologna, a group of the beheading of St. Paul by him much admired.

ALGAROTTI, Francis, son of a Venetian merchant, who, after studying at Rome and Bologna, came to Paris where he published his Newtonianism for the ladies, in Italian, a work translated into French by du Perron, but of inferior merit to Fontenelle's plurality of worlds. Algarotti visited England and Germany, and was noticed by the kings of Poland and Prussia. After some residence in the Polish court as privy counsellor for the affairs of war, he returned to Italy, and died unexpectedly at Pisa 1764, in his 52d year. As a connoisseur in painting, sculpture, and architecture, he possessed taste and judgment, and his genius as a poet is fully proved in the elegant trifles which he wrote in Italian. His works were published in 4 volumes 8vo. in 1765, and translated into French at Berlin 1772, 8 volumes 8vo.

ALGAZALI, an Arabian, born at Thous in Khorassan, author of a treatise on the different classes of science which concern religion.

ALGER, a monk of Liege, author of a book on the sacraments. He died at Cluny, 1131.

ALGHISI, Thomas, an eminent surgeon and lithotomist of Florence, who died in consequence of being severely wounded by the bursting of his gun 1713.

ALGIERI, Peter, a Venetian, whose talents in painting were employed in decorating the opera at Paris. He died 1760.

ALHAZEN, an Arabian who wrote on optics, about the year 1100.

ALI, cousin and son-in-law of Mahomet, was opposed in his view to succeed the prophet, by Othman and Omar, and retired into Arabia, where his mild and enlarged interpretation of the Koran increased the number of his proselytes. After the death of Othman he was acknowledged caliph by the Egyptians and Arabians, but in less than five years after he was assassinated in a mosque 660. Ali, after the decease of his beloved Fatima, claimed the privilege of polygamy, and left 15 sons and 18 daughters. His memory is still held in the highest veneration by the Persians.

ALI-BEG, a Pole, born of Christian parents. When young he was made prisoner by the Tartars and sold to the Turks, who educated him in the Mahometan faith. He rose in the Turkish court, and was appointed interpreter to the grand signior, and translated the bible and the English catechism into the Turkish language. His great work is on the liturgy of the Turks, their pilgrimages to Mecca, and other religious ceremonies, translated into Latin by Dr. Smith. He died 1675.

ALI BEY, a native of Natolia, son of a Greek priest. In his 13th year he was carried away by some robbers as he was hunting, and sold to Ibrahim, a lieutenant of the Janissaries, at Grand Cairo, who treated him with kindness. Ali distinguished himself against the Arabs, but when his patron was basely assassinated 1758, by Ibrahim the Circassian, he avenged his death, and slew the murderer with his own hand. This violent measure raised him enemies, and his flight to Jerusalem and to St. John of Acre, with difficulty saved him from the resentment of the Ottoman porte, that had demanded his head. Time, however, paved the way to his elevation. Those who had espoused the cause of the Circassian were sacrificed to the public safety; and Ali, recalled by the public voice, governed the country with benevolence and equity. The chiefs of each village were declared responsible for the ill conduct of their neighbours, and whilst the general link was extended through every province, security was restored, and confidence revived. But the power of an eastern prince is always precarious; ingratitude was found among those on whom Ali had heaped favors, and when he assisted the Turkish government his conduct was viewed with a jealous eye, and his death determined at Constantinople. In a battle fought against a rebellious Mameluke to whom he had entrusted part of his army, Ali saw some of his troops desert, and, unwilling to survive a defeat, he defended himself with the fury of a lion, till he was cut down by a sabre and carried to the conqueror's tent, where eight days after he expired of his wounds. Ali died in his 45th year 1773, and left behind him a character unrivalled for excellence, for courage, and magnanimity. As governor of Egypt he behaved with the tenderness of a parent; and to the love of his country were united humanity and an elevated genius.

ALI-BERG, a learned Turk in the 17th century, acquainted with 17 languages. He translated the bible into the Turkish language.

ALICE, daughter of Theobald IV. of Champagne, married Lewis VII. of France, by whom she had, 1165, a son called Philip Augustus. During her son's absence in the holy land, she was appointed regent of the kingdom, and her government was marked by moderation and justice. She died at Paris 1206.

ALIGRE, Etienne, a native of Chartres, who rose by his merit to be chancellor of France. He died 1635 in his 76th year. His son, of the same name, was raised to the same dignity as his father, and enjoyed the character of a great and upright magistrate. He died 1677 in his 85th year.

ALKMAAR, Henry D', an eminent German man of the 15th century, author of the fable of Reynard, an ingenious poem, which laſhes the vices and foibles of mankind in the character of beaſts, eſpecially of the fox.

ALLAINVAL, Leonor Jean-Chriſtine Soulas d', a native of Chartres, author of ſeveral comedies of conſiderable merit. His beſt piece was l'embarras des richeſſes. He died of the palſy in the Hotel-dieu 1753.

ALLAIS, Denys Vairaſſe d', a native of Allais in Languedoc, who ſerved in 1665 in the duke of York's fleet, and afterwards taught the Engliſh language in Paris. His writings were not much eſteemed, except his hiſtory of Sevarambia, a political romance.

ALLAM, Andrew, born at Garſington in Oxfordſhire, was of St. Edmund-hall of which he became the vice principal. He tranſlated the life of Iphicrates, and aſſiſted Wood in his Athenæ Oxonienſes. He died of the ſmall-pox 1685, in his 30th year.

ALLATIUS, Leo, a native of Scio, who ſtudied belles lettres and the languages at Rome. Though he took a degree in medicine, literature was his favorite purſuit, and as his erudition was great, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a teacher in the Greek college at Rome. He was afterwards employed by pope Gregory XV. to remove the elector Palatine's library from Germany to the Vatican, in reward for which ſervices, he was appointed librarian. Though employed among eccleſiaſtics, he never entered into orders, becauſe, as he told the pope, he wiſhed to retain the privilege of marrying, if he pleaſed. His publications were numerous, chiefly on divinity. It is ſaid that he wrote Greek for 40 years with the ſame pen, and that when he loſt it, he expreſſed his concern even to the ſhedding of tears. He died at Rome in his 83d year, 1669.

ALLEGRAIN, Chriſtopher Gabriel, a French ſculptor, admitted into the academy for the maſterly execution of the figure of a young man. Among other pieces his Venus and his Diana were much admired. He died 1795.

ALLEGRI, Antonio, an illuſtrious painter, better known by the name of Corregio, from the place where he was born. Though he was neglected in his education, nature had formed him for a painter, and his genius burſt through the ſhackles of ignorance and poverty. It is to be lamented that he never viſited Rome, as his reſidence at Parma procured him neither patronage nor fame. His moſt celebrated paintings were the Virgin and Child, with Mary Magdalen, St. Jerome, and the Notte or Night, which is ſo well deſcribed by lady Miller in her letters from Italy; but in every thing that he did there was ſuperior execution, great judgment, and infinite taſte. The encomiums of Annibal Caracci who, fifty years after his death, admired and imitated him, are ſtrong but juſt. "Every thing," ſays he, "that I ſee aſtoniſhes me, particularly the coloring and the beauty of the children. They live—they breathe—they ſmile with ſo much grace and ſo much reality, that the beholder ſmiles and partakes of their enjoyments." Corregio was employed by the canons of Parma to paint the aſſumption of the Virgin on the cupola of the cathedral; but when the work, which will ever immortalize his name, was completed, the artiſt was meanly forced to accept the ſmall pittance of 200 livres; and, to load him with greater indignity, it was paid in copper. Corregio haſtened with the money to his ſtarving family, but as he had ſix or eight miles to travel from Parma, the weight of his burden and the heat of the climate, added to the oppreſſion of his breaking heart, and he was attacked with a pleuriſy which in three days terminated his exiſtence and his ſorrows 1534, in his 40th year. Titian was the cauſe that this great work was not deſtroyed. As he paſſed through Parma, he viſited and admired the cathedral, and told the ignorant prieſts who threatened ſpeedily to efface the painting, that they ought to value it as moſt ineſtimable, for added he emphatically, "were I not Titian, I would wiſh to be Corregio." Corregio was the firſt who happily introduced in his pictures fore-ſhortenings, an attitude which expreſſes boldneſs of conception, and is attended with ſtriking effect.

ALLEGRI, Gregorio, an eminent compoſer, whoſe works are ſtill uſed in the pope's chapel at Rome. His "miſerere" is always uſed on Good Friday, and is much admired. He died 1672.

ALLEIN, Richard, was born at Ditchet in Somerſetſhire, where his father was rector for 50 years. He ſtudied at Oxford, and obtained the living of Batcomb in Dorſetſhire. He was employed as commiſſioner by parliament for the ejecting of ſcandalous miniſters, and on the reſtoration he was expelled from his living for non-conformity. His peaceful behaviour, however, entitled him to reſpect; he preached frequently in private houſes, and though ſometimes reprimanded as the holder of a conventicle, yet his exemplary life ſhielded him againſt perſecution and impriſonment. His writings were moſtly on theological ſubjects. He died 1681, in his 65th year.

ALLEIN, William, ſon of the above, was of Corpus Chriſti, Oxford, where he took his degrees. He afterwards ſettled at Blandford, Dorſet, from which he was ejected as a nonconformiſt. His millennium, among other curious theological tracts, was much admired. He died 1677.

ALLEIN, Joſeph, ſon of Tobias Allein, was born at Devizes 1623. He was a member of Lincoln and Corpus Chriſti colleges, in Oxford, and took orders, and afterwards went to Taunton in Somerſetſhire, where he married, and where as miniſter he applied himſelf with indefatigable zeal to his office. His income was ſmall, but it was increaſed by the induſtry of his wife, who kept a boarding ſchool. At the reſtoration he was ejected as a non-conformiſt, but as he continued his miniſtry in private, he was committed to Ilcheſter goal, and ſentenced at the aſſizes to pay a fine of 100 marks, and to remain in priſon till the payment. His confinement, which was extended to one year, ruined his conſtitution. He died in November 1668, in his 36th year. His alarm to unconverted ſinners has often been republiſhed.

ALLEN, John, took his degree of LL. B. at Cambridge though educated at Oxford. He was nine years at Rome as commiſſioner from Wareham, and at his return he entered into the ſervice of Wolſey. In 1528 he was raiſed to the ſee of Dublin, and made chancellor of Ireland. He was murdered ſix years after by Thomas Fitzgerald, ſon of lord Kildare.

ALLEN, ſir Thomas, an Engliſh admiral who made the firſt hoſtile attack on the Dutch in 1665. Though with only eight ſhips he attacked their Smyrna fleet, killed their commander Brackel, took four prizes, and diſperſed the reſt into Cadiz. The next year he was at the memorable battle of the 25th July, when de Ruyter the Dutch commander, ſeeing his van defeated and three of his admirals killed, exclaimed, "what a wretch I am, that, among ſo many thouſand bullets, none can come and put an end to my miſery."

ALLEN, Thomas, a divine educated at Worceſter ſchool and at Brazen Noſe and Merton, Oxford, and intimate with ſir Henry Saville, by whoſe influence he was promoted to a fellowſhip at Eton. He wrote learned obſervations on Chryſoſtom's book on Iſaiah, and died 1638, aged 65.

ALLEN, Thomas, a native of Uttoxeter in Staffordſhire. He was fellow of Trinity college, Oxford, which he quitted 1570 for Glouceſter hall, where he applied himſelf to mathematics. His abilities procured him the eſteem of the earl of Northumberland, and of Robert earl of Leiceſter. Allen, who was employed in collecting the moſt curious manuſcripts on hiſtory and aſtronomy, did not eſcape the ſuſpicions of the ignorant, who accuſed him of uſing magic and conjuration to produce a marriage between the queen and Leiceſter. He publiſhed in Latin the ſecond and third books of Ptolemy concerning the judgment of the ſtars, beſides notes on Lilly's books, and on Bale's work de Scriptoribus Britan. He died much reſpected 1632.

ALLESTRY or ALLESTREE, Richard, a native of Uppington in Shropſhire, born in March 1619. He entered at Chriſt church in Oxford, and in the civil war he joined the king's party under ſir John Biron, and was at the battle of Keinton-field in Warwickſhire. At the concluſion of the war he took orders, and was afterwards one of thoſe expelled when the parliament in 1648 ſent viſitors to Oxford to demand the ſubmiſſion of the univerſity. He found an aſylum in the family of lord Newport, in Shropſhire, and after the battle of Worceſter, he was fixed upon by the royaliſts as a proper perſon to convey diſpatches, and have a conference with the king at Rouen. On his return from a ſecond journey in 1659 he was ſeized at Dover by the parliament party, but he had the addreſs to ſave his papers, and after a ſhort confinement he was reſtored to liberty. He was at the reſtoration made canon of Chriſt Church, king's chaplain, Regius profeſſor of divinity, and in 1665 promoted to the provoſtſhip of Eton, which he reſigned 1678. He died of a dropſy 1680. He publiſhed 40 ſermons, beſides a ſmall tract on the privileges of the univerſity of Oxford.

ALLESTRY, Jacob, an Engliſh poet, nephew of the preceding, and ſon of James Alleſtry a London bookſeller, who was ruined by the fire of 1666. From Weſtminſter ſchool he paſſed to Chriſt Church Oxford, where he wrote ſome verſes and paſtorals, and died 1686.

ALLETZ, Pons Auguſtin, a native of Montpellier, who publiſhed various works of ſome celebrity in France, in the compoſition of which he ſhowed indefatigable perſeverance, and great judgment. He died at Paris 1785, aged 82.

ALLEY, William, a native of Wycomb, Bucks, who, after an Eton education, went to King's college, Cambridge. He afterwards ſtudied at Oxford, but as he was a zealous advocate for the reformation, he retired during Mary's reign into the north, where he kept a ſchool, and practiſed phyſic. Under Elizabeth he was made lecturer of St. Paul's, and in 1560 biſhop of Exeter. He wrote the poor man's library, containing ſermons, &c. beſides a commentary on St. Peter's firſt epiſtle, and a tranſlation of the pentateuch, in the biſhop's bible. He died 1570.

ALLEYN, Edward, founder of Dulwich college, was born at St. Botolph, London, Sept. 1ſt, 1566. He applied himſelf to the ſtage, and with ſuch ſucceſs that he was flattered by Ben Jonſon's muſe, and applauded by crowded audiences. He built the Fortune playhouſe near Whitecroſs-ſtreet, Moorfields, and added to his income by being keeper of the king's wild beaſts, with a ſalary of 500l. per annum. His erection of Dulwich college is attributed to a ſuperſtitious cauſe. Whilſt with ſix others he was acting the part of a demon in one of Shakeſpear's plays, he is ſaid to have been terrified by the real appearance of the devil, and the power of imagination was ſo great, that a vow was was made, and the college in 1614 was begun under the direction of Inigo Jones, and in three years finished at the expence of 10,000l. This noble edifice was solemnly appropriated on the 13th Sept. 1619, in the presence of a numerous audience, to the humane purposes of the founder, who appointed himself its first master. The original endowment was 800l. per annum, for the maintenance of one master, one warden, always to be unmarried and of the name of Alleyn, four fellows, three of whom are in orders, and the 4th an organist, besides six poor men, and six women, and twelve boys to be educated till the age of 14 or 16, and then to be apprenticed. Alleyn married three wives, the last of whom survived him. He died 1626, in his 61st year, and was buried in the chapel of his college.

ALLIOT, N. a civil officer in the service of Stanislaus king of Poland. He wrote an account of the expences of his master in the buildings at Nancy,—and a relation of the funeral pomp of Leopold II. 1730. He died 1779.

ALLIX, Peter, a native of Alencon, minister of the protestant congregation of Rouen, and of Charenton near Paris. On the cancelling of the edict of Nantes, he left his country and came to England. His reflections on the holy scriptures were dedicated to James II. and his remarks on the ecclesiastical history of the churches of Piedmont to William. He was honored with the degree of D. D. and promoted to the place of treasurer of Salisbury. He died in London 1717, in his 76th year. His works, which are numerous, and expressive of his piety and great erudition, are all on theological subjects, and consist of reflections on all the books of scripture, 1688, republished by bishop Watson in his theological tracts,—the ancient Jewish church vindicated against the Unitarians, 1691, &c.

ALLOISI, Balthazar, an able historical and portrait painter, who studied under the Caraccis. He was born at Bologna, and died 1638, aged 60.

ALLORY, Alexander, a painter of Florence, famous for his skill in the representation of naked figures. As he was well acquainted with anatomy, his portraits are correct and graceful. He died 1607, in his 72d year.

ALMAGRO, Diego, one of the conquerors of Peru, was of so obscure an origin that he knew not his parents. He accompanied Pizarro in 1525, and every where showed the greatest valor mingled with the basest cruelty. He penetrated in 1525 to Chili, took Cuzco, and at last assassinated his friend Pizarro. This armed the partizans of Pizarro against him, and he was defeated, and condemned to be strangled 1538, in his 75th year. His son rose up to vindicate his character, and to avenge his death, but he was defeated by the viceroy of Peru, and with 40 of his adherents was beheaded 1542. Almagro's cruelty to the unfortunate Atahualpa, is deservedly censured as infamous.

ALMAMON or ABDALLAH III. son of Aaron al Raschid, caliph of the house of the Abbassides, after his brother Alamin, 813, was famous for his protection of learning and of learned men. He conquered part of Crete. He had the best Greek writers translated into Arabic, and made a collection of the best authors. He also calculated a set of astronomical tables, and founded an academy at Bagdad. He died 833.

ALMARUS, Elmerus, or Elmarus, was abbot of St. Augustin's monastery in Canterbury, when archbishop Alphage was murdered by the Danes 1011. He escaped, and 11 years after was made bishop of Sherborne, before the see was transferred to Sarum.

ALMEIDA, Francis, a Portuguese, distinguished in the wars of Grenada, and sent out by Emanuel in 1505, as first viceroy of India. After a perilous voyage he crossed the cape of Good Hope, and proceeded along the coast of Africa, where he spread conquest, terror, and desolation. He reduced Quiloa, Mombassa, and other places under the yoke of Portugal, and with only 700 men he stormed the fort of Panama, which was defended by a strong rampart and a garrison of 4000 men of tried and desperate valor, and instead of sharing a booty which might have rendered his soldiers inactive, he destroyed it by fire. When his son was killed in an engagement with the Arabians, the father refused to mourn with his friends, but declared that he had obtained a short but glorious life. The fame of Albuquerque, and the malice of enemies at home, however, soon stopped his career; but he refused to accept the orders of his recall, and on pretence of avenging his son's death he sailed to Dabul in quest of fresh laurels, and in an engagement with the enemy's fleet, he killed 4000 men. The animosities between the rival governors were appeased by the interference of Contigna; and Almeida, after resigning his power to Albuquerque, set sail for Europe. In his way he landed near the cape of Good Hope, and in an unfortunate quarrel with the natives he was wounded in the throat with a javelin, and immediately expired. Some of the Portuguese, who had shared his toils and glory, attempted to recover his body, but they shared his fate.

ALMEIDA, Lawrence, son of the preceding, accompanied his father to India. He destroyed the ships of Caulan, and in visiting Ceylon he made it tributary to Portugal, and brought away 250,000 lbs. of cinnamon as the first annual payment. He was sent with eight ships to attack the Arabians, who were supported by the sultan of Egypt; but the superiority of the enemy's vessels and the dangers of the coast proved fatal to his views. His ſhip ran aground, and whilſt the other veſſels attempted in vain to relieve him, he fought with undaunted courage, regardleſs of the wounds he had received. A ball at laſt ſtruck him on the breaſt, and put a period to his brilliant career. His ſailors reduced to 20 in number, unwilling to ſubmit, were boarded and overpowered, and met from their conquerors that humanity which their valor deſerved.

ALMEIDA, Apollinarius de, a Portugueſe biſhop, of the order of the Jeſuits, who went as miſſionary to Æthiopia. Though baniſhed by the inhabitants, he had the boldneſs to return, with two other eccleſiaſtics, who together with him were cruelly murdered by the natives, 1568.

ALMEIDA, Manuel d', a Portugueſe Jeſuit who, after a reſidence of 40 years in the Indies, died at Goa 1646. He publiſhed hiſtorical obſervations on Æthiopia.

ALMELOVEEN, Thomas Janſſen d', a Dutch phyſician, author of the Hortus Malabaricus, and Flora Malabarica, deſcriptive of the Malabar plants, 13 vols. fol.

ALMELOVEEN, Theodore Janſſen d', profeſſor of Greek, of hiſtory, and phyſic at Harderwick in Holland, wrote learned notes on ancient authors, and publiſhed the Faſti Conſulares,—Amœnitates,—Onomaſticon,—Vitæ Stephanorum, &c. He died at Amſterdam 1742.

ALMICI, Peter Camillus, an eccleſiaſtic born at Breſcia in Italy. He was well verſed in claſſical literature, and publiſhed ſome critical reflections on Febronius, &c. He died 1779, aged 65.

ALOMLUADAD, Iſmael, an Arabian hiſtorian who gave a chronological account of the Saracen affairs in Sicily from 842 to 904.

ALOADIN, a Mahometan, prince of the Aſſacides or Aſſaſſins, was called the old man of the mountain. He lived between Damaſcus and Antioch, and was ſurrounded by a number of youths, whom he intoxicated with pleaſures, and rendered ſubſervient to his views, by promiſing ſtill greater voluptuouſneſs in the next world. As theſe were employed to ſtab his enemies, he was dreaded by the neighbouring princes. From the name and character of his followers the word aſſaſſin is derived.

ALONZO, John, an eminent architect of Spain. The church of the Hieronymites at Guadaloupe, in Eſtramadura, is a beautiful monument of his genius.

ALPAGO, Andrew, an Italian phyſician, who for ſome time reſided at Damaſcus. On his return he was made profeſſor of medicine at Venice, and died there 1555. He tranſlated Avicenna, Averroes, and Serapion, with notes.

ALPAIDE, was the beautiful wife of Pepin Heriſtel, after his divorce from Plectrude his firſt conſort. This union was cenſured by Lambert biſhop of Liege, and Alpaide excited her brother Dodon to murder the bold eccleſiaſtic. She was mother of Charles Martel.

ALPHANUS, Benedict, archbiſhop of Palermo, known as a phyſician and a poet, died 1086, author of the lives of ſome ſaints in verſe, &c.

ALPHERY, Mekepper or Nicephorus, a native of Ruſſia, deſcended from the imperial family. During the troubles of his country, he came to England with his two brothers, and by the care of Mr. Bidell, a Ruſſia merchant, he ſtudied at Oxford, where his brothers fell victims to the ſmall-pox. In 1618 he ſucceeded to the living of Wooley, Huntingdonſhire, and though he was twice invited to return to Ruſſia with the certainty of being placed on the throne, he preferred the character of a pariſh prieſt in England to the ſplendor of the purple. He was ejected from his living during the civil wars, and ill treated by the republican ſoldiers, though his preſbyterian ſucceſſor behaved towards him with humanity. He ſaw the reſtoration, and was replaced in his living, but retired to Hammerſmith where his ſon had ſettled, and there died aged above 80. The laſt deſcendant of this fallen family married a Johnſon, a cutler at Huntingdon, by whom ſhe had eight children. She was living in 1764.

ALPHONSO or ALPHONSUS, ſurnamed the Catholic, king of Aſturias, fought againſt the Moors, from whom he took upwards of 30 towns. He died in the 18th year of his reign, 757, aged 64.

ALPHONSO II. ſurnamed the Chaſte, king of Aſturias, ſignalized himſelf againſt the Moors and took Liſbon, and died 842.

ALPHONSO III. or the Great, king of Aſturias, ſucceeded his father Ordogno, 866. He waged ſucceſsful wars againſt the Moors, but the inſurrections of his ſubjects, headed by Froila count of Gallicia, drove him from his throne. After being reſtored, he abdicated the crown in favor of his eldeſt ſon Garcias, who had ſome time before ungratefully raiſed an inſurrection againſt him, and then been pardoned; but when the Moors threatened the kingdom, he quitted his retirement, and, at the head of his brave countrymen, he obtained a moſt ſignal victory over the enemy. He died 912, univerſally reſpected for valor and benevolence. He wrote a chronicle of the Spaniſh monarchs.

ALPHONSO VI. king of Leon aud Caſtile, made war againſt the Moors, took Toledo, and died 1109.

ALPHONSO VIII. or IX. king of Leon and Caſtile, ſurnamed the Good or Noble, came to the throne when only four years old, 1158. When of age he retook from the Moors the places loſt during his minority. He defeated his enemies at the great battle of Muradat where the Moors loſt near 200,000 men. He died 1212, aged 60.

ALPHONSO X. king of Leon and Caſtile, ſurnamed the Wiſe, ſucceeded his father Ferdinand III. in 1252. He married Iolante daughter of the king of Arragon, whom he was going to divorce for a Daniſh princeſs becauſe ſhe was barren; but the queen at laſt brought him nine children. He was elected emperor of Germany in 1258, but as he delayed viſiting the empire, Rodolphus was choſen in his room. His ſon conſpired againſt him, and dethroned him; and though he fled among the Saracens for protection, and gained a victory over this unnatural child, yet he was not reinſtated. He died of a broken heart 1284. As an aſtronomer and a man of letters, Alphonſus obtained greater fame than as a monarch. He perceived the errors of Ptolemy's tables, and under his direction at Toledo, thoſe tables, called the Alphonſine tables, were drawn up by the ſkill of Hazan a Jew, and their epoch fixed on the 30th May 1232, the day on which he began his reign. It has been ſaid of Alphonſus, that, in viewing the Ptolemaic ſyſtem, he declared that if God had conſulted him in the formation of the univerſe, he could have given him directions for a more perfect whole; a bold expreſſion which, if it does not breathe the ſpirit of profane ſcepticiſm, at leaſt conveys ſevere cenſure on the ignorance of preceding aſtronomers.

ALPHONSO II. king of Leon and Caſtile, ſucceeded Ferdinand IV. in 1312, and defeated the Moors 1340, killing not leſs than 200,000 of them. He died of the plague at the ſiege of Gibraltar 1350, aged 38.

ALPHONSO V. king of Arragon, ſurnamed the magnanimous, ſucceeded his father Ferdinand the juſt 1416. He extended the Spaniſh influence over Italy, Naples, and Sicily, where he was acknowledged king 1412. He died 1485 aged 74, leaving the kingdom of Naples to his natural ſon Ferdinand, and thoſe of Spain, Sardinia, and Sicily to Juan his brother, king of Navarre. He gave a welcome aſylum to the muſes which perſecution baniſhed from Conſtantinople, and every where encouraged the cultivation of ſcience. He walked with the greateſt familiarity among his ſubjects, obſerving to his courtiers who fancied dangers and conſpiracies, that a father has nothing to fear among his children. Seeing once one of his veſſels ready to periſh, he haſtened in a ſmall boat to the aſſiſtance of the crew, exclaiming, I had rather die with you than ſee you periſh.

ALPHONSO I. king of Portugal, ſon of Henry of Burgundy of France, by Thereſa daughter of Alphonſo king of Leon, was only three years old at his father's death. He defeated five Mooriſh kings at the battle of Ourique, 1139, though with a very inferior force; and thus he raiſed his country from a dependent ſtate to a powerful monarchy, of which he was proclaimed the firſt ſovereign in the field of battle. He was afterwards defeated and taken priſoner by Ferdinand II. of Caſtile, who nobly ſet him at liberty. He died 1185 aged 76.

ALPHONSO II. king of Portugal, ſucceeded his father Sancho 1211. He was engaged in war with the Moors, and died 1223, aged 38.

ALPHONSO III. king of Portugal, brother of Sancho II. ſucceeded 1248. His reign was diſturbed by diſſenſions with the clergy and with the pope. He died 1279, aged 69.

ALPHONSO IV. king of Portugal ſucceeded his father Denys, 1325. He was engaged in war with the king of Caſtile, but afterwards aſſiſted him againſt the Moors. He was an able prince under whom juſtice was adminiſtered with great impartiality. He died 1357, aged 66.

ALPHONSO V, king of Portugal, ſurnamed the African, ſucceeded his father Edward, though only ſix years old, 1438. He made war in Africa, and took Arzilla and Tangiers, from the Moors, and he was alſo engaged in a quarrel with Ferdinand and Iſabella of Caſtile. He died of the plague at Sintra 1481, aged 49. During his reign the Portugueſe diſcovered Guinea, and began to ſpread Chriſtianity in that part of Africa. Alphonſo was a great patron of learning.

ALPHONSO VI. king of Portugal, ſucceeded his father John IV. His intellects proved to be weak, and in his conduct he exhibited the tyrant and the madman. He abdicated the crown in favor of his brother Don Pedro, and died at Cyntra 1683, aged 41.

ALPHONSUS, Peter, a Jewiſh writer of Spain. He was converted to Chriſtianity, and had Alphonſo king of Arragon for his ſponſor 1106. He wrote a vindication of the Chriſtian religion.

ALPINI, Proſpero, a native of Maroſtica in the Venetian territory, born 1553. He left the profeſſion of arms, and ſtudied botany and phyſic, and in 1580 he embarked for Egypt with his friend George Emo or Hemi, the conſul of the republic, and for three years he was employed along the banks of the Nile in learned reſearches, and in examining the nature of plants. On his return he was appointed phyſician to Andrew Doria prince of Melfi, but he was recalled in 1593, and honorably placed in the profeſſorial chair of Padua. As his health had been injured by his travels he died at Padua 1617, aged 64. His works which are in Latin, are chiefly on botanical and medicinal ſubjects.

ALREDUS, ALFREDUS, or ALUREDUS, a native of Beverley in Yorkſhire, who after ſtudying at Cambridge became a ſecular prieſt and treaſurer of St. John's church in his own town. He is ſtiled the Engliſh Florus, from the the elegant Latin history which he wrote of the Britons from king Brutus to his own times. He died about 1126.

ALSAHARAVIUS, an Arabian physician, about 1085, author of Altasrif, a treatise in 32 books on medical practice.

ALSOP, Anthony, received his education at Westminster school and at Christ church, and was presented by Trelawney bishop of Winchester, to a prebend and the rectory of Brightwell, Berks. In 1717 he was sued by Mrs. Elizabeth Astrey of Oxford, for a breach of marriage, and damages for 2000l. were given against him; so that he retired abroad to avoid the sneers of the censorious, as well as to elude contributing with his purse to the triumph of his fair one. The time of his absence is not known. His death was occasioned by a fall into a ditch from near his garden door 1726. He possessed a poetical genius, which however was not frequently exerted. He published early Æsop's Greek fables, in the preface to which he attacked Bentley. Some of his poems are preserved in Dodsley's and Peach's collections.

ALSOP, Vincent, a native of Northamptonshire, who, after taking his first degree at St. John's Cambridge, became assistant in Oakham grammar school. He married Mr. King's daughter, by whose persuasion he left the church for the presbyterian tenets. In his writings he attacked Dr. Sherlock with humor and spirit, and after residing at Wilby and Wellingborough, and suffering imprisonment for six months during the prevailing persecution of the times, he settled in London. After the death of Charles II. he was reconciled to kingly power, when James pardoned his only son whose life might have been forfeited for treasonable practices. His life was spent in the exercise of piety, and in the discharge of his ministry; but in his writings, which were all on theological subjects, he displayed, with a mixture of seriousness, powerful flashes of the wit with which nature had so strongly gifted him. He died in an advanced age, 1703.

ALSTEDIUS, John Henry, a protestant, professor of divinity and philosophy at Nassau, and afterwards at Alba Julia in Transylvania, where he died 1638 in his 50th year. He is best known for his Encyclopedia, which is become the foundation of all modern works of the same kind. His Thesaurus Theologicus, and his treatise on arithmetic, are equally esteemed.

ALSTON, Charles, studied at Glasgow, and after taking his degrees at Leyden, settled at Edinburgh, where he lectured on the Materia Medica and Botany. He is author of Tyrocinium Botanicum Edinburgense, in which he censured Linne's sexual system, 1753—Lectures on the Materia Medica, 2 vols. 4to. 1770, &c. He died 1760, aged 77.

ALTHAMNER, Andrew, a Lutheran minister of Nuremburg, in the 16th century, author of notes on Tacitus' treatise de German Moribus, 4to. beside controversial works.

ALTHUSIUS, John, a German lawyer in the 17th century, who inveighed against kingly power, in which he was opposed by Bodecler.

ALTILIUS, Gabriel, a Neapolitan poet preceptor to Ferdinand son of the king of Naples, and made bishop of Policastro, 1471. Though some imagine that he forsook the muses when raised to his see, it is certain that he wrote after that the first of his poems, his epithalamium on the marriage of Isabella of Arragon, found in the Deliciæ Italor. Poet. Altilius died in 1484, or 1501.

ALTING, Menson, a burgomaster of Groningen, author of the best description of the Low Countries now extant, in folio 1697. He died 1713, aged 76.

ALTING, Henry, was born at Embden in 1583. He was the preceptor, and the minister of the elector palatine, and sat as one of his deputies at the synod of Dort. He filled the theological chair of Groningen from 1627 till his death in 1644. His works are on religious subjects.

ALTING, James, son of the preceding, was born at Heidelberg 1618. He studied at Groningen and Embden, and afterwards passed into England, where he was ordained by Prideaux bishop of Worcester. His determination to reside in England was altered by the offer of the Hebrew professorship at Groningen, which he accepted. As he followed the scriptures against the doctrine of the schoolmen he acquired popularity by his lectures; but he was soon impeached by des Marets the divinity professor as an innovator, and the 21 articles of his accusation were carried before the divines of Leyden, who acquitted the accused of heresy, though not of imprudence, and censured his accuser for want of moderation. These differences were at last settled by the kind interference of some of their friends, on the death-bed of Desmarets. The three last years of his life were subject to constant pain and disease, and he died at last of a fever 1679. His works were printed in five vols. folio, containing practical, philosophical, and problematical tracts.

ALTON, Richard count d', an Austrian general who had the command of the Low Countries in 1787. Though a man of bravery, he betrayed weakness during the insurrections in Brabant 1789, for which he was sent for to Vienna, to clear his character. He died on the journey 1789. His brother distinguished himself against the Turks, and also against the French at the siege of Valenciennes. He was killed near Dunkirk 1793, much regretted as a good soldier.

ALTOVITI, Marseille d', a Florentine lady, lady, who ſettled at Marſeilles, and devoted herſelf to the writing of Italian poetry. She died 1609.

ALURED of Beverley, vid. ALREDUS.

ALVA, Peter d', a Spaniſh Franciſcan who travelled through Peru, and in different countries of Europe. He died in the Low Countries in 1667, leaving a curious life of Saint Francis.

ALVA, Ferdinand Alvarez, duke of, a famous general deſcended from an ancient family in Spain. He was noticed by Charles V. for his intrepidity at the battle of Pavia, and at the ſiege of Metz, and was entruſted with the expedition againſt the holy ſee, and after he had obliged the pope to ſue for peace, he repaired to Rome, and with ſuperſtitious mockery threw himſelf at the feet of the humbled pontiff, imploring his forgiveneſs. When the flame of liberty was kindled in the Low Countries, he was ſent with full powers by Philip II. 1567, to quell the inſurrection. His meaſures were at firſt crowned with ſucceſs, the undiſciplined forces of his opponents ſunk before his veterans, but the minds of the people, which mildneſs might have reconciled to a foreign yoke, were alienated by the deva-ſtation ſpread over their fields, under the direction of the governor and of his council deſervedly denominated the bloody tribunal. Alva ſoon felt the tide of fortune, and of unpopularity ſet againſt him, and after rendering his memory execrable in the Low Countries he ſolicited and obtained his recall 1573. His abilities were afterwards employed againſt Portugal, and he had the good fortune to drive don Antonio from the throne 1581, and thus to add freſh laurels to his military fame. He died 1582 aged 74.

ALVARES, Francis, a Portugueſe prieſt at the court of Emanuel, was ſent as ambaſſador to David king of Abyſſinia. He publiſhed an account of his adventures, and of the country which he had viſited. He died in 1540.

ALVAREZ DE LUNA, or Alvaro, natural ſon of Don Alvaro de Luna by a common proſtitute, was born in 1388. He was in his 20th year introduced at the court of John II. king of Caſtile, and ſo great was the power which he gained over the mind of the monarch that the whole empire was at his diſpoſal. Though baniſhed by the nobles he was recalled and loaded with greater honors. For 30 years out of the 45 which he ſpent at court, he poſſeſſed ſuch an aſcendancy that the king could not change a miniſter or even alter his diet or his clothes, without the approbation of the favorite. His tyranny at laſt haſtened his ruin, he was artfully ſeized by his enemies, and he was tried and ſentenced to loſe his head. His puniſhment was attended with every poſſible ignominy. On the ſcaffold obſerving a book on a pole he aſked the executioner what it meant, and being informed it was to ſuſpend his head upon it, you may, ſays he do what you pleaſe with my body after I am dead, death can bring no diſgrace to a man of courage, nor is it untimely to a man who has enjoyed ſo many honors. He bent his neck to the axe with the cooleſt intrepidity 1453, exhibiting in his life and death the danger and the uncertainty of royal favor improperly beſtowed and unworthily enjoyed.

ALVAREZ, Emanuel, a Portugueſe jeſuit, born at Madeira 1526. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a grammarian and philologiſt at the head of the colleges of Coimbra, Evora, and Liſbon. He died at Evora 1582.

ALVAREZ DE PAZ, James, a jeſuit born at Toledo, author of ſome divinity tracts. He died 1620.

ALVAREZ, Diego, a Spaniſh dominican, engaged in the controverſy of the Thomiſts againſt the Moliniſts. He died 1635.

ALVAROTTO, James, a learned law profeſſor at Padua, whoſe authority is frequently quoted by Italian lawyers. He died 1452 aged 68.

ALVIANO, Bartholomew, a general in the ſervice of Venice, who obtained ſome ſignal advantages over the arms of the emperor Maximilian. He died 1515 in his 60th year, at Breſcia, ſo poor that his ſon was maintained, and his daughters married, at the public expence.

AMADEDDULAT, the ſon of a fiſherman, roſe to the command of the armies of the ſultan of Decan, and obtained poſſeſſion of Perſia, &c which he divided with his two brothers. He fixed his reſidence at Schiraz 933; and died 949 much regretted by his ſoldiers and his ſubjects.

AMADEUS V. count of Savoy, ſurnamed the great, defended Rhodes againſt the Turks, and for this added to his arms the croſs of Malta with the letters F. E. R. T. fortitudo ejus Rhodum tenuit. It is ſaid that he beſieged 32 towns and took them all. He died at Avignon 1323.

AMADEUS VI. count of Savoy 1343, aſſiſted the French againſt Edward III. of England, and afterwards ſupported John Palæologus, againſt the king of Bulgaria. He died of the plague 1383.

AMADEUS VIII. count of Savoy, ſurnamed the pacificator, ſucceeded Amadeus VII, in 1391. After erecting Savoy into a dutchy 1416, he retired from his family to a hermitage called Ripaille. In this retreat, in the midſt of every luxury, with no appearance of ſecluſion from the world except in name, he paſſed his time till 1439, when the council of Baſil elected him pope, in oppoſition to Eugenius IV. He quitted his hermitage and cut off the venerable beard, which he had affectedly permitted to grow to a great length, and aſſumed the name of Felix V. but as he found his his enemies determined to ſupport his rival, he abdicated the tiara in favor of Nicholas V. the ſucceſſor of Eugenius, and ſatisfied with a cardinal's hat, he died 1451 aged 69, at Geneva.

AMADEUS IX. duke of Savoy, ſucceeded Lewis 1465, and was a brave as well as a popular and charitable prince. His ſubjects who knew the goodneſs of his heart, gave him the ſurname of the bleſſed. He died 1472.

AMADEUS, a Franciſcan monk in Portugal who publiſhed ſome myſtical revelations at Rome, and died 1482.

AMADEUS, biſhop of Lauſanne, died 1158, author of a panegyric on the bleſſed virgin.

AMAJA, Francis, a Spaniſh profeſſor of civil law who died at Valladolid about 1640. His commentary on the eight laſt books of the Code, and his other treatiſes were highly valued.

AMAK, a Perſian poet of the fifth century, at the court of the ſultan Khedar Khan, who made him preſident of the academy of poets which he had eſtabliſhed. His poem on the loves of Joſeph and Zoleiſkah was much admired.

AMALARIC or AMAURY, king of the Viſigoths 526, married Clotilda daughter of Clovis king of France, whom he attempted to convert to arianiſm, at firſt by careſſes, afterwards by threats and violence, but in vain. The injured queen at laſt conveyed, as a token of her miſery, a handkerchief covered with her blood to her brothers, in conſequence of which Childebert king of Paris marched againſt her oppreſſor, and defeated him near Narbonne. Amalaric was put to death either as he fled from the battle, or afterwards by the hand of one of his ſoldiers, 531.

AMALASONTHA, daughter of Theodoric king of the Oſtrogoths, was mother of Athalaric. She inherited her father's poſſeſſions as the guardian of her ſon, but while ſhe wiſhed to educate him like her poliſhed neighbours of Rome, ſhe offended her nobles, who conſpired againſt her, and obtained the government of the young prince. Athalaric, now no longer inſtructed in the arts of poliſhed life, but inured to debauchery, ſunk under the fatal power of licentiouſneſs in his 17th year 534. The afflicted mother not knowing how to ſupport herſelf againſt her rebellious ſubjects married her relation Theodatus, but the favored villain diſpatched his unſuſpecting queen, by cauſing her to be ſtrangled in a bath 534.

AMALEK, ſon of Eliphaz, the ſon of Eſau, as the founder of a nation which ſettled in Idumea, and made war againſt the Iſraelites, under Saul and David.

AMALTHEUS, Jerome, John Baptiſte, and Cornelius, three brothers born at Oderzo, in Italy, equally celebrated for their poetry. The firſt ſtudied philoſophy and medicine, the ſecond was ſecretary at the council of Tre and the laſt applied himſelf to literature, a tranſlated the catechiſm of the council in Latin. Among their poems is the followi delicate epigram on two beautiful children w had loſt each an eye.

Lumine Acon dextro, capta eſt Leonilla ſiniſtr
Et poterat formâ vincere uterque Deos.
Parve puer, lumen quod habes, concede ſoro
Sic tu cæcus Amor, ſic erit illa Venus.

AMAMA, Sixtinus, a Hebrew profeſſor Franeker, who refuſed the offers of the u verſity of Leyden to ſucceed to the vaca chair of Erpenius. He cenſured the vulg tranſlation which had received the ſanctio of the council of Trent, in a work called "an barbarus Biblicus", which was ſo reſpectab that ſome ſynods refuſed to admit candidat to holy orders except they underſtood Hebr and Greek originals. His precepts were ſu ceſsfully employed in checking the diſſolu manners which prevailed in the univerſity Franeker, and after his death in 1629, t gratitude of the people of Frieſland for his m mory was ſhown in their generous conduct t wards his children. He was in 1613 Oxford and taught Hebrew in Exeter co lege.

AMAND, Mark Anthony Gerard, Sieur St. born at Rouen in Normandy 1594, d tinguiſhed himſelf as a poet on comic, bu leſque, and amorous ſubjects. His "Moi Sauvé" and his "Solitude" were much admire but have ſince been neglected or forgotte In a poem on the moon it is ſaid that he prai the ſkill of Lewis XIV. in ſwimming, a com pliment which the monarch diſdained, whi ſo affected the poet, that he did not long ſu vive the indifference with which his mu was treated. He died 1661, in his 67 year.

AMASEUS, Romulus, a profeſſor of Bologn author of ſome orations, and of a tranſlation Pauſanias. He died 1558. His ſon Pomp lius publiſhed a tranſlation of part of Polybi and was profeſſor of Greek at Bologna.

AMATUS, de Portugal, a phyſician abo 1550, who travelled through Europe, a wrote commentaries on Dioſcorides, Avicenn &c.

AMAURI, de Chartres, a profeſſor of ph loſophy, born near Chartres in the 13th cen tury. He formed a new ſyſtem of religio on the metaphyſics of Ariſtotle, and acknow ledged three perſons in the Godhead, whic he conſidered as the primary cauſe of matte from which all beings are created. He ſup poſed that there would be three epochs in th government of the world, as there were thre perſons in the trinity. The reign of God h limited to the extinction of the law of Moſe that of the ſon was to laſt as long as the chri tian religion, after which would ſucceed th empire of the holy ghoſt, when men would o fe fer only a ſpiritual worſhip to the ſupreme being. Amauri was condemned by the pope, and for fear of puniſhment retracted his pernicious doctrines, and ſoon after died of diſappointment. His moſt zealous diſciple was Dizant.

AMAURI, king of Jeruſalem after Baldwin in 1162, was unſucceſsful in an expedition againſt Egypt, and died 1173, in his 38th year.

AMAURI II. was king of Cyprus and Jeruſalem, after his brother Guy de Luſignan 1164, and he married Iſabella the ſecond daughter of the preceding, who had laid claims to his crown. He was unſucceſsful againſt the Saracens, and died 1205.

AMAZIAH, ſucceeded his father Joaſh, as king of Judah, in his 25th year. He made war againſt the Edomites, and with the aſſiſtance of Iſrael conquered them in the valley of Salt. He was afterwards taken priſoner, and put to death by his ſubjects, 810 B. C.

AMBOISE, Francois d', ſon of a ſurgeon of Charles IX. of France, roſe to the rank of counſellor of ſtate. He publiſhed the works of Abelard, and wrote ſeveral pieces for the theatre. One of theſe, the Neopolitans, was univerſally applauded. He died in the beginning of the 17th century.—His brother Adrian, author of the tragedy of Holofernes, was biſhop of Treguier, and died 1616. —James, another brother, ſtudied medicine, and was rector of the univerſity of Paris. He died of the plague 1606.

AMBOISE, George d', of the houſe of Amboiſe in France, was born in 1460, and educated for the church, and at the age of 14 elected biſhop of Montauban. After the death of Lewis XI he favored the party of the duke of Orleans, and was rewarded with the archbiſhopric of Narbonne, which he exchanged for Rouen. As deputy of Orleans, he reſtored tranquillity in the province of Rouen, and for his ſervices was promoted to the dangerous office of prime miniſter, when his patron, after the death of Charles VIII. aſcended the throne under the name of Lewis XII. In this ſituation he deſervedly acquired popularity. Inſtead of raiſing the taxes, he diminiſhed the burdens of the people, and by economy and prudence, he maintained the honor and glory of the French name. Amboiſe, who had obtained a cardinal's hat, aſpired to the papal chair, but the intrigues of the Italian biſhops were too powerful for his integrity, and he was diſappointed. He died of the gout in his ſtomach at Lyons, in his 50th year, 1510. He left behind him a popular character, and though his genius was not gigantic, nor his counſels guided by ambition, yet he poſſeſſed firmneſs and energy, and he exhibited a diſintereſtedneſs which awed cabal and intrigue into admiration.

AMBOISE, Aimery d', brother to the cardinal, was famous for the naval victory which he obtained over the ſultan of Egypt 1510. He died in his 78th year, 1512.

AMBOISE, Frances d', a lady celebrated for the improvement which ſhe introduced in the manners and the ſentiments of the Bretons. She was the wife of Peter II. duke of Britanny, whoſe inhumanity ſhe bore with Chriſtian reſignation. After his death 1437, ſhe refuſed to marry the duke of Savoy, and retired to the tranquillity of a convent, where ſhe died 1485.

AMBROSE, of the order of Camaldoli, was born at Portico in Romania, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his fluency in the Greek tongue at the councils of Baſil, Ferrara, and Florence. He tranſlated ſeveral Greek authors, and died 1439.

AMBROSE, de Lombez, Pere, a capuchin, author of a tract on inward peace, and of lettres ſpirituelles, eſteemed for their good ſenſe, moderation, and piety. He is extolled as a man of uncommon meekneſs and humanity. He died 1778, at St. Saviour near Bareges, aged 70.

AMBROSE, Iſaac, was of Brazen Noſe college, Oxford, 1621, and took orders, which, however, he renounced, to adopt the principles of the preſbyterians in the civil wars. As he was in indigent circumſtances, he was often relieved by William earl of Bedford, and he became a preacher at Garſtang and Preſton, diſtinguiſhed by his vehement zeal in ejecting the miniſters of the eſtabliſhed church. He publiſhed a few tracts, one of which "looking unto Jeſus" was in high repute among the Calviniſts, and died of an apoplexy.

AMBROSINI, Bartholomew, profeſſor of medicine and botany in his native city of Bologna, publiſhed ſeveral learned books. The beſt known are Panaceæ ex herbis quæ a ſanctis denominantur, 8vo.—Hiſtoria capſicorum cum iconibus, 12mo.—Theodorica medicina, 4to. He died 1657.

AMBROSINI, Hyacinth, brother and ſucceſſor of the preceding, wrote ſome treatiſes on the names and ſynonimes of plants diſcovered in the 17th century.

AMBROSIUS, Aurelianus, a prince of Armorica, who came 457 to aſſiſt the Britons in the expulſion of the Saxons, whom Vortigern had invited into the kingdom. After the death of Vortigern, he was placed on the throne of Britain, and he reigned with great popularity. He died at Wincheſter 508. Arthur is ſaid to have been his eleve.

AMBROSIUS, Catharinus Politus, a learned Dominican, afterwards, achbiſhop of Compſa, in the kingdom of Naples. In his works, which are ſcriptural, ſome of his tenets are erroneous, and he is to be read with caution. He died at Naples 1552.

AMEDEUS, vid. AMADEUS.

AMELOT DE LA HOUSSAYE, Abraham Nicholas, a native of Orleans 1634, ſecretary to to the French ambaſſador at Venice. His writings were numerous, but ſome of them gave ſuch offence that he was confined in the Baſtille. His moſt popular works were his tranſlation of father Paul's hiſtory of the council of Trent, and his "Courtier" tranſlated from Baltaſar. He alſo tranſlated Machiavel's Prince, and the ſix firſt books of Tacitus' annals, and died at Paris 1706, aged nearly 73.

AMELOT, Denis, a French writer born at Saintonge 1606. He diſregarded the ſarcaſms of the port royal, whom his life of de Gondren had offended, and had influence enough in the Sorbonne, to prevent their obtaining the royal licence to print the New Teſtament. Further to thwart their views, he publiſhed a tranſlation himſelf in 4 vols. 8vo. which, though not free from error had yet its admirers. In his old age, he ſolicited his friends in power for a biſhopric, but he was refuſed in his application. He became member of the oratory 1650, and died there 1658. He publiſhed beſides, a harmony of the goſpels—an abridgement of theology.

AMERBACH, John, a native of Swabia, one of the firſt printers, who, inſtead of the Gothic and Italian recommended the round and perfect Roman letter. He ſettled with ſucceſs at Baſil with Froben, and died 1515. His ſon John was profeſſor of law at Baſil, and the friend of Eraſmus. He died 1562, aged 67.

AMERBACH, Vitus, a native of Bavaria, profeſſor of philoſophy at Ingoldſtadt, where he died 1550, aged 70. He tranſlated into Latin, the orations of Demoſthenes and Iſocrates, and wrote commentaries on Cicero, the triſtia of Ovid, Horace's art of poetry, &c.

AMERICUS, Veſputius, a native of Florence, whoſe mind was early bent to mathematics and navigation. The fame of Columbus attracted his notice, and, determined to rival his glory, he obtained from Ferdinand king of Spain a ſquadron of four ſhips, with which he ſailed from Cadiz 1497. During this voyage, which laſted 18 months, he viſited the coaſt along the Mexican gulph, and in the following year he extended his diſcoveries to the Antilles, and Guiana, and Vennezuela. On his return in 1500, he was received by the Spaniſh court with a coolneſs which his ſervices ill deſerved; but his diſcontent was forgotten under the patronage of Emanuel of Portugal, who furniſhed him with three ſhips in May 1501. In this third voyage, Americus diſcovered the Brazils from La Plata to the coaſt of Patagonia, and he returned to Liſbon September 1502. A fourth voyage was undertaken with ſix ſhips, with the intention of proceeding to the Molucca iſlands in a ſouthern direction along the American coaſt, but he was detained by contrary winds for five months near the river Curabado, and the want of proviſions obliged him to return to Europe. Americus died in the iſland of Tercera in 1514, aged 63. He publiſhed an account of his voyages, but he is become illuſtrious as he obtained the ſingular honor of giving his name to the new world, and thus monopolized the glory which was due to the genius and the enterprizes of the great Columbus. He has been accuſed of giving falſe dates to his writings, that he might eſtabliſh a priority of diſcovery before his rival. The remains of his ſhip the Victory, were preſerved by the king of Portugal in the cathedral of Liſbon.

AMES, William, a native of Norfolk, who after being educated at Chriſt's college, Cambridge, ſettled as profeſſor in the univerſity of Franeker in Holland. Here he enjoyed fame and independence, but as the air of the place was too ſharp for his aſthmatic conſtitution, he removed to Rotterdam with the intention of paſſing into new England. He, however, died at Rotterdam 1633, aged 59. His writings were all on controverſial ſubjects, the principal of which is Medulla Theologica. His ſon William was ejected for nonconformity, from the living of Wrentham in Suffolk in 1662, and died 1689, aged 66.

AMES, Joſeph, a ſhip-chandler of Wapping, who, in an advanced period of life, ſtudied antiquities, and roſe to the ſecretaryſhip of the ſociety of Antiquaries. He publiſhed an account of the earlieſt printers, with a regiſter of the books which they printed, in 4to. 1749, beſides the liſt of Engliſh heads engraved and in mezzotinto, &c. in 8vo. He alſo compiled the "parentalia", from Wren's papers. He died 1759, and the following year his curious collection of foſſils, ſhells, medals, &c. was ſold by public auction.

AMHERST, Jeffery lord, an Engliſh general, deſcended from an ancient family ſeated at Seven Oaks in Kent. He was born 1727, and at the age of 14 embraced the military profeſſion. He was at the battles of Dettingen, Fontenoy, and Rocoux, and in 1756 he obtained the colonelcy of the 15th regiment of foot. He was employed 1758 at the ſiege of Louisbourg, and made governor of Virginia, and commander in chief of the forces in America, and, the fall of Niagara, Ticonderago, Quebec, and Montreal, with the ſubmiſſion of all Canada, marked the progreſs of his judicious meaſures. He was made a knight of the bath, governor of Guernſey, and the next year lieutenant general of the ordnance, and in 1776 created baron Amherſt of Holmſdale. In 1778 he was made commander in chief, and was raiſed in 1791 to the rank of field marſhal. He died 1798.

AMHURST, Nicholas, a native of Marden in Kent, educated at Merchant Taylors', and St. John's Oxford, from which laſt he was expelled on a charge of irregularity. This diſgrace, attributed to his attachment to the Hanover ſucceſſion, he ſeverely reſented, and all his powers of ſatire and abuſe were exerted againſt the univerſity and its members, in his "Oculus Britanniæ," and "Terræ filius."

After

After his expulsion he settled in London as a professional writer, but his most successful undertaking was the conducting of the "Craftsman," a paper of which 10 or 12 thousand copies were daily dispersed, and which for a series of years guided the public taste in politics, and awed the administration into measures of popularity. In this he was occasionally assisted by Bolingbroke, Pulteney, and others; but his own productions were little inferior to the papers of these celebrated leaders of opposition. When the act for licensing plays was passed, a letter in the name of Colley Cibber appeared in the Craftsman, to ridicule the check which the law had placed upon the effusions of poetry, and this so offended the ministry that the printer was seized, but Amhurst surrendered himself, and after being imprisoned, and refusing to give bail for his good behaviour, he obtained his release by bringing his habeas corpus, and the prosecution was dropped. On the reconciliation of the opposition to the court, his services, which for 20 years had been exerted in the cause of his friends, were forgotten, and this neglect probably hastened his dissolution. He died of a fever at Twickenham 1742. Though his morals were impeachable, and his integrity of a doubtful appearance, yet the ingratitude which marked the evening of his days, reflects dishonor on Bolingbroke and Pulteney, and proves that virtue and honesty are seldom found with the great, unmixed with interested and ambitious views.

AMICONI, Giacomo, a Venetian who came to England in 1729, as a portrait and history painter. He adorned the staircase of Powis house with the story of Judith and Holofernes, and the hall of More-park house in Herts, with the fable of Jupiter and Io. In 1736, he went to Paris, and marrying an Italian singer, he returned to his own country. He afterwards was in Spain, and made painter to the king, and he died at Madrid 1752.

AMIRAL, Henry, a native of Auzolet in Auvergne, known during the French revolution for his attempt to assassinate Collot d'Herbois and Robespierre, and thus to rid France of her tyrants. He was seized in the fact and condemned to die, 1792.

AMMAN, John Conrad, a Swiss physician, successfully employed in teaching the deaf to speak in France and Holland. He published a curious account of it in two tracts called Surdus loquens, and died at Amsterdam about 1730.

AMMANATI, Bartholomew, a native of Florence eminent as a sculptor and architect. Many of the Italian cities, especially Rome, contained specimens of his labors and genius. He died 1586 in his 75th year.

AMMANATI, Laura Battiferri, wife to the preceding, became celebrated for her genius and learning. Her poems, which abound with excellent morality, are esteemed high among the productions of the Italian muse. She died at Florence 1589, aged 76.

AMMIRATO, Scipio, a native of Lucca. He was intended for the law, but he took orders, and after an unsettled life through Italy he fixed his residence at Florence under the patronage of the grand duke, who gave him a canonry in the cathedral. He wrote the history of Florence in 2 vols folio, besides numerous other tracts in Italian both in prose and verse, and died there 1600 aged 69.

AMMONIUS, Saccas, a philosopher in the 3d century, founder of the eclectic sect, said to have rejected the christian religion in which he was educated, and have established a school at Alexandria, in which he attempted to reconcile the tenets of Aristotle and Plato. He died A. D. 243.

AMMONIUS, Livinus, a Carthusian monk of Flanders, esteemed by Erasmus for his learning and piety. He died at Ghent 1556.

AMMONIUS, Andrew, a native of Lucca who settled in England and lived under the patronage of sir Thomas More. He was intimate with Erasmus and corresponded with him. He was made secretary to Henry VIII. and employed in a public character by pope Leo X. He died of the sweating sickness in 1517 in his 40th year, and was greatly lamented by Erasmus. He wrote some poetical trifles in Latin, of considerable merit.

AMONTONS, William, an eminent mechanic born in Normandy 1663. When at school at Paris he was seized with such a deafness that he gave up all pursuits of a public nature, and devoted himself to the study of geometry. He suggested some improvements in the structure of barometers and thermometers, on which he published a treatise, and he invented a method for the rapid communication of intelligence from one place to the other, which has lately been adopted under the appellation of telegraph. Much of his time was employed in constructing a new hour-glass for the use of the navy, which might not be subject to the irregularities of sudden motion. He died of an inflammation in his bowels, 1705, aged 42.

AMORY, Thomas, D. D. in the university of Edinburgh, was son of a grocer at Taunton in Somersetshire, and distinguished as a preacher among the dissenters. After passing the greatest part of his life near the place of his nativity, as public teacher, and as instructor of youth, he removed to London, and was a bold assertor of toleration, and warmly espoused the cause of those who solicited the repeal of the test act. In his general conduct Dr. Amory was exemplary, his discourses from the pulpit were excellent, but perhaps too serious and philosophical for the vulgar apprehension. His writings were on theological subjects. He died 1774, in his 74th year.

AMORY, Thomas Esq. an eccentric character,

racter, ſon of counſellor Amory, who went with king William to Ireland. Young Amory was not born in Ireland, though he reſided there, and frequently accompanied dean Swift in his excurſions round Dublin. He afterwards lived in Orchard-ſtreet, Weſtminſter, about 1757, with his wife and a ſon who acquired reputation as a phyſician during a reſidence of 27 years at Wakefield. The moſt remarkable of his publications are his "memoirs on the lives of ſeveral ladies," and his life of John Buncle Eſq. 4 vols. 12mo. In this laſt he is ſuppoſed to give a deſcription of himſelf. His application to his ſtudies was intenſe, and his walks through the moſt crowded ſtreets, exhibited him wrapped in the deepeſt meditation, and inattentive to what ſurrounded him. He died at the advanced age of 97, 1789

AMOS, the third of the 12 minor prophets, ſhepherd at Tekoa. He propheſied in the reigns of Jethoram king of Iſrael, and Uzziah king of Judah, and died about 785 B. C.

AMOUR, William de St., a doctor of the Sorbonne, born at St. Amour in Franche Comté. His book on the perils of latter times was condemned by Alexander IV. and himſelf baniſhed to his native town. He was author of ſeveral other works, and died 1272.

AMOUREUX, N. l', an eminent ſculptor whoſe works are preſerved in his native city of Lyons. He was drowned in the Soane in the beginning of the 19th century.

ANPHIBILUS, a native of Britain, ſaid to have been born at Exeter, and to have been biſhop of Angleſey. He ſtudied at Rome, and is ſaid to have exerted his eloquence in making converts in England and in Scotland. According to ſome, he ſuffered martyrdom about 291.

AMPSINGIUS, John Aſſuer, a profeſſor of phyſic at Roſtock, in the 17th century, author of ſeveral medical treatiſes, printed 1619.

AMRU ERN-AL-AS, a celebrated muſſulman, at firſt the enemy and afterwards the friend of Mahomet. He extended his conqueſts in Egypt, &c. and died 663.

AMSDORF, Nicholas, a ſpirited follower of Luther and biſhop of Nuremburg. He died at Magdeburg 1541, and the ſect who adhered to his tenets, and ſupported in oppoſition to Melancthon, that good works are not neceſſary to ſalvation, were called Amsdorfians.

AMURATH I. an Ottoman emperor, who ſucceeded his father Orchan, and was known for his cruelties towards his ſon, and thoſe who eſpouſed his cauſe. He was a great warrior, and obtained 37 victories, in the laſt of which he periſhed, 1389, aged 71, by the hand of a ſoldier. He was the firſt who eſtabliſhed the formidable force of the Janiſſaries.

AMURATH II. ſon and ſucceſſor of Mahomet, as Ottoman emperor, was the firſt Turk who uſed canon in the field of battle. He reſigned the crown in favor of his ſon Mahomet 1443, and retired to the ſeclusion of the derviſes; but the invaſion of the Hungarians rouſed him to conquer at the dreadful battle of Varna. He afterwards reduced the rebellious Janiſſaries, and defeated the famous Scanderbeg, and finding his ſon incapable to hold the reins, he abandoned his retirement again for the throne, and again routed the Hungarians. He died 1451, aged 75.

AMURATH III. ſucceeded his father Selim II. 1575, and to ſecure himſelf in the poſſeſſion of the throne, he cauſed his five brothers to be aſſaſſinated. This act of cruelty ſo affected his mother that ſhe deſtroyed herſelf. Amurath like the race of Mahomet was valiant. He died 1595, aged 50.

AMURATH I. ſucceeded his uncle Muſtapha in 1622. He took Bagdad, 30,000 of whoſe inhabitants he put to the ſword, though he had promiſed them protection. He died in 1640, aged 31, of exceſſive intoxication.

AMY, N. advocate of Aix, was author of ſome very uſeful works in natural ſcience, particularly obſervations on the waters of the Seine, &c.—new filtrating fountains—reflections on lead, copper, and tin utenſils, &c. He died 1760.

AMYOT, James, was born at Milan, 1513, of an obſcure family, but though of a dull underſtanding, he by indefatigable application acquired independence and reputation. His merit recommended him to Margaret of Berry, ſiſter to Francis I. and he was promoted to a public profeſſorſhip in the univerſity of Bourges. His time was here uſefully devoted to literature, and he publiſhed tranſlations of the loves of Theagenes and Chariclea, beſides Plutarch's lives and morals. He was afterwards entruſted with the care of the king's two younger ſons, and for his meritorious ſervices he was raiſed to the biſhopric of Auxerre, the abbey of Cornelius de Compiegne, &c. He died 1593, in his 79th year. He alſo tranſlated the ſeven firſt books of Diodorus Siculus, ſome tragedies from the Greek, the paſtorals of Daphnis, &c.

AMYRAULT, Moſes, a French proteſtant divine, born in Tourraine 1596. He ſtudied the law, but afterwards entered the church, and was divinity profeſſor at Saumur. He was deputed by the national council of Charenton, to preſent an addreſs to the French king, in favor of the proteſtants, without however paying homage upon his knees, and Richelieu, who was preſent ſaw and admired his bold character, and wiſhed to uſe his abilities to procure a reconciliation between the Romiſh church and the proteſtants, but in vain. This humane, virtuous, and charitable man died 1664, leaving one ſon, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf himſelf as an advocate at Paris, but retired to the Hague, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes. His works, which are very numerous, are chiefly theological.

Amyrutzes, a philoſopher of Trebizond, who renounced the Chriſtian faith for Mahometaniſm, and aſſumed the name of Mahomet Beg 1461. He tranſlated ſeveral books into Arabic at the deſire of Mahomet II. whoſe favor he enjoyed.

Anacletus, a biſhop of Rome after Linus 79. He ſuffered martyrdom 13 years after.

Anacoana, queen of Xiragua in the iſland of St. Domingo, was cruelly put to death by Ovando, who owed her, agreeable to the promiſes of Bartholomew Columbus, both friendſhip and protection.

Anastasius I. the Silentiary, emperor of the eaſt, was born of obſcure parents, but by marrying Ariadne, the widow of the emperor Zeno, he aſcended the throne 491. He poſſeſſed merit and valor, and his reign might have been proſperous if he had not embraced the tenets of the Eutychians, and thus offended his ſubjects. He died 518, aged 88.

Anastasius II. was raiſed to the throne from a private ſtation 713. Three years after he wiſhed to abdicate the ſovereign power for a religious habit, but with equal levity he ſighed again for the imperial purple; and beſieged Conſtantinople, where his rival Leo the Iſaurian was ſeated on the throne. He was betrayed by the Bulgarians, his allies, and cruelly put to death 719.

Anastasius I. pope after Siricius 398. He excommunicated the Origeniſts, and brought on a reconciliation between the eaſtern and weſtern churches. He died 402.

Anastasius II. pope after Gelaſius 496, died after a ſhort reign of two years.

Anastasius III. pope for two years after Sergius III. 911, was eminent for wiſdom and moderation.

Anastasius IV. pope after Eugenius III. 1153, died the following year.

Ancillon, David, a proteſtant divine born at Metz, who in his youth refuſed to ſacrifice his religion to the ſolicitations of the Jeſuits. He ſtudied divinity and philoſophy at Geneva, and after the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he retired to Frankfort, and ſettled at Hanau, where his diſcourſes were much admired. His colleagues in the miniſtry, however, were jealous of his popularity, and by their intrigues, he ſettled at Berlin, where he was received with kindneſs at the court, and had the ſatisfaction to ſee his family promoted to places of honor and truſt. He died in his 75th year, 1692. As his learning was very extenſive, he publiſhed ſeveral uſeful works, and he made ſo judicious a collection of books, that it was frequently viſited as a curioſity by foreigners. The beſt known of his works are A relation of the controverſy concerning traditions, 4to. 1657 — An apology for Luther, Zuinglius, and Beza, 1666, — The life of William Farel — Converſations, two vols. 12mo publiſhed by his ſon.

Ancillon, Charles, eldeſt ſon of the foregoing, was born at Metz, 1659, and was made inſpector of the French courts of juſtice in Berlin, and hiſtoriographer to the king. He wrote on the edict of Nantes, &c. and died at Berlin 1715.

Anckwitz, a Pole of conſiderable abilities. After being employed as ambaſſador in Denmark, and negotiating a treaty with Ruſſia, he was, at the inſurrection of Warſaw in 1794, ſeized and impriſoned. He was accuſed of attempts to betray his country to the Ruſſians, and in conſequence was condemned and hanged at Warſaw, with the greateſt ignominy.

Ancourt, Florent Carton d', a French actor and dramatic writer, born at Fontainbleau, 1661. The Jeſuits tried to gain him into their ſociety, but he preferred the ſtudy of philoſophy and law to divinity, and at laſt turned his thoughts to the ſtage by marrying in his 19th year an actreſs. He afterwards wrote for the ſtage, and obtained by his pieces credit to himſelf, and wealth to the actor. His converſation was ſo agreeable that Lewis XIV. beſtowed many marks of his favor upon him, as alſo the duke of Bavaria, whoſe arrival at Paris was celebrated by the poet by a particular entertainment. Ancourt, after being the hero of the ſtage, retired in 1718 to his eſtate in Berri, that he might devote himſelf to religion. He there tranſlated the pſalms into verſe, and wrote a ſacred tragedy. He died 1726, in his 65th year. His plays were 52 in number.

ANDRADA, Diego de Payva d' a Portugueſe, born at Coimbria. He was ſent by Sebaſtian to the council of Trent, 1562, and there diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his eloquence as a preacher, and his vivacity in reaſoning as an author. Though a warm catholic he is quoted by the proteſtants, and admired for his great erudition, and uncorrupted judgment.

ANDRADA, Francis d', brother to the above, and hiſtoriographer to Philip III. of Spain was author of an hiſtory of John III. of Portugal.

ANDRADA, Thomas d', reformer of the barefoot Auguſtines, was called Thomas of Jeſus. He was with Sebaſtian in Africa, and being taken by the infidels, was confined in a cave, where he wrote his "Sufferings of Jeſus," tranſlated into Engliſh by Weltor. He refuſed to purchaſe his liberty, but preferred conſoling his fellow-ſlaves. He died 1682.

ANDRADA, Anthony d', a Jeſuit of Portugal, who when miſſionary diſcovered Thibet and Cathay, of which he has written an account. He died 1634.

ANDRE, Nathaniel St. a ſurgeon intimate with Pope. He was poiſoned by drinking glaſs with an unknown patient, 1725, but unexpectedly recovered. He died 1776 at Southampton. He was impoſed upon in the affair of Mary Toſts, but he afterwards publicly acknowledged his error.

ANDRE', John, a Britiſh officer, who from the compting houſe, entered into the army and roſe by his merits to the rank of Major Whe

When General Arnold made an offer of surrendering a ſtrong poſition to the Britiſh forces in America, André was entruſted with the delicate negociation. He was ſeized in the attempt and being regarded as a ſpy, was tried by a court-martial, by order of General Waſhington, and ſentenced to be hanged. Though he requeſted to die like a ſoldier, the ignominious ſentence was executed upon him 1780, and he fell with great intrepidity at the age of 29. The American General was cenſured for the ſeverity of his conduct, and not only Engliſhmen, but the Americans themſelves, murmured at the cruel conduct of the new government, and pitied the fate of a deſerving officer. A monument was erected to his memory by the king, in Weſtminſter Abbey.

ANDREAS, James, an eminent Lutheran, born 1528, in the duchy of Wirtemberg. His parents, who were poor, had bound him to a carpenter, but ſome perſons of diſtinction who had obſerved his promiſing genius enabled him to ſtudy, and in two years he made himſelf maſter of Latin, Greek, and Logic. He took his degrees at Tubingen, and was in 1546 made miniſter of Stutgard, which ſoon after he reſigned. He was frequently employed either as a writer or as a deputed divine, at the public conferences held at Worms, Ratiſbon, Augſburg, &c. and in 1561 he was made chancellor and rector of the univerſity of Tubingen. His works are numerous, all on polemical divinity, the moſt famous of which is that on Concord. He died 1590, aged 61. On his death-bed he made a ſolemn profeſſion of his faith in proteſtantiſm.

ANDREAS, John, a native of Mugello near Florence, who ſtudied the canon law at Bologna. He gained great popularity by his learning and auſterity, as he lay upon the ground for 20 years covered only with a bear ſkin. His daughter, called Novella, was carefully inſtructed in the learning of the times, and when her father was engaged, ſhe read lectures to his ſcholars; but that her great beauty might not draw off the attention of her audience, a curtain was placed before her. The works of Andreas were numerous and all on law. He died of the plague at Bologna in 1348, after enjoying his profeſſorſhip 45 years. In his epitaph he was ſtiled "Rabbi doctorum, lux, cenſor, normaque morum;" and pope Boniface called him "lumen mundi."

ANDREW, Tobias, author of Methodi Carteſianæ aſſertio, was a bold defender of the Carteſian philoſophy. He was profeſſor of Greek and of hiſtory at Groningen, and died 1676.

ANDREW DEL SARTO, a painter of Florence 1483, ſon of a taylor. He was a great favorite of Francis I. of France. He is commended for the coloring of his pictures, and the correctneſs and elegance of his figures, though there is a coldneſs and uniformity in all. He poſſeſſed the happy talent of copying pictures to great perfection. He died 1530.

ANDREW, Valerius, a native of Brabant, profeſſor of civil law at Louvain, and author of Bibliotheca Belgica, was ſtill living in 1652.

ANDREW, Ives Mary, a native of Chateaulin in Cornouailles, profeſſor of mathematics at Caen for 33 years, was a man of great learning and genuine vivacity. His poetry is admired, but his chief work is his eſſay ſur le beau, as alſo his traité ſur l'homme. He died 1764, in his 89th year. His works were publiſhed five vols. 12mo.

ANDREW I. king of Hungary, eldeſt ſon of Ladiſlaus the Bald, left his native country with Bela his brother in 1044, when Peter was raiſed to the throne. He was afterwards invited back by the people, who wiſhed to reſtore the pagan religion, but when inveſted with power he obliged his barbarous ſubjects to embrace chriſtianity. He was ſlain in battle by his brother 1059.

ANDREW II. king of Hungary, ſucceeded his nephew Ladiſlaus 1204. He was in the cruſades, and behaved with great valor. He died 1235.

ANDREW III. king of Hungary, grandſon of the preceding, ſucceeded on the death of Ladiſlaus, 1299. His elevation was oppoſed by Charles of Sicily ſon of Ladiſlaus' ſiſter, and a civil war was the conſequence. The troubles continued till the death of both the rivals, who died the ſame year 1305.

ANDREW, ſon of Charobert of Hungary married Joan II. queen of Naples his couſin, but ſuch was the diſlike which was kindled between theſe youthful ſovereigns, that the queen was at laſt perſuaded by her favorites to conſent to the aſſaſſination of her huſband in his 19th year 1345.

ANDREWS or ADREWE, Euſebius, a barriſter of good family in Middleſex, ſecretary to lord Capel, and on the breaking out of the civil wars, a colonel in Charles' ſervice. After the loſs of Worceſter, he attempted the recovery of the iſland of Ely, and being taken priſoner he was condemned by Bradſhaw to be hanged and quartered, but on his petition the ſentence was changed to beheading, which he ſuffered with great fortitude on Tower Hill, 1650.

ANDREWS, Lancelot, an Engliſh divine born in London 1565. After being educated at Merchant Taylors', he entered at Pembroke hall, Cambridge. His abilities were made known to Walſingham ſecretary to Elizabeth, who procured for him St. Giles Cripplegate in London, and a prebend and reſidentiaryſhip of St. Paul's. He was afterwards maſter of his college, and on the deceaſe of Elizabeth he gained the favor of James ſo much by his pulpit eloquence, that the monarch employed him to defend his kingly right againſt the attack of Bellarmine, under the name of Matthew Tortus. Andrews ſupported his cauſe with ſpirit in his Tortura torti, and the king rewarded him with the rank of privy counſellor, and the biſhopric of Chicheſter 1605. He was afterwards advanced to Ely, and then to Wincheſter; but though he enjoyed the favors of the monarch, he did not forget his independence as an Engliſhman; and when James wiſhed to know the ſentiments of his courtiers with reſpect to raiſing money without parliament, he found Andrews decidedly ſevere againſt the unconſtitutional meaſure. He died at Wincheſter-houſe in Southwark, 1626. Milton has written an elegant elegy on him. Beſides the Tortura torti, he wrote a manual of devotions in Greek, tranſlated by Stanhope into Engliſh, and a volume of ſermons.

ANDRONICUS I. ſon of Iſaac Commenus, was impriſoned for his rebellious conduct againſt Manuel, but after 12 years' confinement, he eſcaped into Ruſſia, and on the elevation of young Alexis II. he was received as a protector and a partner of the throne. Thus armed with power he ſtrangled the unſuſpecting youth, and ſeated himſelf ſole Emperor on the throne of Conſtantinople 1183 in his 71ſt year. His cruelties however rendered him odious, and he was two years after ſeized in an inſurrection, and put to death in the moſt ignominious manner.

ANDRONICUS PALÆOLOGUS II. ſucceeded his father Michael VIII. in 1282. His feeble rule was unable to withſtand the attacks of his enemies, and he was baniſhed from the throne by his grandſon of the ſame name, and finiſhed his days in a monaſtery 1332, aged 74.

ANDRONICUS PALÆOLOGUS III. grandſon of the preceding, was warlike and enterpriſing. He died of a fever, univerſally regretted by his ſubjects, 1341, in his 45th year.

ANDRONICUS IV. was aſſociated to his father John V. 1355. His perfidy irritated his father, who put out one of his eyes, and raiſed his brother Manuel in his place. He died in exile.

ANDRONICUS, founder of a ſect of the ſame name, adopted the errors of the Severians, and ſupported that the upper part of a woman was the work of God, but the lower the work of the devil.

ANDRONICUS, a learned man of Theſſalonica, who took refuge in Italy, after the fall of Conſtantinople, and taught Greek at Rome, Florence, and Paris. He died at Paris 1478.

ANDROUET DU CERCEAU, James, an architect at the end of the 16th century, who furniſhed the deſigns for the grand gallery of the Louvre, the Pontneuf, &c. He publiſhed ſome works on his profeſſion and died abroad.

ANDRY, Nicholas, a profeſſor of philoſophy, and dean of the faculty of medicine at Paris, was a native of Lyons, and author of ſeveral treatiſes now little known, except thoſe on medicine, eſpecially a treatiſe on the generation of worms in the human body,—on phlebotomy,—on orthopædia, or the method of correcting deformities in children. He died 1742, aged 84.

ANEAU, Bartholomew, a native of Bourges, principal of the college of Lyons. In 1565, during a proceſſion, a ſtone was thrown from the college upon the prieſt who carried the conſecrated bread, and immediately the place was ſtormed, and Aneau, whoſe calviniſtical opinions were unpopular, being found alone and ſuſpected, was dragged, and inhumanly murdered by the populace. He was author of ſome ſatires and other pieces in French and in Latin.

ANELLO, Thomas, called commonly Maſſaniello, a fiſherman of Naples, born 1623. He felt for the wrongs of his country, when the Auſtrian government, to which Naples was ſubject, laid a freſh tax upon fruits which the already oppreſſed people were unable to bear. A number of boys, to the amount of 2000, were armed with canes by the demagogue, the viceroy was attacked, and the government ſuſpended. Anello poſſeſſed firmneſs and popularity, and he was inveſted with the ſupreme power, and ſaw himſelf ſuddenly at the head of 150,000 people, who bowed to his nod. He did not forget the right of the nation, he ſigned a ſolemn convention with the terrified government, and after ſecuring the freedom of the ſubject, he nobly determined to lay aſide his power. The thought was heroic, but the ſolicitations of his wife and kindred, or the more powerful calls of ambition, forbad it; and he ſtill continued his authority, loſt in debauchery and intemperance, till the dagger of four aſſaſſins rid the world of a man whom the intoxication of ſplendor began to render cruel and vindictive, 1647.

ANEURIN, a Britiſh poet, celebrated as the king of bards, and as the leader of the Olidinian Britons at the battle of Catraeth. The valor diſplayed on this bloody day was celebrated by the warlike bard in a poem ſtill preſerved among the records of Welch literature, as alſo his odes of the months. He died about 570.

ANGE DE ST. JOSEPH, le Pere, a carmelite of Toulouſe. He travelled into Perſia as miſſionary, and tranſlated the Perſian pharmacopœia into Latin, beſides a treatiſe on the language of the country, a very valuable performance. He died at Perpignan, 1697.

ANGE DE STE. ROSALIE, a learned Auguſtine born at Blois. He died at Paris 1726, aged 71, before he had completed the new edition of the hiſtory of the royal family of France, &c. by Anſelm. This work was afterwards edited in 9 vols. fol.

ANGELI, Bonaventure, a native of Ferrara, profeſſor of the law and author of the hiſtory of Parma, printed 1591. He died 1576.

ANGELI, Baldus, an Italian phyſician, author of a Latin treatiſe on vipers, at the latter end of the 16th century.

ANGELI, Peter, a Latin poet of Barga in Tuſcany. After teaching at Reggio he came to Piſa, where Coſmo I. ſeated him in a profeſſorial chair. When the town was ſuddenly beſieged by Strozzi in 1554, Angeli animated the ſtudents by his example, and withſtood the enemy till ſuccours came from Florence. He wrote two poems, Cynegeticon, or of the Chace, in ſix books, which coſt him 20 years' labor, and Syrius or the expedition of Godfrey de Bouillon, in 12 books. He died 1596, aged 79.

ANGELIC, John, a Dominican of Fiezola, known as the painter of pope Nicholas V.'s chapel, for which he refuſed the archbiſhopric of Florence. He is ſaid to have left inaccuracies in his great works, that he might not draw too much the admiration of mankind. He died 1455, aged 68.

ANGELIS, Dominico de, a native of Lecce in Otranto, admitted into the moſt celebrated academies of France and Spain. When Philip V. of Spain was maſter of Naples, he was appointed hiſtoriographer, and afterwards ſecretary to the duke of Gravina. His compoſitions are 14 in number, moſtly upon hiſtorical, biographical, or critical ſubjects, in Italian. He died at Lecce 1719, in his 44th year.

ANGELO BUONAROTI, Michael, a great painter, ſculptor, and architect. He was born 1474 in Tuſcany, and was nurſed by a woman of Settiniano, whoſe huſband was eminent as a ſculptor, ſo that he was ſaid to have ſucked ſculpture with his very milk. His genius was early diſplayed, and it raiſed ſuch jealouſy among his youthful rivals, that one of them, Torrigiano, ſtruck him with ſuch violence on the noſe that he carried the mark to his grave. The protection of Lorenzo de Medicis raiſed him to conſequence. An academy was erected, but the painter fled with his patron during the troubles of Florence, and retired to Bologna. It is said that about this time, he made and buried an image of Cupid at Rome, which was soon after dug up, and considered by cardinal Gregory as a most valuable antique, till Michael Angelo proved it to be his own, by fitting to it the broken arm which it had lost, and which he had kept on purpose. The most celebrated of his pieces is his last judgment, painted for Paul III. though it is perhaps to be lamented, that the artist's revenge had been cruelly immortalized, by his representation of a cardinal, who was his enemy, in the number of the damned. His architectural abilities are best displayed in the public buildings of Florence, and particularly of Rome, where he completed the building of St. Peter's church, in the execution of which he spent 17 laborious years without salary. He was also an elegant poet, as his sonnets, canzonets, &c. published by his grand-nephew at Florence 1627, fully show. He died 1564, aged 60.

ANGELO, Thomas de, an ecclesiastic, author of an history of Sicily for the first five centuries, and of other works. He died at Messina, 1720.

ANGELONI, Francis, born at Terni in Spolatto, was author of an history of his native town, and of a valuable Augustan history by medals, from J. Cæsar to Constantine the great.

ANGELUS, Christopher, a learned Greek, driven from Peloponnesus by the Turks. He came to England and studied at Cambridge under the patronage of the bishop of Norwich. He afterwards went to Baliol, Oxford, where he instructed the students in Greek. He died 1638. He was author of several works, the best of which is his account of his sufferings in Greek and English.

ANGIER, Samuel, a native of Essex, educated at Emanuel college Cambridge. He was ejected for nonconformity from his living at Denton Lancashire, in 1662, and died 1677 aged 72. He was author of a theological treatise called a help to better hearts for better times.

ANGILBERT, St. descended from a noble family of Neustria, studied under Alcuinus with Charlemagne, and not only became his minister and favorite, but married his daughter Bertha. He was made governor of the coast, but he resigned his honors and the company of his wife for the monastery of Centula or St. Requier of which he became the abbot. He was often drawn from his religious retirement to affairs of state; he went three times to Rome, and saw Charlemagne crowned emperor of the West. Of his works few remain. He was so elegant a poet that Charlemagne called him his Homer. He died February 814

ANGIOLELLO, born at Vicenza, wrote in the Italian and Turkish tongue an history of Mahomet I. which he inscribed to him. He had been slave to Mustapha 1473, and therefore his history is that of an eye-witness.

ANGLICUS, Gilbertus, physician to Herbert, archbishop of Canterbury, was author of a compendium of physic, the earliest extant, at the end of the 13th century.

ANGLICUS, Ricardus, an English medical writer who studied at Oxford, and afterwards at Paris, about 1230. He was eminent in his profession. A list of his works is preserved in Aikin's Biog. Mem. of Medicine.

ANGLUS, Thomas, an English priest, distinguished himself by his learning and genius. His fondness for the peripatetic philosophy, and his attempts to apply the principles of Aristotle to explain the mysteries of religion, created him many enemies, who procured the condemnation of his writings, both at Douay and at Rome. He died after the restoration of Charles II.

ANGUIER, Francis and Michael, two brothers, natives of Eu, in Normandy, who adorned Paris by their beautiful sculpture. The former died 1699, aged 95, and the other 1686, aged 74.

ANGUILLARI, John Andre del', an Italian poet, who wrote a tragedy on Œdipus, notes on the Orlando of Ariosto, and a valuable translation of Ovid's Metamorphoses, in the 16th century.

ANGUSCIOLA, Sophonisba, a native of Almona in Italy, eminent for her historical and portrait paintings. She bestowed such attention to her profession that she became blind. She died 1626 aged 93. Her sisters Lucia and Europa, also excelled in the execution of the pencil.

ANICETUS, pope of Rome, after Pius, 157, suffered martyrdom under M. Aurelius, 168.

ANICH, Peter, son of a turner, was born near Inspruck 1723, and after being employed as a laborer and a shepherd, his genius for mechanics burst forth. He was admired for his knowledge of astronomy, for the accuracy of the maps and charts which he drew; and the pair of globes which he made for the university of Inspruck were justly considered as of superior beauty and value. He died early in life 1766.

ANICHINI, Lewis, a Venetian engraver, celebrated for the delicacy and precision with which he engraved even the minutest objects. It was at the sight of his pieces that Michael Angelo exclaimed, that the art of engraving under his hand had reached the summit of perfection. His best piece was a medal of Alexander the great, prostrating himself before the high priest at Jerusalem.

ANIELLO, Thomas, vid. ANELLO.

ANKERSTROOM, John James, a Swedish officer who in the war carried on by Sweden against againſt Ruſſia, ſuffered himſelf to be gained over againſt the intereſts of his country. He was ſentenced to death, but the pardon of his king, inſtead of producing gratitude, rendered his hatred more inveterate. He conſpired againſt Guſtavus, and as the monarch entered a room where a maſked ball was aſſembled, the aſſaſſin diſcharged at him a piſtol containing two balls and ſome nails. The wound was mortal and the king expired 29th March 1792. The 27th of April following the bloody murderer was led to execution, but inſtead of contrition he gloried in his deed. His right hand and his head were cut off.

ANNA IVANOVNA, daughter of Ivan Alexiovitch, emperor of Ruſſia, married in 1710 Frederic William duke of Courland, and ſucceeded Peter II. on the throne 1730. At the death of her huſband, 1711, ſhe took for her favorite Biren, a perſon of low birth, but great duplicity; and when raiſed to the throne her ſubjects were ruled by this capricious minion, who, it is ſaid, baniſhed no leſs than 20,000 perſons to Siberia through revenge. Anna died 1740 aged 47.

ANNAND, William, A. M. a native of Edinburgh, who was choſen one of the miniſters and became a popular preacher there. He behaved with great kindneſs towards the preſbyterians, and oppoſed James when he wiſhed to diſpenſe with the penal laws. At the revolution he was made dean of Raphoe in Ireland, where he died 1710 aged 64. He wrote a volume of valuable ſermons.

ANNAT, Francis, a native of Rouergue, of the order of Jeſuits, teacher of philoſophy at Toulouſe. He was made confeſſor to the French king 1654, which office he held 16 years. He is known for his great zeal in oppoſing the Janſeniſts, and for his uncommon modeſty and diſintereſtedneſs. His writings are controverſial and admired for judgment and moderation. He died at Paris 1670, aged 80.

ANNE, of Auſtria, daughter of Philip II. of Spain married Lewis XIII. 1615, and was mother of Lewis XIV. of France. The intrigues of Richelieu rendered her marriage-ſtate unhappy, but during the minority of her ſon, ſhe was permitted to govern the kingdom by means of Mazarin. Her power was popular by the victories of the great Condé. When Lewis XIV. ſucceeded to the government in 1660, ſhe retired to a convent, and died 1666, aged 64.

ANNE, of Beaujeu, daughter of Lewis XII. of France, married the duke of Bourbon, and was regent during the minority of her brother Charles VIII. Her government was marked by firmneſs and wiſdom, though in her private character ſhe was vindictive and violent. She died at Chantelle 1522, aged 60.

ANNE, of Britany, was wife of Maximilian of Auſtria, and next married Charles VIII. of France, and after his death Lewis XII. She was celebrated for her beauty, her modeſty, and her patronage of the learned. She died 1514 in her 38th year.

ANNE, of Cleves, a daughter of John III. duke of Cleves. Her picture by Holbein was ſhewn by Lord Cromwell to the licentious Henry VIII. and he demanded her for his queen. The painter had flattered the princeſs, and Henry, ſoon diſguſted with the Flanders mare, as he called this ill-treated woman, obtained a divorce from his obſequious parliament. Anne, without ſtruggle, left England, and retired to Cleves, where ſhe died 1557.

ANNE, daughter of James II. ſucceeded William III. as queen of England. Her reign forms a brilliant epoch in the Engliſh hiſtory from the victories of Marlborough; but ſhe poſſeſſed not the firmneſs required to diſtinguiſh the merits and virtues of her ſubjects. Under her adminiſtration, Scotland was united to England. The queen poſſeſſed the peculiar felicity of having for her miniſters the ableſt ſtateſmen that ever lived, and among her ſubjects the moſt learned, ſublime, and eloquent writers in the walks of poetry, ſcience, and general literature; and therefore with truth her reign has been denominated the Auguſtan age of England. In 1683 ſhe married prince George of Denmark, by whom ſhe had ſeveral children who all died young. She died Auguſt 1714, aged 50.

ANNEBAUT, Claude d', of an ancient family in Normandy, was taken priſoner with Francis I. at the battle of Pavia. He was afterwards marſhal and admiral of France, and died 1552.

ANNEIX DE SOUVENEL, Alexis Francis, an advocate of the parliament of Britany, known by an elegant epiſtle in verſe to the ſhades of Boileau. He died at Rennes 1758, aged 69.

ANNESDEY, Samuel LL.D. a native of Cumberland, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and afterwards chaplain of a man of war, and then miniſter of Bliſſe in Kent. He afterwards, in conſequence of his violent ſermons againſt the monarchy, obtained St. Giles Cripplegate, London, from which he was ejected by the act of uniformity 1662. He died 1696, aged 77, author of ſeveral ſermons. It is ſaid John Weſley was his grandſon by the mother's ſide.

ANNESLEY, Arthur, earl of Angleſey, a native of Dublin 1614, educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, and Lincoln's Inn. In the beginning of the civil wars he favored the royal cauſe; but he afterwards eſpouſed the republican ſide, and was employed with ſucceſs as a commiſſioner in quelling the diſturbances of Ulſter, and in withdrawing the command of Dublin from the duke of Ormond. The violence of his party however displeased him, and after the death of Cromwell he began to favor the re-establishment of regal authority, and on Charles's return he was made a peer for his signal services, in effecting the restoration. He was made treasurer of the navy, but his political quarrel with Castlehaven and the duke of Ormond, with respect to the insurrections in Ireland, rendered him unpopular with the king, to whom, in 1682, he ventured to present a petition against the succession of the duke of York, and he resigned. He was marked out by James II. for the office of chancellor, but his death prevented his elevation 1686, in his 73d year. He was a man of abilities, and great sagacity and learning. He wrote, besides political pamphlets, a valuable history of the troubles of Ireland from 1641 to 1660. He was the first of those spirited nobles, who considered a choice library as an ornament to their splendid equipage, and he made a valuable and expensive collection. On the sale of his books, a memorandum was found on a leaf, to mention that the Εικων Βασιλικη was not the work of the unfortunate Charles, but of Dr. Gauden, which circumstance produced a war of controversy.

Annius, de Viterbo, a Dominican, master of the sacred palace of Alexander VI. He wrote commentaries, &c. besides 17 books of antiquities, a foolish and injudicious collection of the spurious works attributed to Xenophon, Archilochus, Philo, Fabius Pictor, Berosus, &c. He died 1502, at Rome aged 70.

Anscharius, a Frenchman, bishop of Hamburgh and Bremen, celebrated for the conversion of the Danes to Christianity. He died 865, aged 64.

Ansegisus, abbot of Lobbes in the diocese of Cambray, made a collection of the capitularies of Charlemagne and Lewis his son, in two vols. fol. He died 833.

Anselm, a native of Aost in Savoy, who came to England in 1092, and was with difficulty prevailed upon by king Rufus to fill the vacant see of Canterbury. Though gratitude might have influenced his conduct, Anselm looked with indifference upon the monarch, and refused to receive the metropolitan pall from his hands. Anselm had no sooner left the kingdom to repair to Rome, than the king seized the revenues of the archbishop. The prelate complained to Urban II. who, while he wished to defend the rights of his office, did not fail to listen to the more powerful arguments of his rival accompanied by presents, and the dispute remained undecided till the death of the monarch, and of the pope. On the accession of Henry I. Anselm received an invitation to return, and his arrival was marked with the most extraordinary respect, both from the king and the people; but when re-investiture was demanded, and the homage generally paid to a new monarch, the haughty prelate refused. The king was firm in his determination, and Anselm was bound to obey the commands of the pope. The bishops, who had before espoused the cause of the king, now changed their sentiments, and Anselm, who had retired into Normandy, had the gratification to see the king come to solicit a reconciliation, which was effected in the abbey of Bec. Anselm returned to England before the final settlement of this dispute, and died 1109 in his 76th year. He was author of several theological treatises. He was the first prelate who insisted upon the celibacy of his clergy, in the synod of Westminster 1102. In his time the archbishop of York attempted to throw off his dependency on the see of Canterbury, in which, however, he failed.

Anselm, an Augustine monk, author of a chronological history of France, &c. 1694, continued afterwards to nine vols folio. 1726. He died at Paris 1694 aged 69.

Anselm, Anthony, son of a surgeon of Armagnac, distinguished as a preacher and poet. He died 1737 aged 86.

Anson, George Lord, was son of William Anson esquire of Huckborough, the descendant of an ancient family in Staffordshire. His fondness for naval history and bold adventures was encouraged by his father. He was sent with a squadron of five ships to annoy the Spaniards in the southern ocean, and he sailed from Portsmouth 18th of Sept. 1740. He was 40 days in crossing Cape Horn, March 1741, in the most tempestuous season, but undismayed he proceeded and reached Juan Fernandez with only two ships and two smaller attendant vessels, and 335 men. From thence he set sail to attack Paita, and after he had destroyed his ships as unserviceable except the Centurion of 64 guns, he crossed the Pacific ocean, and after refreshing for some time in China, he returned towards the east, and took the famous Acapulco galleon, off the Philippine islands. He touched at Canton, where he supported the dignity of the British flag, and returning by the Cape of Good Hope, he passed during a fog through a French fleet, and arrived at Spithead the 15th June 1744, after a voyage of three years and nine months. His riches were conveyed to London in 32 waggons, with music playing, and amidst the shouts of the rejoicing populace, and the booty was divided among those brave men who had shared his glory and his toils. Some years after his good fortune led him among a French fleet of six men of war and four East India ships which he took. It was on this occasion that the French admiral said to him, in presenting his sword and pointing to two of his ships "monsieur, vous avez vaincu l'invincible, et la gloire vous suit." His services were rewarded by George II. with a peerage, and he was placed at the head of the admiralty, nominated vice admiral of England on the death of sir John Norris, and became the naval oracle of his country. He afterwards protected with a squadron the descent made in 1758 at Cherbourg and St. Maloes, but his exertions were too great for the languid state of his health, and the last office he performed was the conveying of Charlotte, the consort of George III. to England. He died June 6th, 1762, at his seat Moor-park Herts, lamented by the whole nation. He had no issue by his lady, who was daughter of earl Hardwicke, and who died before him. Lord Anson was a great and popular character, he possessed such inoffensive, artless manners, that it was jocosely said of him by a person who observed how he was imposed upon by characters of whose company he was too fond, that he had been round the world, but never in it. His voyage round the world was a well executed performance, compiled by Benjamin Robins; and so popular that four large impressions were sold in 12 months.

ANSTIS, John, a native of St. Neot's in Cornwall, born 1669, and educated at Exeter college Oxford, and at the Middle Temple. He was in 1702 member for St. Germain's, and opposed the bill for occasional conformity, for which he was ridiculed among the Tackers. He was commissioner of prizes under queen Anne, and was garter king of arms from 1714, to his death, which happened 1741. He was distinguished by his great knowledge of heraldry, a science which he enriched by many learned publications, as well as other genealogical treatises. The best known of his publications, were a letter on the honor of the earl marshal, 8vo. 1706.—the form of the garter installation, 8vo. 1720—the register of the noble order of the garter, 2 vols. fol. 1724—observation introductory and an historical essay on the knighthood of the bath, 4to. 1725. His eldest son John, of Corpus Christi Oxford, was associated with his father as garter king 1725, and made genealogist and register of the bath. He died a bachelor 1754.

ANTHEMIUS, an architect of Lydia, in the 6th century, who was also an able mathematician, and invented several machines to imitate thunder, earthquakes, &c. He was employed by Justinian in the erection of St. Sophia's church, Constantinople, and other edifices.

ANTHONY, Saint, the founder of monastic life, was born at Coma in Egypt, 251. He sold his possessions, which he distributed to the poor, and retired into the desert, where for 20 years, say the catholics, his virtues were exposed to the greatest temptations from the wiles of Satan, till he prevailed, and saw himself at last surrounded by a crowd of followers zealous to merit his blessings and to imitate his piety. He died 356 in the 105th year of his age. St. Athanasius, to whom he gave his tunic, has written his life.

ANTHONY, Francis, was born in London 1550, and studied at Cambridge, where he laid the foundation of that chemical knowledge which enabled him to impose upon the credulous, by selling his panacea of potable gold, on which a treatise was printed at Hamburgh 1598. His success as an empiric was great, but he was violently opposed by Gwinne and Cotta, and it was confidently asserted that his nostrum was poisonous, and many on their death-bed attributed their death to it. The inoffensiveness of his manners, his learning and his private virtues however, stemmed the torrent of unpopularity, and though he was imprisoned for practising without a licence, his reputation and his fortune encreased. He died in Bartholomew Close 1623, aged 74, leaving two sons both physicians, one of whom John, succeeded his father as the proprietor of his medicine, and the other practised at Bedford.

ANTHONY, king of Navarre, was son of Charles of Bourbon, duke of Vendome, and married Joan d'Albret 1548, who brought him the principality of Bearne, and the kingdom of Navarre. He abandoned the protestant tenets for the catholic faith, and then formed with Guise and Montmorency the famous league called the triumvirate. During the civil wars in 1562, he took the command of the army; and Blois, Tours, and Rouen, surrendered to his arms. He was wounded on the shoulder at the siege of this last place, and died 35 days after at Andeli 1562. His son was afterwards the celebrated Henry IV. of France.

ANTHONY, titular king of Portugal, was son of Lewis the second son of Emanuel. His pretensions to the throne were opposed by Philip II. of Spain, who sent the duke of Alva against him 1580, and obliged him to fly from his dominions. Anthony was a wretched fugitive in Holland, France, and England, and died at Paris 1595 aged 64.

ANTHONY, illegitimate son of Philip duke of Burgundy, deserved by his valor the name of the Great. He was engaged in Africa against the Moors, and in Switzerland, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Nanci. Lewis XI. of France and Charles VIII. honorably rewarded his services. He died 1504 aged 83.

ANTHONY, Paul Gabriel, a Jesuit, born at Luneville. He was professor of philosophy and theology, and died at Pont-a-Mousson, 1743. He wrote theologia universa dogmatica, 7 vols. 12mo. &c.

ANTHONY, a Sicilian, who when taken prisoner by Mahomet II. at the Negropont, 1473, set fire to the arsenal at Gallipoli, for which he was sawed in two by the Turks.

ANTHONY, N. an architect who settled at Paris, from Switzerland, during the revolution, plary life and refuſed the archbiſhopric of the city, when offered by Clement IV. Gregory X. invited him to the council of Lyons to read the book which he had written againſt the Greeks; and he died on his way to join the pontiff at the monaſtery of Foſſanova, near Terracina, 1274, in his 50th year. He was canoniſed 1323. His writings moſtly upon theological ſubjects, prove him to have been a man of great learning, and extenſive knowledge. They have often been publiſhed, in 17 volumes folio. His authority in religion became deciſive in the Catholic ſchools, and he approached ſo near to the erudition of St. Auguſtine, that he was ſaid in the true ſpirit of the metempſychoſis, to poſſeſs the tranſmigrated ſoul of that celebrated ſaint. It was in defence of Thomas Aquinas that Henry VIII. compoſed the book which procured him from the pope the title of the Defender of the Faith.

AQUINO, Philip, a Jew of Carpentras, converted to Chriſtianity, and profeſſor of Hebrew at Paris. He wrote a Hebrew talmudical, &c. dictionary, and corrected le Jay's polyglot bible. He died 1650. His ſon, Lewis, was author of ſeveral valuable books in oriental literature.

ARABSCAH, author of a hiſtory of Tamerlane, and of a treatiſe of the unity of God, was a Mahometan of Damaſcus, who died there 1450.

ARAM, Eugene, a native of Ramſgill, Yorkſhire, ſon of a gardener. His genius diſplayed itſelf whilſt in the humble occupation of his father, mathematical calculations and geometrical knowledge were quickly acquired, and Lilly's grammar, though in unintelligible language, was learnt by heart, and afterwards Camden's Greek, till this ſelf-taught claſſic unfolded the meaning of a few Latin lines, and then with rapid ſteps advanced to the comprehenſion of the authors of Latin and Greek literature. He alſo made himſelf perfect in Hebrew, and with theſe great acquirements he gained his livelihood, by engaging in ſeveral ſchools in the ſouth of England. In 1757, he came to the free ſchool at Lynn, a perfect maſter of the moſt abſtruſe ſtudies, and acquainted with heraldry and botany. He had begun to make collections for radical compariſons between the modern languages and ancient tongues, and already more than 3000 words were ſelected to eſtabliſh this affinity in a comparative lexicon, when his labors were arreſted by the hands of juſtice. He was taken up at Lynn, 1758, for the murder of Daniel Clark, a ſhoemaker of Knareſborough, who had been murdered 13 years before; and, after a trial in which he defended himſelf with coolneſs and ability, he was found guilty of the crime, and, after attempting to commit ſuicide, he ſuffered death at York, Auguſt, 1759. He acknowledged the juſtice of his ſentence, and attributed the crime to a ſuſpicion of adultery between his wife and Clark.

ARANTIUS, Julius, an Italian phyſician and anatomiſt, the pupil of Veſalius and Bart. Magus, known by a learned treatiſe on the human fœtus. He was born at Bologna, and died there 1581, aged 61.

ARBRISSEL, Robert d', a native of Britany, who founded the monaſtery of Fontevrault, and ſeparated his male and female diſciples. He died 1117.

ARBUCKLE, James M. A. a native of Glaſgow, maſter of a ſchool in the north of Ireland. He poſſeſſed genius, and his merit was acknowledged in his poems. He propoſed a tranſlation of Virgil, but did not finiſh it. He died 1734, aged 34.

ARBUTHNOT, Alexander, ſon of lord Arbuthnot, was eminent for his learning. He was a zealous defender of the reformation, and publiſhed Buchanan's hiſtory of Scotland, beſides ſome poetical trifles, and orations on the origin of law, and died at Aberdeen, 1538.

ARBUTHNOT, John, M. D. ſon of an epiſcopal clergyman, was deſcended from the noble family of the ſame name, and born at Arbuthnot, near Montroſe. After his education at Aberdeen, he came to London, where he attacked "Woodward's eſſay towards a natural hiſtory of the earth;" and ſoon roſe in the medical profeſſion, when he had ſucceſsfully attended prince George of Denmark. He was made phyſician to queen Anne, 1709, and, ſoon after, his acquaintance was formed with the moſt celebrated wits of the age, with two of whom, Swift and Pope, he engaged, in 1714, to compoſe in the true cervantic ſtile, a ſatire on degenerated taſte and the abuſe of learning. Of this plan only the firſt book was publiſhed, under the name of "memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus." The queen's death in ſome degree overturned the hopes of Arbuthnot. He felt the blow, and paſſed ſome time with his brother, the banker at Paris. In 1727, he publiſhed, in 4to. his tables of ancient coins, &c. and afterwards employed his pen in medical tracts, one of which, "effects of air on human bodies," was unhappily ſuggeſted by the aſthmatic complaint under which he labored. He died under this dreadful diſorder, at his houſe, Cork-ſtreet, 1735. His ſon George enjoyed a place in the Exchequer, and was one of Pope's executors; and his daughter Anne was a legatee in the poet's will. In praiſe of Arbuthnot, too much cannot be ſaid. His benevolence was equal to his wit, and it is admitted that he was inferior to none in learning, vivacity, and genuine humor. The letter which he wrote to Pope on his death-bed is a ſtrong inſtance of the goodneſs of his heart, the purity of his principles, and the conſtancy of his religious faith.

ARC, Joan of, Vid. JOAN.

ARCERE, Anthony, a native of Marſeilles, who was a prieſt of the oratory. As ſkilled in the oriental languages, he travelled into the eaſt, where he made a valuable collection of manuſcripts. He began a French and Turkiſh dictionary, the completion of which was unfortunately prevented by a fever, which proved fatal, 1699, in his 35th year.

ARCERE, Lewis Etienne, a prieſt of the oratory of Marſeilles, known as a poet, but more as the hiſtorian of Rochelle and of Amiens. He died 1781, in extreme old age.

ARCHINTO, Octavius, deſcended of a noble family in the Milaneſe, is known for his "antiquities," in 1 vol. folio, in the 16th century.

ARCHON, Lewis, chaplain of Lewis XIV. born at Riom in Auvergne, was patroniſed by the cardinal of Bouillon, and made himſelf known by his entertaining hiſtory of the French king's chapel, in 2 vols. 4to. 1711. He died at his abbey of St. Gilbert-neuf-fontaines. 1717, in his 72d year.

ARCONS, Cæſar de, a Gaſcon, advocate in the parliament of Bourdeaux. He died 1681, author of ſome treatiſes on the flux and reflux of the ſea, &c.

ARCQ, Philip Auguſte de St. Foi d', an ingenious Pariſian, ſaid to have been the natural ſon of count Touloufe. He is known for his hiſtory of commerce and navigation—his temple of ſilence—letters of Oſman, 3 vols. 12mo—his general hiſtory of war, 2 vols. 4to. &c. He died 1774.

ARCUDI, Alexander Thomas, a dominican of Venice, author of Galatina literata;—the hiſtory of Athanaſius—and other hiſtorical and biographical works. He died about 1720.

ARCUDIUS, Peter, a Greek eccleſiaſtic of Corfu, employed in Ruſſia by Clement VIII. He was patroniſed by cardinal Borgheſe; and he diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a writer on controverſial works againſt the Greek and Proteſtant churches. He died 1635.

ARCY, Patrick d', an Engliſhman. Vide. DARCY.

ARDEN, Edward, a native of Warwickſhire, of a reſpectable family, who married Mary, daughter of Sir George Throgmorton, and lived a retired life on his eſtate. He had frequent quarrels with his neighbour, the great earl of Leiceſter, whoſe pride looked down with contempt on the independence of a country gentleman, and his ruin was determined. Somerville, a thoughtleſs young man, who had married one of his daughters, was drawn into a ſuppoſed conſpiracy againſt the queen's life, and though no evidence appeared againſt him, except the report of a letter which had been thrown into the fire by his father-in-law, not only he, but Arden, his wife, his daughter, wife of Somerville, and Somerville's ſiſter were conveyed to the Tower, and after torture had been uſed to draw confeſſions, this unhappy family were condemned to ſuffer death. Somerville was found ſtrangled the night before his execution, as was ſuppoſed, that he might not accuſe his perſecutors, and Arden expired by the hand of the executioner in Smithfield, December 20, 1583, in his 52d year, amidſt the tears of pitying thouſands. The reſt were pardoned, but the mangled heads of the father and of the ſon-in-law were expoſed on London bridge.

ARDERN, John, an early medical writer, ſettled at Newark from 1348 to 1370, after which he came to London. He was eminent in his profeſſion, and thence his cures were attributed to magic and ſuperſtition. He wrote a treatiſe on the fiſtula in ano.

ARENA, Anthony de, a native of Soliers near Toulon, author of ſome inferior treatiſes on juriſprudence. He alſo wrote macaronic verſes, a farrago of barbarous language, partly French, and partly Latin, and partly provincial, firſt brought into faſhion by Merlin Coccaio. His chief work is his war of Charles V. in Provence. He died 1544.

ARESI, Paul, a native of Cremona, biſhop of Tortona, and author of ſome theological works, in Latin and in Italian. He died 1645, aged 71.

ARETIN, Guy, a benedictine monk, known for his diſcovery of a new method to learn muſic, publiſhed under the name of "Micrologus." He is the inventor of ſix notes in muſic, "ut, re, mi, fa, ſol, la," borrowed, it is ſaid, from the hymn to St. John, by taking the firſt and ſixth ſyllables:

UT queant laxis — REſonare fibris
MIra geſtorum — FAmuli tuorum
SOLve polutis — LAbiis reatum.

Some attribute the word gamnut to him, which he borrowed from the 3d letter of the Greek, in the marking of his notes, and with the idea that muſic originated in Greece.

ARETIN, Leonard, a native of Arezzo, from whence his name. He may be conſidered as the reſtorer of the Greek language to Italy. He was employed as ſecretary of the briefs under five popes, after which he became ſecretary to the republic of Florence. He tranſlated ſome of Plutarch's lives, and wrote ſome hiſtorical pieces, with elegance and accuracy. His hiſtory of the Goths acquired him alſo fame and patronage. He died at Florence, 1443, in his 74th year.

ARETIN, Francis, a man eminent for his learning, and his knowledge of Greek. He ſtudied at Vienna, and afterwards taught there with ſuch ſucceſs that he was called prince of ſubtleties. In law, his opinion was conſidered of ſuch weight, that whatever cauſe he previouſly condemned was generally loſt. He read lectures at Piſa and Ferrara; but he was diſappointed in his expectations at Rome, though Sextus IV. declared he would have honored him with a cardinal's hat, which was due to his merits, were he not afraid that by so doing he should rob the public of a most incomparable professor. Aretin, whose temper was choleric, never kept his servants more than one or two months, as he expected better attendance from new ones. He was parsimonious, and as he lived in celibacy, his fortune became immense, and was divided among his relations. He died about 1470.

ARETIN, Peter, natural son of Lewis Bocci of Arezzo, became so celebrated for his satire, that he was called the scourge of princes. His friendship was courted by Charles V. and Francis I. who no doubt dreaded the venom of his pen more than they esteemed his merits; and he grew so arrogant, that he represented himself on a medal as a god, and on the reverse received the presents of obsequious monarchs. It is to be lamented, that a genius, which so strongly possessed the powers of satire and genuine humor, was not fully employed in lashing the vices of men. The name of Aretin will be execrated by the virtuous, for the obscenities, and the immoral writings with which he has insulted the world. His comedies were highly applauded, and his works of devotion may be read with satisfaction and surprise. Some have said, but falsely, that he abandoned his lascivious principles. Aretin is said to have died by falling from a chair, and injuring his head, upon laughing immoderately at some indelicate conversation at which he was present. He died 1556, aged 65.

ARETIN, John, an able writer of Berne, in the 15th century, author of Examen Theologicum—a catalogue of comets—sermons, &c.

ARGALL, John, an eminent scholar, educated at Christ-church, and rector of Halesworth, Suffolk. He died suddenly at a feast at Cheston, 1606. He published two tracts in Latin.

ARGENS, Jean Baptiste de Boyer, Marquis d', a native of Aix in Provence. He followed for some time the military profession, and then distinguished himself as a writer, and as the friend of the king of Prussia, with whom he lived 25 years as chamberlain. He returned to his native country, and died there, at the end of 1770, aged 66. He was a man of strong sense, and great learning, as his Lettres Juives, Chinoises, Cabalistiques, and his philosophy of good sense, &c. sufficiently prove.

ARGENSON, Mark Rene le Voyer, Marquis, d', celebrated as the first who introduced lettres de cachet, during his administration of the police at Paris, 1697, was born at Venice, where his father was ambassador from the French court. He succeeded d'Agueſſeau in the office of chancellor, 1719, but was disgraced the following year, and died of a broken heart in 1721, aged 69.

ARGENTAL, Charles Auguſtus count d', a foreign minister at the French court, known as the friend of Lekain, Voltaire, and oth learned men, and as the author of some el gant verses. He died 1788, aged 88.

ARGENTIER, John, born at Castlenovo Piedmont, died at Turin, 1572, aged 58. H studied medicine, and was called censor me corum, because he censured Galen. His wor appeared in 12 vols. folio, Venice, 1592.

ARGENTRE, Bertrand d', a native of Vitr who died 1590, in his 71st year, of a brok heart, on account of the disasters brought up his country by the plague. He wrote an a count of Britany, &c.

ARGENTRE, Charles Dupleſſis d', a nati of Britany, known for his valuable and inte esting collectio judiciorum de novis erroribu &c. 3 vols. fol. He died in 1740, aged 67.

ARGENVILLE, Anthon. Joſeph Dezallier a French writer, son of a bookseller at Par He wrote several useful works, especially l lives of painters, in 3 vols. 4to. 1755, of whi Horace Walpole does not speak with sufficie encomium—a valuable treatise on garde ing, 4to. 1747—a catalogue of French foss —and other works. He died 1765.

ARGOLI, Andrew, a native of Tagliacozz patronised by the senate of Venice, and ma professor of mathematics at Padua. He di 1657, author of a book, de diebus criticis, 4t 1652—ephemerides from 1640, after h death continued to 1700.

ARGOLI, John, son of the preceding, pu lished an idyllium on the silk worm, at th age of 15. With the desire of further a plause, he shut himself up, and after seve months, at the age of 17, he produced h Endymion, in 12 cantos, a poem so elega that it was attributed to his father. H wrote other pieces, equally admired; and fo lowed the profession of jurisprudence at Bo logna, with great credit. He died abo 1660.

ARGONNE, Don Bonaventure d', a nativ of Paris, author of some useful works, esp cially miscellanies of history and literature, r plete with entertaining anecdotes and valuab reflections, published under the name of Ma ville. He died a Carthusian monk at Gaillo near Rouen, 1704, aged 64.

ARGUES, Gerard des, a geometrician, in timate with Descartes. He was born at L ons, 1597, and died there 1661. He wro treatises on conic sections, on perspective, &c ARGYRE, Iſaac, an eminent mathematicia of the 14th century, author of some works o geography and chronology.

ARGYROPYLUS, Joannes, a learned ma who fled from Constantinople when taken b Mahomet II. and contributed to the revival Greek literature in Europe. He was re ceived by Cosmo de Medicis, of Tuscan placed in the professor's chair at Florence, an made tutor in the prince's family. He re tired during the plague, to Rome, where h le lectured on Ariſtotle. He died of a fever, occaſioned by eating melons, in his 70th year, about 1478. He tranſlated ſeveral of Ariſtotle's works, in an able manner. He was ſaid to be an intemperate epicure, ſo that the whole of his fortune was ſquandered in ſupplying the delicacies of his table. He treated Cicero with contempt, becauſe he had ſaid of his favorite Greek, that it is a language verborum inops.

ARIADNE, daughter of Leo I. married to Zeno, who ſucceeded as emperor, 474. She was ſo diſguſted with her huſband, and ſo eager to enjoy the company of her favorite Anaſtaſius, that ſhe forgot her character in barbarity. Zeno, when intoxicated was ſhut up in a ſepulchre, where he was ſuffered to die; and Anaſtaſius was placed on the throne. She died 515.

ARIAS MONTANUS, Benedict, a native of Seville, eminent for his knowledge of modern and ancient literature. He was engaged by Philip II. of Spain to publiſh an edition of the polyglot bible, which he completed, and publiſhed in 8 vols. fol. The monarch liberally offered the author a biſhopric, but it was modeſtly refuſed. He died 1598, in his 71ſt year.

ARIAS, Francis, a jeſuit, author of ſeveral theological treatiſes. He died 1605, aged 72.

ARIBERT, ſon of Clotaire II. king of France, obtained part of Aquitaine as his patrimony from his elder brother, Dagobert I. He was crowned at Toulouſe, and died two years after, 630.

ARIEH, Jacob Juda, a learned rabbi of Amſterdam, in the 17th century, author of a deſcription of the tabernacle, in Hebrew.

ARIOSTI, Attilio, a muſician, born at Bologna. He was at firſt a Dominican, but quitted the ſociety, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a compoſer at Bologna, and Venice, and in Germany. He afterwards came to England, where his maſterly execution on the viol d'amore, a new inſtrument, gained him applauſe. He publiſhed a book of cantatas, 1725.

ARIOSTO, Lodovico or Lewis, an illuſtrious poet, born at Reggio, 1474, of a family allied to the dukes of Ferrara. His early genius diſplayed itſelf in the compoſition of the play of Pyramus and Thiſbe, which he acted with his brothers and ſiſters; but his father viewed his ſtudies with a jealous eye, and bade him forſake the muſes for the bar. After his father's deceaſe, he returned to his favorite purſuits, and, under the patronage of cardinal d'Eſte, he began the plan of a poem, which was to immortalize the Italian muſe. He was invited to write in Latin by cardinal Bembo; but, with the ardor of a poet, he replied, "that he aſpired to the firſt rank of Italian compoſition, and knew he muſt be placed only ſecond as the votary of the Latin muſe." He read with attention Homer and Virgil, and, with a mind ſtored with all the learning of antient times, he borrowed a ſubject from Bojardo's Orlando Inamorato, and produced his incomparable poem of Orlando Furioſo. When on the death of Hippolito, Alfonſo duke of Ferrara ſucceeded as patron of the poet, he ſhewed his regard for him, by appointing him governor of Graffignana. For his retirement, he built a houſe at Ferrara; and when queſtioned why he, who ſhone in the deſcription of magnificent palaces, had made it ſo ſmall, he replied, "that words were cheaper placed together than ſtones." He read his poems with ſo ſweet a voice, that his friends were enraptured to hear him; and he poſſeſſed ſo delicate an ear, with ſo choleric a temper, that he once entered into a potter's ſhop, who had been repeating ſome of his verſes, with an improper accent, and broke a great number of the pots expoſed to ſale. The man expoſtulated in vain at the violence of the ſtranger, "I have not ſufficiently revenged myſelf on thee," exclaimed Arioſto; "I have broke only a few pots, and you have ſpoiled the moſt beautiful of compoſitions to my face." Arioſto died at Ferrara, 8th July 1533, in his 59th year. A buſt was erected to his memory, with an epitaph written by himſelf. He had two ſons by a favorite, called Alexandra, whom he would have married, had he not been apprehenſive of loſing his benefices. The Orlando Furioſo has been deſervedly extolled, and it ranks high after Homer. Arioſto poſſeſſes all the fire of poetry; he paſſes with incredible rapidity and eaſe from the terrible to the tender, from the ſoft to the ſublime; every character is intereſting: his heroes are valiant without raſhneſs; and his heroines are feminine without vulgarity; and nature appears in all her native majeſty, adorned by all the graces of art, and recommended by the moſt enchanting language of poetry. Beſides the Orlando, Arioſto wrote ſeven ſatires, five comedies, ſonnets, ballads, &c. Hoole has given a ſpirited verſion of this admired poem.

ARIOSTO, Gabriel, brother to the poet, was himſelf eminent as a Latin poet, in the ſtile of Statius. He died 1552. His ſon Horace was born at Ferrara, and died there 1593, aged 38. He was author of a ſpirited defence of his uncle's poem againſt Pelegrino; and compoſed beſides comedies, a poem called Apheus.

ARKEL, Cornel. Van, a Dutch Armenian divine of Amſterdam, educated under Limborch and Le Clerc. He died 1724, aged 54. He is author of Hadriani Junii, &c.

ARKENHOLZ, John, a native of Helſingfors in Sweden, who ſtudied at Upſal, and obtained the office of ſecretary of public accounts, and was appointed, in 1746, keeper of the cabinet curioſities of Caſſel. He died 1777, author author of some treatises on political subjects, memoirs of queen Christina, &c.

ARKWRIGHT, Sir Richard, a man who rose to opulence and reputation from the humble station of penny barber, in Bolton, Lancashire. He was the inventor of the spinning jenny, a system of machinery which, by his perseverance, was made to shorten and facilitate the labor of spinning cotton, and which has introduced plenty and independence among the lower orders of the community. This enterprising man, after trying his fortune at Preston, and at Nottingham, raised extensive works at Cromford-bridge, Derbyshire, where he built a beautiful mansion, and a church, in which his remains were deposited. When sheriff for the county, he was knighted, and at his death, 3d August 1792, he left property to the amount of nearly half a million.

ARLAUD, James Antony, a native of Geneva, eminent as a painter. He was patronised at Paris by the duke of Orleans, and afterwards passed to London. His most celebrated piece was a copy of Leda, which in a moment of superstitious devotion, he destroyed by cutting it in an anatomical stile, and dividing the limbs among his friends. A copy of this celebrated picture was sold in London for 60l. He died at Geneva, 1743, aged 75.

ARLOTTA, a beautiful woman of Falaise, daughter of a tanner. She was seen gazing at her door by Robert duke of Normandy, as he passed through the street: and he made her his mistress. She had by him the conqueror, William; and after Robert's death, she married Herluin, by whom she had three children, for whom William honorably provided.

ARLOTTO, a native of Magello, in Tuscany, 1385. He was brought up in the trade of the woollen manufacture, but he left it for the church; and he had the good fortune to obtain the rural deanry of St. Cresci in the diocese of Fiesole. The income of this was sufficiently large to maintain him in independence; and as residence was not required, he indulged his partiality for foreign countries by travelling. He visited London, where he was noticed by Edward IV. and after a series of strange adventures, he returned to his native country. As he possessed an inexhaustible fund of genuine humor, he was the companion of the gay and the dissipated, and frequently forgot the dignity of his character, by descending to the low buffoonery of a mimic. On his return to the deanry, he swore that he would clear his church of mice; and accordingly the animals were caught and confined in great numbers in a glass cage for a month. Only one survived this dreadful punishment, it was restored to liberty, with a little bell about its neck, which served to scare away the whole race, and it was alive three years afterwards. He died at Florence, 1483, in his 98th year.

ARMELLINO, Francis, a banker, made cardinal by Leo X. He became unpopular on account of the taxes which he recommended. He died 1527.

ARMINIUS, James, a native of Oude-water, in Holland, 1560, founder of the sect of the Arminians. As he lost his father early, he was supported at Utrecht, and Marpurg, by the liberality of his friends; but when he returned home, instead of being received by his mother, he found that she, as well as her daughters, and all her family, had been sacrificed to the wantonness of the Spaniards. His distress was for a while inconsolable, but the thirst after distinction called him to Leyden, where his industry acquired him the protection of the magistrates of Amsterdam, at whose expence he travelled to Geneva and Italy, to hear the lectures of Theodore Beza and Zabarella. On his return to Holland, he was ordained minister of Amsterdam, 1588, and so great was his popularity, that he was followed by admiring auditors, and the enemies of his doctrines and of his success were silenced by the solidity of his arguments, and the integrity of his heart. In theological disputes upon grace, and other contested points, he preserved his high reputation; and though not only his friends but the magistrates frequently interfered in the dispute, the force of his reasoning was never weakened, or his learning misapplied in indecent invectives. As professor of divinity at Leyden, he distinguished himself by three orations on the object of theology—on the author and end of it—and on the certainty of it; and he afterwards explained the prophet Jonah. In his public and private life, Arminius has been admired for his moderation; and though many gross insinuations have been thrown against him, yet he seemed entitled to the motto which he assumed,—a good conscience is a paradise. A life of perpetual labor and vexation of mind, at last brought on a sickness of which he died, October 19, 1609. His writings were all on controversial and theological subjects, and were published in 1 vol. 4to. Frankfort, 1631. The Arminians, in the number of whom appear Grotius, Episcopius, &c. are still numerous in Holland. They maintain, that man is made by God a free agent, and that providence before-hand decrees his salvation or damnation, which, however, totally depend upon his own uninfluenced action; a doctrine directly opposed by the Calvinistical tenets of predestination. Of these important opinions Burnet has given an account in his exposition of the 17th article.

ARMSTRONG, Thomas, an active supporter of the royal cause during the civil wars, for which he was honored with knighthood. After ter the reſtoration, Armſtrong ſhowed the moſt violent oppoſition to popery; and when Monmouth was determined on rebellion, he eſpouſed his cauſe, and viſited with him the guards, with the intention either of attacking them by force, or gaining them by artifice. He fled from the country, and was outlawed. His perſecutors, however, ſeized him abroad, and he was brought to London, and executed without a trial. 20th June 1684.

Armstrong, Dr. John, a celebrated poet, born at Caſtleton, Edinburghſhire. He took his degrees of M. D. in the univerſity of Edinburgh, 1732, but he did not meet with the ſucceſs in his profeſſion which his merits deſerved. He firſt wrote ſome ſmall medical tracts, which were followed by the economy of love, a poem after the manner of Ovid, objectionable for its licentiouſneſs, though admired for the ſpirit of its lines, corrected and purged in the edition of 1768. In 1744, the art of preſerving health was publiſhed, and on this highly finiſhed performance the fame of Armſtrong totally depends. By means of his friends, the poet was recommended to the notice of the great. He was appointed phyſician to the lame and ſick ſoldiers behind Buckingham houſe, and, in 1760, he was made phyſician to the army in Germany. It was at this time that he wrote his poem called "Day," inſcribed to John Wilkes; and the freedom of remark which he uſed in one paſſage upon Churchill not only drew the vengeance of the ſatiriſt upon him, but diſſolved the friendſhip which had before cordially exiſted with Wilkes. He collected his ſcattered pieces, 1770, and the following year he wrote a ſhort ramble through France and Italy by Lancelot Temple. He died in September 1779, leaving behind him about 3000l. a ſum which ſurprized his friends, as they knew that his income was ſmall, and that his heart was generous.

Armstrong, John, a native of Leith, educated at Edinburgh, where he publiſhed his juvenile poems, and an eſſay on the means of puniſhing and preventing crimes. He came to London about 1793, and wrote for the newſpapers, and preached among the diſſenters. He died in his 26th year, 1797.

Armyne, lady Mary, daughter of Henry Talbot, the fourth ſon of George earl of Shrewſbury, married ſir William Armyne, and rendered herſelf diſtinguiſhed by her piety and benevolence, as well as her knowledge of hiſtory, of divinity, and of the languages. She contributed largely towards the encouragement and ſupport of the miſſionaries ſent to North America. She alſo endowed three hoſpitals; and died 1675.

Arnald, Richard, B. D. a native of London, educated at Benet's and Emanuel colleges, and preſented to the rectory of Thurcaſton in Leiceſterſhire. He publiſhed ſeveral ſermons, and beſides a commentary on wiſdom, on eccleſiaſticus, &c.; but his beſt known performance is his commentary on the apocrypha. He died 1756.

Arnall, William, an attorney's clerk, who became a political writer in the pay of ſir Robert Walpole. It appears from the report of a ſecret committee that, in four years, he received 10,997*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* for his pamphlets; and though ſo liberally rewarded, he died of a broken heart, and in debt, 1741 aged 26.

Arnaud de Meyrveilie, or Mereuil, a poet of Provence, in the ſervice of Beziers, of whoſe wife he became deeply enamoured. He praiſed the lady in anonymous lines; and when at laſt diſcovered, he was not diſcarded, but received valuable preſents from the hands of a woman who had the virtue to pity and not to enflame his paſſion. He died 1220.

Arnaud de Villa Nova, a phyſician, who improved himſelf by travelling through Europe, and created himſelf enemies by having recourſe to aſtrology. He enjoyed ſome reputation at Paris, and afterwards retired to Sicily, to Frederic king of Arragon. He was ſhipwrecked on the coaſt of Genoa, 1310 or 1313. His works appeared at Lyons, 2 vols. fol.

Arnaud, Anthony, an advocate of Paris, born 1550. He was attorney-general to Catherine de Medicis, and acquired reputation by the exertion of his abilities, particularly in defending the univerſity of Paris, where he had been educated, againſt the Jeſuits, 1594. Bayle denies his being of the reformed religion. He died in his 60th year.

Arnaud d'Andilli, Robert, eldeſt ſon of the preceding, was early introduced at court, diſtinguiſhed as the friend of the great, and the patron of genius and learning. He retired, in his 55th year, to the convent of Port Royal des Champs, and employed himſelf not only to ſtudy, but to the cultivation of trees, the fruit of which he yearly preſented to queen Anne of Auſtria. He died 1674, in his 86th year. He was author of memoirs of his own life—memoirs of the houſe of Portugal, &c.

Arnaud, Anthony, brother of the preceding, was born at Paris 1612. He was intended for the law; but ſtudied divinity, in which he took his degrees at the Sorbonne. He was engaged in the controverſy upon grace, and ſided with the Janſeniſts againſt the Jeſuits. In one of his public letters, however, he proceeded farther than prudence permitted; for which he was expelled from the faculty of divinity; and it was during this ſuſpenſion of favor that he for twenty-five years devoted himſelf to the compoſition of thoſe works in logic, geometry, grammar, theology, and metaphyſics, which have immortalized his name. On his return to public life, he was preſented to the king, and recovered his popularity; but the violence of his enemies drove him a second time, 1679, into obscurity into the Netherlands, where he continued his controversial labors against the Calvinists and Jesuits. He died, in his 82d year, 1694. He was a man of a mild and inoffensive character, of no very promising appearance, but endowed with uncommon powers of mind. His works are very numerous.

ARNAUD, Henry, brother of Robert and Anthony, was employed as negociator at the court of Rome; and, on his return, 1649, he was made bishop of Angers, where, like a father, he protected the poor, and by the most exemplary virtues discharged the high duties of his office. When the queen-mother marched with an army to punish the rebellion of Angers, the good bishop disarmed her resentment, in his administration of the sacrament. Take, said he, to the incensed princess, the body of him who forgave his enemies as he was dying on the cross. He died at Angers 1692, in his 95th year.

ARNAUD, de Brescie, a bold ecclesiastic, the disciple of Peter Abelard, in the 12th century, who maintained that it was unlawful for the clergy to hold a temporal estate. On the death of Innocent II. by whom he had been condemned, and obliged to fly to Switzerland, he attacked the papal power, drove the pontiff from Rome, and reformed the government of the city. He was afterwards seized, and burnt alive, in 1115, and his ashes thrown into the Tiber. Some of his followers came to England, 1160; but were all put to death, as persons dangerous to the happiness of the state.

ARNAUD, Francis, a native of Carpentras, distinguished by his literary labors, in connection with Sicard, especially the Gazette literaire de l'Europe—in the journal etranger —and in pieces on philosophy, literature, and the arts, 4 vols. 12mo. He died at Paris, 1784.

ARNDT, John, a native of Ballenstadt in Anhalt, known as minister of Quedlinburg, and afterwards of Brunswick. As he lived in times when controversial points were disputed upon with acrimony, he felt the rancor of opposite opinions. He was for eleven years minister of Kell, on the presentation of the duke of Lunenburgh, where he died, 1621. His chief work is his treatise of true christianity, in 4 books, in German, which, on account of its excellence, has been translated into several languages.

ARNDT, Joshua, professor of logic at Rostock, died at Gustrof, the place of his births, 1617, in his 61st year. He wrote miscellanea sacra, 8vo. &c.

ARNI, Thomas Augustine, son of an upholsterer in Covent Garden, whom Addison characterised in the Tatler, No. 155 & 166. He was educated at Eton, and bound to an attorney; but he preferred music, and soon rose to be leader of the band at Drury Lane. He composed the music for Addison's opera of Rosamond, that for Milton's Comus, and that of Mallet's masque of Alfred, in which Rule Britannia was first introduced. In consequence of his reputation, he was created Mus. D. at Oxford, in 1759. He died of a spasm in the lungs, 1778, author of the favorite opera of Artaxerxes, the Guardian outwitted, and the Rose. Mrs. Cibber, the famous actress, was his sister.

ARNISÆUS, Kenningus, a German professor of physic at Helmstadt. He is known for his able political treatises in defence of the authority of princes. He died 1635.

ARNOLD, Samuel, an eminent musical composer, educated under Gates and Nares. His cure of Saul, and his prodigal son, obtained him great celebrity, so that, in 1778, he was honored with the degree of Mus. D. by the university of Oxford. After leaving Covent Garden, where he first appeared, 1760, he became the proprietor of the fashionable Marybone Gardens; and, in 1783, succeeded Dr. Nares at the royal chapel. He was also organist of Westminster Abbey, in which his remains are deposited. He died 1802. Besides musical compositions, he began a splendid edition of Handel's works, in 1786.

ARNOLD, Jeffery, author of a history of mystical theology, and of a history of the church and of heretics, besides other tracts, was a zealous minister of Perleberg, and a strong advocate of the pietists. He died 1714.

ARNOLD, Christopher, a native of Nuremberg, who studied at Altorf, and afterwards travelled on the continent and in England. He died professor at Altorf 1685, aged 58. He is author of testimonium Flavianum, seu epistolæ 30. de Josephi testimonio de Christo, &c.

ARNOLD, Benedict, an American, born in New England, and brought up as a surgeon. He quitted this profession for the sea; and afterwards embraced, with enthusiasm, the republican cause against the mother-country, and took the command of a company of volunteers at Newhaven. His good conduct raised him to higher offices, and he was selected to make an attack, through pathless wilds, upon Canada. In his attempt to take Quebec by surprise, he received a wound in his leg; and upon the failure of his plans, he withdrew the remains of his forces to Crown Point. He was afterwards employed on Lake Champlain; but though attached to the American cause, either dissatisfaction, or the fear of finding himself on the vanquished side, induced him to open a negociation with sir Henry Clinton, and, as a proof of his sincerity, to deliver up into the hands a the English West point, of which he had had the command. In the attempt poor André was sacrificed, and Arnold, with difficulty, escaped on board a British ship of war. Here he was treated with respect, and on the unfortunate conclusion of the war, he was rewarded with a pension. He was afterwards in Nova Scotia, and in the West Indies, where he was taken by the French, from whom he escaped. He returned to England, and died in London, 1801.

ARNOUL, a bishop of Lisieux, who resigned his office to retire in his old age, to the abbey of St. Victor at Paris, where he died 1184. His letters are curious, in containing an account of the discipline and manners of his time.

ARNTZENIUS, John Henry, a learned Dutchman, law professor at Utrecht, where he died 1799. He wrote academical discourses and dissertations — miscellanies — institutiones juris Belgici, 2 vols. 8vo.

ARNU, Nicholas, a dominican, professor of metaphysics at Padua, where he died 1692, aged 63. His works in 10 vols were chiefly on the theology and philosophy of Aquinas, and curious for the extravagance of his ideas, and his denunciations against the Turkish empire.

ARNULPH or ERNULPH, a monk of St. Lucian de Beauvais, patronised by his friend Lanfranc of Canterbury, and made bishop of Rochester under Henry I. He wrote an history of the church of his diocese, which is still preserved at Rochester, and theological treatises, and died 1124, aged 84.

ARNULPH, natural son of Carloman, was elected emperor of Germany 888, and crowned at Rome 896, by pope Formosus. He died, as is supposed, by poison, 899, and was succeeded by his son Lewis IV.

ARNWAY, John, a native of Shropshire, who studied at Oxford, and became rector of Hodret and Ightfield, in his native county. In the civil wars he lost his estates, and retired to Oxford, 1640, where he served the king, and was made archdeacon of Coventry; but on the success of Cromwell, he went to the Hague, where he published two pamphlets on the moderation of Charles I.—and an alarm to the English. He afterwards went to Virginia, where he died of a broken heart, 1653.

ARON, Peter, a musical writer of Florence, patronised by Leo X. and made canon of Rimini. The best known of his compositions, is de institutione harmonicâ.

ARPINO, Joseph d', a celebrated painter, born at Arpino, 1560. In his 13th year he was in the humble situation of waiter on the painters who were adorning the Vatican; and it was from this time that his genius burst forth. The pope, acquainted with his merit, created him knight of St. Michael. He possessed spirit; but when his rival Caravagio attacked him, he refused to fight him, before he was knight like himself. Against Annibal Caracci he likewise meditated revenge; but the painter showing him his pencil, added, with this weapon I defy you. The best pieces of Arpino, who is known among the painters by the name of Josepin, are from the history of Rome, the most capital of which is the battle of Romulus with the Sabines. He died at Rome, 1640, aged 80.

ARRAGON, Jeanne d', a celebrated Italian lady, mother of Marc Anthony Colonna, who distinguished himself against the Turks at Lepanto. The wits of the age embalmed her virtues and her praises in elegies, in all languages, published at Venice 1158, under the title of Tempio alla divina signora Arragona. She died 1577.

ARRAN, James Hamilton, earl of, a Scotch nobleman, highly favored by Henry II. of France, in 1555, and made captain of his Scotch life guards. He at one time aspired to the hand of queen Elizabeth of England, which however, he did not disclose, to pay his adoration to her more beautiful rival, the queen of Scots. Mary received his proposals with indifference and contempt, and Arran sunk into despair and insanity. He died 1609.

ARRIAGA, Roderic d', a Spanish jesuit, professor of theology at Salamanca and Prague. His works were on metaphysics and divinity, 8 vols. fol. He died 1667, aged 75.

ARROWSMITH, John, a theological professor at Cambridge 1660, author of several valuable works strongly calvinistic, especially Tactica sacra—Godman, or exposition of St. John's first chapter—a chain of principles, &c.

ARSENIUS, bishop of Constantinople, excommunicated Michael Palæologus, for dispossessing John Lascaris of the crown. The emperor demanded absolution, but the prelate refused without resignation, and was banished to an island, where he died in the 13th century.

ARSENIUS, a Roman deacon, appointed by pope Damascus, preceptor to Arcadius, son of Theodosius. The virtues of the master were unable to correct the haughtiness of the pupil. One day Theodosius found his son sitting and the preceptor standing before him, upon which he ordered him to sit down, and his pupil to rise. It is said, that the licentious prince ordered his master to be dispatched, and that Arsenius discovering the perfidy, fled from the court to Egypt, and passed the rest of his life among the anchorites of Scetis.

ARSENIUS, archbishop of Malvasia in the Morea, was author of a collection of apophthegms, and some scholia on Euripides, and died at Venice 1435.

ARTALI, Joseph, a native of Mazara in Sicily, who in his youth fought a duel and killed his adversary, and fled to Candia when besieged by the Turks. In this place he distinguished himself, and was knighted, and on his return to Europe, he was patroniſed by the duke of Brunſwic, and the emperor Leopold. He was ſo ſkilful as a duelliſt, that he was called the chevalier du Sang. He wrote ſeveral poetical pieces, and died 1679, at Naples, aged 51.

ARTAUD, Peter Joſeph, a native of Bonieux, in the comtat Venaiſſin, biſhop of Cavaillon, eſteemed for his learning and his exemplary piety. His works are paſtoral diſcourſes, &c. He died 1670, aged 54.

ARTEAGA, Don Stephano, a Spaniſh Jeſuit, who died at Paris, 1800, aged 55. He is author of a treatiſe on ideal beauty in Spaniſh,—the revolutions of the Italian theatre to the preſent time, in Italian, 3 vols. 8vo. 1785, &c.

ARTEDI, Peter, a phyſician of Sweden, ſo intimate with Linnæus, that they made each other heirs of their manuſcripts and literary property. He is known for his diligence in the hiſtory of foſſils and quadrupeds. He was accidentally drowned in a canal at Leyden, 1735, in his 30th year.

ARTHINGTON, Henry, a native of Yorkſhire, who, under the pretence of being inſpired, attempted to introduce a reformation in the kingdom by the wildeſt ſchemes.

ARTHUR, a Britiſh prince, whoſe exiſtence ſome hiſtorians regard as fabulous. He is ſaid to have ſucceeded his father as king of Britain 516. He attacked the Saxons, whom he defeated, and afterwards made war againſt the Picts, and againſt Ireland and the weſtern Iſles of Scotland. He eſtabliſhed the order of the knights of the round table at Wincheſter, and died about 542.

ARTHUR, duke of Britany, was the poſthumous ſon of Geoffrey Plantagenet ſon of Henry II. by Conſtantine daughter of the duke of Britany. ASAPH, St. a native of North Wales, w was a monk of Llanelvy under Kentigern t biſhop of that ſee. He ſucceeded to the l ſhopric, and Llanelvy exchanged its name f St. Aſaph. The biſhop wrote the ordinanc of his church, the life of his predeceſſor, & and died about 600.

ASAPH, a muſician of the tribe of Levi, the age of king David, ſaid to have compoſ ſeveral of the pſalms.

ASCHAM, Roger, a native of Kirkb Wiſke near Northallerton, Yorkſhire, knov for his learning, and for the reſpectable ſha which he bore in the education of the fami of Henry VIII. From St. John's colle Cambridge, where he was known by his a plication, and his knowledge of Greek, he w introduced to Henry VIII. to whom he i ſcribed his treatiſe on archery, and he not on received a penſion, but as he wrote a beautif hand, he was appointed to inſtruct in writi prince Edward, the lady Elizabeth, and t two brothers Henry and Charles dukes Suffolk. Elizabeth was indebted to him al for her knowledge of Greek and Latin, as l re read with her the best part of Livy, Cicero, Isocrates, Sophocles, &c. He afterwards returned to Cambridge as public orator of the university, and was invited 1550 to attend an embassy to Charles V. and it was on his way to London he visited lady Jane Grey at Bradgate-hall in Leicestershire, in whose hands he found a Greek edition of Plato's Phædo, a book from which this amiable woman said she received more real pleasure than from sharing the diversion of her attendants and family who were hunting in the park. In Germany, he applied himself to politics so successfully that he wrote a book on the affairs of the empire. He was appointed Latin secretary to king Edward, an office which was still continued for him under Mary and Elizabeth; but though a favorite at court, he did not use his influence to raise himself to preferment, as a prebend in the church of York was the only favor he received, and unasked from the crown. He died in London 1568, aged 53, and was interred in St. Sepulchre. Buchanan wrote the following just tribute to his memory:

Aschamum extinctum Patriæ Graiæque camœnæ,
Et Latiæ verâ cum pietate dolent.
Principibus vixit carus, jucundus amicis,
Re modicâ: in mores dicere fama nequit.

Ascham's most valuable work is his schoolmaster, written at the request of sir Richard Sackville, in consequence of a dispute with respect to the various modes of education. His latinity and the elegance of his diction in his letters have been greatly and deservedly admired.

Ascham, Anthony, author of tracts on astrology, and on the properties of herbs, gathered 1550, was a physician and also an ecclesiastic.

Ascham, Anthony, a friend of Cromwell, and a member of the long parliament. He was educated at Eton, and King's college Cambridge. He was assassinated with his interpreter by six exiled royalists in Spain, where he had been sent as envoy from England, 1650. He wrote a discourse on the revolutions and confusions of governments, 8vo. 1648.

Asgile, John, a lawyer of eminence, known for his wit and his misfortunes. He was brought up at Lincoln's inn, and rose to consequence and employment. Two treatises replete with humor and sarcasm had already given him popularity, when he published another on the possibility of avoiding death, which drew upon him the odium of the friends of the church, and particularly of Dr. Sacheverell; so that when he afterwards went to Ireland and by success in the law purchased an estate and procured a seat in the house of commons, he was ignominiously expelled for the contents of his pamphlet. On his return to England, he was returned for Bramber in Sussex; but here the morality of his writings was also called in question, and though he made an eloquent defence in favor of his opinions, which he refused to retract, he was expelled as a disgraced and unworthy member. This blow hastened the ruin of his fortunes, he became a prisoner of the King's Bench, and afterwards of the Fleet, and after 30 years thus spent in confinement and poverty he expired 1728, aged upwards of 80.

Ashe, Simeon, a nonconformist educated at Emanuel college, and settled in Staffordshire, where he became acquainted with Dod, Ball, Hildersham, and others. He was educated at the grammar-school in his native town, became a chorister of the cathedral, and at the age of 16 was admitted into the family of James Paget baron of the exchequer, by whose means he rose to be solicitor and attorney in the common pleas. At the beginning of the civil war he entered at Brazen-nose college, where he laboured with great assiduity in mathematics, taken priſoner, but in his attempt to eſcape, he was ſtruck by a ſoldier on the head, and the blow produced a fever, which proved fatal, 1643. He is author of a remonſtrance againſt preſbytery—of a brief review of the inſtitution, &c. of biſhops, &c.

ASTRUC, John, a French phyſician, who, after ſtudying at Montpellier, acquired great reputation at Paris. He was for ſome time in Poland, phyſician to the king at Warſaw. His works, de morbis venereis, &c. are highly eſteemed. He was born 1684, and died at Paris, 1766. Beſides the above, he wrote treatiſes on pathology—on ulcers and tumors—on the inoculation of the ſmall-pox—on female diſeaſes, tranſlated into Engliſh, &c.

ATABALIPA, or ATAHUALPA, the laſt king of Peru, of the race of the Incas. He was made king of Quito on his father's death, 1529: but he aſpired to the whole kingdom, and defeated his brother Hualſcar, who ſat on the throne of Peru. When Pizarro invaded Peru, the unhappy monarch was invited to a parley, and treacherouſly ſeized, and ſoon after barbarouſly ſtrangled, or burnt at the ſtake, 1533, though he had paid for his ranſom all the gold which a room pointed out by the Spaniards could contain. Some of the Spaniſh authors have endeavoured to repreſent him as an uſurper, but little credit is to be given to their aſſertions. They wiſh to wipe off the odium deſervedly fallen on their countrymen, by attacking the innocent character of Atabalipa.

ATHALIAH, wife of Jehoram, and mother of Ahaziah, king of Judah, was daughter of Ahab, by Jezebel. Her ſon, excited by her advice and example, committed every exceſs of wickedneſs; and, after his death, ſhe murdered the whole of the royal family, except Joaſh, who was with difficulty preſerved. She was, after a reign of ſeven years, put to death. The hiſtory of this vicious princeſs is the ſubject of one of the fineſt of the tragedies of Racine.

ATHELING, Edgar, ſon of Edward, and grandſon of Edmund Ironſide, king of England, was regarded as the future monarch; but the intrigues of Harold prevailed againſt him. The battle of Haſtings, 1066, in deſtroying his rival, cut off his hopes of ſucceſs; and he fled to Scotland, and afterwards to Normandy. He was reconciled to the conqueror, and was at the firſt cruſade, where he behaved with great intrepidity. He paſſed the laſt years of his life at Montſbury.

ATHELSTAN, though but natural ſon of Edward the elder, was made king of England after his father's death, 925. He was ſucceſsful againſt the Danes, whom he defeated in Northumberland; and afterwards he devoted himſelf to the arts of peace. He encouraged commerce, by beſtowing the title of thane on ſuch of his merchants as had performed three voyages. He died 941.

ATHIAS, Joſeph, a learned printer of Amſterdam, who publiſhed an edition of the Hebrew bible, 2 vols. highly eſteemed, beſides editions in Spaniſh, Engliſh, and German. He died 1700.

ATKINS, James, D.D. a learned Scotſman, of Kirkwall in Orkney, educated at Edinburgh and Oxford, and made biſhop of Moray, in 1677, and afterwards tranſlated to Galloway. He died at Edinburgh, 1687. He wrote againſt the preſbyterians.

ATKINS, ſir Robert, was educated at Baliol college, and was made a judge of the court of Common Pleas, 1672, which he reſigned, in 1679, through diſguſt at the conduct of the government. He ſhowed his impartiality on the bench, though his mind was occaſionally tinctured by ſuperſtition; and at the revolution he was made lord chief baron by William. In June 1695, he reſigned his high office, and ſpent the laſt fourteen years of his life in dignified retirement at Saperton Hall in Glouceſterſhire. He died 1709, aged 88. leaving behind him a character of great probity. He was twice married; and his only ſon, ſir Robert Atkins, inherited his virtues, and was repreſentative of the county. He publiſhed the hiſtory of Glouceſterſhire, from the materials collected by Dr. Parſons; and died 1711, aged 64. The writings of judge Atkins are all on conſtitutional and juridical ſubjects.

ATKYNS, Richard, a native of Glouceſterſhire, who ſuffered during the civil wars for his attachment to the royal cauſe, and ſpent above 1000*l.* in lawſuits, in twenty-four years, to eſtabliſh the right of the king's grant in printing law books. He publiſhed original and growth of printing, in 4to, and, five years after, his vindication, &c. He died in confinement in the Marſhalſea, September 14, 1677.

ATRATUS, Hugh, or Black, called the phœnix of his age, from the great powers of his mind, was born at Eveſham in Worceſterſhire, and was made a cardinal by Martin II. 1281. He died of the plague, ſix years after, author of genealogia humana—problemata, &c.

ATTENDULI, Margaret, a ſiſter of Sforza, grand conſtable of Naples. When her brother was perfidiouſly ſeized, ſhe armed her friends, and at their head made repriſals, and thus obtained the liberation of the captive.

ATTERBURY, Lewis, ſon of Dr. Atterbury, rector of Milton, Northamptonſhire, was educated at Chriſt Church, and ſubmitted to the republican viſitors. He was, in 1654, made rector of Great Riſſington, Glouceſterſhire, and, three years after, obtained the living of Milton, Bucks. He was drowned near his houſe, 1693. He publiſhed three ſermons.

ATTERBURY, Lewis, eldeſt ſon of the preceding, seding, was educated at Westminster school, and Christ Church, Oxford. He, in 1684, became rector of Symel in Northamptonshire, which he afterwards resigned. He succeeded as preacher at Highgate chapel, and, by being one of the chaplains of the princess Anne, he was, 1707, presented to the living of Shepperton by the queen, and by the bishop of London to that of Hornsey, 1719. His charitable disposition was strongly displayed in his studying physic for the benefit of the poor at Highgate, and distributing advice and drugs gratis. On the death of Dr. Sprat, the archdeacon of Rochester, he made application for the office, and, as his brother was bishop of the see and patron, he expected no refusal; but he was disappointed. He died at Bath, of a paralytic stroke, 1731, in his 75th year. He was author of two vols. of sermons, and other tracts, and he left his collection of pamphlets, &c. to Christ Church. He left the bishop's son, Osborne, heir to his fortune.

ATTERBURY, Francis, bishop of Rochester, was born at Middleton Keynes, near Newport Pagnel, March 6, 1662; and after finishing his education at Westminster and Christ Church, he became known by his wit and his learning. His poetical abilities were early displayed; and as a defender of the protestant religion he also acquired celebrity. Though distinguished at Oxford as a scholar, and a tutor, he frequently complained of the hardship of his situation to his father, and at last followed his advice, by marrying miss Osborne, a lady in the neighbourhood, from whose distant relationship to the Leeds family he expected preferment. On leaving Oxford, he was elected lecturer of St. Bride's, London, 1691, and soon after made chaplain to William and Mary. With the eloquence of a popular preacher, he possessed the obstinacy of a controversialist, and therefore his works, when published, drew upon him the animadversions of Hoadly, of Bentley, and others. His zeal, however, in support of the rights of convocations, was rewarded by the thanks of the Lower House of Convocation, and by the degree of D.D. from Oxford. Preferment was now heaped upon him; sir John Trelawney, bishop of Exeter, gave him the archdeaconry of Totness, he became chaplain to queen Anne, and was, in 1704, raised to the deanry of Carlisle. In 1712, he was made dean of Christ Church, though power and influence were exerted in favor of Dr. Smalridge; and the following year he attained the height of his ecclesiastical dignity, by being made bishop of Rochester, and dean of Westminster. When George succeeded to the throne, the bishop was treated with coolness and he resented the affront, by refusing to sign the declaration of the bishops, and by opposing, in the parliament, with vigor and eloquence, the measures of the government. This decided and hostile behaviour proved the beginning of his misfortunes. He was suspected of favoring the pretender, and, August 24, 1722, he was arrested, and confined in the Tower. Though the messengers treated him with rudeness and harsh incivility while they secured his person and seized his papers, yet the council behaved towards him with that candor and affability, which justice and impartiality recommend. March 23, 1723, a bill was brought in the house of commons to inflict penalties on Francis bishop of Rochester, and he was ordered to prepare his defence. He declined using his influence among the commons, but, as he wrote to the speaker, he reserved the vindication of his conduct in that house of which he had the honor to be a member. The trial lasted above a week. The bishop was supported by all the learning of the bar, and he spoke in his own cause with all the energy of the persuasive powers which he was known to possess; but he was condemned, by a majority of 83 to 43 votes. The bishop met the disgrace of banishment with unusual firmness; he took an affectionate leave of his friends; and, June 18, 1723, he embarked in the Aldborough man of war, and was landed at Calais; where he met lord Bolingbroke, whom the royal pardon recalled to England, upon which he observed, with his usual facetiousness, "then his lordship and I are exchanged." In his exile, he was pursued with more vindictive rage that when in England. Access to him was denied to his family, without the king's sign manual, and the favor was with difficulty obtained from the extortion of high fees. He wished to pass the remainder of his life at Brussels; but he was hurried to Paris, where he had the prudence to resist the solicitations of the pretender. He was from thence carried to Montpellier, for two years; and on his return to Paris, worn out by the unkindness of the world, and domestic sorrow on the loss of his daughter, in 1729, he died, February 15, 1732. His body was brought over, and deposited in Westminster Abbey, in a monument which, in 1722, he had prepared; but no inscription marks the spot, as his friends were unwilling that his name should be recorded without mentioning that he died bishop of Rochester. He had by his lady four children. However blameable his conduct may appear as a politician, it is to be remembered, that those who have drawn his portrait have espoused a different cause. His good sense and his prudence forbid us to think that he formed any plot for the restoration of the Stuarts, to whom it is probable that he was attached from strong prejudices, from early habits, and from the temper of the times, which permit neutrality to no man; but it is certain, that he was offered the see of Winchester, and a pension of 5000*l.* if he would discontinue his opposition to the measures of Walpole, Walpole, and it is known that the rejection of this mean offer hastened his downfal. His private character as a man was most amiable and exemplary; as a preacher he was great and eloquent; and as a writer, his sermons, his letters, and other tracts, prove most decidedly that he possessed piety, genius, flow of language, and erudition.

AVALOS, Ferdinand Francis d', marquis of Pescara, in the service of Charles V. was taken prisoner at the battle of Ravenna, 1512, and employed the hours of his captivity in writing a dialogue of love, addressed to his wife, the virtuous Victoria Colonna. His abilities contributed much to the battle of Bicoque, the recovery of the Milanese, and the victory of Pavia. It is said that the pope wished to gain him to his cause by the promise of the kingdom of Naples. He died, without issue, at Milan, 1525, aged 36.

AVALOS, Alphonso d', marquis del Vasto, was the heir of the preceding. He assisted bravely the arms of Charles V. in Italy; but was defeated at Cerisoles, 1544, and died 1546, aged 42.

AVANTIO, John Marien, a learned civilian, who left Rovigo when his brother had been assassinated there, and settled at Padua. He died 1622, aged 58. He wrote a poem, and left a manuscript of an ecclesiastical history, and concilia de criminalibus rebus, &c.

AUBERT, Peter, a French lawyer, who died 1733, aged 91. He left to his native city, Lyons, where he had exercised various civil offices, his valuable library. He was author of retour d'isle d'amour, a romance, &c.

AUBERT DU BAYET, N. a French officer engaged in the American war. At the revolution, he favored the popular cause, in the national assembly, and was at the defence of Mentz, in 1793, and in the war of La Vendée. He was ambassador at Constantinople, and died of a fever, brought on by intemperance, 1797.

AUBERTIN, Edme, minister of the reformed church at Charenton, and afterwards at Paris, in 1631, died at Paris, 1652. He was author of a work on the eucharist of the ancient church, attacked by Arnauld and others.

AUBERY, or AUBRY, John, a physician of Bourbonnois, author, among other things, of a curious and learned work called l'antidote de l'amour, in 12mo. &c.

AUBERY, Anthony, a lawyer of Paris, remarkable for his uncommon application to study, from 5 in the morning till 6 in the evening. His works, the principal of which are, his history of Richelieu, 2 vols. fol. and of Mazarin, 4 vols. 12mo. are not possessed of superior merit. He died of a fall, 1695, aged upwards of 78.

AUBERY, Louis, sieur du Maurier, travelled with his father, who was ambassador to Holland, and visited Poland, Berlin, and Rome. After a few years passed at court, he led a life of philosophical ease at his country-seat, where he died, 1687. His memoirs on the history of Holland, 2 vols. 12mo. 1682, are often quoted, and are truly valuable. His grandson published memoirs of Hamburgh, Lubec, &c.

AUBESPINE, Charles de, chancellor of France, was an able statesman, but proud and haughty in his demeanor. He excited the jealousy of Richelieu and Mazarin, and, though the favorite of the court, was imprisoned for ten years; and died 1653, aged 73.

AUBIGNÉ, Theodore Agrippa d', a learned Frenchman, grandfather to Madame Maintenon. He is said to have translated the Crito of Plato into French when he was only eight years old; but the improvement of his mind was checked by the death of his father, when he had attained his 13th year, so that he forsook letters for the court, and became the favorite of Henry IV. He afterwards retired to Geneva, where his abilities were admired. His principal work is an histoire universelle, 3 vols. fol. which was publicly burnt by the parliament of Paris, because he treats the name of king with unbecoming harshness. He died at Geneva, 1630, in his 80th year.

AUBREY, John, an English antiquary, born at Easton-Piers in Wiltshire, 1625, and educated at Malmsbury, where he had for his school fellow the famous Hobbes. He entered as gentleman commoner of Trinity college Oxford, and, four years after, 1646, was admitted of the Middle Temple; but his father's death checked his studies; and the various litigations which he had in succeeding to his estates, not only reduced his property, but called him to more active pursuits. He distinguished himself in the Monasticon Anglicanum, and preserved the remembrance of Osney abbey by a curious draught before it was destroyed. After the restoration, he visited Ireland. After being twice shipwrecked, he left his country for a short tour to Orleans; but misfortunes crowded upon him so that he parted with all his estates, and at last was reduced to indigence. Lady Long, of Drayton, however, received him with hospitality, and he continued his indefatigable labors in pursuit of antiquities and of natural curiosities. He died suddenly about 1700. His works are chiefly on antiquities, consisting of miscellanies on apparitions, magic, charms, &c.

AUBRIOT, Hugo, a native of Burgundy famous as the builder of the Bastille by order of Charles V. of France, in 1369. He was accused of heresy, and became the founder of the sect which were called after him Hugonots, but for his error he was condemned to be confined for life between two bare walls, from which however he was set at liberty by the Maillotins. He died in Burgundy 1382.

AUBUSSON, Peter d', grand master of the order order of St. John of Jeruſalem, died at Rhodes, in 1503, aged 81, after having repeatedly ſignalized himſelf as a warrior againſt the beſieging Turks, and as a ſtateſman. He is blamed for betraying to the pope the brother of Bajazet, who had returned to Rhodes, truſting to his honor and protection. For this villainy he was made a cardinal.

AUDEBERT, Germain, a counſellor of Orleans, who, in a tour through Italy, celebrated Venice in a poem, for which he was honored by the Venetians with the order of St. Mark. He died 1598, aged above 80.

AUDEBERT, John Baptiſt, a French naturaliſt of Rochefort, 1759. As an engraver his merit was very great. He died 1800. His firſt performance was l'Hiſtoire des Singes, des makis, &c. 1 vol. fol. 1802.

AUDIFRET, Jean Baptiſte d', a native of Marſeilles, ambaſſador at Parma, Modena, Mantua, &c. He died at Nancy 1733, aged 76, author of an uſeful geography ancient and modern, in 3 vols. 4to.

AUDIGUIER, Vital d', a native of Villefranche, known for his adventures in queſt of independence. He was author of ſome romances, light poems, &c. 2 vols. 1614, and was aſſaſſinated 1630.

AUDLEY, James Lord, is diſtinguiſhed for his valor in the wars of France under Edward III. at the battle of Poitiers. For his ſervices, he was made by the Black prince conſtable of Glouceſter caſtle, governor of Aquitaine, and ſeneſchal of Poictou. He was one of the firſt knights of the garter, and died about 1386.

AUDLEY or AWDELEY, Thomas, of a noble family in Eſſex, was called to the bar after an education at the univerſity, and, in 1529, his merits raiſed him to the chair of the houſe of commons. He was ſo ſubſervient to the capricious Henry, that he not only received from him the ſcite of Chriſtchurch priory, with the plate, &c. belonging to it, but was appointed chancellor in the room of ſir Thomas More. He alſo ſat as judge at the trial of his diſhonored predeceſſor, and at that of biſhop Fiſher, and eaſily conſented to all the rapacious meaſures of his maſter. He was a great benefactor to Magdalen, Cambridge, and died 1544.

AUDRAN, Girard, ſon of an engraver of Lyons, perfected at Rome what he had learned at home, and gained ſuch reputation by his art, that he was eſteemed the moſt correct hiſtorical engraver that ever lived. Beſides Alexander's battles, he finiſhed ſix ſheets of the Cupola of Val-de-grace, from the deſigns of Mignard. He died 1703, aged 63.

AUDRAN, Claude, brother to Girard, an hiſtorical painter employed by le Brun. He died at Paris 1684, aged 42, profeſſor of the academy of painting.

AUDRAN, John, nephew of Girard, an engraver of Lyons. His principal works were the draught of fiſhes and the reſurrection of Lazarus, from Jouvenet; the rape of the Sabines from Pouſſin; the coronation of Mary de Medicis; the departure of Henry IV. for Germany, &c. He died 1756, aged 89. This family has been particularly diſtinguiſhed by painters and engravers.

AVED, Jacques-André Joſeph, a painter of eminence, ſon of a phyſician of Douai. A portrait of the ambaſſador of the Porte preſented to Lewis XV. procured him diſtinction. He died at Paris 1766, aged 64.

AVEIRO, Joſeph, duke of, a Portugueſe noble, who conſpired with the Jeſuits againſt king Joſeph I. and, after ſhooting at the king, was ſeized and broke on the wheel, 1759.

AVENPACA, a Spaniſh moor, and peripatetic philoſopher, in the 12th century, who attempted to reconcile and explain the Koran by the ſyſtem of Ariſtotle.

AVELAR, a Portugueſe painter, who became ſo rich by his profeſſion, that his name became proverbial.

AVENTIN, John, was born of obſcure parents, 1460, at Abenſperg in Bavaria, and, after being profeſſor of the learned languages at Vienna and Cracow, he was made tutor to the duke of Bavaria's children, and encreaſed his reputation by writing the annals of Bavaria, firſt publiſhed in 1554, by Jerome Zieglerus. In 1529, Aventin was violently ſeized, it is ſuppoſed, on a complaint of hereſy, but as no charge was made againſt him, he was releaſed from his captivity, and, though now 64, he began to think of marriage. In the effervescence of a heated brain he conſulted his bible, and determined to take the firſt woman he met, which proved to be his own maid, deformed and ill-tempered. By her he had a ſon, who died young, and a daughter who ſurvived him. He died 1534, aged 68. He has been ſuſpected by the Jeſuits of being a Lutheran in diſguiſe, but the imputation is againſt his writings and not againſt his religion, as he ſpeaks with freedom of the libertiniſm of the catholic clergy.

AVERANIUS, Joſeph, a native of Florence, who acquired very rapidly an intimate knowledge of the learned languages, of mathematics and philoſophy, and of law. Beſides tranſlating Archimedes, in his leiſure hours, he aſcertained the momentum of bodies on inclined planes, defended Galileo's philoſophy, and enquired into the ſwiftneſs and propagation of ſound. As a lawyer he was patronized by Coſmo III. de Medicis, who made him profeſſor of civil law at Piſa. He died 1738, aged 76.

AVERANIUS, Benedict, eldeſt brother of the preceding, was born at Florence 1645. He was well acquainted with Plato and Ariſtotle, and he alſo cultivated poetry, but, by the direction of his father, he ſtudied juriſprudence at Piſa, and in 1676, he was made Greek profeſſor, and 6 years after raiſed to the chair of humanity. He was univerſally reſpected for his learning, ſo that he was ſolicited by the univerſity university of Pavia to accept a profeſſor's chair, and alſo by pope Innocent XI. who admired his genius. To improve his ſtile he tranſlated Salluſt, Celſus, and other Latin authors, into Greek, and wrote Greek elegies. He died 1707. His diſſertations and other works, were printed after his death in 3 vols. fol. at Florence 1717.

AVERDY, Clement Charles de l', a native of Paris, miniſter and comptroller of the finances under Lewis XV. was at one time the favorite of the people. Though he introduced the reform of abuſes, his endeavors proved abortive in the midſt of a luxurious court, and in 1764, the meaſures which he was forced to recommend proved ſo unpopular, that he ſolicited and obtained his diſmiſſion. He retired to his country ſeat, where the revolution found him engaged in agricultural purſuits, and regardleſs of the politics and the prejudices of party. The recollection of his ſervices was too powerful to ſuffer him to end his days in privacy; he was ſuſpected, and conſequently condemned and guillotined 1794, aged 74. He was author of the Code penal,—the king's ſovereignty over Britany, &c.

AVERROES, an Arabian philoſopher born at Corduba, where his father was judge, under the emperor of Morocco. His knowledge of law, divinity, mathematics, and aſtrology was very extenſive, and to this was added the theory rather than the practice of medicine. After being profeſſor at Morocco he was called away to ſucceed his father as judge in Corduba, and ſoon after he was inveſted with the ſame powers in Morocco and Mauritania. He poſſeſſed a firmneſs and patience of mind, which could diſtinguiſh and inveſtigate the bias of human paſſions, and he was humane and liberal, ſo that the opulence which he derived from his marriage and from his poſts was not heaped up, but generouſly diſperſed for the relief of indigence and ſtarving merit. The attacks of malice, however, have too often prevailed, and Averroes is in the number of thoſe whom ſuperior virtues have not always ſhielded. Repreſented by the nobility of Corduba, to Manſor king of Morocco as a profane philoſopher and a heretic, he was impriſoned; but while many urged the neceſſity of capital puniſhment on ſo great an offender; it was agreed by the doctors whom the monarch conſulted that Averroes ſhould retract. He was accordingly conducted to the gate of the moſque, bareheaded, where every one who entered indignantly ſpit into his face; after which he was aſked by the doctors if he repented of his hereſy, to which he replied Yes, and was diſcharged. He continued under diſgrace till the king diſcovered that his ſucceſſor did not poſſeſs the ſame uprightneſs and that the dignity of the law could be ſupported by none better than by Averroes. He was therefore reſtored to all his honors; glad to find his innocence acknowledged by the people and the monarch. He died at Morocco 1206. In his private life Averroes was regular, and devoted much of his time to philoſophical purſuits. He grew very corpulent, ſo that he eat but once a day. He was particularly fond of Ariſtotle, on whoſe works he wrote commentaries, and for which he was called the commentator. The medical works of Averroes are ſcarce and above mediocrity, and of his numerous verſes on amorous and light ſubjects very few remain. He looked back upon his youthful follies with regret; and though a Mahometan in religion, he exclaimed in the ſpirit of a Chriſtian, "Would to God I had been born old, or that in my youth I had been in a ſtate of perfection."

AUGER, Edmund, a Jeſuit, whoſe eloquence is ſaid to have converted 40,000 proteſtants to the catholic faith. His diſintereſtedneſs was ſuch that he refuſed promotion to a biſhopric. He died 1591, aged 61.

AUGURELLI, John Aurelius, a poet and philoſopher. He was profeſſor of literature at Venice, and it was ſaid of him by Paulus Jovius that he had a great genius in a little body. He ruined himſelf by pretending that he had diſcovered the philoſopher's ſtone ſo that Leo X. to whom he dedicated his beſt poem called Chryſopœa, gave him a large empty purſe, adding, he who can make gold wants nothing but a place to keep it in. He died 1524, aged 83.

AUGUSTIN, Anthony, a native of Saragoſſa, employed by the pope as ambaſſador to England 1554, and afterwards as his agent at the council of Trent. In 1574 he was made archbiſhop of Tarragona, and died 1586. He was author of ſome treatiſes and of dialogues on medals.

AUGUSTINE or AUSTIN, Saint, firſt archbiſhop of Canterbury, was ſent with 40 others by pope Gregory I. from Rome to convert the Britons to chriſtianity, and he landed in the iſle of Thanet about the year 596. He fixed his ſeat at Canterbury, and by the directions of the pope he uſed with moderation his new converts, by permitting them ſtill to aſſemble in the temples which were now converted to Chriſtian churches, and by only deſtroying the idols to which they paid the moſt ſolemn worſhip. The converſion of the whole nation, however, was a work of difficulty. Auſtin found adverſaries unwilling to yield to argument, and probably the diſreſpect which he ſhewed to the Britons in receiving their deputies ſitting, irritated againſt his doctrines a people naturally ſuperſtitious, and ſtrongly attached to the religious tenets of their forefathers. Auſtin died at Canterbury 604.

AUHADI-MARAGAH, a Muſſulman poet who put into verſe the Giam-giam, a book full of Mahometan ſpirituality. He was enriched by the preſents of the emperor of the Tartars in 1319. His tomb is held in great veneration at Iſpahan.

AVICENNA, a famous Mahometan phyſician

ſician and philoſopher, who early applied himſelf to literature, to botany, arithmetic, and mathematics. At the age of 16 he was ſo far acquainted with phyſic that he viſited patients and that he might ſtill more improve his underſtanding, he ſtudied Ariſtotle's metaphyſics, which after reading 40 times, he gave up in deſpair as unintelligible, till by accident he met a beggar that offered him to ſale a treatiſe of Al Farabius on metaphyſics, which clearly opened to him the ſenſe and the meaning of the Grecian philoſopher, after which he had ſo long labored in vain. He now acquired credit as a phyſician by curing the king of Khoraſſan, but his enemies raiſed a perſecution againſt him, when the monarch's library was deſtroyed by fire, as he was accuſed of the miſchief, that he might arrogate to himſelf all the learning which he had received from books. Some aſſert that all his celebrity aroſe from the ſuperior talents of his maſter, to whom his mother had bound him as a ſervant on pretence of being deaf. The old man, as it is ſaid, admired his fidelity, and left his papers open to his view, which the crafty pupil copied and ſent to his mother, and after his maſter's death publiſhed as the reſult of his own knowledge and experience. In the opinion of Dr. Friend, who muſt be conſidered as a judge, Avicenna had few merits, his writings are extracts from Galen, and others, and he often confuſes the nature or deſcription of a diſeaſe by an affected diſplay of learned terms. Avicenna died 1036 in his 56th year, with the character of a learned man but too much addicted to wine and to effeminate pleaſures. His books on medicine, &c. were in number about 100, now nearly all loſt.

AVILA, Louis' d', a native of Placentia, general under Charles V. at the ſiege of Metz 1552, of which the defence was conducted by the duke of Guiſe. He wrote memoirs of the African war, and of the wars of Charles V. againſt the proteſtants of Germany.

AVILER, Auguſtin Charles d', a native of Paris, taken by the Algerine pirates as he was ſailing from Marſeilles to Rome. During his two years of captivity at Tunis he merited the thanks of the dey by producing the much admired plan of the moſque there, and on regaining his liberty he viſited Rome, and afterwards beautified Montpellier by the erection of a magnificent gate in honor of Lewis XIV. He died at Montpellier 1700, aged 47. He wrote a courſe of architecture in two vols. 4to.

AUNGERVILLE, Richard, a native of St. Edmunſbury, Suffolk, educated at Oxford. He was tutor to Edward III. and was raiſed to the ſee of Durham 1333, and in 1334 made lord chancellor, and two years after treaſurer. He was not only learned but the munificent patron of learned men, and founded a library at Oxford. He wrote Philobiblos or the right uſe of books, and died at Durham 1345, aged 74.

AUNOY, Marie Catherine Jumelle de Berneville Counteſs d', widow of count d'Aunoy, and niece of madame Deſloges, is known as a voluminous writer of Romances in a careleſs ſtile, and with much affectation of the ſupernatural and marvellous. Her adventures of earl of Douglaſs and tales of the Fairies, are her beſt pieces. Her huſband was accuſed of treaſon, and with difficulty cleared himſelf. One of his three accuſers afterwards through remorſe of conſcience confeſſed the charge to be falſe. She died 1705.

AVOGARDI, Lucia Albani, an Italian poeteſs of Bergamo. Her pieces poſſeſſed ſuch merit, that Taſſo became her commentator. She died at Breſcia, where ſhe married a Venetian nobleman.

AURELLI or ARELLI, John Mutio, a Latin poet, who cloſely imitated Catullus, but without following his feeble or indecent parts. He was made by Leo X. governor of a place where he was found dead ſoon after with his mule at the bottom of a well, 1520; and it is ſuppoſed that his oppreſſion had drawn upon him this puniſhment from the inhabitants.

AURENG-ZEB, great mogul, conſpired with Moradone of his brothers againſt his father Shah-Gehan at Agra, and kept in him confinement till he cauſed him to be poiſoned by one of his phyſicians. His brothers were deſtroyed with equal cruelty, and he became maſter of a large dominion, which he extended by the conqueſt of Decan, Viſapour, and nearly the whole Indian peninſula. A power acquired by perfidy and bloodſhed, was maintained with vigor, and though Aureng-Zeb, did not eſcape the tortures of a reproaching conſcience, he was mild in his manners, and conſulted the good of his ſubjects. As he had been cruel to his father, he dreaded retaliation from his ſons, and lived himſelf conſtantly in his camp, in the midſt of his ſoldiers. He died at Ahmednager, 1707, aged 89.

AURIA, Vincent, a native of Palermo, wrote ſeveral works in Latin and in Italian, the moſt eſteemed of which are his hiſtory of the great men of Sicily, in 4to. and his hiſtory of the viceroys of Sicily, fol. He died 1710, aged 85.

AURIGNY, Gilles d', an ingenious French poet of the 16th century, of whoſe private character little is known. His tuteur d'amour is a chef d'œuvre for fancy, eaſe, and elegance.

AURIGNY, Hyacinthe Robillard d', a Jeſuit of Caen, regent of the college of Alençon. He wrote ſome chronological memoirs on hiſtory, valuable for their accuracy. He died 1719, in his 44th year.

AURILLON, Jean Baptiſte Elie, a native of Paris, admired for his eloquence in the pulpit, and his learning. He was author of ſome divinity tracts, and died 1729, aged 78.

AURIOL, Blaiſe d', a profeſſor of the canon law at Toulouſe, is known by ſome poetical pieces, and treatiſes. He was ſo terrified at the prediction of a deluge, by a pretended prophet of his time, that he built himſelf a large ark in which like Noah, he hoped to ſurvive the general calamity. He died 1540.

AURISPA, John, a native of Noto in Sicily, patroniſed and preferred by Nicholas V. He tranſlated Archimedes, Hierocles' commentary on Pythagoras's golden verſes, &c. and died at Ferrara, at the end of the 15th century.

AUROGALLUS, Matthew, a native of Bohemia, profeſſor at Wittemberg, and aſſiſtant to Luther in tranſlating the bible into German. He publiſhed a Chaldee and Hebrew grammar, and died 1543.

AUSTIN, William, a barriſter of Lincoln's Inn, author of hæc homo, or the excellency of women, partly extracted from Agrippa's book de nobilitate, &c. He wrote alſo meditations on the feaſts and faſts of the church, 1637.

AUTEROCHE, Jean Chappe d', was born at Mauriac, and early diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his rapid progreſs in learning, which was aided by the advantages of rank and opulence. The principal of his college mentioned him to Caſſini, he was therefore employed to ſurvey the royal buildings, and he advanced his reputation by tranſlating Halley's works, and diſplayed the accuracy of his calculations in his obſervations on the two comets which appeared in 1760. The tranſit of Venus over the ſun's diſk, on the ſixth of June 1761, added ſtill to his popularity. While Pinge was ſent to the iſle of Roderigo, the abbé Auteroche braved the rigors of the north, and fixed upon Tobolſk, the capital of Siberia, as the place for his obſervations. The appearance of the philoſopher with his mathematical apparatus was viewed by the barbarian natives with terror, ſo that the governor was obliged to protect his perſon with a guard; but the cauſe of ſcience triumphed, and the aſtronomer, who made his obſervations in the preſence of the archbiſhop of Tobolſk, and other men of ſcience, immediately diſpatched a courier to Paris with the reſult. So much intrepidity for the advancement of philoſophy did not paſs unnoticed by the empreſs of Ruſſia; the abbé was invited to Peterſburg, where the higheſt academical honors were to attend his ſettlement. The liberal offers were however rejected by the independent Frenchman, who prepared, in 1769, to view another tranſit of Venus, and croſſed the Atlantic for the coaſt of California, which was the place moſt favorable for obſervation. A peſtilential diſeaſe had ſpread devaſtation over the country, but the abbé fearleſs of danger landed at St. Joſeph, determined there to make his aſtronomical remarks; againſt the advice of his friends. The 3d of June, the wiſhed-for day arrived, the obſervations were completed, and the diſorder ſeemed to reſpect the perſon of the abbé; but however, three days after he was attacked. Yet he might have ſtruggled againſt the diſeaſe, had he not imprudently expoſed himſelf to the air, in obſerving an eclipſe of the moon, on the very day that he took phyſic. His fate was now decided, he grew worſe, and died Auguſt 1ſt, 1769, in his 49th year, a remarkable inſtance of indefatigable application, unfortunately ſacrificed to a too eager purſuit after knowledge. His papers were preſented to the world by young Caſſini.

AUTHON, John d', abbot of Angle in Poitou, was hiſtoriographer to Lewis XII. His hiſtory of France from 1490 to 1508 is very circumſtantial and entertaining, though he is blamed by ſome for a coolneſs of narration, and a diſintereſting detail of trifles occaſionally interſperſed with improbable facts. He died 1523.

AUTREAU, Jacques d', a painter of Paris, who, at the age of 60, began to write for the ſtage. His pieces were favorably received, and though deficient in intricacy of plot and action, yet they were admired for vivacity, eaſe, and comic ſpirit. The beſt known of his pictures was his Diogenes with a lanthern in ſearch of an honeſt man, which he finds in a repreſentation of cardinal de Fleury. Autreau lived in retirement, happy in his poverty. He died at Paris, 1745, in the hoſpital of incurables.

AUVERGNE, Anthony d', a native of Clermont, director of the opera at Paris, and known as a very eminent compoſer, whoſe works are held in the higheſt admiration. He died at Lyons 1797, aged 84.

AUVIGNY, N. Caſtres d', a man of great genius, born in the Hainaut, and intimate with l'abbé des Fontaines, who nurtured and directed his taſte. He was killed at the battle of Dettingen 1743, in his 31ſt year. His writings were numerous for his age, and all on hiſtorical ſubjects, the moſt admired of which are his lives of illuſtrious Frenchmen, 8 vols. 12mo.—hiſtory of Paris, 4 vols. 12mo.—beſides memoires of madame Barneveldt, 2 vols. 12mo.

AUZONT, Adrian, a native of Rouen, known as a mathematician. He is ſaid to be the inventor of the micrometer in 1667, the merit of which however is claimed alſo by the Engliſh. He firſt ſuggeſted the idea of applying the teleſcope to the aſtronomical quadrant, though ſome attribute it to Picard. He died 1691.

AXERETO or ASSERETO, Blaiſe, a celebrated Genoeſe admiral who defeated Alphonſo V. of Arragon, in a naval battle 1435, and took him priſoner.

AXTEL, Daniel, a colonel in the parliamentary army. He was ſtrongly infected with the puritanical tenets of the times, and from a grocer he became a ſoldier, and by his good conduct roſe to the place of colonel. He was employed at the trial of the king, and his behaviour ſhowed that he had not preſerved much much reverence for fallen majesty. He afterwards went to Ireland, but being dissatisfied with the conduct of Henry Cromwell, he gave in his resignation, till the restoration of the old parliament called him again to action. He was however opposed by Monk, and after supporting general Lambert against Ingoldsby, he was obliged to fly, but was soon taken and committed to the tower. He was the 50th of the 52 excepted from the bill of indemnity, and he was accordingly tried as being concerned in the king's murder, and was sentenced to be hanged at Tyburn. Axtel in his last moments showed great firmness of mind, and attempted to justify his conduct to the spectators. His head was set up at the end of Westminster hall, and the limbs exposed in other places. He left a widow with seven children, for whom he had provided in his prosperity.

AYESHA, daughter of Abubeker, was the most beloved of the wives of Mahomet, though she bore him no child. After his death she opposed the succession of Ali, but, though violent, her character was respected, and when taken prisoner she was dismissed without injury. She died 677, aged 67.

AYLESBURY, sir Thomas, a native of London educated at Westminster school and Christchurch. His abilities as a mathematician and man of science recommended him to Buckingham, by whose influence he was made a baronet, and master of the mint. During the civil wars he suffered much from the parliament, and on the king's death he retired to Flanders, where he died 1657. In his public character he was a great patron of literature; and among his friends particularly was Thomas Harriot, and also Thomas Allen who entrusted his MSS. to his confidential care.

AYLESBURY, William, son of the preceding, was educated at Westminster school and Christchurch. Charles I. who knew his merits, appointed him tutor to the young duke of Buckingham, and his brother lord Francis Villiers, with whom he travelled, and on his return was made groom of the royal chamber, and encouraged to translate d'Avila's history of the civil wars of France. The civil wars reduced him from comfortable independence to poverty, and he passed to Jamaica, where he died 1657.

AYLETT, Robert, a master in chancery, of Trinity hall, Cambridge, L. L. D. 1614, wrote Susanna or the arraignment of the two elders in 8vo.—divine and moral speculations in verse, &c.

AYLMER, John, was born at Aylmer-hall in Norfolk 1521, and patronised by the duke of Suffolk, who maintained him at Cambridge, and made him tutor to his children, among whom was lady Jane Grey He espoused the cause of the reformation, and was instrumental in converting many of the people in Leicestershire; but when Mary came to the throne, he fled to Strasburg and Zurich till the elevation of Elizabeth recalled him home. He was one of the eight divines appointed to dispute with the same number of catholics; but though his learning was great, he received little preferment, because it is said he had reflected upon the indolence of the bishops. At last he was made bishop of London; but it is a strong reflection on his character, that he sued for dilapidations his predecessor, who had been warm in his recommendation of him to a diocese, and recovered 900l. or 1000l. During the plague, the bishop's humanity was eminently conspicuous. By his orders the sick were visited by his clergy, every possible comfort was liberally administered, and books with directions to prevent the spreading of the contagion were freely circulated at his expence. In his last years he wished to exchange his diocese for Ely or Winchester, but when this could not be effected, he hoped to resign in favor of Dr. Bancroft, which the latter rejected. He died at Fulham 1594, aged 73. He was a man of great learning, strong sense, of a warm independent temper, eloquent and popular as a preacher, and as a bishop rigid in enforcing punctuality and subordination, so that the puritans and anabaptists have described him as intolerable in his conduct, virulent in his language, and tyrannical over his inferiors. He has been accused of avarice in cutting down the woods which belonged to his diocese, to the amount of 1000l. to the hurt of his successor, and in consequence of a representation to the council of the circumstance, the queen enjoined him to desist. He was author of an answer to Knox's blast against the empire of women.

AYLOFFE, sir Joseph, bart. descended of an ancent Saxon family, was educated at Westminster school, and St. John's college, Oxford, and became eminent for his learning and his knowledge of the history and antiquities of his country. He intended to write the history of Suffolk, but he dropped the intention from the deficiency of the materials promised to him, and in 1747 he circulated proposals for a translation of the French encyclopædia with additions and a large collection of articles concerning the history and antiquities of Great Britain, but after the first volume was published, the work was laid aside for want of sufficient patronage. Sir Joseph was elected vice-president of the antiquarian society. He died at Lambeth 1781, aged 72. Besides various papers in the Archæologia, he published calendars of the ancient charters in the Tower of London, 4to.—additions of Leland's collectanea, 9 vols. 8vo.—Hearne's curious discourses, 2 vols. 8vo. &c.

AYLON, Luke Vasques d', a Spaniard, engaged in the discovery and conquest of America. He made an expedition into Florida 1520, and is supposed to have perished in a second voyage to the same place.

AYMAR, James, a peasant of Dauphiné, who acquired some reputation by pretending to discover secrets, hidden treasures, robberies, &c. by means of a sacred wand. He died 1708, in his 46th year.

Aymon, John, a Piedmontese, who embraced the tenets of Calvin in Holland, and afterwards returned to the Romish church. He was permitted access to the king's library at Paris, but he dishonorably conveyed away some of the books, and among others the manuscript original of the synod of Jerusalem held 1672. He wrote an ecclesiastical history &c.

Ayres, John, an English penman of considerable eminence. He was in the household of sir William Ashurst lord mayor of London 1694, to whom he dedicated his arithmetic made easy, of which a 12th edition appeared 1714. He lived at the hand and pen in St. Paul's church yard, where he published several other works on penmanship.

Ayrmin or Ayermin, William, a native of Lincolnshire, chancellor of England, and afterwards treasurer. He was ambassador at Rome, where, he obtained the nomination to the vacant bishopric of Norwich from the pope, which so offended the king that he refused for a long time to admit him to his see. He died about 1337.

Ayscough, George Edward, an officer in the foot guards, distinguished by his literary accomplishments. He wrote Semiramis a tragedy, 1777, and on his return from the continent, which he visited for the benefit of his health, he published letters with some account of France and Italy. He fell a victim to a rapid consumption, 1779.

Ayscough, Samuel, an indefatigable compiler, born at Nottingham, where his education was begun under the care of Mr. John son, till the misfortunes of his father rendered his further progress in learning impossible. From the mean occupation of servant in a mill, young Ayscough was drawn by the friendship of a school fellow, and admitted into the British museum. He made here a correct catalogue of the MSS. of the collection. He also assisted in the arrangement of the papers in the tower, and made an index to the first 56 vols. of the Gentleman's Magazine, to the Monthly Review, to the British Cri to Shakespeare, and to other popular wo He wrote besides remarks on the letters o American farmer, &c. He was for some ti curate of St. Giles's in the Fields, and he gan in 1790 to preach the Fairchild lect on Whit-tuesday, before the Royal Socie for 14 years. In 1804 the lord chancel gave him the living of Cudham in Kent, the appointment came too late for he died next year.

Ayscue, sir George, a gallant English miral descended from an ancient family in L colnshire. He was knighted by Charles but in the civil wars he declared for the co monwealth. In 1651 he reduced Barbado and the next year he defeated a Dutch fle and soon after, he retired from the service command the fleet of Charles Gustavus k of Sweden. After the restoration he was p moted in the English navy, and in 1666 co manded the Royal Prince, the largest ship the world; when, during a desperate fight four days with the Dutch fleet, he unfor nately struck on the Galloper sand, and w against his will, obliged by his crew to surr der. The Dutch, proud of their capti carried him from town to town as a specta to the people. Sir George after this ne went again to sea, but died in retirement.

Azevedo, Ignatius, a Portuguese Je born 1527. He relinquished the indep dence of a large fortune to embark as a m sionary to India. The vessel, in which he w was attacked by pirates, and he and his companions were massacred by the barbar enemy 1570, near Palma. This cruel ev was lamented through Europe, and Aze do was proclaimed a martyr by a pa bull.

Azorius, John, a native of Lucca n Carthagena, eminent as a public professor Alcala and at Rome. He wrote Institution moralium, 3 vols. folio. and died at Ro 1603.

Azzolini, Laurence, secretary to p Urban VIII. and bishop of Narni, d 1532. He wrote an admired satire aga debauchery.

B.

BAA BAA

Baahdin, Mahomet Gebet Amuli, a learned Persian, author of a summary of civil and canon law.

Baan, John de, a Dutch painter born at Haerlem 1633. Charles II. and all the royal family were painted by him. After some residence in England, he went to Italy, and patronised by the grand duke of Tuscany. talents were so great that he excited the j lousy of inferior artists, and one of them ne ly succeeded in stabbing him to the heart. ingenious man died at Amsterdam, 1702.

ſon James, was alſo an artiſt of eminence, who followed William at the revolution, and died 1700 aged 27.

BAART, Peter, a Latin and Flemiſh poet author of the Flemiſh georgics, a poem in imitation of Virgil, highly commended by his countrymen. He wrote alſo another poem called le Triton de Friſe.

BABA, a Turkiſh impoſtor. He announced himſelf in 1260, as the meſſenger of God; and collected a number of adherents, at whoſe head he laid waſte Natolia. He was at laſt overpowered and his ſect diſperſed.

BABEK, a Perſian, who in 823 aſſembled ſome followers, with whom he defeated the troops of Almamon. He was conquered, and after being led about on an elephant through the ſtreets, his hands and legs were cut off, and he expired in the midſt of the greateſt agonies.

BABEUF, Francis Noel, a native of St. Quintin. He was at firſt a menial ſervant, and next became an attorney, and in the beginning of the French revolution he eſcaped from the priſon of Arras, where his diſhoneſty had immured him, to come to Paris, where he publiſhed a paper called the tribune of the people. By diſſeminating the moſt pernicious principles he continued popular, and on the fall of Robeſpierre, he was regarded as a proper perſon to ſucceed the tyrant, and to guide the deſtinies of France. His profligate character was at laſt denounced by his accomplices, and condemned to the guillotine. He ſuffered with great compoſure 1797 aged 37. An account of his trial, in which he diſplayed great eloquence and firmneſs of mind, has been publiſhed in 3 vols. 8vo.

BABINGTON, Gervaſe, a native of Nottinghamſhire, educated at Trinity college Cambridge. He was raiſed to the ſee of Llandaff, and tranſlated to Hereford; and in 1597 to Worceſter. He was a great benefactor to the cathedral library at Worceſter. He died of the jaundice 1610. He wrote notes on the five books of Moſes, and expoſitions of the creed, &c. beſides ſermons, &c.

BABINGTON, Anthony, a native of Derbyſhire, known in Engliſh hiſtory for his conſpiracy to aſſaſſinate queen Elizabeth, and to procure the releaſe of Mary of Scots, who he hoped would reward her deliverer by taking him to ſhare her throne. The plot was diſcovered by Walſingham, and the conſpirators ſuffered death 1586.

BACAI, a learned muſſulman, who died 885, of the hegira. He is author of ſeveral treatiſes on ancient philoſophers, on divination by numbers, a commentary on the koran, &c.

BACCALAR-Y-SANNA, Vincent, marquis of St. Philip, a native of Sardinia, who wrote the monarchy of the Hebrews, tranſlated into French, 4 vols. 12mo.—and Memoirs of Philip V. 4 vols. 12mo. He died at Madrid 1726.

BACCALI, a learned Mahometan, ſurnamed from his learning, the ornament of the doctors. He wrote a book on the prayers of the Muſſulmans, on the glory and excellence of the Arabs. He died 562 of the hegira.

BACCELLI, Jerome, a native of Florence, who tranſlated the Odyſſey into Italian 1558. He died before the completion of his tranſlation of the Iliad.

BACCHINI, Benedict, a benedictine of Parma, author of a literary journal. He became librarian and hiſtoriographer to the duke of Modena, and afterwards filled the chair of eccleſiaſtical hiſtory with ability. He publiſhed ſeveral very learned works, and made a collection for the hiſtory of the houſe of Eſte. He died 1721, aged 70.

BACCIO, Andreas, a native of Ancona, phyſician to pope Sixtus V. He wrote ſome learned and valuable treatiſes, de venenis et antidotis; de gemmis, de thermis, de naturali vinorum hiſtoriâ, &c.

BACCIO, Francis Bartholomew, an hiſtorical and portrait painter of Florence, who died 1517, aged 48.

BACH, John Sebaſtian, a German muſician, in the ſervice of the duke of Saxe Weimar, and eminent for his ſkill in playing on the organ. He died at Leipſic 1754, aged 69.

BACHAUMON, Lewis Petit de, a native of Paris, author of ſecret memoirs, to elucidate the hiſtory of literature in France, in 36 vols. 12mo. and other works. He died 1771.

BACHELIER, Nicholas, an architect and ſculptor, who after ſtudying at Rome introduced at Toulouſe and Lucca the graceful and eaſy manner of his maſter Angelo. He died after 1553.

BACHINI, Bernardine, a Benedictine, born at Borgo San Domino. He compoſed ſome valuable books in Latin and Italian, a literary journal from 1686 to 1697, 9 vols. 4to. &c. and died at Bologna 1721, aged 70.

BACICI, John Baptiſte Gauli, a native of Genoa who, at the age of 14, entered into the ſervice of a dealer of pictures at Rome, where he was patroniſed and inſtructed by Bernini. He became eminent as a painter, and particularly diſtinguiſhed himſelf by drawing the portrait of a man dead for 20 years, whoſe features he gradually collected from the information of ſurviving friends, ſo that at laſt he produced a moſt perfect reſemblance. Though bold in his ideas and great in his colorings and his foreſhortening, Bacici is blamed for incorrectneſs, and for want of taſte in his draperies. The violence of his temper proved fatal to his family, in reproving his ſon before his companions he gave him a blow on the face, which ſo irritated the youth that he threw himſelf into the Tiber, and left his father inconſolable. He died 1709, in his 70th year.

BACKER, James, a Dutch portrait painter, who died 1560, aged 30.

BACKER, Jacob, a portrait painter born at Henlingen. His pieces are much admired. He died 1651, aged 42.

Backhouse, William, a Berkſhire gentleman, educated at Chriſtchurch. He left Oxford, and devoted himſelf to alchemy and aſtrology, and had among his pupils and friends Aſhmole, who called him father. He died 1662. He was author of the pleaſant fountain of knowledge, from the French, 8vo. 1644—the complaint of nature—the golden fleece, &c.—and he alſo invented the inſtrument called the Way-wiſer.

Backhuysen, Ludolph, a painter of Embden, whoſe ſea pieces were much admired. He died 1709 aged 78.

Bacon, Robert, an Engliſh friar known at Oxford as divinity profeſſor. He viſited Paris, and in 1233 was made treaſurer of Saliſbury cathedral. He wrote among other things the life of St. Edmund the primate, and died 1248.

Bacon, Roger, was born near Ilcheſter, of a reſpectable family 1214. He was educated at Oxford, and viſited Paris, the reſort of the learned of the times, and after taking the degree of doctor, and becoming monk of the Franciſcan order 1240, he returned to his native country. His ſtrong inquiſitive mind was liberally ſupported by the munificence of his friends, among whom were biſhop Groſtete, Rich the primate, Shirwood, &c. and he made the moſt rapid ſtrides in the advancement of ſcience and philoſophy. His experiments were ſo far above the comprehenſion of his age, that he was accuſed of magic; the monks of his order grew jealous of his reputation, his works were rejected from their library, and the principal of the order was prevailed upon to impriſon him. In his confinement Bacon compoſed his "Opus majus," addreſſed to the pope, in which he hoped to prevail upon the pontiff to reform the errors of the church. At laſt, after ten years of painful ſolitude, he was ſet at liberty by the interference of his friends, and by his application to the general of his order, Jerom d'Aſcoli, who was lately raiſed to the papal chair, to whom he inſcribed his treatiſe "on the means of avoiding the infirmities of old age." The remainder of his life was ſpent in academical repoſe at Oxford, where he died 1294. Bacon is univerſally allowed to have been a man of ſuperior merit, and the vaſt acquirements of his mind in a barbarous age ſtrongly evince with what ſucceſs perſeverance may labor in the road of learning. The more accurate experiments of the moderns pay daily tributes of gratitude to this father of philoſophy, and it is now manifeſt that to his comprehenſive mind were known many of the ſecrets which the repeated efforts of ſucceeding ages have ſcarce brought to light. He was acquainted with the ſtructure of an air pump, with the laws of optics, and the power of glaſſes; he knew the preparation of phoſphorus, and he clothed, in unintelligible language the name of gunpowder, which he ſaid was formed with ſulphur, nitre, and charcoal, as if he anticipated the devaſtation which its diſcovery by Schwart, ſome ages after, was to bring upon mankind. In his writings amounting to above 80 treatiſes, ſome of which are publiſhed and ſome preſerved in manuſcript he uſed an elegant and nervous ſtyle. His great knowledge in chemiſtry has been moſt ſatisfactorily proved by the experiments of Homberg.

Bacon, ſir Nicholas, keeper of the great ſeal under Elizabeth, and the deſcendant of an ancient Suffolk family, was born 1510. He was of Corpus Chriſti college, Cambridge, and ſtudied the law at Gray's Inn. He was employed under Henry VIII. to whom he propoſed a plan never adopted, for the erecting of a college to inſtruct young ſtateſmen in all the branches of political knowledge. He was knighted by Elizabeth, and made keeper of the ſeals, but as he favored the Suffolk ſucceſſion he was treated with coldneſs, and ſuſpected of aſſiſting Hales in writing a tract againſt the rights of the queen of Scotland. He was ſoon after reinſtated in the queen's good opinion by the interference of ſir William Cecil, and he died 1579.

Bacon, Anne, ſecond daughter of ſir Anthony Cook, preceptor to king Edward VI. and wife of the preceding, was eminent for her learning and virtues. She tranſlated from the Italian into Engliſh Ochine's ſermons, and Jewel's apology for the church of England, from the Latin.

Bacon, Francis, viſcount St. Alban's, was ſon of ſir Nicholas Bacon mentioned above, and was born at York-houſe in the Strand, 1561. He was early introduced at court; and after ſtudying at Trinity college, Cambridge, he accompanied, though little more than 16, ſir Amias Pawlet, ambaſſador to the court of France. During his travels, his father died; and as he found himſelf not maſter of the independence which he expected, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of law at Gray's Inn; and, by the means of lord Burleigh, he obtained at court the reverſion of the regiſterſhip to the ſtar chamber, worth 1600*l.* a year, which, however, he did not enjoy till twenty years after. Whilſt at Gray's Inn, where he was choſen Lent-reader, he formed the plan of his great philoſophical work, the inſtauration of the ſciences; but neither his learning nor his abilities recommended him at court, as the favors of the queen were divided between the Cecils and the earl of Leiceſter, who was afterwards ſucceeded by Eſſex: and Bacon, unfortunately for his advancement, warmly embraced the cauſe of the latter. Elizabeth was ſenſible of his great talents, but nothing could overpower the phlegmatic averſion of the Cecils, who repreſented Bacon as a ſpeculative man, whoſe head was filled with philoſophy, and not with political knowledge. From this diſappointment, Bacon would have buried himſelf in a foreign kingdom, if his friends had not interfered. On the acceſſion of James I. he roſe into power, though ſtill oppoſed by Cecil earl of Saliſbury and by ſir Edward Coke. He was knighted, made attorney-general, keeper of the ſeals, lord chancellor, and raiſed to the peerage. His elevation was not unattended by the envy of enemies; and he was ſoon accuſed by the commons of groſs bribery and corruption. The king, who ſaw that not only Bacon but his favorite Villiers was aimed at, adviſed his chancellor to make no defence, and promiſed him protection if he were condemned. Bacon, unhappily for his reputation, made no defence, and he was found guilty, fined 40,000*l.* impriſoned in the Tower, and declared incapable to ſerve his majeſty, and unworthy to retain his ſeat in parliament. Though there is ſome reaſon to ſuppoſe that Bacon liſtened to bribery, either by himſelf or his ſervants, in caſes which were pending before him, yet it is remarkable that none of his decrees in chancery were afterwards ſet aſide, as dictated by oppreſſion, partiality, or falſehood; a fact that eſtabliſhes his probity far beyond the power of intereſted or venal panegyriſts. The fine was remitted by the king; and though the diſgraced chancellor determined to ſpend the reſt of his days in privacy, yet he was reſtored to the public opinion, and ſat in the firſt parliament of Charles. Neither in his elevation nor diſgrace did Bacon forget the great object of his heart, and he labored aſſiduouſly for the eſtabliſhment of his new philoſophy. He died 1626, at lord Arundel's houſe, Highgate, of a fever. In his conduct, Bacon was generous and humane, for though he had a good income, 1800*l.* a year from his penſion, and 700*l.* from his eſtates, his debts at his deceaſe were found to amount to 22,000l. Bacon has been cenſured, and deſervedly, for ſtanding forth as the accuſer of Eſſex, a man who had patroniſed him. As a writer, his "novum organum ſcientiarum," has among his other performances, immortalized his name. He has introduced a new ſpecies of philoſophy to enlighten and dignify man, to teach him how to think, and to lead him from error, from darkneſs, and falſe comprehenſion, to truth and the moſt accurate concluſions. Bacon, however, as a philoſopher, has met opponents, and Hume has not heſitated, in his compariſon of his merits with thoſe of Galileo, to raiſe the Italian far above the fame of his countryman. Bacon's works have been collected in 5 vols. 4to. and 10 vols. 8vo.

BACON, Anthony, elder brother to the chancellor, though diſtinguiſhed for his knowledge of politics, was ſatisfied with the tranquillity of a private ſtation. He was intimate with Eſſex, and he aſſiſted him with his advice, in the midſt of his diſtreſſes.

BACON, ſir Nathaniel, knight of the bath, half-brother to the chancellor, was diſtinguiſhed as a painter in the ſtile of the Flemiſh ſchool. Some of his pieces are preſerved at Culford, and at Gorhambury, among which a picture of himſelf is much admired, and a cook-maid with dead fowl.

BACON, Phanuel, was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. He took his degree of D. D. 1735, and became rector of Baldon, Oxfordſhire, where he died 1783. He wrote, beſides five plays, an elegant poem called "the artificial kite," firſt printed in 1719, and inſerted in the Gentleman's Magazine 1758, and he was admired for the ready flaſhes of his wit and for his punning.

BACON, John, an Engliſh ſculptor, born at Southwark, 1740. At the age of 15, he was bound to a china manufacturer at Lambeth; and ſo diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his aſſiduity, that in a little time the improvements of the manufactory were all the efforts of his genius. From the various models preſented to his view, he laid the foundations of his future fame; and in his execution diſplayed ſuch taſte that he obtained not leſs than nine premiums from the ſociety for the encouragement of arts. He obtained, in 1769, the gold medal of the royal ſociety, and his manly figure of Mars encreaſed, if poſſible, the high reputation which he had already acquired. His admired buſt of the king, for Chriſt Church-hall, Oxford, procured him the royal patronage. Another buſt was alſo made for Gottingen univerſity; and he delineated the groupe of lord Chatham's monument in Guildhall, and that of the celebrated Guy, for his noble hoſpital. The other more remarkable productions of his chiſel are, Mrs. Draper's monument in Briſtol cathedral, two groupes at the top of Somerſet-houſe, a ſtatue of Henry VI. for Eton college, judge Blackſtone's ſtatue for All ſouls college, Chatham's monument in Weſtminſter abbey, and the ſtatues of Johnſon and Howard in St. Paul's cathedral. An inflammation in the bowels proved fatal to this moſt ingenious artiſt, 1799. The article on ſculpture in Rees' encyclopædia was his elegant production.

BACQUERRE, Benedict de, a phyſician, little known, but as the author of an excellent work, "ſenum Medicus."

BACQUET, advocate to the king of France, wrote ſome ingenious law works, and died 1597.

BACTISHUA, George Ebn, a chriſtian phyſician, at the court of Almanſor. As he had an old woman for his wife, the caliph ſent him 3000 dinars, and three beautiful girls, as a preſent, which the phyſician ſent back, obſerving, that his religion forbade him the uſe of more than one woman at a time.

BADAKSCHI, a Perſian poet under the caliph Moctaſi. His divan or collection of poems is written upon the fortunes of the great men of the court; and he ſays, that the varied ſcene in human affairs ought not to create ſurprize, as we ſee that life is meaſured by an hour-glaſs, and that an hour is always above and the other below in alternate ſucceſſion.

BADCOCK, Samuel, ſon of a butcher of South Molton, was born 1747, and was educated in the tenets of the diſſenters. During his education, he imbibed ſome of the ſtrong principles of the methodiſts on free grace, election, &c. which in his maturer years he totally abandoned. His firſt employment as paſtor was at Wimborne, in Dorſetſhire; from whence he removed to Barnſtaple, in Devonſhire. In this new ſituation, he met ſome of Dr. Prieſtley's theological works, which he admired ſo much that he viſited him, and afterwards correſponded with him. His vivacity, however, the modeſt elegance of his diſcourſes, and the eaſineſs of his manners ſoon raiſed him enemies among men who had embraced the rigid tenets of the nonconformiſts, and he was ejected from his office, in 1777, on a ſcandalous imputation, which proved falſe, and highly reflected on his accuſers. He retired to South Molton, and in 1780 he began to write for the Monthly Review, and likewiſe publiſhed a ſmall pamphlet on the topic of the day, the materiality or immateriality of the ſoul. As a reviewer, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his critique on Madan's Thelyphthora, and the Chattertonian controverſy; but when Prieſtley's corruptions of Chriſtianity appeared, his obſervations upon it were ſo forcible, and ſo well ſupported, that they drew an anſwer from the author in leſs than a month, in which the abilities of the unknown critic were candidly allowed to be reſpectable. Prieſtley found himſelf likewiſe attacked by Horſley; and when Badcock, in the Review, praiſed the performance, the offended unitarian, who had diſcovered him, accuſed him of miſrepreſentation. Badcock had the good ſenſe not to reply. During his reſidence at South Molton, he married the niece of the famous John Weſley; and from the papers which he received by that connexion, he publiſhed an account of the family. His character was now ſo well eſtabliſhed, that his aſſiſtance was courted by profeſſor White, who had been appointed Bampton lecturer at Oxford, in 1783; and from their united labors were produced thoſe ſermons which have been ſo deſervedly admired. What the extent of this connection was, has been a matter of controverſy; but it muſt be allowed, that the profeſſor claims unequivocally the whole merit of the plan and of the execution of the better part. If Dr. White had been more punctual in his payment of a reward ſo juſtly deſerved, his character might have been unaſſailed, and he might have ſecurely repoſed under the patronage of the great. In 1786, Badcock quitted the diſſenters, and the following ſpring was ordained. He engaged at the octagon chapel, in Bath, where he preached a much admired charity ſermon, printed, but not publiſhed. He preached alſo before the judges at Exeter, in Lent, 1783; and the following May he died, of a bilious complaint, at the houſe of his friend ſir John Chicheſter, baronet. His conſtitution was naturally weak, and he was frequently attacked by unpleaſant and delirious head-achs, which ſo much affected his ſpirits that he dreaded the loſs of reaſon far more than death. The powers of his mind were ſtrong and vivid, and his genius was exerted, with the liberality of his friends, to ſupport him above the embarraſſments of indigence.

BADENS, Francis, an hiſtorical and portrait painter of Antwerp. He died 1603, aged 32.

BADEW, Richard de, a native of Badow Eſſex. He was chancellor of Cambridge 1326, and laid the foundation of a college called Univerſity-hall, which was deſtroyed accidentally by fire; and when rebuilt, by the daughter of de Clare, earl of Glouceſter, was called Clare-hall.

BADILE, Anthony, an Italian painter of Verona, whoſe pieces were admired for correctneſs. He died 1560, aged 80.

BAGFORD, John, a native of London, originally a ſhoemaker, afterwards a bookſeller and an antiquarian, and a collector of old books, curious prints, &c. He enriched the famous library of Moore, biſhop of Ely, for which he was admitted into the Charter-houſe by the prelate. He died at Iſlington, 1716, aged 65. His valuable collection of books and antiquities, was purchaſed by the earl of Oxford, and added to his library. He publiſhed propoſals, 1707, for a general hiſtory of printing; and his manuſcripts, though badly written, and worſe ſpelled, may be conſulted with advantage.

BAGGER, John, made biſhop of Copenhagen at the age of 29, in conſequence of his knowledge of oriental learning, and theology, was a native of Lunden, and died 1693, aged 47. He publiſhed ſome learned diſcourſes.

BAGLIONI, John Paul, a native of Perugia, who uſurped the ſovereignty of his country, of which he was diſpoſſeſſed by Cæſar Borgia. He afterwards ſerved in the Italian armies, and was at laſt treacherouſly invited to Rome by the pope, Leo X. and cruelly beheaded, 1520.

BAGLIVI, George, a native of Apulia, profeſſor of anatomy at Rome, where he died 1706, in his 38th year. He poſſeſſed ſuperior abilities in his profeſſion, as he fully evinced by his compoſitions, all written in Latin. He wrote a curious diſſertation on the anatomy, &c. of the tarantula.

BAGNIOLI, Julius Cæſar, an Italian poet of Bagna Cabano. His beſt pieces are the judgment of Paris, and the tragedy of Aragonois. He died about 1600.

BAGSHAW, William, a native of Tidſwell, educated at Corpus Chriſti college, Cambridge, and miniſter of Gleſſop, which he reſigned in 1662, 1662, for nonconformity. He continued to preach privately, and a large meeting was erected for him at the revolution. He wrote several valuable treatises; and died 1703, aged 75.

Bagshaw, Edward, M. A. a student of Christ Church, Oxford, for some time assistant at Westminster, under Busby. He proved so violent in his principles that he was imprisoned for nonconformity, and died in Newgate, 1671. He was a man of abilities, and wrote Dissertationes duæ, 4to.—de monarchiâ absolutâ dissertatio politica, &c.

Bahrdt, Charles Frederick, M. A. a native of Bischoffwerda, who studied at Leipsic. An intrigue drove him from Leipsic to Erfurt, where he gave lectures on biblical antiquities; and he then removed to Giessen, and afterwards to Durkheim. Here he opened a house for the instruction of youth, which he called Philanthropinum; but his plans failing, he went to Holland, and then to England, where he obtained four pupils. On his return to the continent, he found that his conduct had given offence at Vienna, and therefore he retired to Prussia, and settled at Halle, as an innkeeper. The sentiments of which he boasted in public as a deist, rendered him suspected to the magistrates, and he was imprisoned for twelve months. He died 1792, aged 51. His character was unprincipled and licentious. He turned out his wife from his protection and house, to live in adultery with his servant; and in every part of his conduct gloried in what could offend religion and morality. Besides his essay towards a system of the doctrines of the bible, 1769, he published other works, equally singular for extravagances and licentious opinions.

Baian, or Baion, a native of Goa, who embraced Christianity, and came to Rome, about 1630. He was author of some ingenious works, besides a translation of the Æneid into Greek verse, and the Lusiad of Camoens into Latin.

Bajazet I. emperor of Turkey; succeeded his father Amurat I. 1389. He conquered Bulgaria, Macedonia, and Thessaly; and after he had made the emperor of Constantinople tributary to his power, he marched to attack Tamerlane in the east. He was, however, totally defeated near Angoury, 1402, and taken prisoner; and when the proud conqueror asked him what he would have done with him if he had obtained the victory, Bajazet answered, I would have confined you in an iron cage. Such, then, shall be thy fate, rejoined Tamerlane. He died, 1403, at Antioch in Pisidia. Some however say, that he was honorably treated by Tamerlane.

Bajazet II. succeeded his father Mahomet II. 1481, and extended the boundaries of his kingdom; and obliged the Venetians to sue for peace. His reign was distracted by intestine discord, and he fell by the perfidy of his son, Selim, who caused him to be poisoned, 1512, in his 60th year.

Baier, John William, a divine of Nuremberg, professor of divinity at Halle, where he died, 1694, aged 49. He was author of a compendium of theology and other works.

Baier, Jean Jaques, an eminent physician born at Jena. He practised with success in several cities of Germany, and was professor of physiology and president of the college of physicians, &c. at Altorf, where he died, 14th July 1735. He was author of some Latin dissertations, &c. on medical and botanical subjects, &c.

Baif, Lazarus, a native of Pins, near la Fleche, employed as ambassador to Venice, &c. by Francis I. He wrote some incoherent treatises,—de re navali—de re vestiariâ; and died 1545.

Bailies, William, a Prussian physician, author of an essay on the Bath waters, &c. 1757. When introduced to the king of Prussia, the monarch told him, that to have acquired the great reputation which he possessed he must have killed many people. He boldly replied, not so many as your majesty.

Baillet, Adrian, a learned Frenchman, born of poor parents at Neuville, in Picardy, and educated by the fathers of a neighbouring convent. In 1680, he became library keeper to de Lamoignon, and began to form an index of every subject which was treated in the books which he possessed; and so voluminous were his labors, that they were contained in 35 folio volumes, all written with his own hand. His next work was "jugemens des savans," which had a very rapid sale, and which he totally gave to the bookseller, requesting only a few copies for his friends. As in this work he mentioned not only the praises but the censures passed on different authors, he met with violent opposition, and those who suffered by the lash of his criticism rose up in their defence, so that under the names of Asinus in Parnasso, anti-Baillet, &c. he was attacked and ridiculed. Besides these, he wrote a prolix life of Descartes, 2 vols. 4to.—an history of Holland—the lives of saints, 4 vols. fol.—and several theological works; and he formed the plan of "an universal ecclesiastical dictionary," which was to contain a perfect system of divinity, supported by authorities from scripture, in 3 vols. folio, when he died of a lingering illness, 1706, in his 57th year.

Bailli, Roche le, a native of Falaise, physician to Henry IV. He was learned, and a strong supporter of the doctrines of Paracelsus. He wrote treatise on the plague, and other works in Latin, and died at Paris, 1605.

Bailli, Robert, a native of Glasgow, known as a firm opposer of episcopacy. He was tutor to lord Montgomery, and was patronised by lord Eglintoun. He was one of those who drew up an accusation against Laud; and during the troubles of Scotland he was ever active in ſupport of the preſbytery, as well as in oppoſition to toleration. After the death of Charles I. he waited as a deputed divine from the general aſſembly upon Charles II. at the Hague, and he expreſſed in a ſpeech his reſpect for his ſovereign, and his abhorrence for the murderers of his father. On the reſtoration, he was made principal of the univerſity of Glaſgow; but ſo great was his averſion to epiſcopacy, that he refuſed a biſhopric. When he was viſited, during his illneſs, by the new-made archbiſhop of Glaſgow, he addreſſed him in theſe words: "Mr. Andrews, (I will not call you my lord), king Charles would have made me one of theſe lords, but I do not find in the New Teſtament that Chriſt had any lords in his houſe;" but he accompanied his cenſure with kindneſs and courteous liberality. He died, 1662, aged 63. His writings, now little peruſed, diſplayed great learning and ingenuity. His letters and journals have lately been publiſhed, 2 vols. 8vo. 1775.

BAILLON, William de, a learned French phyſician. His works are valuable, edited by his friend Dr. Thevart, in 4to. He died 1616, in his 78th year.

BAILLY, James, a French writer, born at Verſailles. He died 1768, aged 67. His "theatre" appeared 1768, 2 vols. 8vo.

BAILLY, John Sylvain, an aſtronomer, ſon of the preceding, born at Paris, 1736. At the age of 16, he wrote two tragedies; in one of which, Clotaire, he painted in vivid colors the ſufferings and the death of a mayor of Paris by an infuriate populace; dreadful prognoſtic of the miſeries which awaited him. Dramatic compoſitions, however, were not calculated to diſplay the powers of his genius. The friendſhip of de la Caille directed him in the purſuit of ſcience; and, in 1763, he introduced to the academy his obſervations on the moon, and the next year his treatiſe on the zodiacal ſtars. In 1766, he publiſhed his eſſay on the ſatellites of Jupiter, and in 1775, the firſt volume of his hiſtory of ancient and modern aſtronomy appeared, and the third and laſt in 1779; and, in 1787, that of Indian and oriental aſtronomy, in 3 vols. 4to. He was deputy to the firſt national aſſembly; and was on July 14th, 1789, nominated mayor of Paris. His impartiality was conſidered ſoon as a crime; and when he ſpoke with reverence of the royal family, on the trial of the queen, he was regarded as unfit to preſide over the rebellious city. He deſcended, in 1791, from his elevation, and retired to Melun; but the ſanguinary tribunal of Robeſpierre, who knew his merit, and would not protect it, dragged him to execution. He loſt his head by the guillotine, 12th November 1793, exhibiting in death, heroiſm, reſignation, and dignity. Beſides his great works, he wrote the eloges of Leibnitz, Charles V. la Caille, Corneille, two "rapports," and left MSS. on the origin of fables, and of ancient religions.

BAILLY, David, a painter, born at Leyden. He acquired great reputation for his hiſtorical pieces, and died 1630.

BAILLY, James, a French painter of Gracay in Berry, who died 1679, aged 50. His flowers, fruits, &c. were much admired.

BAINBRIDGE, John, a phyſician and aſtronomer of Aſhby de la Zouch, in Leiceſterſhire. After taking his degrees at Emanuel college, Cambridge, he ſettled in his native county, where he practiſed phyſic, and undertook the care of a grammar ſchool. He was invited to London, where his application to aſtronomy and mathematics, and his ſcientific deſcription of the comet of 1618, publiſhed in 4to. raiſed him to fame. In 1619, he was made, by his friend Saville, firſt aſtronomical profeſſor at Oxford; and he entered at Merton college, where he was appointed reader of Linacer's lecture. He died in 1643, aged 61. Bainbridge was indefatigable after literature; and he began at the age of 40 to ſtudy the Arabic, that he might give a more correct edition of all the ancient aſtronomers, agreeable to the ſtatutes of his founder.

BAITHOSUS, founded, with Sadoc, the ſect which denied a future ſtate. Theſe heretics, at firſt called Baithoſæi, were better known by the name of Sadducees.

BAIUS, or DE BAY, Michael, a native of Melin, divinity profeſſor of Louvain. He was ſent as deputy at the council of Trent; but in his wiſh to bring back the followers of Luther and Calvin to the church, he adopted ſome of the tenets with reſpect to juſtification, ſo that his writings were not only denounced by the inquiſition, but 76 of the points which he advanced condemned. He acknowledged his errors, and a ſecond time the papal power interfered between his followers and thoſe of the jeſuit Leſſius. Baius died 1589, aged 76. His works are written in a correct and cloſe ſtile, far ſuperior to the learning of the times, and publiſhed in 4to. It is ſaid that he read St. Auguſtin not leſs than nine times, to acquire the graces and beauty of his language.

BAKER, David, an Engliſh Benedictine, who ſtudied at Broadgate-hall, now Pembroke college, Oxford. He travelled in Italy, and reſided in England in the time of Charles I. as miſſionary; after which, he ſettled as director and confeſſor of the Engliſh nuns at Cambray. He died in London 1641. His writings were moſtly on theological ſubjects. His collections for an eccleſiaſtical hiſtory of England in ſix folio volumes, are loſt.

BAKER, ſir Richard, author of the chronicles of the kings of England, was born at Siſſinghurſt, in Kent, and ſtudied three years at Hart-hall, Oxford. He was knighted at Theobalds by James I.; and was made ſheriff 1620 for Oxfordſhire. He married a daughter of ſir George Manwaring, of Shropſhire, and by becoming ſurety for ſome of her family he was ruined, and died in the Fleet priſon, 1645. He was a man of extenſive learning, as his miſcella-miſcellaneous works ſufficiently prove. The laſt edition of his chronicle was 1730, fol.

BAKER, Thomas, a native of Ilton, Somerſetſhire, who ſtudied at Magdalen-hall and Wadham college, Oxford, and obtained the vicarage of Biſhop's Nymmet, Devonſhire, where he lived a retired life, and died 1690, aged 65. He publiſhed an uſeful book called geometrical key, &c. 1684, in 4to. and for the anſwers ſent to the queries propoſed to him by the royal ſociety, he received their me l.

BAKER, Thomas, a learned antiquary, of a very reſpectable family. His grandfather, who was recorder of Newcaſtle, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the royal cauſe, and was almoſt ruined by his liberality in favor of the monarch. His ſon George, of Crook, in the county of Durham, married into the Northumberland family of Forſter; and Thomas, one of the iſſue of this marriage, born 1656, was educated at Durham grammar-ſchool, and afterwards at St. John's college, Cambridge. He entered into orders, and was preſented to Long Newton rectory; but he was ſoon after diſgraced, for refuſing to read James II.'s declaration for liberty of conſcience; and he reſigned his living, 1690, and returned to college, where he enjoyed his fellowſhip till diſpoſſeſſed, in 1717, for refuſing to take the oaths. He ſtill continued to reſide in the college till the day of his death, ſupported, it is ſaid, by Matthew Prior, who retained his fellowſhip to ſupply the income to his friend. He was attacked by a paralytic ſtroke, which in three days terminated his exiſtence, 1740. In private life, Baker was diſtinguiſhed by his affability, his eaſy and mild manners, and as a ſcholar he was equally known. Beſides his "reflections on learning," which paſſed through eight editions, and his preface to Fiſher's funeral ſermon for the counteſs of Richmond and Derby, nothing has been publiſhed of his works; but he made collections for the hiſtory of St. John's college and the antiquity of Cambridge univerſity, ſo that not leſs than 39 volumes in folio, and 3 in 4to. of theſe valuable manuſcripts are preſerved both in the Britiſh muſeum and at Cambridge. Baker, as executor of his elder brother's will, was the means of founding ſix exhibitions at St. John's, with money left for charitable uſes. He was intimate with the moſt celebrated literati of his age, who reſpected his talents, and frequently conſulted him.

BAKER, Henry, an ingenious naturaliſt, born in Fleet-ſtreet, London. His mother was a midwife; and he was for ſome time engaged in a bookſeller's ſhop, but left it for philoſophical purſuits. His chief employment was to correct the ſtammering of grown-up perſons, and to teach the deaf and dumb to ſpeak; and he acquired an ample fortune by this moſt honorable profeſſion. He was an active member of the royal and antiquarian ſocieties, to whoſe memoirs he contributed ſenſible communications. He wrote poetry in the younger part of his life, and maintained throughout a character reſpectable for urbanity of manners, and a conciliating deportment. He died in the Strand, 1774, in his 71ſt year. His microſcopical experiments were very valuable, and have been publiſhed. His valuable collection of ſhells, native and foreign foſſils, petrefactions, corals, ores, &c. was ſold by auction, 1775. His name muſt be mentioned as the firſt who introduced into England the large Alpine ſtrawberry, the ſeed of which was tranſmitted to him in a letter by profeſſor Bruns, of Turin. He likewiſe introduced the ſeeds of the true rhubarb, rheum palmatum, ſent over to him by Dr. Mounſey, the phyſician of the empreſs of Ruſſia. He married the youngeſt daughter of the well-known Daniel Dufoe, by whom he had two ſons, who died before him. The eldeſt, David Erſkine Baker, was brought up to the buſineſs of a ſilk throwſter, in Spital-fields; but he grew extravagant, and at laſt loſt himſelf, by enliſting in the mean retinue of a company of ſtrolling players. He wrote poetry, and that entertaining book called the companion to the play-houſe, 2 vols. 12mo. 1764, ſince enlarged, under the title of biographia dramatica, 2 vols. 8vo. The ſecond ſon, Henry, was a lawyer, but far from reſpectable in his profeſſion. He left an only ſon, 1763, to whom his grandfather left all his property. It is ſaid, that the art of inſtructing deaf perſons periſhed with Baker, as he enjoined thoſe who benefited by his ſervices the moſt profound ſecrecy, and moreover took a bond of 100*l.* for their faithful obſervance of the promiſe.

BAKEWELL, Robert, eminent as the improver of Britiſh cattle, was born, 1726, at Diſhley, Leiceſterſhire. His attention was directed to the improvement of the breed of cattle, and ſo ſucceſsfully, that the Diſhley ſheep became celebrated over the country, and one of his rams was let for the extraordinary price of 400 guineas, and his bulls at 50 guineas each a ſeaſon. He died 1798.

BAKHUISEN, Ludolph, a ſelf-taught painter and engraver of Embden, who died 1709, aged 78. His pieces, the ſubject of which are generally tempeſts and ſea views, &c. are highly admired for their ſpirit, and the ſoftneſs and delicacy of his coloring.

BALAAM, ſon of Beor or Boſor, a celebrated prophet in Meſopotamia, ſent for by Balak, king of Moab, that he might curſe Iſrael. The curſe which he intended to pronounce was, by the influence of the Almighty, changed into a bleſſing; but though he thus diſappointed the expectations of Balak, the wicked prophet encouraged him privately to allure the Iſraelites to the commiſſion of debauchery; and the advice fatally ſucceeded. Balaam was killed with Balak in a battle, about 1450 B. C.

BALBI, John, or Janua, a Genoeſe dominican, author of ſeveral commentaries, &c. His chief work, "catholicon," is an uſeful book, containing a claſſical encyclopædia, &c. It was one of the firſt books ever printed.

BALBOA, Vaſco Nugues de, a Caſtilian, known by his enterprizing genius. He was one of the American adventurers, and in 1513 he left Spain, to discover the South Sea, and in one month after his departure he gained the wished for ocean. Though he could possess pearls and gold, he preferred the love of his fellow adventurers. He was found at Santa Maria, on the coast of Darien, where he had built a town, and crossed the isthmus, in the meanest habit, building a hut for his dwelling, by the governor of the Spanish king, who became jealous of his popularity, and falsely accused him of felony. The charge was easily proved before a corrupted tribunal; and the unfortunate Balboa lost his head 1517, at the age of 42.

Balbuena, Bernard de, a Spanish poet of eminence, born at Toledo, and educated at Salamanca. He settled in America, and died there 1627, after being seven years bishop of Porto Rico.

Balcanqual, Walter, a Scotsman, who attended James I. when he came to England. He took the degree of D.D. at Oxford, and appeared at the synod of Dordt for the church of Scotland. He was successively master of the Savoy, in 1624, dean of Rochester, and in 1639, dean of Durham. He wrote king Charles' declaration concerning the late tumults in Scotland,—sermons,—epistles concerning the Dordt synod, &c. He was a great sufferer during the rebellion, and with difficulty escaped his persecutors. He died at Chirk castle, Denbighshire, 1645.

Balde, James, a native of Upper Alsatia, surnamed the Horace of his country. He died at Neuburg, 1668, in his 65th year; and the senators of the place eagerly solicited to obtain his pen, which was, as a most precious relict, carefully kept in a silver case. His works are miscellaneous, partly dramatic, partly odes, &c. exhibiting strong flashes of genius, but without the correctness of mature taste. His Uranie victorieuse was rewarded by Alexander VII. with a gold medal.

Baldinucci, Philip, a Florentine of the academy of la Crusca, well acquainted with painting and sculpture, of which he began the history. His death, in 1696, in his 72d year, prevented the execution. He wrote the general history of painters, 6 vols.—an account of the progress of engraving on copper—a vocabulary of designs.

Baldock, Robert de, an ecclesiastic, who shared the misfortunes of Edward II. He died in Newgate.

Baldock, Ralph de, was educated at Merton, Oxford, and made bishop of London, 1304. His election was disputed; but he was confirmed by the pope, and consecrated at Lyons, 1306; and on his return to England he was made chancellor by Edward I. which he resigned on the king's death. He was a virtuous prelate; and his history of the British affairs, now unfortunately lost, proves that he possessed learning and great judgment. He died at Stepney, 1313.

Baldus, or Baldi, Bernard, a native of Urbino, abbot of Guastalla, distinguished by his knowledge of sixteen languages. He published tracts on mechanics, &c. and began an historical and geographical description of the world, which he did not finish, dying 1617 aged 64.

Baldwin I. count of Flanders, was engaged in the crusades, and when Constantinople was taken, 1204, by the French and Venetians, he was appointed emperor of the East. In a battle against the Greeks and Bulgarians, 1205 he was taken prisoner, and, after a confinement of sixteen months, barbarously put to death, in his 35th year.

Baldwin II. the last Latin emperor of Constantinople, was raised to the throne 1228. His reign was agitated with the dissensions of powerful rivals; and, to avoid falling into the hands of his enemies, he fled to Negropont and to Italy, where he died, 1273, aged 55.

Baldwin I. king of Jerusalem, was brother of Godfrey de Bouillon. After the death of Godfrey, he succeeded to the throne of Jerusalem, 1100, and the next year conquered Antipatris, Cæsarea, and Azotus, to which Acre was added in 1104, after an obstinate siege. He died 1118.

Baldwin II. king of Jerusalem, was son of Hugh count Rethel, and succeeded to the throne, 1118. He defeated the Saracens in 1120, but four years after he was unfortunately taken prisoner. He died 1131.

Baldwin III. king of Jerusalem, son of Fulk of Anjou, succeeded his father, 1143. He was successful in some battles, and took Ascalon, and died 1163.

Baldwin IV. king of Jerusalem, succeeded his father Amaury, 1174. As he was a leper Raymond of Tripoli held the government which was resigned by the subtle sovereign to his nephew, Baldwin V. He died 1185, and his successor the following year, as it is said, of poison, administered by his mother, that her husband, Guy de Lusignan, might ascend the throne.

Baldwin, Francis, a native of Arras, professor of law at Bourges, &c. He was patronized by Anthony king of Navarre, Charles V. and by Henry III. of France, whom he intended to accompany when elected king of Poland: but he died of a violent fever, 1573, in his 54th year. He died a catholic, though it is said that he four times exchanged his religion from catholic to protestant. He was author of leges de re rustica, &c.

Baldwin, a native of Exeter, primate of England, who attended Richard I. in his crusade, and died 1191.

Bale, Robert, a native of Norfolk, prior of the Carmelites of Norwich. He died 1503. He is author of annales Carmelit.—historia Æliæ prophetæ, &c.

BALE, John, a native of Cove in Suffolk, educated among the Carmelites at Norwich, and removed to Jesus college, Cambridge. He was a Roman catholic, but became protestant. The resentment of the Roman priests, however, was so great, that he fled over to Holland, where he continued six years, till he was recalled and promoted by Edward VI. to a living in Hampshire, and afterwards raised to the see of Ossory, which he abandoned on the accession of Mary. He retired to Holland and Switzerland; but on the accession of Elizabeth he refused to return to his diocese, satisfied in the enjoyment of a prebend at Canterbury, where he died, 1563, aged 67. During his absence in Holland, he wrote some excellent books, in English; but his most valuable work is his Latin account of the best English writers. It contained a catalogue of 3618 years, from Japhet to 1557.

BALECHON, Nicholas, an eminent engraver, born at Arles. He died suddenly, at Avignon, 1765, aged 46. There was much delicacy and softness in his execution. His principal pieces are les belles marines, Ste. Genevieve, and a portrait of Frederick Augustus king of Poland. Of this last he took proof impressions, contrary to his promise, for which he was expelled from the academy.

BALEN, Hendrick Van, a painter of Antwerp. His best pieces are the drowning of Pharaoh, and the judgment of Paris. He died 1632, aged 72. His son John was also eminent as a landscape painter.

BALES, Peter, a man eminent for his skill in penmanship, and considered as the inventor of short-hand writing. He studied at Oxford; and in 1575, he wrote the Lord's prayer, the creed, the ten commandments, with two short prayers in Latin, besides his own name, motto, day of the month, year of the Lord and of the queen's reign, all within the circle of a single penny, inchased in a ring and golden border, which he presented to the queen at Hampton Court. He was employed by Walsingham in imitating hand-writing for political purposes; and, four years after, 1590, he opened a school near the Old Bailey. He published his "writing schoolmaster," an useful performance, recommended by eighteen copies of complimentary verses from men of genius and learning. He died 1610.

BALEY, Walter, a native of Portsham, Dorsetshire, educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford. He was proctor of the university, 1558, and took his degrees in physic, whilst he studied divinity with equal attention. He was professor of physic at Oxford, and soon after physician to queen Elizabeth. He died 1592, aged 63. His writings were chiefly on the eye-sight and its preservation, neither valuable nor learned. He also wrote a discourse on the qualities of pepper, &c.

BALGUY, John, an English divine, born at Sheffield, where his father was master of the grammar school. He was of St. John's college, Cambridge, where he laments that two years were lost to himself by an improper fondness for reading romances, till he was awakened from his inactivity by perusing Livy, and urged to more honorable pursuits. Some part of his time was spent in the care of Sheffield school, either as head or assistant; and afterwards he was in the family of Mr. Banks, as tutor. When admitted to orders, he distinguished himself as a preacher, and during the first four years of his residence at Lanesley and Tanfield, in Durham, he never omitted writing a new sermon every week, so that afterwards he committed at once to the flames 200 of these valuable compositions, in the presence of his son, whom he wished to excite to the same laudable application. As a writer, he became respected in the Bangorian controversy, and was a warm advocate in the cause of rational religion and Christian liberty. His works consist of sermons and of tracts, all on divinity; and though some of his philosophical opinions are considered erroneous, his principles must be applauded, and his discourses highly admired. He was a great friend to toleration, and whilst he abhorred the tenets of the Romish church, he cultivated an acquaintance with the most respectable of the dissenters and of the quakers. His defence of Hoadley recommended him to the friendship of that prelate; but he nobly disdained to use this as a step to rise to preferment. Besides a prebend at Salisbury, he obtained North Allerton, and died at Harrowgate, 1748, in his 63d year.

BALIOL, sir John, the founder of Baliol college, Oxford, was born at Barnard castle, Durham. He was governor of Carlisle, 1248 and the guardianship of Alexander III. of Scotland, and of Margaret of England, his wife, was entrusted to his care; but an accusation of misconduct drew upon him the vengeance of the English king. The foundation of his college was laid 1263. During the wars of Henry III. and his barons, he supported the king's power.

BALIOL, John de, king of Scotland. He was descended from David earl of Huntington, brother of king William called the Lion; and on the death of queen Margaret, he laid claims to the crown, in which he was opposed by Bruce. His rights were established by Edward I. of England, who acted as arbitrator; and he did homage 1292. When he found himself a vassal of England, he boldly shook off the yoke, and made an alliance with the French king; but the battle of Dunbar proved fatal to Baliol, who, with his son, was carried a captive to the Tower, and afterwards was released by the pope's legate, 1299. Baliol retired to France, where he died, 1314. His son Edward afterwards claimed the kingdom, and obtained it for a little time; but, at his death, the family became extinct.

BALL, John, an English divine, of Oxfordshire, shire, 1585, minister of Whitmore, in Staffordshire. Though in his principles a puritan, he was severe against those who separated from the church. He wrote a book on the power of godliness; and died 1640.

BALLARD, George, a native of Campden, in Gloucestershire, who, while the apprentice of a habit-maker, employed some of his time to the acquisition of the Saxon language. Lord Chedworth offered him an annuity of 100l. a year, of which, however, he only accepted 60l. as sufficient, and he then went to Oxford, where he was made one of the eight clerks of Magdalen college, and afterwards one of the beadles of the university. He died 1755, in the prime of life. His access to the Bodleian was the means of his encreasing his valuable collections; but he published only "memoirs of British ladies celebrated for their writings," in 4to. 1752.

BALLENDEN or BULLANDEN, sir John, a Scotch historian, in favor with James V. He was canon of Ross and archdeacon of Murray, and he succeeded to the office of clerk-register to the court of chancery, which the troubles of the times obliged him to resign. He was also a lord of session; but the opposition which he made to the reformation, rendered him obnoxious to the ruling powers, so that he retired to Rome, where he died 1550. He wrote several pieces in prose and verse, &c.

BALLERINI, Peter and Jerome, two learned brothers, ecclesiastics, at Verona, the former of whom was born 1698, the latter 1702. Besides several valuable works of their own, they edited the works of Leo the Great, those of cardinal Norris, those of Gilbert bishop of Verona, &c.

BALLEXFERD, a native of Geneva, author of the education physique des enfans, a valuable composition. He wrote also on the causes of the death of so many children, an equally meritorious publication. He died 1774, aged 48.

BALLIN, Claude, a goldsmith of Paris. He executed, in the most perfect stile of elegant workmanship, four vases, representing the four ages of the world, for Richelieu, with four antique vases to match them, and also silver tables, dishes, girandoles, &c. for Lewis XIV. Several works of this illustrious artist are still admired at Paris, St. Denys, and Pontoise. He died 1678, aged 63.

BALSHAM, Hugh de, bishop of Ely, founded Peter-house, at Cambridge, and died 1286.

BALTHASAR, Christopher, a king's advocate at Auxerre, who quitted the catholic religion for the tenets of the protestants, in whose favor he wrote several treatises, especially against Baronius, which were received with great avidity. The synod of Loudun granted him, in 1659, a pension of 750 livres, for his services.

BALTHAZARINI, surnamed Beaujoyeux, an Italian musician, recommended by Brissac to Henry III. of France, for the entertainment of whose court he wrote several ballads and pieces of music. He composed a ballet called Ceres and her nymphs, for the nuptials of the duc de Joyeuse with the queen's sister, mad moiselle de Vaudemont; and this is regarde as the origin of the ballet heroique of Franc BALUE, John, a cardinal, born of mean p rents in Poitou. He raised himself to conse quence, and gradually became bishop of Evre and Arras. He was raised to the purple Paul II. and became minister to Lewis X and acted as general over his troops. U grateful to his duty and to his master, formed intrigues with the dukes of Burgun and Berri; and when at last discovered by t king, he was imprisoned for 11 years; aft which he repaired to Rome, and rose to ne preferments. He afterwards came to Fran as pope's legate, and died at Ancona, 1491.

BALZUE, Stephen, a native of Tulles, Guienne, who employed himself in enrichi the libraries of his patrons with valuable m nuscripts, till in his 39th year he was a pointed professor of canon law in the roy college with every mark of distinction. F his lives of the popes of Avignon, the ki granted him a large pension, but his attac ment to the duke of Bouillon, the history whose family he had undertaken to write, a in which he inserted some offensive remark was productive of trouble. When the du was banished he shared his disgrace; he ho ever was restored to favor, though he was n replaced to the directorial chair of the roy college. He died 1718, in his 87th year, a left behind him the character of an indefatig ble collector of curious manuscripts and ann tations. He wrote little, though he possess an extensive acquaintance with polite literatu and was connected by correspondence a friendship with the most learned men of his a BALZAC, John Louis Guez de, a native Angouleme, who visited Holland in his 17 year, where he wrote a discourse on the st of the united provinces. He travelled wi the duke d'Epernon, and with la Valette, h he found at last the tranquillity of retireme on his estate at Balzac more congenial to h inclinations, than paying court to Richelie who flattered him with promises of high p tronage. He was admired for the elegance his writings, especially his letters to Voltai who however censures his stile, but allows h the merit of having given harmony and nu bers to French prose. His writings creat him some opponents, but though he dread the weapons of an adversary, he was pleas with the familiarity of the great, and a pensi from the court of 2000 livres, and the pom ous title of historiographer of France, a counsellor of state. He was of a weakly co stitution, so that he used to say when he w but 30, that he was older than his father. H died 1654, in his 60th year. His works, co sisting of le Prince,—le Socrate Chretien, l'Aristippe,—Entretiens,—Christ victorie &c. were collected and printed 1665, with preface, by de Cassagnes.

BAMPOCHE, a nick-name given to Peter de Laer for his deformity. He was a native of Laerden, in Holland, where he died 1673, aged 60. The chief merit of his pieces, is the ease with which he delineates characters, so that shops, inns, conversations, cattle, &c. are touched with the highest success by his pencil.

BAMBRIDGE, Christopher, a native of Westmoreland, educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and employed as ambassador from Henry VIII. to pope Julius II. He was made bishop of Durham; and in 1508 translated to York, and six years after he was poisoned by his servant, in revenge for some blows which he had received from him.

BAMPFIELD, Francis, M.A. a native of Devonshire, educated at Wadham college, was made prebendary of Exeter, and minister of Sherborne, Dorsetshire, but was ejected for non-conformity. He was author of a book on the observation of the sabbath, and died in Newgate 1684.

BANCHI, Seraphin, a dominican of Florence, who came to France for the improvement of his studies. When Peter Barriere, a youth of 27, formed the project of assassinating Henry IV. Banchi became acquainted with the secret, which he prudently revealed to one of the lords of the court. The assassin was thus discovered as he was ready to perpetrate the deed, and Banchi was rewarded with the bishopric of Angouleme, which he resigned in 1608 for the life of a recluse. His writings were chiefly controversial.

BANCROFT, Richard, was born near Manchester, and educated at Jesus college. He was chaplain to queen Elizabeth, and bishop of London 1597, and advanced to Canterbury on the death of Whitgift 1604. He was a strong advocate for the royal prerogative, and the rights of the church; and in a conference at Hampton Court in an oration of mean flattery, he compared James I. to Solomon for wisdom, to Hezekiah for piety, and to Paul for learning. He was indefatigable to establish episcopacy in Scotland. He died at Lambeth 1610, aged 66.

BANCROFT, John, nephew to the primate, was born in Oxfordshire, and educated at Christ Church. He was afterwards master of University college, and during the 20 years in which he presided over the society, he employed himself in establishing their rights and improving their property. In 1622, he was raised to the see of Oxford, and built the palace of Cuddesden for the residence of the bishops. He died 1640.

BANDARRA, Gonzales, a Portuguese cobler, distinguished as a prophet and versifier. He was silenced by the inquisition, and narrowly escaped being burnt 1541, and died 1556.

BANDELLO, Matthew, a native of Castelnuovo, in the Milanese, author of several curious novels in the manner of Boccace. He was ruined by the Spanish conquests, and retired as an outcast into France, upon the estate of his friend Cæsar Fregosa, near Agen. He was bishop of Agen in 1550 by Henry II. and devoted his time to literary pursuits. He resigned his bishopric in 1555, according to his promise, and the vacant see was conferred on James the son of Fregosa. He died in 1561. His novels were edited in three vols. 4to. with a fourth volume.

BANDINELLI, Baccio, a native of Florence, known by his pieces in painting and designing, and particularly in sculpture. His copy of the famous Laocoon, in the garden of Florence, is much admired. He died in 1559, aged 72.

BANBURI, Anselm, a monk born at Ragusa, who studied in France. The grand duke of Tuscany, who was not ignorant of his merit, intended to place him at the head of the academy of Pisa. He died at Paris 1743, aged 72. His antiquitates Constantinopolitanæ, in two vols. fol. and his numismata Roman. Imperat. are chiefly valuable.

BANGUIS, Peter, professor of theology at Abo for 32 years, was in 1682 raised to the see of Wyburg. He wrote an ecclesiastical history of Sweden, a sacred chronology, and other works, and died 1696, aged 63.

BANGUISI, Thomas, author of an Hebrew lexicon, and of a treatise on the origin of the diversity of languages, was professor of Hebrew, &c. at Copenhagen, where he died 1661, aged 61.

BANIER, Anthony, an ecclesiastic of Clermont in Auvergne, who acquired by the patronage of his friends that education which the poverty of his parents could not supply. He was entrusted with the care of the children of Metz, president of the chamber of accounts at Paris; and it was for their education that he produced his "Historical explanation of Fables." This work was universally admired, and procured the author admission to the academy of inscriptions. A new edition soon after appeared with improvements, and the addition of five dialogues, further to illustrate and to enrich the work. The fruits of his literary labors were numerous and valuable, various essays, and not less than 30 dissertations were produced by him to the academy of Belles Lettres, the treatises on history and literature by Vigneul Marville or rather Bonaventure D'Argonne, were re-published, and new light given to the voyages of Paul Lucas into Egypt, and of Cornelius le Brun to the Levant. In the last ten years of his life Banier devoted his time to his favorite study of mythology, and then translated the metamorphoses of Ovid, with remarks and explanations. It was also at that time that he completed his mythology, in 3 vols. 4to. or 7 in 12mo. a book abounding in erudition, and deservedly admired. He was prevailed upon by the booksellers when he labored under the attacks of a fatal distemper, to superintend a new edition of a general history of the ceremonies, &c. of all the nations in the world, which 20 years before had appeared in in Holland, and he had the gratification to see it finished in 1741 in 7 vols. fol. Banier died that year in his 69th year.

BANISTER, John, a learned physician of the 16th century, who, after studying at Oxford, settled at Nottingham, where he acquired great reputation. He was author of several works on physic and surgery.

BANISTER, Richard, the younger, was educated under his relation, of whom mention has just been made, and applied himself to complaints of the eyes, ears, hare-lips, and wry necks. He settled at Stamford in Lincolnshire, but occasionally visited London, and other places. He obtained a certificate of the magistrates of Norwich of his having cured 24 blind persons in that city. His language is harsh, and of his life the only account is to be derived from his works. The time of his death is unknown.

BANKS, sir John, a barrister of Gray's Inn, born at Keswick in Cumberland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. He was in 1630 attorney general to the prince of Wales, and was afterwards chief justice of the king's bench, from which he removed to the common pleas. He died at Oxford 1664. Several of his MSS. on law are still extant. His wife is famous for defending Corff-castle against the parliament, till relieved by lord Carnarvon.

BANKS, John, a native of Sunning in Berkshire, apprenticed to a weaver at Reading. He left his trade in consequence of breaking his arm, and retired to London with ten pounds left him by a relation, and after feeling all the hardships of poverty, he became, from a bookseller's stall in Spitalfields, and a bookbinder's shop, a writer of miscellaneous essays, and solicited subscriptions to some trifling poems. Pope, to whom he addressed a letter and a poem, honored him with an answer and a double subscription, and the obscure poet rose to literary consequence, distinguished as the author of the critical review of Oliver Cromwell's life, 12mo. a work frequently re-printed. He wrote besides, the Weaver's miscellany, in imitation of Duck's thresher, and in the latter part of life he was engaged on the Old England and Westminster Journals. He died of a nervous disorder at Islington 1751.

BANKS, John, was a member of the society of New inn. As a writer for the theatres he did not meet with encouragement. Though his language is not often the language of poetry, yet there is something interesting in his compositions. The subjects are happily drawn from history, and incidents are introduced which can move the heart and call forth all the sympathising feelings of an audience. His tragedies are seven in number, of which the best is indubitably the earl of Essex, a drama abounding in bold strokes of nature, and some fine instances of the pathetic. The time of his death is not known.

BANNIER, John, a Swedish general under Gustavus Adolphus. He distinguished himself in various battles, and after the death of h master added to the glory of Sweden by t taking of several important places from t Germans and Saxons. He forgot his milita character to espouse the daughter of the prin of Baden, after the death of his wife, and di 1641, aged 40.

BANQUO or BANCHO, a Scotch gener who joined Macbeth in the overthrow of h sovereign, and for his services was murdered the usurper.

BAPTIST, John, a native of Lisle, reside for some time in England, as a painter flowers. He studied at Antwerp, and assist le Brun in painting the palace of Versailles, which the flowers were his execution. T duke of Montague, who was ambassador France, employed him with la Fosse and Ro seau in the decoration of Montague hou now the British museum. A looking gl which he adorned with a garland of flowers queen Mary, is still preserved at Kensingt palace. There is a print of him from a pai ing by sir Godfrey Kneller, in Walpole's ane dotes. Iaximilian, and to Innocent VIII. He was ade patriarch of Aquileia againſt the wiſhes his countrymen, who had a law that their nbaſſadors ſhould accept no favor from the Roman pontiff; and ſo inexorable were the Venetians, that Barbaro's father, who was en-truſted with the firſt offices of the ſtate, unable to avert their reſentment, died of a broken heart. Barbaro wrote ſome excellent treatiſes as well as poetry; and tranſlations from Plu-tarch and Dioſcorides. He died at Rome
1493, aged 39.

BARBARO, Daniel, coadjutor of the patriarchate of Aquileia, with his uncle Hermolao, was ambaſſador from Venice to England, where he continued till 1551. He died 1570. His works were a treatiſe of eloquence, in 4to., an Italian tranſlation of Vitruvius, &c.

BARBAROSSA, Aruch, a well known pirate, who made himſelf maſter of Algiers, and murdered the king Selim, whom he had come to aſſiſt againſt his Spaniſh invaders. He afterwards made himſelf maſter of Tunis, and of Tremecen. His ſucceſs was ſtopped by Gomares governor of Oran, but when beſieged in the citadel he made his eſcape; yet, though he ſtrewed the way with ſilver and gold, he was overtaken and cut to pieces, 1518, in his 44th year.

BARBAROSSA, Cheredin, ſucceſſor to his brother Aruch, was the able admiral of Selim II. He obtained poſſeſſion of Tunis, but was checked by Charles V., after which he plundered ſeveral towns of Italy, and then advanced to Yemen in Arabia, which he conquered. He died 1547, aged 80, leaving his ſon Aſan in poſſeſſion of the kingdom.

BARBAROUX, Charles, deputy from Mar-ſeilles to the national convention, proved himſelf one of the bittereſt enemies of Lewis XVI.
He was intimate with Roland, and attacked the Orleans party, the uſurpation of Robeſpierre, and the Jacobins. His conduct rendered him obnoxious to the demagogues in power; and when the Girondiſts were overthrown, he was accuſed but eſcaped into Calvados. He afterwards paſſed from Quimper to Bourdeaux, where he was recognized and guillotined, 1794.

BARBATELLI, Bernardino, a painter of Florence. His fruit pieces, animals, flowers,
&c. were much admired. He died 1612, aged 70.

BARBAZAN, Stephen, a native of Auxerre, well acquainted with authors of the middle centuries, from whom he drew curious anecdotes.
He aſſiſted in the completion of the Recueil alphabetique in 24 vols. 12mo. 1745, and the following years, a deſultory work. He wrote alſo inſtructions from a father to a ſon. He died 1770, aged 74.

BARBE, a Bohemian lady who married the emperor Sigiſmund. She was devoid of thoſe virtues which ought to adorn elevated rank.
She died 1451. Another, queen of Poland, ſurnamed Eſther for her piety. She died 1525. Another, alſo queen of Poland, married ſecretly to Sigiſmund Auguſtus. She died 1551.

BARBEAU des BRUYERES, Jean Louis, ſon of a wood-monger at Paris, roſe by his genius

from the mean occupation of his father. He resided in Holland, and on his return he assisted for 23 years M. Bauche in the completion of his works. His first publication in 1759, was his mappe monde historique, an ingenious chart. He published besides the tablettes chronologiques of Lenglet, a translation of Strahlemberg's description of Russia, la Croix's modern geography, besides large contributions to the works of his friends, and the two last volumes of the Bibliotheque de France, by le Long. Barbeau had to struggle against poverty, but it did not ruffle his temper. Two years before his death he married, that his infirmities might be alleviated by the affectionate attention and concern of a female friend. He died of an apoplexy at Paris, 1781.

Barberini, Francis, a poet of Tuscany, born 1264. Of all his works there is extant only his poem called the precepts of love, a composition extremely elegant, chaste, moral, and instructive. The family of the Barberini was distinguished in Europe in the 17th century. Francis, nephew of pope Urban VIII. was a cardinal and legate of the holy see in France and Spain. He died in 1679, aged 83. His brother Anthony was likewise a cardinal, and an able negociator and ambassador, and died 1671, aged 64.—Another, brother of pope Urban VIII. who died 1646, aged 77, and ordered this inscription to be placed on his tomb: "Hic jacet pulvis & cinis, postea nihil."

Barbey, Marc le, a celebrated physician of Bayeux, who checked the ravages of the plague among his countrymen, but refused to save the friends of the league. He was the favorite of Henry IV., who ennobled his family. He died about the last years of the sixteenth century.

Barbeyrac, John, a native of Bariers, in Languedoc, teacher of philosophy at Berlin, and afterwards professor of law and history at Lausanne, from whence he passed to Groningen. Besides a treatise on the morality of the fathers, and another on gaming, he translated into French Puffendorf's works, Noodt's discourses, Grotius' de jure pacis, &c. some of Tillotson's sermons, &c. He died 1729, aged 55. His brother Charles was eminent as a physician in Provence, and the friend of Locke and Sydenham. He died at Montpellier 1699, aged 70, author of traités de medicine, 12mo. and quæstiones medicæ duodecim, 4to.

Barbier d' Aucour, John, a native of Langres, who studied for the bar, but was unsuccessful in his first pleading, either from fear, or failure of memory, a circumstance to which Boileau, in the Lutrin, has alluded. So small were his pecuniary resources, that he consented to marry his landlord's daughter, that he might thus satisfy the demands which she had upon him. The patronage of Colbert, one of whose sons he educated, promised him better times, but the minister's death disappointed him, and a more fortunate attempt at the bar at last restored him to his character. In his last cause in defence of Le Brun, a valet accused of murdering his lady, he displayed a most commanding eloquence. He died of an inflammation of the breast, 1694, aged 53. He told the abbé Choisi who visited him in his last illness, that he rejoiced in leaving none to inherit his misery. His works were trivial, except his "Sentimens de Cleanthe, &c. 2 vols. 12mo., a book of infinite value for its ingenious reasoning and the justness of its criticism.

Barbier, Mary Ann, a native of Orleans, who published several tragedies and operas which have been attributed but falsely to her friend the abbe Pelegrin. She died in 1742. Her works are scarce above mediocrity.

Barbier, Lewis, a favorite of Gaston duke of Orleans, raised to the bishopric of Langres by Mazarin for betraying the secrets of his master. He left 100 crowns for the best epitaph for his tomb, which was written in a stile of irony by Monnoye. He died 1670.

Barbieri, John Francis, a pupil of the Caraccis. His historical pieces possessed merit. He died 1666, aged 76. His brother Paul Antonio was eminent in drawing quiet scenes and animals. He died 1460.

Barbosa, Arius, one of the chief restorers of learning in Spain. He was instructed in Greek by Angelus Politian, and was a professor at Salamanca for 20 years. He was preceptor to the king of Portugal's sons, and died 15.. He wrote some Latin poems, a treatise on prosody, &c.

Barbou, Hugh, a printer of eminence at Lyons, who settled at Limoges in 1580, where he printed Cicero's letters to Atticus, &c. with du Bos' notes, &c. His descendants have carried on the same profession at Paris with emolument to themselves, and advantage to the public.

Barbour, John, a Scotch ecclesiastic, employed by David Bruce as ambassador in England. He wrote in verse an account of the life and actions of Robert Bruce, a work highly esteemed. He died 1378, aged 58.

Barclay or Barklay, Alexander, a writer of the 6th century. He was of Oriel college, Oxford, and from thence travelled on the continent. On his return he was preferred to the provost of his college, who had been made a bishop. He was rector of Baddow Magna in Essex. He was an elegant writer, and translated some of the best authors on the continent and among them Navis Stultifera, &c. He died at Croydon in an advanced age.

Barclay, William, a native of Aberdeen who went over to France, where he studied civil law at Bourges, and was made professor at Pontamousson. His son was nearly engaged to follow the tenets of the Jesuits, which his father prevented, and the dissention between him and the society was so great that he abandoned Lorraine and came to England, where James offered him some handsome preferment provided he subscribed to the articles of the Anglican church, which he declined. He returned to France, and died professor at Ang in 1605. He wrote several books on the kingly and papal power, &c.

BARCLAY, John, son of the preceding, was educated by the Jesuits. He visited England with his father, and complimented with a Latin poem James, who wished to patronise him, but he returned to France. After the death of his father he resided in London for ten years, and afterwards went to Rome, where he died 1621. His works were numerous and elegantly written. The most celebrated are his Euphormio, a satire in Latin; and his Argenis, &c. translated into various languages, a kind of romance in the stile of Petronius and Apuleius, in which he describes the manner of a court, &c.

BARCLAY, Robert, a native of Edinburgh. His father sent him to Paris under his uncle, who presided over the Scots' college, where he imbibed the tenets of the Roman catholics. On his return to Scotland he zealously embraced the principles of the quakers. His writings are numerous. The most celebrated is his apology for the quakers, published in Latin, and two years after translated by himself, and addressed to Charles II. with excessive freedom of language. He was universally respected not only for his writings but the purity of his life. He travelled over England, Holland, and Germany, with the famous legislator Penn, with the intention of making converts; and on his return spent the rest of his life in dignified retirement. He died at Ury, 1690, in his 42d year.

BARDAS, a chief at Constantinople, uncle and guardian to Michael III. He was put to death by Basilius the Macedonian, 866.

BARDAS called SCELERUS, a general raised to the purple by his soldiers after John Zimisces. He was opposed by Phocas, and in consequence of a defeat fled to Bagdad, where he was imprisoned 979.

BARDIN, Peter, a native of Rouen, author of several treatises of an inferior character; drowned in 1637, in attempting to save his pupil Humieres. His epitaph by Chapelain, in a stile of panegyric, mentioned that the virtues were drowned with him. He wrote le grand Chambellan de France, Pensees morales sur l'Ecclesiaste, &c.

BARDNEY, Richard, a benedictine of Bardney in Lincolnshire, author of a life of Grostete bishop of Lincoln. He died 1504.

BAREBONE, Praise God, a leader of Cromwell's parliament of 1654. He was a leather seller by trade, but he acquired such celebrity as a demagogue, that the parliament was ludicrously called after his assumed name. Two of his brothers, it is said, had adopted likewise scripture names, one of them, "Christ came into the world to save Barebone"; and the other, "if Christ had not died thou hadst been damned, Barebone," which the wits of the time abbreviated to the two last words. When Monk led his army to London, Barebone acted with such violence at the head of the rabble, that the general sent a petition to parliament to punish this furious zealot and his partisans.

BARENT, Dieterick, a Dutch painter. He excelled in historical pieces and in portraits. He died 1592, aged 58.

BARETTI, Joseph, a native of Turin, son of an architect. The little fortune which he inherited was lost at faro, and he became an author by profession. After many difficulties, and after visiting several countries of Europe, he came in 1750 to London. He accidentally met at the Orange coffee-house Mr. Lennox, whose wife wished for instruction in the Italian language, and from this connection arose the consequence which he afterwards enjoyed. Mrs. Lennox introduced him to Dr. Johnson, whose friendship he long and sincerely enjoyed, and to other persons of distinction. After a residence of ten years in London, he set out in 1760 through Spain and Portugal for Italy, not however without expressing with all the power of gratitude, his deep sense of the kindness of England. In his journey he followed the directions of Dr. Johnson, and in taking notice of whatever scenes passed before his eyes, he produced a most amusing performance, published in 4 vols. 8vo. At Venice he published a periodical paper called Frusta literaria, under the character of a peevish soldier returned home after an absence of 50 years. This satirical performance raised him enemies, and after six years he returned to England, where he in a little time engaged in an injudicious controversy with Mr. Sharp, who had just published "letters from Italy, &c." He made some short excursions to France and Spain in 1768 and 69; and it was after this that an accident happened which threw a veil of horror over the rest of his life. On his return from the Orange coffee-house through the Haymarket about seven o'clock in the evening, he was attacked by a woman whose indecorous behaviour provoked him to strike her on the hand. She continued her insults, and three men, apparently in connection with the woman, approached to push him from the pavement, and to trample upon him, when he struck one of them, Evan Morgan, with a knife, and repeated the blows when pursued. The wounds were so deep that Morgan died the next day, and Baretti was at the following sessions at the Old Bailey tried for murder. The infamous life of his assailants, and the respectability of his own character, were strong in his favor; and he refused the accustomed privilege of having the half of his jury of foreigners. He read his defence from a printed paper, and he accounted for the knife which inflicted the wounds, by saying that he wore it as all foreigners do, to cut sweet-meats and fruits in deserts. He was acquitted, as having committed the murder in his self-defence. He returned to his literary life, and improved his fortune as well as his reputation by various publications. He received, it is said, 500l. for his travels, and obtained a pension of 80l. per annum from lord lord North. He ſoon, however, found himſelf in indigent circumſtances, and the refuſal which he met in his application to the booksellers for relief, ruffled his ſpirits and haſtened in ſome degree his decline. An attack of the gout was neglected, and medical men was diſregarded till a recovery was impoſſible. On the morning of his death, he declared that he had dreaded the arrival of that day; he put off the attendance of his barber to the morrow, and with great cheerfulneſs took his laſt leave of his friends. About eight, he took a glaſs of wine, and immediately after expired, May 5th, 1789 in his 73d year. In his private character he was highly reſpectable, his integrity was unimpeached, and his converſation always eaſy and free. He was of a benevolent diſpoſition, and never heſitated to divide his laſt ſhilling with an indigent friend, It is to be lamented that among his papers which were careleſly burnt by his executors, there were ſome letters and valuable communications from Dr. Johnſon. His works were numerous, but though in general intereſting he diſregarded them in one of his letters, as haſtily produced under the preſſure of poverty, and not abounding with that elegance which more opulent circumſtances might have ſupplied. His works are, beſides the travels, the dictionary Italian and Engliſh, 2 vols 4to.—a diſſertation on Italian poetry,—the Italian library, as introductive to the Italian language,—an Italian grammar,—an account of the cuſtoms of Italy, two vols. 8vo.—an introduction to moſt of the European languages, 8vo.—a Spaniſh and Engliſh dictionary, &c.

Bargrave, Iſaac, an eccleſiaſtic, member of Clarehall, Cambridge, and chaplain to James I. and Charles. He was dean of Canterbury, but he ſuffered greatly during the civil wars, and Sandys, a man whoſe life he had ſaved, treated him and his family with unuſual ſeverity, and impriſoned him in the Fleet. Bargrave ſurvived that ingratitude only three weeks, and died of a broken heart, 1642, aged 56. He was a zealous defender of the liberties of the kingdom, and it is ſaid that he offended king James, at St. Margaret's Weſtminſter, by a diſcourſe againſt popery, &c.

Barkham, John, a native of Exeter, who ſtudied at Oxford, and died at Bocking in Eſſex, of which he was rector and dean. He is mentioned by Speed, and others, as poſſeſſing "learning, virtue, and courteſy," His valuable collection of coins and medals, which he gave to Laud, was preſented to the univerſity.

Barksdale, Clement, a native of Winchcomb, Glouceſterſhire, educated at Abingdon ſchool, and Oxford. He was maſter of Hereford ſchool, but during the civil wars he left it, and took pupils at Hawling. On the reſtoration he was preſented to the living of Naunton, where he died 1687, aged 78. His works are ſermons, and tracts, monumenta literaria, ſive obitus et elogia, doctorum vivorum ex hiſtorii Thuani, 4to.—Nympha Libethris,—the life of Grotius, 12mo.—memorials of worthy perſons, &c.

Barlaam, a monk of Calabria, who i viſiting Conſtantinople, gained the favors c Andronicus who made him abbot of St. Sal vador 1339. He was ſent by that princ into the Weſt, to promote the reunion of th two churches, and to ſolicit the aſſiſtance c Chriſtian princes againſt the Mahometan He died about 1348. His letters were pub liſhed at Ingoldſtadt, 1604.

Barlæus, Gaſpardus, a Latin poet of Ant werp, appointed ſubprincipal of the college c Leyden, but afterwards ejected. He too his degrees in phyſic at Caen, and filled th chair of philoſophy at Amſterdam, till hi death in 1648, in his 64th year, though hi writings, in favor of Arminius, raiſed him number of enemies, who loudly called fo his diſmiſſion. His orations are admired fo wit and purity, and his poems for elegance and correctneſs.

Barlæus, Lambert, a Greek profeſſor a Leyden, who wrote annotations on Lucian' Timon, and Heſiod's theogony, &c. He ſpok Greek with the ſame fluent facility as hi mother tongue. He died 1655.

Barland, Adrian, a native of Barland i Zealand, profeſſor at Louvain, and author c notes on Virgil, Terence, Pliny the younger and Menander, beſides an abridgment of uni verſal hiſtory,—the chronicles of the dukes c Brabant. He died 1542.

Barletta, Gabriel, a Dominican, born in the kingdom of Naples. He acquired ce lebrity as a writer and a preacher, and it be came proverbial to ſay, neſcit prædicare qu neſcit Barlettare. It is reported that his ſer mons rapidly paſſed through 20 editions, bu ſo incongruous was the compoſition, ſo full c ſerious reflections and ridiculous levities, tha a more ſingular performance ſcarce ever ap peared. He was born about 1400, but th time of his death is unknown.

Barlow, William, prior of a monaſtery was raiſed to the ſee of St. Aſaph, and after wards of St. David's, in the reign of Henry VIII. He was tranſlated to Bath and Well 1547, but was ejected by Mary becauſe h was married, upon which he retired to Ger many. On Elizabeth's acceſſion, he was pro moted to Chicheſter, where he died 1568 He was author of ſeveral controverſial books &c.

Barlow, Francis, a native of Lincoln ſhire, who excelled in his repreſentation c birds, beaſts, fiſhes, &c. He died 1702.

Barlowe, Thomas, a native of Weſt moreland, educated at Appleby ſchool, an Queen's college, Oxford. He kept his pre ferment during the civil wars and became ſuc ceſſively keeper of the Bodleian, provoſt c his own college, Margaret profeſſor of divinity arch archdeacon of Oxford, and bishop of Lincoln, 1675. He was violent against the Roman catholics, but vented his resentment at the revolution against those who refused to take the required oaths. In his opinions he was a strong calvinist, and warmly supported the Aristotelian tenets against the new philosophy of the Royal society. He died at Bugden, Huntingdonshire, 1691, in the 85th year of his age. Such of his books were given to the Bodleian of which there were no copies already deposited there, and the rest to Queen's college. His works were against popery and chiefly controversial.

BARLOWE, William, bishop of St. David's, studied at Baliol college, and distinguished himself as the first discoverer of the nature and properties of the loadstone, the cementing of which he effected by a new method. He explained the difference between iron and steel, and why a magnet by being doubly capped takes up a greater weight. His opinions were made public in three treatises. He died 1625.

BARNABAS, St. a Levite, born at Cyprus. As soon as he embraced christianity, he sold his estate and delivered his money to the apostles. He preached the gospel in company with St. Paul, and afterwards passed with St. Mark into Cyprus, where he was stoned to death by the Jews.

BARNARD, Theodore, a painter of Amsterdam, who adorned the cathedral of Chichester by his paintings of kings and bishops.

BARNARD, John, a native of Castor in Lincolnshire, who studied at Queen's college, Cambridge. He married Dr. Heylyn's daughter and settled at Waddington, the advowson of which he purchased. He obtained after the restoration a prebend of Lincoln. He died at Newark, on a journey to Spa, 1683. He wrote against scandalous ministers, &c. besides the life of his father-in-law.

BARNARD, Sir John, an upright magistrate, and statesman. He was born at Reading, where his father, a quaker, was a wine merchant. At the age of 19 he relinquished the quakers for the established church and became first known in an examination in the House of Lords on a wine bill, against which the merchants objected. The spirited manner in which he expressed himself on the occasion, gained him popularity. He became candidate for the city of London, and was elected in 1722, and he served the city in six succeeding parliaments. In 1727, he was appointed alderman of Dowgate-ward, and in 1738 was lord mayor. His conduct in parliament was ever guided by a strong attachment to his country; and in his opposition to Walpole, especially on the excise act, his language was firm, manly, and patriotic. In July 1758 this virtuous magistrate resigned his gown, and after attaining nearly the age of 80, he expired 1766. The general character of sir John may be collected in the respect and esteem of his fellow citizens on his resignation. He was complimented with all those expressions of admiration which are due to integrity, and his public and private life was equally made the subject of panegyric. He had been knighted in 1732 by George II. and in memorial of his merits his fellow citizens erected his statue in the exchange.

BARNAVE, Anthony Peter Joseph Marie, a native of Grenoble. The revolution called him to Paris, where as deputy to the national assembly he displayed great eloquence. When he expressed some interest for the captive monarch, whom he had conducted back from Varennes to Paris, and ventured to predict that liberty by its excesses might be productive of miseries to his country, he was sent to prison. The energy of his appeal to the sense of the nation would have procured his acquittal if his judges had been upright. He was guillotined 1793, aged 32.

BARNES, Juliana, a native of Roding in Essex, prioress of Sopewell nunnery, eminent for her learning and personal accomplishments. She has been mentioned with great commendation by Bale, Hollinshed, and others. She wrote some treatises on hunting, hawking, &c. She was living in 1486.

BARNES, Joshua, a native of London, educated at Christ-hospital, and admitted servitor of Emanuel, Cambridge. In 1700, Mrs. Mason of Hemmingford, a widow not beautiful in person, but possessed of 200l. a year, visited him at Cambridge, and her offer to settle on him the half of her income at her death induced him to solicit her hand, which the obliging fair one did not refuse to Joshua, for whom, she observed, the sun stood still. He died 1712, in his 57th year, and his widow, who was nearly of the same age as himself erected a monument over him at Hemmingford. His works were valuable for their erudition and criticism. The chief were, a poetical paraphrase of Esther, —the life of Edward III. dedicated to James II.—a learned edition of Euripides,—Anacreon,—and Homer, &c. Bentley used to ridicule his learning, and with pedantic pride observed, that he knew Greek as much as a cobler.

BARNES, Robert, D. D. was employed by Henry VIII. to collect the opinions of the German divines, about his divorce. His attachment to Luther's doctrines incurred the displeasure of the monarch, and he was burnt alive at a stake, in 1540. He wrote a treatise on justification, &c.

BARNEVELDT, John d' Olden, a statesman, ambassador to Elizabeth in England, and to Henry IV. of France. His attempts to limit the authority of Maurice the second stadtholder of Holland, raised him enemies, by whom he was accused of designs to deliver the country to the Spaniards, and in consequence of this he was tried and beheaded in 1619. His sons William and René resented this cruelty, and though the elder escaped, René felt the punishment due to a conspirator. The mother stepped in defence of her son, and when Maurice expressed surprised to see her eager to save him when she had seen his father fall unlamented. She indignantly replied, "I would not solicit a pardon for my husband, for he was innocent; I ask it for my son because he is guilty."

BARO or BARONI, Peter, a native of Estampes in France, who left his country on account of his protestantism, and found a hospitable asylum in England, in the house of lord Burleigh, and at Cambridge with Dr. Pierce, by whose influence he was chosen Margaret professor of divinity 1574. He opposed Whitacre, Tindal, and Chadderton, who violently supported the tenets of absolute predestination, and whilst he gave a more moderate explanation to the doctrine in his sermons and in his lectures, he found himself cited before the vice chancellor, and accused before Whitgift; and though lord Burleigh the chancellor disapproved of the prosecution, he was obliged to leave Cambridge for Crutched-friars, London, where he died. His writings were on divinity subjects, and in Latin.

BAROCHE, Frederick, a painter of Urbino, who learnt sculpture of his father, and architecture and geometry and perspective of his uncle, and drew the heads of his Virgins after the features of his sister, and those of his Jesus's after his nephew. The jealousy of his rivals proved nearly fatal. He was maliciously poisoned, and though he recovered, his constitution grew weak and languid, and he lingered in an unhealthy state, till his 84th year 1612. His historical pieces are deservedly admired, but he shines with superior lustre in the execution of his devotional portraits. His merit was universally admitted, and his infirmities alone prevented him from accepting the honors which were offered to him by the duke of Tuscany, the emperor, and Philip II. of Spain. In correctness he is great; he understood well the effects of light and shade, and though the attitudes of some of his figures are out of proportion, he certainly may be said to approach near the softness and graces of Correggio.

BARON, Bonaventure, a native of Ireland, divinity professor at Rome, where he spent 60 years, and died blind in a good old age 1626. He was a learned writer. His theologia in 6 vols. is his best performance.

BARON, Michael, son of a merchant of Issondun, became celebrated as a player. His powers in expressing the passions were such that he was called the Roscius of his time. He was not insensible to popularity, and with arrogance he observed, that once in a century perhaps a Cæsar might arise, but that 2000 years were requisite to produce a Baron. His superior excellence was in a great degree owing to his own exertions, so that Racine in representing his Andromache to the actors, with the judgment of a poet and of a man of feeling, paid him the highest compliment assuring him that he could give him no instruction, "for (added he) your own heart will tell you more than any lessons of mine can suggest." He died in 1729, aged 77. Three volumes in 12mo. of theatrical pieces, appeared in 1760, under his name, of which however some supposed that he was not the author. His dialogue is lively, and his scenes diversified. His "Coquette,—l'ecole des peres—l'homme a bonne fortune, &c." are his best pieces. His father was also on the stage for some time. When playing Don Diego the Cid his sword fell, and kicking it as the character required, he wounded his little toe against the point, but he disregarded the blood till a gangrene informed him of his danger. He might have saved his life by amputation, but he observed, that a theatrical monarch with a wooden leg would be hissed and therefore he waited patiently the slow approaches of death, which happened in 165

BARON, Hyacinth Theodore, a learned physician of Paris, author of a Latin dissertation on chocolate. He died 1758, aged 72.

BARONI, Adrianne Basile, a native of Mantua, sister to the poet Basile. She was admired for her beauty and her accomplishments, that volumes were written in her praise. Her daughter Leonora possessed equal charms, and met equal admiration, and 1659, a collection of pieces in Latin, Greek Spanish, Italian, and French, was published in which her beauty was portrayed with all the graces of poetry.

BARONIUS, Cæsar, a native of Sora in Italy He was appointed confessor to Clement VII keeper of his library, and raised to the rank of cardinal. On the death of the pope 160 he was nearly elevated to the pontificate, he had 31 voices in his favor, but his election was opposed by the Spanish faction. He died 1607, aged 68. His works are numerous and valuable, especially his Annales ecclesiastici, 12 vols. fol. abridged by several authors.

BAROU DU SOREIL, N. a native of Lyons distinguished as a man of letters. He translated some things from the English, &c. He was put to death after the siege of Lyons, the end of 1792.

BAROZZI, James, an architect, in the duchy of Modena. His skill in architecture was displayed in the splendid edifices of Bologna, and in the canal between Ferrara and Bologna. He succeeded M. Angelo as the architect in the erection of St. Peter's Rome, and died there 1577. He wrote treatise on perspective, and also rules for the five orders of architecture, a popular work which has passed through 16 editions.

BARRAL, Peter, an ecclesiastic of Grenoble who kept a school at Paris, and was author of a Dictionaire historique, &c. des hommes celebres, 6 vols. 8vo. a work generally esteemed though in some articles unnecessarily severe

F

He alſo abridged Pitiſcus's dictionaire des antiq. Rom. &c. His ſtile was manly and vigorous, though occaſionally negligent. He died at Paris 1772.

BARRE, Francois Poullain de la, a French eccleſiaſtic who obtained a profeſſorial chair at Geneva, and died there 1723. He publiſhed ſome treatiſes on the equality of the two ſexes, the education of women, &c.

BARRE, Louis Francois Joſ. de la, a native of Tournay, editor of Moreri's dictionary, and author of ſome books on antiquarian hiſtory, &c. He alſo aſſiſted Banduri in his imperium orientale, and in his collection of Roman medals. He was rewarded with a penſion by the grand duke of Tuſcany, and died at Paris 1738, aged 50.

BARRE, Michel de la, a muſician of Paris, eminent as a player on the german flute, and as the author of muſical compoſitions. He died 1744.

BARRE, Joſeph, an eccleſiaſtic, chancellor of the univerſity of Paris, where he died 1764, aged 72. He was well verſed in eccleſiaſtical and profane hiſtory. His hiſtory of Germany 11 vols. 4to. is the beſt of his works, though it does not abound in elegance of language, or happy combination of events. He publiſhed, beſides a life of marſhal de Fabert 2 vols. 12mo. &c.

BARRÉ, Madame du, celebrated as the miſtreſs of the effeminate Lewis XV. was the daughter of an obſcure ſilverſmith of Paris, of the name of Chivaux. Her eldeſt ſiſter was the miſtreſs of a colonel Barré, and in viſiting her ſhe was accidentally ſeen and admired by the fickle monarch. To improve this infamous attachment, ſhe ſecretly married the brother of her ſiſter's ſeducer, and was loaded with all the riches which a captivated maſter could beſtow. At the revolution ſhe was accuſed before the bloody tribunal, who wiſhed to ſhare her ill acquired opulence, and ſhe was dragged to the ſcaffold, where her puſillanimity expoſed her to the deriſion of her enemies, and ſhe cloſed like a coward a life of guilt, licentiouſneſs, and infamy, 1793.

BARREAUX, Jacques Vallée, a native of Paris, known by the libertiniſm of his life and converſation. As his income was ample, he ſpared nothing to give variety to his voluptuous purſuits; his winters were paſſed in the mild climate of Florence, and in ſummer he was loſt amidſt the diſſipation of the capital. In his old age he became a convert to Chriſtianity. He died at Chalons ſur-Saone 1673, in his 72d year. An elegant ſonnet "Grand Dieu, &c." is the only thing which he wrote.

BARRELIER, James, a Dominican, who made the tour of Spain, France, and Italy. He made a large collection of plants, &c. during his journey, and he intended to give a general hiſtory of plants called Hortus mundi, when a fatal aſthma ſtopped his uſeful labors 1673, in his 67th year. A collection of his intended work was afterwards publiſhed by de Juſſieu, called "Plantæ per Galliam, &c."

BARRERE, Peter, a phyſician of Perpignan, author of treatiſes on the color of negroes, 4to. on the hiſtory of equinoctial France, &c. He died 1755.

BARRETT, George, a native of Dublin, eminent as a ſelf-taught painter. In his youth he obtained the prize of 50l. from the Dublin ſociety for the beſt landſcape in oil, and in 1762 he gained a ſimilar prize from the London ſociety of arts. His moſt admired pieces are preſerved in the collections of the dukes of Portland and Buccleugh, and others. He died 1784, aged 52.

BARRETT, William, a native of Somerſetſhire, who ſettled at Briſtol as a ſurgeon, and for 20 years made collections for the hiſtory of that city. The work was publiſhed in 4to. 1788, and the author died the next year. He was intereſted much in the Chattertonian controverſy, as he was one of the earlieſt friends of the unfortunate youth.

BARRIERE, Pierre, a man who, from a ſailor, became a ſoldier, and formed the project of aſſaſſinating Henry IV. of France. He imparted this diabolical purpoſe to a monk, who informed the courtiers of the king's danger, and Barriere was ſeized and broken on the wheel at Melun, 1693.

BARRINGTON, John Shute, ſon of Benjamin Shute, merchant, was born at Theobald's Herts. He early imbibed the tenets of the diſſenters, in whoſe favor he wrote ſome treatiſes. He applied himſelf to the law, and ſo conſpicuous were his abilities, that the miniſtry applied to him when he was but 24 years old to exert his influence with the Scotch preſbyterians to promote the union. He was ſucceſsful, and his labors were rewarded by the appointment of commiſſioner of the cuſtoms, in 1708. His character was ſo highly reſpected that John Wildman eſq. of Becket, Berks, though a ſtranger, left him his eſtate, and ſome years after the ſame honorable compliment was paid him by Francis Barrington of Toſts, who had married his relation, and whoſe name and arms he aſſumed. Mr. Shute ſat in parliament for Berwick-upon-Tweed, but he did not diſtinguiſh himſelf as an eloquent or a frequent ſpeaker. In 1720 he was made a peer of Ireland by the title of viſcount Barrington, and died at Becket 1734, in his 66th year. He was the diſciple and the friend of the famous Mr. Locke. He was author of miſcellanea ſacra in two vols. 8vo. explaining the ſpiritual gifts, &c. by which the apoſtles propagated chriſtianity, a work which ſhook the infidelity of Anthony Collins. He wrote alſo other treatiſes on divinity and political ſubjects, a tract on the toleration of proteſtant diſſenters, 1701,—the rights of proteſtant diſſenters in 2 parts, &c.

BARRINGTON, Daines, fourth ſon of lord Barrington, was a Welſh judge, and afterwards second juſtice of Cheſter. Theſe offices he reſigned ſome years before his death, and devoted himſelf to literary purſuits. He was author of obſervations on the ſtatutes, 4to—tracts on the probability of reaching the north pole, 4to. &c. He died 1800, aged 73, at his chambers in the Temple.

BARRINGTON, Samuel, fifth ſon of lord Barrington, diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the taking of St. Lucia, and at the ſiege of Gibraltar with lord Howe in 1782. He was made poſt-captain 1747, rear admiral in 1778, and died 1800, aged 71.

BARROS, or DE BARROS, John, a native of Viſeo, preceptor to the children of Emanuel king of Portugal. After being three years governor of St. George, on the coaſt of Africa, he was made treaſurer of the Indies; and in this employment he formed the deſign of writing the hiſtory of that lately diſcovered part of the globe. He died at Pombal 1570, in his 74th year. His hiſtory is divided into 4 decades, and contains a collection of many hitherto unknown facts, though unadorned with the graces of elegance, or the ſtricteſt attachment to truth.

BARROW, Iſaac, a native of Cambridgeſhire, educated at Peter-houſe. He was ejected in 1643, and retired to Oxford, and was made chaplain of New college, and after the reſtoration he was made biſhop of Sodor and Man, and ſoon after tranſlated to St. Aſaph. He died 1680. The two ſees over which he preſided were much benefited by his liberality.

BARROW, Iſaac, a learned mathematician and divine, of an ancient family in Suffolk, born in London. From the Charter-houſe, where he gave few proofs of application, and many of his fondneſs for fighting, he went to Felſted in Eſſex, where a change of diſpoſition ſoon diſtinguiſhed him. He was admitted penſioner of Peter-houſe, Cambridge, 1643; but when he went to reſide, he became member of Trinity college. He was afterwards choſen fellow of the college; but though his income was ſmall, from the loſſes which the civil war had brought upon his father, he did not ingloriouſly ſubmit to the ruling powers; and though he ſubſcribed to the covenant, he ſoon repented, and inſiſted upon the eraſure of his name. His ſtudies were directed to divinity; and ſoon after he applied himſelf with indefatigable zeal to aſtronomy, and made a rapid progreſs beſides in anatomy, botany, and chemiſtry. Upon not being elected Greek profeſſor, he reſolved to travel, and to ſupply his expences he parted with his books, 1655. He viſited Paris, Leghorn, and Florence, and every where enriched the ſtores of his mind by obſervation and inquiſitive reſearches. His pecuniary difficulties were removed by the liberality of Mr. James Stock, a young merchant of London, whom he met at Florence; and in his way from Leghorn to Smyrna, he diſplayed uncommon courage, by aſſiſting the crew of the veſſel in beatin off an Algerine corſair that threatened the with death or ſlavery. He paſſed from Smyr na to Conſtantinople, where he reſided on year, and returned to England through Ve nice, Germany, and Holland, in 1659. H took orders, agreeable to the ſtatutes of h college, and in 1660 was elected to the Gree profeſſorſhip of the univerſity, and two yea after to that of geometry in Greſham col lege. The next year he was made Lucaſia mathematical lecturer at Cambridge, an o fice which, in 1669, he reſigned to his gre friend Iſaac Newton. He received prefer ment from his uncle, biſhop of St. Aſaph and from Ward biſhop of Saliſbury, and, i 1672, the king, whom he ſerved by his con duct, and flattered by his poetry, made hi maſter of Trinity college, obſerving, wit real truth, that he gave it to the beſt ſchola in England. He was vice chancellor in 1675 but his public ſervices were of ſhort duratio He died of a fever 1677, aged 47, and wa buried in Weſtminſter Abbey, where h friends erected a monument over him. Th writings of Barrow are numerous and valua ble, chiefly on mathematical ſubjects. As divine he was great as well as exemplary, t that Charles II. whoſe chaplain he was, calle him, with propriety, "an unfair preacher, meaning that he exhauſted every ſubject and left nothing for others to ſay. Barrow is a remarkable inſtance of the amendmen which may happily be produced from youth ful irregularities. His conduct when a bo was ſo diſpleaſing to his father, that the ol man was heard to ſay, that if it pleaſed Go to take any of his children, he hoped it migh be his ſon Iſaac. The mathematical part o his valuable works conſiſts of Euclidis elements & data—lectiones geometricæ—Archimedi opera—Apollonii conicorum, libri 4.—Theo doſii ſpheric, libri 3. His ſermons are highl eſteemed, and have been frequently edited His works in Engliſh were publiſhed toge ther by Dr. Tillotſon, in 3 vols. fol. 1682.

BARRY, Girald, a native of Pembroke ſhire. He obtained preferment in the church and was made biſhop of St. David's by th chapter, which, however, could not be ſanc tioned by the pope. When afterwards offere the ſame biſhopric, in 1215, he refuſed it He is author of the hiſtory of the conqueſt o Ireland, and of the topographia Hibernica edited by Camden, 1602,—itinerarium Cam briæ, &c.

BARRY, James, ſon of the repreſentative of Dublin, was in 1629 made king's ſerjeant and in 1634 knighted, and appointed a ba ron of the exchequer. At the reſtoration he was made chief juſtice of the king's bench and raiſed to the peerage, by the title of lor Santry. He was intimate with the unfor tunate Stafford; and died 1673. He wrot the caſe of tenures upon the commiſſion o defective titles.

BARRY

BARRY, Spranger, ſon of a ſilverſmith, was born 1719. After following for two or three years his father's buſineſs, his inclination for theatrical purſuits burſt forth, and in 1744, he appeared on the ſtage, as Othello. As his acting was of ſuperior order, he was received with applauſe; and ranked with the great names of Garrick, Cibber, Sheridan, Quin, and Woffington, who at that ſeaſon were engaged on the Dublin ſtage, and from whoſe exertions in producing full houſes, a Barry, Quin, or Garrick fever, became proverbial for diſeaſes contracted in an overloaded theatre. In 1746, Barry came to England; but his connexion with Drury-lane was of ſhort duration. In Covent-garden, however, he became a formidable opponent to the great Roſcius, as he played the ſame characters, and divided with him the applauſes of the town. After eleven years of arduous contention, Barry joined with Woodward of Covent-garden in an expedition to Ireland, where they built two elegant play-houſes, at Dublin and Cork. The plan did not, however, ſucceed. Barry engaged with Foote at the Opera-houſe, Hay-market, and there introduced his wife in the character of Deſdemona, which ſhe ſupported with ſo much force that Garrick then in the pit, admired her powers, and not only foretold the high rank to which her abilities were ſoon to raiſe her, but actually engaged her and her huſband at Drury-lane. In 1773, he returned to Covent-garden, where, though broken by infirmities, and the gout, he occaſionally called forth thoſe burſts of univerſal applauſe which ſoothed his old age, and brought back to his recollection the exertions of his more vigorous years. He died 1774. His greateſt characters were Othello, Macbeth, Lear, Eſſex, and Jaffier; and ſo powerfully expreſſive of grief were his features, that the ſpectators, ſays a writer of the times, were diſpoſed to pity before he ſpoke, and his broken throbs ſo wrung the ſoul that their diſtreſs could be relieved only by torrents of tears.

BARRY, James, a native of Cork, whoſe genius early marked him for eminence as a painter. His piece on the legendary baptiſm of the king of Caſhel recommended him to the Dublin ſociety for the encouragement of arts; and he was noticed by Burke, Johnſon, ſir Joſhua Reynolds, and other men of great public fame. By the friendſhip of Burke, he travelled on the continent, to improve himſelf in the ſchools of Italy. On his return to England, in 1772, he publiſhed an inquiry into the real and imaginary obſtructions to the acquiſition of the arts in England. About this time he wiſhed to adorn St. Paul's cathedral with religious paintings; but the plan was rejected, as unworthy of the ſimple ſpirit of the proteſtant faith; and therefore he propoſed to the ſociety of arts to adorn their room with allegorical paintings; which patriotic deſign was completed in the labor of ſeven years, in a ſeries of ſix very beautiful pictures. In 1777 he was elelected royal academician, and in 1786 appointed profeſſor of painting. He was, in 1799, removed from his office, and ſoon after expelled from the learned body whoſe fame he had long ſupported by the elegant labors of his pencil and the animated language of his lectures. The cauſe of this diſgrace is attributed to his republican principles. This eminent artiſt was attacked by a paralytic ſtroke, which ten days after proved fatal. He died 1806, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral.

BARRY, George, a Scotch divine, educated at Edinburgh, and ſucceſſively miniſter of Kirkwall and of Shapinhay in the Orkneys, where he died, 1805, aged 57. His ſtatiſtical account of his two pariſhes for ſir John Sinclair was much admired, and his reputation as a writer and as a public teacher procured him from Edinburgh the degree of D. D. Much of his time was devoted to the hiſtory of the ſeven iſlands of the Orkneys, and this very valuable compoſition made its appearance a little before the author's death, in 1 vol. 4to. with maps, &c.

BARTAS, Guillaume de Salluſte du, a French poet, born in Armagnac. He was commander of a corps of cavalry under Henry IV.; and he travelled through England, Denmark, and Scotland. The poem which rendered his fame known, was his commentary of the week of creation, in 7 books; a work in which he diſplayed his conceit, as well as the barbarity of his age, by calling the head the lodging of the underſtanding, the eyes the twin ſtars, the noſe the gutter or chimney, the teeth a double paliſade, uſed as a mill to the open gullet, &c. This poem, though incorrect, in five or ſix years, paſſed through 30 editions. Bartas wrote ſome other poetical pieces, but all in the ſame contemptible ſtile. What, however, renders his character amiable, is the integrity of his life, and the innocence and modeſty of his conduct. He died 1590, at the age of 46. His works were collected by Rigaud, folio.

BARTH, John, was born at Dunkirk, and by his bravery roſe from a fiſherman's occupation to conſequence in the French navy. When he had the command of a ſquadron of ſeven frigates, he eluded the vigilance of the Engliſh and Dutch, who were blocking up Dunkirk, deſtroyed a fleet of 86 Engliſh merchantmen, afterwards made a deſcent near Newcaſtle, where he deſtroyed 200 houſes, and brought back prizes to the value of 500,000 crowns. He often engaged ſuperior forces, and always obtained the advantage; and for his ſervices he was ennobled. In 1694, with a ſmaller number of ſhips, he attacked the Dutch fleet, which had captured the merchant ſhips, laden with corn, which he was ordered to join, and had the good fortune to take the whole of the enemy, beſides thoſe of his own nation that had ſurrendered. His uncouth figure and rough manners were the ridicule of the courtiers of Lewis XIV. When the monarch told him that he had made him chief d'eſcadre, you have done very well, replied the unpoliſhed ſeaman. He could neither read nor write, but merely was able to ſcrawl his name. He died at Dunkirk, 1702, of a pleuriſy, at the age of 51.

BARTHE, Nicolas Thomas, author of ſome dramatic pieces, of a tranſlation of Ovid's art of love into French verſe, &c. was a native of Marſeilles, and died at Paris, 1785, aged 52.

BARTHELEMI, Jean Jacques, celebrated as the author of the voyage of Anacharſis, was born near Aubagne, in Provence, 1716. He was educated at Marſeilles, and, after devoting himſelf to Hebrew, Syriac, and Greek, he was admitted into the church. He became, 1744, aſſociate in the care of the medals of the king's cabinet at Paris, and was afterwards ſecretary to the academy of inſcriptions; and on the death of Boze, he ſucceeded as keeper of the cabinet of medals. He viſited Italy in 1755, where he made judicious obſervations on the valuable relics of the lately diſcovered city of Herculaneum. On his return to France, he was honored with a ſeat in the royal ſociety of London, and Choiſeul gave him a penſion of about 250l. a year, to which was added, in 1765, the place of treaſurer of St. Martin de Tours, and, five years after, the poſt of ſecretary-general to the Swiſs guards. His great work, entitled the voyage of the young Anacharſis in Greece, appeared in ſeven vols. 8vo. 1788, and commanded the univerſal admiration of the world. This compoſition was the labor of 30 years, and in elegant and chaſte ſtile exhibited the moſt pleaſing characters of antiquity, interſperſed with philoſophical reflections, intereſting anecdotes, and amuſing deſcriptions, and every where abounded with proofs of judgment, taſte, and erudition. In 1793, the venerable philoſopher was dragged to a priſon; but he was ſoon after liberated, by order of the government, at a moment when, with calmneſs and reſignation, he expected death. He died 1795.

BARTHIUS, Gaſpard, a native of Cuſtrin. As his father was profeſſor of civil law at Frankfort on the Oder, he received the beſt inſtruction, ſo that at 12 years of age he tranſlated the pſalms into Latin verſe, of every meaſure. He unfortunately loſt his father, but his education was not on that account neglected. He went through all the univerſities of Germany, and afterwards viſited Italy, France, Spain, England, and Holland, and made himſelf a perfect maſter of moſt of the foreign languages, as his elegant tranſlations from the Spaniſh and French ſhow. He ſettled at Leipſic; and in his old age he relinquiſhed all worldly affairs for devotion. He died 1658, aged 71. His commentaries on Statius and Claudian, in 4to. and his adverſaria, in fol. are his beſt works.

BARTHOLIN, Gaſpard, a native of Malmoe, in Schonen, who is ſaid, at the age of 3, to have learned to read perfectly in fourteen days and to have compoſed with correctneſs, at 13 ſome Greek and Latin orations. He travelled through the greateſt part of Europe, and at laſt ſettled at Copenhagen as Latin profeſſor an employment which, ſix months after, he exchanged for the chair of medicine. A ſevere illneſs, however, alarmed his conſcience, naturally weak, and he vowed to apply himſelf to divinity if he recovered. He kept his vow and afterwards ſucceeded to the theological profeſſorſhip. He died of a violent cholic 1629, at Sora, aged 44. His works were on anatomy, metaphyſics, logic, and rhetoric.

BARTHOLIN, Thomas, ſon of the preceding was born at Copenhagen, 1616. He ſtudied phyſic at Leyden, Paris, Montpellier, Padua Malta, and Baſil; and in 1646 he returned to his native city, where he was appointed mathematical profeſſor, and the next year promoted to the anatomical chair. Thirteen years after he retired to his ſmall eſtate of Hageſted, near the capital, where his hopes of literary eaſe were diſturbed by the deſtruction of his library and valuable papers by fire, in 1670. His misfortunes did not paſs unnoticed. The univerſity of Copenhagen made him librarian, and the monarch made him his phyſician with a handſome ſalary, exemption from taxes and the honor of a ſeat in the council of Denmark. He died 1680.

BARTHOLIN, Thomas, ſon of the preceding profeſſor of hiſtory and law at Copenhagen and counſellor to the king, died 1690. He publiſhed antiquitates Danicæ, &c. His brother Eraſmus, was profeſſor of geometry and medicine at Copenhagen, and died 1698, aged 73. Another brother called Gaſpar, ſucceeded his father in the anatomical chair—John was profeſſor of theology—and a daughter called Margaret, was eminent as a poetefs in the Daniſh language.

BARTHOLOMEW, St. one of the apoſtles who preached the goſpel in the Indies. It is ſaid that he was flead alive in Armenia.

BARTHOLOMEW, The Martyr, a native of Liſbon, who attended the council of Trent and was urgent for the introduction of a reform among the clergy. He was archbiſhop of Braga, where, during a peſtilence, he behaved with all the kindneſs of a friend, and the benevolence of a good Chriſtian. He retired in his old age from his ſee to a monaſtery and died 1590, aged 76. His works have appeared in two vols. fol.

BARTLET, John, was miniſter of St. Thomas, near Exeter, from which he was ejected for refuſing to conform. He died in a good old age. He was author of ſome divinity tracts. His brother William was alſo ejected from Bideford rectory, and was a violent independent. He died 1682, author of a model of church government.

BARTOLI, Daniel, a jeſuit of Ferrara, who publiſhed ſeveral hiſtorical works, in Italian. His beſt compoſition was an hiſtory of his ſo-

ciety, in six vols. fol. translated into Latin by Giannini. He died at Rome, 1685, aged 77.

BARTON, Elizabeth, a religious impostor in the age of Henry VIII. called the holy maid of Kent. The convulsive fits, to which she was subject, were converted to purposes of deception by Masters the minister of Aldington, her native place, and she was so perfectly instructed in her art, that she imposed upon the enlightened mind of sir Thomas More, bishop Fisher, and archbishop Warham. Her external conduct and devotion countenanced her professions, and she was believed when she asserted that she saw visions of angels, and that in her trances the virgin Mary appeared to her. When the artifice had so far succeeded, she began to prophesy, and acknowledged that God had revealed to her, that if Henry divorced his queen, his reign would not extend to a month's duration. The popish priests, encouraged by her success, fanned the flame, the king's character was blackened, and he was even insulted to his face by some of his preachers, till the boldness of the imposture roused his resentment. The maid and her accomplices were produced before the star-chamber, the whole plot was revealed, and the confession of the actors was publicly read to the astonished populace at St. Paul's cross, and the holy maid and her confederates Masters, Bocking, Deering, &c. were condemned and executed at Tyburn, 1534.

BARUCH, the prophet, author of a book not received as canonical, was the friend and associate of Jeremiah.

BARWICK, John, a native of Westmoreland, educated at Sedberg-school, where he acted with credit the part of Hercules in one of Seneca's tragedies. At St. John's, Cambridge, he gained so much reputation that, when only 20 years of age, he pleaded before the privy council, in the controverted election of a master. He wrote against the covenant, and procured the plate of the university for the king's service, and managed with secrecy his correspondence when at Carisbrook-castle, and in other places. His attachment was transferred to Charles II. but he was at last betrayed by one Bostock, of the post-office, and he was imprisoned. To his great sagacity and retentive memory, Clarendon, it is said, owes many of the materials of his history. On the restoration of Charles, Barwick refused the bishopric of Sodor and Man, and that of Carlisle, satisfied with the deanry of Durham, which he afterwards exchanged for that of St. Paul's. He died of a pleurisy 1664, aged 52.

BARWICK, Peter, brother of the dean, was eminent as a physician for his skill in the small pox. He published in Latin a life of his brother, and supported Harvey's doctrine of the circulation of the blood, &c. He died 1705.

BAS, le, a French engraver of eminence. His landscapes and sea pieces were well executed. He died since 1765.

BASEDOW, John Bernard, a native of Hamburgh, son of a barber. He obtained in 1753 the chair of professor of moral philosophy and belles lettres at Soroe, in Denmark, which he afterwards lost for speaking irreverently of religion. He next tried a plan of education in a new method, but though he obtained large sums of money to carry his schemes into execution, the measures failed upon trial. He was author of various works of no great merit, and died 1790, aged 67, a victim, it is said, to intemperance.

BASHUYSEN, Henry James Van, a native of Hanau, professor of ecclesiastical history, and of the oriental languages. He was afterwards called to the divinity chair of Berlin. He printed in his own house various learned works, chiefly on rabbinical subjects, and died 1758, aged 79.

BASIL I. a native of Adrianople, of an obscure family. He was taken prisoner by the Bulgarians when a soldier, and escaped to Constantinople, where he was noticed by the emperor Michael, and at last taken as partner of the empire. Basil discovered that Michael, jealous of him, intended his destruction, and he anticipated the blow, and became sole emperor in 867. He reigned till 886, when he was killed by a stag in hunting.

BASIL II. emperor of Constantinople after John Zimisces, died 1025, aged 70, after a reign of 50 years. His inhumanity is remarkable, after he had defeated the Bulgarians, he permitted only one in every 100 to retain his eye-sight, that he might conduct his 99 eyeless companions to their terrified monarch, who, it is said, survived only two days the horrid spectacle.

BASIL, an impostor, who disturbed the peace of Constantinople in 934, by pretending to be Constantine Ducas, who had been dead for some years. He was seized and burned alive at Constantinople.

BASIL, a physician, the head of the Bogomiles, in Bulgaria, who recommended a community of goods, and even of wives. He was condemned for his heresy, by a synod at Constantinople. He pretended that God had another son called Sathanael, who revolted against his father, and was hurled from heaven with the angels, which espoused his cause, and that he was afterwards shut up in hell by Christ, who had been sent to destroy him.

BASILISCES, brother of Verina, wife of Leo I. emperor of the East, was unsuccessful in an expedition against Genseric. He afterwards seized the empire under Zeno Isauricus, and governed with cruelty. Two years after 477, he was defeated by the deposed emperor, and perished in a prison.

BASILOWITZ, Iwan, a bold hero, who rose against the Tartars, and in giving freedom to his countrymen, laid the foundation of the Russian power, and first assumed the name of Czar. He reigned 50 years, and died 1584.

BASINE, wife of Basin, king of Thuringia, fled from her husband to espouse Childeric I.

"Had I known a more valiant hero than yourſelf," ſaid ſhe to this new lover, "I would have flown over the ſeas to his arms." She was mother of Clovis.

BASINGSTOKE, or BASINGE, John, was born at Baſingſtoke, and ſtudied at Oxford and Paris. He viſited Athens, and brought back ſeveral Greek MSS. His works are ſermons, Latin tranſlations from Greek books, &c. He is ſuppoſed to have firſt introduced the uſe of Greek numeral figures into England. He died about 1252.

BASIRE, Iſaac, D.D. a native of Jerſey, who ſtudied at Cambridge. During the rebellion he retired to Oxford, and in 1646, travelled towards the Levant, to recommend the doctrines of the church of England to the Greeks. After preaching in Greek to the clergy of the Morea, he went to Aleppo and Jeruſalem, where he viſited the temple of the ſepulchre, and returned through Meſopotamia and Conſtantinople to Tranſylvania, where George Ragotzi II. raiſed him to a divinity profeſſor's chair. On the return of Charles II. he came back to England, and was promoted to a prebend of Durham, and died 1676. His works were diatriba de antiq. Eccleſ. Brit. libertate,—a letter to ſir Richard Brown, &c. the hiſtory of the Engliſh and Scotch preſbytery, &c.

BASKERVILLE, John, a native of Worceſterſhire, diſtinguiſhed as a printer. From a writing maſter at Birmingham, he became a japanner, and five years after, in 1750, he commenced printer. He ſpent much money in the improvement of this favorite purſuit, and it was not before 1756 that he publiſhed his firſt work, a beautiful 4to. edition of Virgil. Other books equal in beauty iſſued from his preſs, till in 1765 he ſolicited his friend Dr. Franklin to procure him at Paris purchaſers for his types. The expences of the war prevented his meeting the encouragement which he hoped, but after his death the types, much to the diſgrace of the bookſellers of London, as well as the Britiſh nation, were doomed to add celebrity to the labors of the literati of France, who purchaſed them in 1779 for 3700*l.* and ſoon after expended not leſs than 100,000*l.* in printing the works of Voltaire. Baſkerville, in his private character, was indolent, peeviſh, and reſentful, and he was ſo far an infidel that he raiſed himſelf a mauſoleum in his ground that his body might not reſt among Chriſtians, whoſe religion he diſregarded. He died 1775, aged 69.

BASKERVILLE, Sir Simon, knight, was born at Exeter, and ſtudied at Exeter college, Oxford. In 1606, he was ſenior proctor of the univerſity. He devoted himſelf to medicine, and, as a phyſician in London, he obtained diſtinction, and the honor of knighthood, and amaſſed ſo large a fortune, that he was called Baſkerville the rich. It is ſaid that he had no leſs than 100 patients a week, and the hoſpitality of his life deſerved the ſucceſs which he obtained. He died 1641, aged 68.

BASNAGE, James, a native of Rouen, in Normandy. He ſtudied at Saumur under Tanaquil Faber, and went at the age of 17 to Geneva, where he prepared himſelf for the miniſtry. He ſettled in his native town, but the diſgrace of the proteſtants in 1685 drove him to Rotterdam, till the penſionary Heinſius obtained for him in 1709 a ſhare in the miniſtry of the Walloon church at the Hague. Baſnage was diſtinguiſhed as a divine, and a ſtateſman, ſo that Voltaire ſaid with truth that he was more fit to be a miniſter of ſtate than of a pariſh. His abilities were courted by the regent Orleans, who directed his ambaſſador du Bois to follow his advice in the negociation for an alliance between Holland, France, and England; and the exiled proteſtant, as a reward for his ſervices, obtained the reſtitution of all his forfeited property. As a ſcholar Baſnage was of a ſuperior order, in private life he was affable, candid, and ſincere, and he cultivated friendſhip with the greateſt men in Europe, his epiſtolary correſpondence with whom does honor to his head and heart. He fell a victim to a complication of diſorders 1723, in his 70th year. His works are numerous, and his hiſtory of the Jews ſince the time of Chriſt, 15 vols. 12mo. 1716, is particularly valuable.

BASNAGE, Henry, brother to James, was advocate at Rouen, but fled to Holland upon the proſcription of the proteſtants, and died there 1710, in his 54th year. Among other works, he reviſed the dictionaire of Furetiere, 3 vols. folio.

BASNAGE, Benjamin, a proteſtant miniſter of Carentan, and author of a valuable treatiſe on the church. He aſſiſted at the national ſynod of Charenton, and died 1652, in his 72d year.

BASNAGE, Anthony, eldeſt ſon of Benjamin, was miniſter of Bayeux, and fled to Holland on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, where he died 1691, aged 81.

BASNET, Edward, a native of Denbighſhire, made in 1537 dean of St. Patrick, in Ireland. During O'Neal's rebellion, he eſpouſed the cauſe of government, and marched at the head of the troops under the lord lieutenant, and for his ſervices was made a privy counſellor, and received a grant of the lands of Kilternan, in the neighbourhood of Dublin.

BASSAN, James du Pont, a painter, born at Baſſan, in Italy. His pieces are generally on ſubjects of landſcapes, animals, and night ſcenes, and ſo ſucceſsful, that Annibal Carracci was himſelf deceived by a book which he had drawn on a wall, and which he attempted to ſeize, as if real. In his flowers he interwove ſerpents with great dexterity, though little taſte. His valuable pieces were diſperſed through Europe; and among others, Titian purchaſed ſeveral of them. Baſſan died at Venice

Venice, 1592, aged 80, leaving four ſons, all painters. Of theſe Francis was employed by the Venetian republic, with Paul Veroneſe and Tintoret, to adorn the palace of St. Mark. He was of a melancholy turn, and, in a fit of ſelf-created terror, he threw himſelf out of a window, and died ſoon after, 1694, aged 44. Leander, another brother, obtained the collar of St. Mark, from the doge of Venice. John Baptiſte and Jerome were eminent as imitators of the ſtile of their father.

BASSANDYNE, Thomas, a Scotchman, educated at Antwerp. He learned the art of printing at Paris and Leyden, and returned home in 1558. He joined the reformers, and printed ſeveral books. He died 1591.

BASSANTIN, James, a Scotchman, who after ſtudying aſtronomy and the mathematics, at Glaſgow, travelled through the Netherlands and Germany, and at laſt ſettled at Paris. He returned in 1652 to his native country, and became early acquainted with ſir Robert Melvil, a ſtrong partizan of Mary, queen of Scots, and he afterwards ſupported the ambitious views of Murray. Baſſantin died 1568. In his religion he was a zealous proteſtant, and as a man of learning he was ſtrongly tinctured with the ſuperſtition of the time. He placed great confidence in aſtrology, and with more zeal than good ſenſe aſſerted the influence of the planets on the affairs of the world. His works are all on mathematical ſubjects, and bear ſtrong teſtimony to his merits as a philoſopher.

BASSELIN, Oliver, a fuller of Vire, in Normandy, in the 15th century, known for his ballads, called Vaudevilles, by corruption for Vaux de Vire, the place where he lived.

BASSET, Peter, chamberlain to Henry V. accompanied that prince in all his expeditions, of which he has given an account in one volume.

BASSI, Laura, wife of Joſeph Verati, honored in 1732 with the degree of doctor of philoſophy for her mental accompliſhments, diſplayed in her lectures on experimental philoſophy. Her private life was alſo deſerving of the higheſt encomiums. She died 1778.

BASSOMPIERRE, Francois de, a marechal of France, confined in the Baſtille by Richelieu, who dreaded the power of his ſatire. He remained in this confinement 10 years, till the death of his perſecutor, and employed his time in writing his memoires, 3 vols which are intereſting, though occaſionally trivial. On his releaſe, he received the offer of 500,000 livres from the ducheſs of Aiguillon, niece of Richelieu, which he politely refuſed, adding, "Madam, your uncle has done me too great an injury, to allow me to receive ſo much good from you." He was employed in embaſſies by Lewis XIII. and he poſſeſſed all the requiſites of a courtier, with great preſence of mind, affability, and wit. He ſpoke the languages of Europe with great fluency. He was much addicted to play and women, ſo that it is ſaid, that on the morning in which he was arreſted, he burned not leſs than 6000 letters which he had received from ladies of gallantry. He was found dead in his bed, 1646, in his 67th year.

BASSVILLE, Nicholas John Hugon de, a Frenchman, ſent as envoy to Rome to reclaim ſome of his countrymen impriſoned there. During a tumult he was ſtabbed with a razor, 1793, and died 34 hours after. This violence offered to his perſon was made a pretence for ſevere meaſures againſt the pope. Baſſville wrote elements of mythology, 8vo.—memoirs of the French revolution, &c.

BASSUEL, Peter, a native of Paris, diſtinguiſhed as a ſurgeon and a lecturer. His diſſertations in the memoirs of the academies are valuable compoſitions. He died 1757, aged 51.

BASTA, George, a native of Rocca, near Tarentum, diſtinguiſhed as a warrior in the ſervice of the duke of Parma, and of the emperor, in Hungary and Tranſylvania. He died 1607, author of two treatiſes in Italian, on military diſcipline.

BASTARD, Thomas, a native of Blandford, educated at Wincheſter ſchool, and New college, Oxford, from which he was expelled for a libel. He obtained preferment by means of the earl of Suffolk, and was diſtinguiſhed as a poet. His faculties were diſordered on the cloſe of his life, and he died in an obſcure ſituation near Dorcheſter, 1618. He was a man of learning, and chiefly eminent for his facetious converſation. He publiſhed epigrams, ſermons, &c.

BASTON, Robert, a Carmelite monk, poet laureat, and public orator at Oxford. He attended Edward I. againſt Scotland, but he was taken priſoner, and inſtead of celebrating the victories of his maſter, he was compelled by torture to ſing the ſucceſſes of the Scotch. He wrote ſeveral works in a ſtile barbarous, but not totally contemptible, for the age in which he lived. He died 1310.

BASTWICK, Dr. John, a native of Eſſex, born 1593, educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge. He travelled nine years, through Europe, and became doctor of phyſic at Padua. His publication called flagellum pontificis, &c. drew upon him the reſentment of the biſhops, and he was fined 1000*l.*, excommunicated, &c. and impriſoned, till he made a recantation. In his confinement, of two years, he wrote ſeveral things, and inveighed againſt the ſeverity of his treatment. He was therefore fined 5000*l.*, ſentenced to be pilloried, to loſe his ears, and to be impriſoned for life. He was conſequently immured in St. Mary's caſtle, in the Scilly iſlands, till the civil wars put an end to his ſufferings. In 1640, the commons voted the proceedings againſt him illegal; he was recalled to London amidſt the acclamations of thouſands, and he was repaid the fine from the forfeited eſtates of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the other commiſſioners who had ſo ſeverely treated him.

BATE, John, D.D. prior of the Carmelites at York, was born in Northumberland, and ſtudied at Oxford. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his knowledge of philoſophy, divinity, and Greek, and he publiſhed ſeveral things chiefly critical and theological, and died 1429.

BATE, George, a phyſician, born near Buckingham. He ſtudied at New college, Queen's, and St Edmund's hall, Oxford, and practiſed in the univerſity. He was phyſician to Charles I. while at Oxford, afterwards to Oliver Cromwell, and to the royal family after the reſtoration. His recommendation to the favor of Charles II. originated, it is ſaid, in the report that he had given the uſurper a ſtrong doſe which haſtened his death. He wrote a Latin account of the civil wars, &c. and died 1669.

BATE, Julius, a friend of Hutchinſon, by whom he was recommended to Charles duke of Somerſet, and to the living of Sutton, in Suſſex. He attended Hutchinſon in his laſt illneſs, and contradicted the report that his friend on his death bed had recanted to Dr. Mead the publication of his writings. Dr. Mead, it is to be obſerved, had much to his ſurpriſe been diſmiſſed from his attendance on Hutchinſon. Bate was author of ſome valuable pieces on criticiſm and divinity, and in defence of his friend's ſyſtem. He died 1771.

BATECUMBE, William; a mathematician, who floriſhed 1420. He ſtudied at Oxford, where he taught mathematics. The chief of his works are, de ſphæræ concavæ fabricâ & uſu—de ſphærâ ſolidâ—concluſione ſophiæ, &c.

BATEMAN, William, biſhop of Norwich, was founder of Trinity-hall, Cambridge. He was well verſed in civil and canon laws, and died 1354, at Avignon.

BATES, William, a non-conformiſt divine, educated at Emanuel and King's colleges, Cambridge. He was chaplain to Charles II. and miniſter of St. Dunſtan's in the weſt, from which he was ejected by the act of uniformity. He was at the conference of the Savoy, and he alſo was, with Jacomb and Baxter, engaged in the diſpute againſt Pearſon, biſhop of Cheſter, Gunning of Ely, and Sparrow of Norwich. His character was ſo reſpectable that, though a non-conformiſt, he might have obtained the deanry of Coventry, or even been raiſed, according to Calamy, to any biſhopric of the kingdom. He was intimate with Tillotſon, Finch, Nottingham, and Bridgman, and publiſhed the lives of ſome eminent men in Latin, in 4to. 1681. His works were publiſhed in a folio volume after his death, and died 1699, aged 73.

BATHE, Henry de, a native of Devonſhire, appointed 1238, under Henry III. to the office of juſtice of the common pleas, and afterwards of juſtice itinerant. Though for a while under diſgrace 1251, in conſequence of ſome ſlanderous accuſation, he was reſtored to royal favor, and advanced to the place of chief juſtice of the king's bench. He died 1261.

BATHE, William, an Iriſh jeſuit, rector of an Irish ſchool at Salamanca, where he died 1614. He is author of introduction to the art of muſic, in 4to. London—janua linguarum, &c.

BATHURST, Ralph, a Latin poet, phyſician, and divine of Trinity college, Oxford, of which he was preſident, 1664. In the younger part of his life he ſtudied phyſic, but after the reſtoration he took orders, and became dean of Wells, and vice chancellor of the univerſity. He refuſed, in 1691, the biſhopric of Briſtol, from his regard for the ſociety over which he preſided, whoſe chapel he rebuilt in a very elegant ſtile. He wrote poems and other pieces, and died 1704, in his 84th year. His life has been written by Thomas Wharton.

BATHURST, Allen, deſcended from the Bathurſts of Northamptonſhire, was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, under his uncle the preſident, and afterwards was elected for two parliaments for Cirenceſter. He oppoſed Marlborough, and was one of the 12 lords introduced in one day, 1711, to the upper houſe, to form a majority. He continued firm to his political friends even in their diſgrace, and boldly oppoſed the attainder of Bolingbroke and Ormond, and in 1718, he ſhowed himſelf as a ſpeaker among the peers the moſt formidable opponent of the meaſures of the court. In 1704, he married Catherine daughter of ſir Peter Apſley, of Suſſex, by whom he had four ſons and five daughters. His only ſurviving ſon was for ſome years chancellor of England, and made a peer by the title of lord Apſley. Lord Bathurſt was employed about the perſon of Frederic prince of Wales, and of his ſon George III. at whose acceſſion he reſigned his offices for a penſion of 1200*l.* In his private character lord Bathurſt was a man of great generoſity, and affable in manners, and his long and familiar acquaintance with Pope, Swift, and Addiſon prove him to have poſſeſſed wit, taſte, and erudition. He was attached to rural amuſements, and fond of conviviality. He drank regularly his bottle after dinner, and laughed at the temperate regimen of Dr. Cadogan which 50 years before Dr. Cheyne had recommended to him, aſſuring him that he ſhould not live ſeven years more if he did not abſtain from wine. He died 1775, aged 91.

BATONI, Pompeo, a native of Lucca, eminent as a painter. His beſt piece is Simon the magician contending with St. Peter, preſerved at Rome in the great church, dedicated to the apoſtle. Batoni died 1787, aged 79.

BATTAGLINI, Mark, biſhop of Nocera and Ceſena, died 1717, aged 71. He wrote hiſtory of councils, folio, and annales, &c. 6 vols.

BATTELY, Dr. John, born at Bury, Suffolk, was fellow of Trinity college Cambridge and chaplain to Sancroft, who gave him the living of Adiſham, and the archdeaconry of the dioceſe. He wrote Antiquitates Rutupinæ, &c. and died 1708, aged 61.

BATTEUX, Charles, philoſophical profeſſor and member of the French academy, &c. was eminent for his erudition, as well as for his private virtues. His works are various, chiefly on claſſical literature, in which he diſplays more method and more labor, than eloquence or purity. His death was accelerated by grief, in obſerving that the elementary book which he wrote for the military ſchool at Paris, did not ſucceed ſo well as he wiſhed. He died at Paris 1780, aged 67. Among other works he publiſhed the four poetics of Ariſtotle, Horace, Vida, and Boileau, with notes, two vols. 8vo.

BATTIE, Dr. William, a phyſician, born in Devonſhire, and educated at Eton, and King's college Cambridge. His views to ſtudy the law were checked by his poverty, and he turned his thoughts to phyſic, and practiſed at Uxbridge and London, and became phyſician to St. Luke's. In 1738, he married the daughter of Barnham Goode, under-maſter of Eton ſchool, a man whom for a ſatirical poem, Pope has immortaliſed in his Dunciad. Dr. Battie was lampooned for the active part which he took with the college of phyſicians againſt Dr. Schomberg in 1750, in the Battiad, a poem ſaid to be written by Schomberg, Moſes Mendez, and Paul Whitehead. Dr. Battie's publications were on medical ſubjects, and all reſpectable. His obſervations on madneſs recommended him to public notice, and he was with Dr. Munro examined at the bar of the houſe of commons, with reſpect to the private madhouſes in the kingdom. Dr. Battie died of a paralytic ſtroke 1776, aged 75. He publiſhed an edition of Iſocrates, two vols. 8vo.

BAUDELOT de DAIRVAL, Charles Cæſar, an advocate of the Parliament of Paris, author of a treatiſe called "de l'utilité des voyages," in two vols. 12mo. He died of the dropſy 1722, aged 74.

BAUDET, Stephen, an eminent French engraver of Blois employed on Pouſſin's pieces. His chief work is Adam and Eve, from Dominichino. He died 1671, aged 73.

BAUDIER, Michæl, a native of Languedoc, hiſtoriographer under Lewis XIII. He wrote the hiſtory of the Mahometan religion,—the life of cardinal Amboiſe,—of Ximenes, Suger, &c.—and though his ſtile is inelegant, his works are curious and intereſting.

BAUDIN, Peter Charles Lewis, a native of Sedan, elected to the national aſſembly and to the convention. It was he who nobly exclaimed on the laws made with reſpect to emigrants, "if among the millions of the guilty, ten innocent perſons can be found, the law which ſtrikes them is unjuſt." He died 1799. He wrote anecdotes on the conſtitution, on the liberty of the preſs, &c.

BAUDIUS, Dominique, a native of Liſle. He viſited England in the ſuite of the Dutch ambaſſador, and formed an acquaintance with ſir Philip Sidney, and afterwards he went to France, where he ſtaid 10 years, and was admitted advocate of the parliament of Paris. He next went to Leyden, where he was profeſſor of elcquence, and hiſtoriographer to the ſtates in 1611. He was a man of genius, as well as erudition, and in his Latin poems he diſplayed taſte and elegance of compoſition. He was a zealous advocate for a truce between Spain and Holland, and two diſcourſes on the ſubject were ſo much miſrepreſented to Maurice, that he was accuſed of being bribed by the French ambaſſador. He died at Leyden 1613, aged 52. He was ſo addicted to wine and to ſenſual pleaſures that his character was expoſed to the ſevereſt ridicule, eſpecially from the pen of Scioppius.

BAUDOIN, Benedict, a divine of Amiens, author of a diſſertation on the ſhoes of the antients.

BAUDOT, de JUILLI, Nicholas, a native of Vendome, author of ſeveral hiſtorical pieces. His hiſtory of the conqueſt of England, by William of Normandy, 12mo.—of Philip Auguſtus, two vols. 12mo.—and Charles VII. two vols. 12mo.—are his beſt pieces. He wrote beſides, the hiſtory of Catherine of France queen of England, &c. and died 1759, aged 81.

BAUDOUIN, John, a native of Pradelle in the Vivarais, in the ſervice of queen Margaret of France. He publiſhed tranſlations of Salluſt, Tacitus, Lucian, Suetonius, &c. but as he wrote more for bread than fame, his language was occaſionally inelegant. He died at Paris 1650, aged 66.

BAUDRAND, Mich. Anton. an eccleſiaſtic, born at Paris. He viſited Rome, Germany, and England, and wrote "Dictionaire Geographique, two vols. fol." printed firſt in Latin, and afterwards in French. He died 1700, in his 67th year.

BAUDRICOURT, Jean de, a marechal of France, who ſignalized himſelf in the conqueſt of Naples, 1495. His father Robert was the perſon who introduced the famous maid of Orleans on the public ſtage.

BAUHINUS, Gaſpar, phyſician to the duke of Wirtemburg, was profeſſor of botany at Baſil, where he died 1624, aged 65. He is ſtiled in his epitaph the phœnix of his age for anatomy and botany, but Riolan accuſes him of ignorance. He wrote Inſtitutiones anatomicæ,—theatrum botanicum,—a treatiſe on hermaphrodites, &c. His ſon John Gaſpar was equally eminent.

BAULOT, or BEAULIEU, James, a lithotomiſt, born of obſcure parents in Franche-conpté. He ſerved in a regiment of cavalry, till he formed an acquaintance with an empirical ſurgeon called Paulouni. After five or ſix years of inſtruction, he began to practiſe for himſelf, and he travelled over different parts of France, and to Geneva and Amſterdam, with the boldneſs of an enthuſiaſt. He uſed to neglect his patients after the operation, adding "I have extracted the ſtone, God will cure the wound." His ſucceſs was ſuch, that at Amſterdam the magiſtrates, in gratitude for his ſervices, had his portrait engraved, and a medal ſtruck. His method was adopted by Cheſelden with ſuch unuſual ſucceſs that it was called the Engliſh operation, though the invention belonged to the French. After viſiting Rome and Vienna, Baulot retired to a ſeat near Beſançon, where he died 1720, aged 69. His life was written by Vacher, 1757, 12mo.

Baume, James Francis de la, a native of Carpentras, author of a poem called the Chriſtiade, in 6 vols. 12mo. written in a pompous and affected ſtile. He wrote beſides "eloge de la paix," and other ſmall pieces; and was for more than 10 years engaged in the Courier de l'Europe. He died at Paris 1757, aged 52.

Baumer, John William, a native of Rheweiler, who ſtudied at Jena and Halle, and left divinity for medicine, of which he was profeſſor at Erfurt. He wrote the natural hiſtory of the mineral kingdom, 2 vols.—of precious ſtones, and other works,—and died 1788, aged 69.

Baumgarten, Alexander Gottlieb, of Berlin, ſtudied at Halle, where he was made profeſſor of philoſophy, and afterwards at Frankfort on Oder. He wrote metaphyſica, 8vo.—Ethica philoſophica, 8vo. &c.—and died 1762, aged 48.

Baur, John William, a painter and engraver of Straſburg. He excelled in pictures of proceſſions, public places, and markets, but his figures are little and mean. He died 1640, aged 30.

Baur, Frederick William Von, a native of Heſſian Hanau, who ſerved in the Heſſian troops in the pay of Britain, 1755. In 1757 he ſerved under Frederic II. of Pruſſia, and in 1769 he entered into the Ruſſian ſervice, and was appointed by Catherine inſpector of the ſalt works of Novogorod. He was alſo employed in ſupplying Moſcow with water, and in making deeper the canal of Peterſburgh, and in conſtructing a capacious harbour at its extremity. He died 1783, author of memoires hiſtoriques & geographiques ſur la Valachia, 8vo.—of a chart of Moldavia, &c.

Baussiri, a Mahomedan, author of a poem in praiſe of Mahomet, who cured him as he ſaid of the palſy in a dream. Every line of the poem ends with an M, the initial of the prophet's name, and it is ſo highly valued that many of the Mahomedans learn it by heart, on account of its maxims.

Bautru, William, a Frenchman famous for his wit. After ſeeing the eſcurial in Spain attended by an ignorant librarian, he told the king that it would be advantageous for him to make his librarian his treaſurer, becauſe, ſaid he to the monarch who enquired why, he never touches what he is intruſted with. He died at Paris 1665, aged 77.

Bauvin, John Gregory, a native of Arras, was eminent for his knowledge of belles lettres. He wrote a tragedy called Arminius, afterwards amended under the name of the Cheruſci. He wrote other pieces, and died 1776 aged 62.

Baux, William de, prince of Orange, received in 1214 from the emperor Frederic I the title of king of Arles and Vienna. He was murdered by the people of Avignon 1218 and his body cut to pieces, and it was this which cauſed the ſiege of Avignon by Lewis VIII. in 1226.

Baxter, Richard, a nonconformiſt, born at Rowton, Shropſhire, 1615. He was appointed maſter of Dudley free-ſchool by the intereſt of Mr. Richard Foley of Stourbridge, and ſoon after admitted into orders. He was one of thoſe who ſhowed their diſlike to an unqualified ſubmiſſion "to archbiſhops, biſhops, et cætera," as they knew not what the et cætera comprehended. In 1640 he was invited to be miniſter at Kidderminſter, but the civil war expoſed him to perſecution, as he eſpouſed the cauſe of the parliament. He retired to Coventry, till the ſucceſs of the republicans recalled him to Kidderminſter. The uſurpation of Cromwell gave him great offence, and he even argued in private with the tyrant on the illegality of his power, but in the only ſermon which he preached before him he wiſely confined his ſubject to the diſſenſions exiſting in the kingdom on religious matters. He preached before parliament the day before the king's return was voted, and likewiſe before the lord mayor for Monk's ſucceſſes. Charles II. made him one of his chaplains, and Clarendon offered him the biſhopric of Hereford which he refuſed, alleging in a letter his reaſons of conſcience, and he only requeſted permiſſion to continue his miniſtry at Kidderminſter. His oppoſition to the church government was now ſo open that he felt the perſecution of the court, and did not even eſcape confinement. In 1672 he came to London, where he built a meeting-houſe in Oxendon-ſtreet, but his preaching was forbidden here as well as in Swallow-ſtreet. In 1682 he was ſeized, and fined 1951. for preaching five ſermons within five miles of a corporation, and he would have been impriſoned had not his phyſician Dr Thomas Cox pleaded the infirmity of his health. His paraphraſe on the New Teſtament drew upon him in 1685 the vengeance of Jeffries, and he was condemned to be impriſoned for two years, but ſix months after he was diſcharged by the interference of lord Powis with James. He died 1691. His compoſitions were very numerous, not leſs than 80 according to Mr. Long of Exeter, or according to Dr. Calamy 120, or 145 ſays the Biographia Britannica. Burnet ſpeaks of him as a man of great piety, whoſe learning would have commanded univerſal eſteem if not directed to politics.

Baxter, William, nephew to the preceding, was born in Shropſhire. His education was ſo neglected, that when he entered at

Harrow

Harrow school at the age of 18, he knew not one letter, and understood nothing but Welch. Application surmounted all difficulties. As a grammarian, a critic, and an antiquarian, he equalled his cotemporaries, as his editions of Horace, Anacreon, his translations of some of Plutarch's, his glossary of Roman antiquities, and his dictionary of British antiquities, sufficiently evince. From a private school at Tottenham high cross, he was elected master of the Mercers' school London, which office he ably filled for more than 20 years. He resigned a little before his death, which happened 1723, in his 73d year. Some of his letters, &c. are preserved.

BAXTER, Andrew, a native of Old Aberdeen, engaged as tutor in Scotland. As he travelled with his pupils, he resided some time at Utrecht, and visited different places in France, Germany, and Flanders. He married a clergyman's daughter at Berwick, by whom he had three daughters and one son, Alexander, whose communications to the Biographia Britannica represent his father as a man of great learning, tried integrity, candor, and humanity. He was intimate with Wilkes, to whom he dedicated one of his works. Of his compositions the most valuable is his enquiry into the nature of the human soul, &c. He died of a complication of diseases, 1750, aged 63. He wrote besides Matho, dialogues, &c. translated.

BAYARD, Pierre du Terrail, chevalier de, a soldier of fortune born at Dauphiné. He followed Charles VIII. to the conquest of Naples and his heroic valor, as well as his generosity and his humanity, have been celebrated. He gave back to the daughter of his hostess at Brescia, the 2000 pistoles which he had received for the protection of the house, and he triumphed over his passion, in refusing to offer violence to a most beautiful woman, whom poverty had submitted to his power. He was with Francis I. at the battle of Marignan, and when mortally wounded, in 1524, he seated himself under a tree, exclaiming, that in his life he had always faced the enemy, and that in his death he would not turn his back upon them. He was in his 48th year, 32 of which had been devoted to the service of his king and country.

BAYER, Theophilus Sigfred, a German, who after visiting Dantzic, Berlin, and other towns of Germany, settled at Konigsberg as librarian, and nine years after, 1726, went to Petersburg, where he became professor of Greek and Roman antiquities. He died there in 1738, aged 44. He wrote a number of valuable dissertations. His Museum Sinicum in two vols. 8vo. is highly esteemed. His grandfather, John, of Augsberg, was a mathematician, chiefly known for his description of the stars in his Uranometria, in which he assigns the names of the Greek letters to the stars of each constellation.

BAYEUX, N. an advocate of Caen, rewarded with the poetical prize of the academy of Rouen for his ode on filial piety. He also translated the Fasti of Ovid, 4 vols. 8vo. with valuable notes, and wrote reflexions on the reign of Trajan, in 4to. He was accused of a criminal correspondence, and the massacres of September in 1792 put an end to his life.

BAYLE, Peter, born 1647, at Carla, a small town of Foix, was educated by his father. His scruples were raised by the controversial books which he perused, and by the conversation of a popish priest, when he attended the Jesuits' college at Toulouse, and he embraced the catholic religion, which 18 months after he renounced as unsupported by revelation. He now was employed as tutor in three private families, but this was too circumscribed for his rising fame, and he retired to Paris, and soon after was made philosophical professor at Sedan, by the united suffrages of the senate of the university. Here he maintained the high character which he had acquired, but the cause of the protestants was not favored at the court of Lewis XIV. and among other establishments the college of Sedan was suppressed 1681. Bayle, thus abandoned, doubted whether he should fly to England or Holland, but an invitation from Rotterdam drew him to that city, where he was appointed professor of philosophy and history. In this peaceful retreat, he began to publish some of his works, which, with the admiration of the learned, brought upon him the resentment and envy of rivals and enemies, and the censure of Christina of Sweden. This princess, who prided herself on her mental acquirements, and who professed herself a catholic, more from conviction than prejudice, had been alluded to by Bayle in one of his journals, as the author of a letter on the persecution of the protestants, and therefore a correspondence was opened with him, and he was persuaded by the queen in a letter, full of conceited terms of high superiority, to apologise for his expressions, and to acknowledge her as the friend of merit. His most inveterate enemies were Jurieu and Renaudot, and it is to be lamented, that men of science cannot engage in controversy without acrimony of language. He was afflicted in his latter years with a decay of the lungs; but considering it as an hereditary complaint, he disregarded medical advice. He died 1706, after writing the best part of the day. The works of Bayle are "thoughts on the comet of 1680, 4 vols. 12mo. in which he introduces with much good sense, profane and religious conclusions,—"nouvelles de la republique des lettres," a very popular periodical work,—a philosophical commentary on the words of our Saviour "compel them to come in," 2 vols. 12mo.—"answers to the questions of a provincial, 5 vols. 12mo."—"lettres in 5 vols."—and a dictionary "historical and critical 4 vols." folio. Of these works, which display strength of mind, deep research, and vast erudition, the dictionary is the most celebrated. In this, however, Bayle gave the reins to the licentiousness tiousness of his ideas. He is to be censured, not only for indelicate expressions frequently introduced with the eagerness of a prurient imagination, but for impious sentiments, and so far did Jurieu prevail against him, that his judges yielded to the truth of the representation, and called upon the author to correct his expressions, in his second edition, from which, consequently, some offensive passages were properly expunged. Among the homage paid to Bayle should be mentioned, not only the opinion of Voltaire, who considers the dictionary as a book where a man may learn to think, but the decree of the parliament of Toulouse. When his relations wished to cancel the will that he had made in Holland, as not valid in France, Senaux one of his judges, with the indignation of a man of humanity, exclaimed, that the learned were citizens of all countries, and that he ought not to be branded with the name of foreigner, in whose birth and writings France had so much reason to glory. In his private character Bayle was liberal and disinterested, he was fond of independence, and maintained his principles under persecution and in distress. His various compositions, besides the dictionary, have been published in 4 vols. folio. Des Maiseaux has written his life.

Bayley, Anselm, minor canon of St. Paul's and Westminster, and subdean of the chapel royal, was educated at Christ Church, Oxford. He died 1794. He was author of some useful publications, the antiquity, confidence, and certainty of Christianity, canvassed, on Dr. Middleton's examination of the bishop of London's discourses on prophecy—practical treatise on singing, &c.—a complete grammar of the English language—a grammar of the Hebrew, with and without points—the old testament Hebrew and English, with remarks, 4 vols. 8vo.—&c.

Bayly, Lewis, a native of Caermarthen, educated at Oxford, and made bishop of Bangor in 1616. He is author of "the practice of piety," which in 1734 reached the 59th edition. The bishop died 1634, leaving four sons.

Bayly, Thomas, son of the preceding, was educated at Cambridge. He was with Charles at Oxford, and defended with lord Worcester Ragland castle; after which he retired to the continent, where he became a papist, and published some controversial tracts. He died in great poverty in Italy, in an obscure hospital.

Bayly, Nathan, was author of an English dictionary, and of some other works.

Baynard, Anne, daughter of a physician of eminence, was born at Preston, Lancashire, 1672. As she was well instructed in classical literature, she wrote Latin with great ease and fluency. She died 1697.

Baynes, sir Thomas, knt. professor of music in Gresham college, was educated at Christ's college Cambridge, and accompanied sir John Finch to Italy and Turkey. He died at Constantinople 1681, aged about 59, and was soon followed to the grave by his friend sir John. They both together left munificent donatio of 4000l. to Christ's college.

Baynes, John, was born at Middleha Yorkshire, and educated at Richmond scho from whence he passed to Trinity college Cam bridge. At the age of 20 he obtained the m dals for the best exercises on mathematical a classical subjects. He entered at Gray's in and espoused, with all the eagerness of a you man, the politics of the times, and he sto forth a vehement champion of reform at Yo in 1779. His abilities were displayed not on by his speeches as a member of the constit tional society, but his poetical talents fann the flame of party. It is difficult to ascerta what he wrote, but the London Courant amo other papers owed its fame for some time his exertions, and he has been considered author of the archæological epistle to de Milles. In his friendship Baynes was warm zealous, and sincere, and at all times a stro advocate for his favorite liberty. He was a tacked by a fever, hastened it is supposed excessive application, and after three days' il ness he expired 1787, aged 29.

Bazire, Claude, a native of Dijon, who the revolution raised to infamous celebrity. the national assembly and in the convention h shone for violent measures, and as the tool the Jacobins he inveighed indecently again the king, and proposed a law to set a price la Fayette. At last Robespierre, tired wi his bloody services, caused him to be co demned, and he suffered with Danton 179 aged 30.

Be, Guillaume le, an engraver and lett founder at Troyes. In 1545, at the age of 2 after seeing the manner of composing types, the house of Robert Stephens, he went to V nice, where he cut punches for the Hebre printing house of Justiniani. He returned Paris, where he died 1598, aged 73. His s Henry was a printer of respectability at Par and his sons and grandsons were equally em nent in the same profession.

Beacon, Thomas, a divine educated Cambridge, and the first who wrote again bowing at the name of Jesus. He retired Germany, under Mary, and wrote a consol tory epistle to the persecuted protestants. U der Elizabeth he obtained a prebend at Ca terbury. Of his works his "de cœnâ domini alone was in Latin in 3 vols. fol.

Beale, Mary, was born in Suffolk, an distinguished herself as a portrait painter in o water colors, and crayons. She copied Peter Lely's and Vandyke's portraits, and w little inferior to her contemporaries. She die 1697, aged 66, leaving two sons, who for som time studied painting. One of them after wards studied physic under Sydenham, an practised at Coventry.

Beard, John, known for his eminence an actor, was brought up in the king's chape and at Cannons in the duke of Chandos' ch pel. He first appeared at Drury-lane in sir

Lovarul

Loverule in the "devil to pay," 1737, but his ſucceſs was interrupted for a few years, by his marriage with Henrietta, daughter of the earl of Waldegrave. He afterwards exchanged Drury-lane for Covent-garden. His wife died 1753, and ſix years after, he married the daughter of Mr. Rich, whom he ſucceeded in the management of Covent-garden. In 1759, he appeared in the character of Macheath, and divided the applauſes of the town for 52 ſucceſſive nights, with Miſs Brent in Polly. In 1768 he retired from the ſtage, and died that year, in his 74th year, reſpected for his private character.

BEATON or BETON, David, archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, was born 1494, and educated at St. Andrew's and Paris. In 1528 he was made lord privy ſeal, and ſome years after he was employed in negociating the king of Scotland's marriage with Magdalen of France, and afterwards that with Mary daughter of the duke of Guiſe. Not only the Scots but Henry VIII. himſelf grew jealous of his influence, and when he was raiſed to the rank of cardinal and the primacy of Scotland, the Engliſh monarch ſent an ambaſſador to king James, to inſinuate the deep and perfidious ſchemes which he meditated in favor of the catholic cauſe. James however was deaf to the repreſentations of Henry, the cardinal ſummoned heretics before him, and directed his reſentment particularly againſt ſir John Borthwick the favorite of the king of England, and George Buchanan, illuſtrious as a poet and hiſtorian. The death of James checked the career of Beaton, who aſpired to the regency, but the envied power was veſted in the hands of Arran, and himſelf confined in Blackneſs caſtle. His intrigues liberated him, he was reconciled to the regent, and again vented his perſecution againſt the proteſtants. Among thoſe who ſuffered was George Wiſhart, who was precipitately tried, condemned, and burnt as a heretic at St. Andrew's, in the preſence of his perſecutor. This inhuman deed rouſed the indignation of the kingdom, and the cardinal's pride kindled a formidable conſpiracy. He rejected a petition of the ſon of lord Rothes, and the indignant youth bound his family to reſent the inſult. The prelate was attacked in his caſtle, his ſervants were ſecured, and the firſt ſound that awoke him from his ſleep were threats againſt his life. He opened his door upon promiſes that no violence ſhould be offered to his perſon, but the fatal ſtab was given by James Melvil, with a cool ferocity, which, while it inſulted the bleeding victim, profanely called upon the God of peace to witneſs the revenge of Wiſhart's innocence. This was in 1546.

BEATON, James, nephew of the archbiſhop, was raiſed to the ſee of Glaſgow before his 25th year. At the reformation in 1560, he fled to France with the records, &c. of his cathedral, which he preſented to the Scotch college of Paris. He left a MS. hiſtory of Scotland, and died 1603, aged 73.

BEATRIX, daughter of the count of Burgundy, married Frederic I. in 1156. It is ſaid that ſhe was inſulted by the people of Milan, and that the emperor revenged her by the deſtruction of the place, and the ignominious puniſhment of the inhabitants.

BEATTIE, James, a Scotch poet, born in Kincardinſhire. He was educated at Aberdeen, and afterwards undertook the care of Alloa ſchool in Fifeſhire. He removed to Aberdeen grammar ſchool as aſſiſtant, and married the daughter of the head maſter. His minſtrel, begun in 1771, and finiſhed in three years, procured him the patronage of lord Errol, and the profeſſorſhip of moral philoſophy and logic in the Mariſchal college of Aberdeen, with a penſion of 200l. from the king. Soon after he viſited London, where he was received by Dr. Johnſon, Dr. Porteus, and other literary characters, with all the reſpect due to merit and virtue. He died 1803. Beſides his elegant poem of the minſtrel, he publiſhed a ſmall volume of poems and tranſlations 1760,—the judgment of Paris 1765,—an eſſay on the nature and immutability of truth, in oppoſition to ſophiſtry and ſcepticiſm, 1770, a work of great merit, and ſo forcible againſt David Hume's doctrines that he never heard the name of Beattie mentioned without emotions — diſſertations moral and critical in 4to. 1783,—the evidences of the Chriſtian religion in two ſmall volumes, written at the requeſt of his friend the biſhop of London, &c.

BEATTIE, James Hay, ſon of the above, was born at Aberdeen 1768. At the age of 13 he entered at the Mariſchal college where he took his maſter's degree in 1786, and before he was 19, he was appointed by the king aſſiſtant profeſſor of moral philoſophy and logic. To the mildeſt manners he united the profoundeſt devotion; he always carried about him a pocket bible and a Greek new teſtament. He was carried off by a nervous atrophy, 1790, to the great grief of his father and of the univerſity. His father publiſhed a ſmall volume of his poetry in 1799, and gave a pleaſing account of his lamented ſon, of whom he obſerves that he never found fault with him more than three or four times in his life. He had impreſſed early upon his mind the rules of morality, and particularly to ſpeak the truth and keep a ſecret, and, I never found, ſays the afflicted father, that in a ſingle inſtance he tranſgreſſed either.

BEATUS RHENANUS, publiſhed, among other claſſical works, the hiſtory of Vell. Paterculus, the works of Tertullian with valuable notes, and other pieces, &c. He died 1547.

BEAU, John Lewis le, a profeſſor of Paris, who wrote a diſcourſe on the dangers which attend literary men from poverty and from opulence. He publiſhed Homer in Greek and Latin, 2 vols. 1746, and Cicero's orations with annotations, 3 vols. 1753, and died 1766, aged 45.

BEAU,

BEAU, Charles le, elder brother of the preceding, was profeſſor of belles lettres at Paris, and like Rollin he enjoyed and deſerved the veneration of a great number of reſpectable pupils. Beſides contributions to the memoires of the academy, he wrote an hiſtory of the lower empire, in 22 vols. 12mo. He died 1778, aged 77. His opera latina were edited 3 vols. 12mo.

BEAUCAIRE de PEQUILLON, Francois, biſhop of Metz, wrote, beſides his treatiſe des enfans morts dans le ſein de leur mere—rerum Gallic. commentaria, from 1461 to 1562, and died 1591. In his hiſtory of France, which appeared after his death, he is too partial to the Guiſes, but otherwiſe he is correct and elegant.

BEAUCHAMP, Richard, earl of Warwick, a brave general who was at the council of Conſtance, and died at Rouen in Normandy 1439, aged 58.

BEAUCHAMPS, Pierre Francois Godard de, was born at Paris, where he died 1761, aged 72. Beſides tranſlations of Rhodantis & Doriclis, and of the loves of Iſmene and Iſmenias, &c.—he wrote "lettres d' Heloiſe & d' Abelard," and reſeaches ſur les theatres de France, in 3 vols.

BEAUCHATEAU, Franc. Matthieu Chatelet de, ſon of a player, born 1645, was diſtinguiſhed as a poet, and early noticed by the mother of Lewis XIV. &c. At 12 he publiſhed ſome of his poems, called la lyre du jeune Apollon, and coming over to England he was admired by Cromwell. He travelled into Perſia, where it is ſuppoſed that he died, as no intelligence was ever after heard of him.

BEAVER, John, a Benedictine of Weſtminſter abbey, in the 14th century, author of a manuſcript chronicle of Britiſh affairs from Brutus to his own time.

BEAUFORT, Margaret, daughter of John Beaufort duke of Somerſet, the grandſon of John of Gaunt, was born in Bedfordſhire, in 1441. She became mother of Henry VII. by Edmund Tudor earl of Richmond; after whoſe death ſhe married ſir Henry Stafford: and for her third huſband ſhe took Thomas earl of Derby. She founded the colleges of Chriſt and St. John, Cambridge. She died 1509.

BEAUFORT, Henry, brother of Henry IV. of England, was ſucceſſively biſhop of Lincoln and afterwards of Wincheſter, chancellor of England, a cardinal and legate in Germany. He crowned, in 1431, Henry VI. in the metropolitan church of Paris. He died 1447.

BEAUFORT, Francois Vendome duc de, ſon of Cæſar duke of Vendome, was born at Paris 1616. He was impriſoned for conſpiring againſt Mazarin, and attempted in vain to excite a rebellion. He acquired celebrity in the civil wars, and againſt the Turks in Africa, and afterwards at the ſiege of Candia, where he was ſlain, in 1669.

BEAUFORT, Louis de, author of the hiſtory of Germanicus,—of a diſſertation on the uncertainty of the five firſt ages of the Roman republic,—of a hiſtory of the Roman republic, &c. was member of the London royal ſociety; and died at Maeſtricht 1795.

BEAULIEU, N. baron de, an Auſtrian general, diſtinguiſhed in quelling the inſurrection of the Brabanters in 1789, and afterwards againſt Biron, the French general. In 1796 he commanded the Auſtrian armies in Italy, but ſunk before the good fortune of Bonaparte, and after loſing the battles of Montenotte, Milleſimo, Mondovi, &c. he reſigned his power to Wurmſer, and died ſoon after.

BEAUMARCHAIS, Peter Auguſtin Caron de, ſon of a clock maker, was born at Paris 1732. He was brought up to his father's profeſſion, and invented a new eſcapement in the machinery of a watch, which was diſputed with him by another artiſt, but honorably adjudged to him. He was alſo eminent as a muſician, and was noticed by the ſiſters of Lewis XV. and liberally patroniſed for the part which he ſupported in their private concerts. Upon the breaking out of the revolution, he fled to Holland, and then to England; but afterwards returned to France, and was impriſoned. Liberated with difficulty from the abbaye, he died ſuddenly, in 1799, aged 69. He wrote memoires contre Goeſman, &c.—memoire in anſwer to W. Kornman,—Eugenie, a drama, —the two friends, a play,—the barber of Seville, a comedy,—the marriage of Figaro,—Tarare, an opera,—la mere coupable, &c. Theſe plays, and his great and indefatigable activity, contributed much to render him independent and rich.

BEAUMELLE, Laurent Angliviel de la, a native of Valleraugues, honorably treated in Denmark, and afterwards at Berlin, where he became acquainted with Voltaire. On his return to Paris, 1753, he was confined in the baſtille for his book called "mes penſées;" but he was reſtored to liberty, and retired to Toulouſe. He was afterwards librarian to the king; but a dropſy in the cheſt rapidly terminated his uſeful career, 1773, in his 46th year. His moſt valuable works are, the memoirs of mad. Maintenon, 6 vols. 12mo.—letters to Voltaire—a commentary on the Henriade—a defence of the ſpirit of laws, &c. He poſſeſſed the powers of wit and ſatire in a reſpectable degree; but it is to be lamented that his perſonalities were ſo illiberal againſt Voltaire, whom, in ſpite of his quarrel, he ſtill reſpected and eſteemed.

BEAUMONT, ſir John, ſon of Francis Beaumont, one of the judges of queen Elizabeth, retired from Oxford, to his native county, Leiceſterſhire. He was knighted by king Charles, and died 1628, aged 46. He wrote the "crown of thorns," a poem, in 8 books—Boſworth-field, &c.—beſides ſome tranſlations from Horace, Perſius, Virgil, &c.

BEAUMONT, Francis, brother to the preceding, ſtudied at Cambridge and the Inner Tem-

Temple. His dramatic pieces, compoſed in conjunction with Fletcher, acquired great celebrity, and though he did not reach his 30th year before he paid the debt of nature, 1615, the correctneſs of his judgment, his taſte, and his genius, have immortalized his name as a poet. He was intimate with Ben Jonſon, who ſubmitted his pieces to his criticizing eye. His works are publiſhed with thoſe of Fletcher.

Beaumont, Joſeph, ſucceſſively maſter of Jeſus college and Peter-houſe, Cambridge, was author of Pſyche, or love's myſtery, in 24 cantos, an allegorical poem, much admired. He wrote obſervations on More's apology, &c. and died 1699, aged 84.

Beaumont de Perefix, Hardouin, archbiſhop of Paris, wrote a valuable hiſtory of Henry IV. for the uſe of Lewis XIV. to whom he was preceptor. He diſplayed with fidelity and elegance, the great virtues of his hero. He died 1670.

Beaumont, mad. le Prince de, a lively writer, whoſe works, in the form of romances, letters, memoirs, &c. were intended to improve youth in morality and religion. She was born at Rouen, 1711, and died at Anneci, 1780.

Beaumont, Elias de, of Carentan, in Normandy, was brought up to the bar; but though he poſſeſſed great powers of mind, he unfortunately was not bleſſed with the gift of pleaſing elocution. The memoire which he wrote on the Calas had a moſt powerful effect over the French nation. He wrote beſides various other memoires of merit. He died at Paris 1785. His wife wrote an intereſting novel, called lettres du marquis de Roſelle, 12mo. and died 1783.

Beaune, Jacques de, a miniſter of the priories under Francis I. He was obliged by threats to give to the queen-mother the 300,000 crowns which had been promiſed to Lautrec for the defence of the Milaneſe, and when the expedition failed he was accuſed of ſpeculation. In his juſtification, he informed the king of the application of the money; but the queen-mother perfidiouſly obtained the receipts from his ſecretary, and the unfortunate miniſter having nothing to produce in his defence, was condemned, and executed, 1527.

Beaurain, Jean de, a native of Aix en Iſſart, known as a negociator and a geographer. He was at the age of 25, geographer to Lewis XV. for whom he compoſed a curious perpetual almanac. His topographical deſcription of the campaigns of Luxemburg from 1690 to 1694, in 3 vols. fol. were highly valued. He died at Paris 1771, aged 75.

Beaurieu, Gaſpard Guillard de, a French writer, born in Artois 1728, died at Paris 1795. He was eccentric in his dreſs and character, though in his converſation he was lively, witty, and entertaining. He wrote various things, the beſt known of which are l'eleve de la nature, the pupil of nature, 2 vols. 8vo. often reprinted—cours d'hiſtoire naturelle, 7 vols. 12mo. &c.

Beausobre, Iſaac de, a proteſtant of Niort, who fled to Berlin for tearing the king's ſignet from the door of a reformed church which he was forbidden to enter. The king of Pruſſia eſteemed him, and he deſerved his confidence by his erudition, and the ſpirit and morality of his diſcourſes. Of his writings the moſt eſteemed was his hiſtory of the Manichæans, 2 vols. a work praiſed by Gibbon. He died 1738, aged 79. He wrote beſides a defence of the reformation—a tranſlation of the New Teſtament, with notes, &c.

Beausobre, Louis de, ſon of the preceding, was born at Berlin. He wrote philoſophical diſſertations on fire, "les ſonges d'epicure," &c. He died of an apoplexy, 1783, aged 53.

Beauvais, Guillaume, a native of Dunkirk, author of a hiſtory of the Roman emperors by medals, 3 vols. 12mo. He died at Orleans, 1773, aged 75.

Beauvais, Charles Nicolas, a native of Orleans, known as a violent and ſeditious member of the national aſſembly and of the convention. He died at Montpellier, 1704. He wrote eſſays hiſtoriques ſur Orleans, 8vo. —deſcription topographique du mont Olivet, 8vo. &c.

Beauzée, Nicolas, author of an univerſal grammar, or expoſition of the elements of languages, 2 vols. 8vo.—of an expoſition of the hiſtorical proofs of religion, and other works, was member of the academy, and profeſſor of grammar in the military ſchool. He was born at Verdun, and died at Paris, 1789, aged 72.

Bebele, Henry, a native of Juſtingen, in Swabia, profeſſor of eloquence at Tubingen. He was an able Latin ſcholar, and received the poetical crown, in 1501, from Maximilian I. Beſides "opuſcula Bebeliana," he wrote tracts, &c.

Beccadelli, Lewis, a native of Bologna, who followed the fortunes of cardinal Pole, of whom he wrote an account, in Latin. He was ambaſſador at Venice and Augſburg, and had the care of Ferdinand ſon of Coſmo I. duke of Tuſcany. He reſigned the archbiſhopric of Raguſa; but was diſappointed in his expectations to ſucceed to Piſa. He died 1572, aged 80. He wrote a life of Petrarch, in Italian.

Beccadelli, Antonio, a native of Palermo, profeſſor of belles lettres at Pavia. He was crowned with the poetic laurel by Sigiſmund, 1432, and died at Naples 1471, aged 97. His epiſtles, &c. were printed at Venice 1453. He wrote alſo a book on the ſayings and actions of Alphonſo king of Arragon; and was ſo partial to Livy, that he ſold an eſtate to purchaſe a copy of the hiſtorian.

Beccafumi, Dominique, a ſhepherd of Sienna, whoſe abilities were obſerved and encouraged by Beccafumi, one of his countrymen. In gratitude he exchanged the name of his family, Mecarino, for that of his benefactor.

factor. He died at Genoa, 1549, aged 65. His St. Sebastian is much admired.

BECCARI, Augustine, a native of Ferrara, the first Italian who wrote pastorals. His "il sacrificio" appeared 1555. He died 1560.

BECCARIA, John Baptist, a learned monk of Mondovi, a teacher of philosophy and mathematics at Palermo, Rome, &c. He wrote dissertations on electricity, and an essay on the cause of storms, &c. He died at Turin, 1781.

BECCARIA James Bartholomew, a native of Bononia, who studied medicine, and became professor of natural philosophy at Bononia. As a medical reader he acquired opulence and fame. His publications on philosophical and medical subjects were numerous, so that his opinion was courted by the learned of Europe, and his name enrolled among their most respectable societies. Beccaria studied the diseases of the temper as well as those of the body; and by perseverance he converted a sour disposition to mildness and placid composure. He died 1766, aged 84.

BECCARIA, Cæsar Bonesana marquis, an Italian philosopher. He published a treatise on crimes and punishments, which proved a popular work, and was translated into various languages—disquisitions on the nature of style, &c. He died 1795, aged 75.

BECCUTI, Francis, an Italian poet, professor of law in his native town of Perugia. He died 1509, aged 44. He is known by his burlesque poetry, in imitation of Berni.

BECERRA, Gaspard, a Spanish sculptor and painter in fresco, the pupil of Raphael. His best piece is a virgin, made by order of Isabella of Valois. He died 1570.

BECKER, John Joachim, successively physician to the electors of Mentz and Bavaria, died at London 1685, aged 40. He possessed great genius, and his discoveries in chemistry and mechanics were many and important; but these were obscured by impetuous passions, which raised him enemies, and obliged him to fly from Germany for an asylum in Britain. His publications were seven in number, on philosophical subjects, the chief of which is physica subterranea, &c.

BECKER, Daniel, a physician of the elector of Brandenburg, who died in his native city of Konigsberg 1760, aged 43. He was author of commentarius de theriacâ, &c. 8vo. &c.

BECKET, Thomas, was born at London, 1119, and educated at Merton abbey, in Surrey, and afterwards at Oxford and Paris. He passed to Bononia, in Italy, where he studied civil law, and embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and was made by Henry II. chancellor, 1158. As a courtier, Becket assumed all the gaiety of the times, and when he attended the king to Toulouse, he maintained in his train 1200 horse, besides 700 knights or gentlemen. On the vacancy of Canterbury, Becket was raised to the see, but, by resigning the seals of chancellor, he offended the king; and his haughtiness, and the high tone in which he asserted the privileges of the church, further widened the breach. Henry wished for a community of laws, but Becket refused to repress the disorders of his clergy by suffering them to be tried in the same manner as the laity, and though he assented to the constitutions of Clarendon, he retracted his acquiescence, and resigned his office at the feet of the pope, who not only forgave, by reinstating him, but espoused his cause, and annulled the decrees. Henry, displeased with the conduct of Becket, banished his adherents, and sent them in disgrace to their exiled master. After a while, the haughty prelate condescended to see his sovereign 1167, but broke off the conference, because Henry refused to give him the kiss of peace. In 1169, another meeting took place on the confines of Normandy, and a reconciliation was effected, and the king, in proof of his sincerity, held the bridle of Becket's horse while he mounted and dismounted twice. On his return the primate refused to restore the excommunicated bishops; and so irritated was Henry on hearing this, that he exclaimed, "he was an unhappy prince, since none of his followers had either spirit or gratitude to revenge his wrongs on so insolent a priest." The words animated four of his courtiers, who sailed for England, and dashed out the prelate's brains before the altar of his cathedral, 1171. The murderers fled, and to expiate their crimes, undertook a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, where they died. The news of Becket's death alarmed Henry, who not only exculpated himself before the pope, but performed penance at the shrine of the murdered priest, and, after passing the night on the cold pavement in penitence and prayer, he suffered himself to be scourged by the monks. To his death and not to his virtues Becket was indebted for these honors. He not only became a saint by the indulgence of the church, but numerous miracles were wrought at his tomb. The spot was visited by thousands with religious awe, and the shrine of the saint was adorned with whatever was most costly and valuable in the kingdom.

BECKINGHAM, Charles, an eminent dramatic writer, two of whose pieces, Henry IV. of France, and Scipio Africanus, were acted before he completed his 20th year. He died 1730, aged 32.

BECKINGTON, Thomas, a native of Somersetshire, in the fifteenth century, author of a book about the rights of the English monarchs in France. He was of New college, and bishop of Bath and Wells.

BEDA, Noel, an ecclesiastic, born in Picardy, and raised to the headship of the college of Montaign. His attack on Erasmus was so severe that the offended scholar convicted him of asserting 181 lies, 210 calumnies, and 47 blasphemies. It was by his influence that the Sorbonne did not pronounce in favor of the divorce of Henry VIII. He died in exile, in the abbey of Mount St. Michael, 1537.

BEDA, or BEDE, surnamed the Venerable, was born at Wearmouth or Jarrow, in the county of Durham. His time was devoted to the severest studies, and his name became so respectable, that pope Sergius in vain solicited his presence at Rome. Confinement and application at last overpowered his constitution; but though laboring under the complicated weight of a consumption and an asthma, he continued occasionally to impart instruction to the monks of the monastery, till he expired, 735, aged 63. Of his writings, all in Latin, the most celebrated were his ecclesiastical history from the time of Julius Cæsar to his own age, collected from the annals of convents and ancient chronicles—his commentaries on scriptures, &c. Though he possessed all the puerile credulity of the times, and indulged in the relation of legendary miracles, he wrote with surprising facility, but without elegance, art, purity, or reflection. He was, according to Camden and others, a man of superior powers of mind, and he shone like a meteor in the darkness of a barbarous age. So valuable were his writings considered that a council ordered them to be publicly read in churches.

BEDELL, William, a prelate, born 1570, at Black Notley, in Essex. He studied at Emanuel college, Cambridge, resided upon the living of St. Edmundsbury, Suffolk, and five years after, 1604, he went to Venice, as chaplain to the ambassador sir Henry Wotton. During a residence of eight years here, he studied Hebrew, and formed a friendly and intimate acquaintance with Paul Sarpi, and others celebrated for their learning and piety. On his return home he was presented to Horingsheath, and 12 years after elected provost of Trinity college, Dublin, and two years after was raised to the see of Kilmore and Ardagh. In this station Bedell behaved with that strong sense of propriety which his private manners so much promised. He exhorted his clergy to exemplary conduct and residence. His ordinations were public and solemn, example was made to go hand in hand with profession in the great business of religion, and in a synod of his clergy some canons were enacted, excellent and conciliatory. A strong advocate for the church, he always abhorred the persecution of the papists, and supported the justice of his cause by the arms of meek persuasion, not of virulent compulsion. The liturgy as well as the bible were translated into Irish, and every method pursued which might enlighten the minds of an uncivilized peasantry. So much meekness did not go unapplauded; when the country was torn by rebellion in 1641, the bishop's palace was the only habitation in the county of Cavan that remained unviolated. Malice however prevailed; the rebels, who had declared that the prelate should be the last Englishman driven from the country, demanded the unfortunate men who had fled to his roof for refuge, and when he continued firm to his refusal, he and his family were seized. The horrors of confinement, and more particularly the misfortunes of his country, broke his heart, he expired 1641, in the house of Sheridan, a protestant, to whose care he had been entrusted. His memory received unusual honors from the rebels, who, in a large body accompanied his remains, and fired over his grave in the church-yard of Kilmore, with all the homage due to a worthy man, a pious christian, and an exemplary prelate.

BEDERIC, Henry, a monk, about 1380. He was born at St. Edmundsbury, Suffolk, and for his learning was honored with the degree of doctor of the Sorbonne, and chosen provincial of the Augustin order in England.

BEDFORD, Hilkiah, a quaker of Lincolnshire, who settled as stationer in London. His son of the same name was educated at St. John's, Cambridge; but though patronised by the earl of Winchelsea, the politics of the revolution deprived him of his benefice in Lincolnshire. He was fined 1000 marks for publishing "The hereditary right of the crown of England asserted," though the real author was Harbin, a nonjuring priest, whom his friendship thus protected. He wrote an answer to Fontenelle's oracles and Dr. Barwick's life, translated from the Latin, &c. and died 1724, aged 61.

BEDFORD, Thomas, second son of Hilkiah, was educated at Westminster school, and St John's, Cambridge, and he acquired some reputation among the nonjurors at Compton, Derbyshire, where he died 1773, in good circumstances and much respected. In his earlier years he was chaplain at Angiers, in France, in the family of sir John Cotton, bart. and he prepared for the press an edition of Simeon of Durham's history. He wrote also an historical catechism.

BEDFORD, John duke of, third son of Henry IV. the general of the English armies in France, during the minority of Henry VI. defeated the French fleet in several encounters especially near Southampton, and routed the duke of Alençon. He died at Rouen, 1435. When some courtiers advised Charles VIII. of France, to demolish the monument of this noble foreigner, the monarch answered, "Suffer to sleep in peace the ashes of a man who when alive made all France tremble."

BEDLOE, William, a low adventurer, whom the success of Oates animated to the discovery of a pretended popish plot, for which the commons voted him 500*l.* The play called "The excommunicated prince," is ascribed to him. He died 1680.

BEGA, Cornelius, a Dutch painter born at Haerlem. His landscapes, cattle, and conversations, were much admired. During a plague he fell a victim to his attention to his mistress, who was attacked by the disease 1664, in his 45th year.

BEGER, Laurence, of Heidelberg, was librarian to the elector of Brandenburg. He published by the king of France. He died at Paris, 1734, aged 60.

Belleau, Remi, one of the ſeven poets called the pleiades of France, lived in the family of Renatus of Lorraine. He excelled as a paſtoral writer, and in his tranſlations of Anacreon he preſerved all the beauties and eaſe of the original. His poem on the nature, &c. of precious ſtones is much admired. He died at Paris 1577, aged 49.

Bellecour, Colſon, a diſtinguiſhed actor on the French ſtage, who died 1786. His wife, who ſurvived him till 1799, was equally celebrated, particularly in the low characters of Moliere's comedies.

Belleforet, Francis de, a native of Guienne, who ſtudied at Bourdeaux and Touloufe, and paſſed to Paris, where he was honored with the friendſhip of the learned and the great. His hiſtory of the ninth Charles of France,—his univerſal hiſtory of the world, his annals or general hiſtory of France,—are the moſt known of his works. He died at Paris 1583, aged 53.

Bellenden, William, a Scotchman, maſter of the requeſts to James VI. and humanity profeſſor at Paris. He publiſhed Ciceronis princeps, 1608, and Ciceronis conſul, 1612, dedicated to Henry prince of Wales, with treatiſes on political writers, &c. His admiration of the Roman orator, and of Seneca and Pliny, was further demonſtrated in a more comprehenſive work, "de tribus luminibus Romanorum," the completion of which, however, was ſtopped by death. This valuable treatiſe was edited in 1787, by Dr. Parr.

Bellenger, Francis, a learned doctor of the Sorbonne, who tranſlated Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, and alſo Herodotus, of which the copy was left in MS. He wrote criticiſms on Rollin's works, to prove his ignorance of Greek. He died at Paris, 1749, aged 61.

Bellet, Charles, a native of Querci, who died at Paris, 1771. He obtained ſeveral prizes at Marſeilles, Bourdeaux, and Rouen.

Bellet, Iſaac, a phyſician, author of a treatiſe on the effects of the imagination on pregnant women—a hiſtory of Catiline's conſpiracy, &c. He died at Paris 1778.

Bellievre, Pompone de, of Lyons, was diſtinguiſhed as a negociator at the court of Charles IX., Henry III, and Henry IV. He died at Paris 1607, in his 78th year.

Bellin, Gentil, a Venetian, ſo eminent as a painter, that Mahomet ſolicited him to come to Conſtantinople. He complied, and adorned that capital with the moſt maſterly efforts of his pencil. His beſt piece was the decollation of John the Baptiſt; the ſkin of the neck of which, however, the grand ſignior cenſured, as not agreeable to nature, and to convince the painter, ſummoned a ſlave before him, and ordered his head immediately to be ſtruck off. This ſo intimidated Bellin, that inſtead of correcting the fault, he earneſtly ſolicited his diſmiſſion. He returned to Venice loaded with preſents, and died 1501, aged 80.

Bellin, James, a geographical engineer, of Paris, who enriched literature by 80 valuable marine charts, &c. He was member of the royal ſociety of London, and died 1772, aged 69.

Bellini, Laurence, a phyſician of Florence, made profeſſor of philoſophy, though only 20 years of age. He enjoyed the patronage of the grand duke Ferdinand II.; and as an anatomiſt and phyſician acquired great celebrity. His works were in Latin, and much admired. After being thirty years profeſſor, he left Piſa for Florence, where he died 1703, aged 60.

Bellocq, Peter, was valet de chambre to Lewis XIV., and is known for his wit, his phyſiognomy, and his ſatirical writings. He was the friend of Moliere and Racine, and died 1704, aged 59, author of a poem on the hotel des invalides—ſatires—petits maitres—nouvelliſtes, &c.

Belloi, Peter Laurence Buyrette du, a native of Auvergne, who, after being educated for the bar, abandoned his country, and retired to Ruſſia, where he aſſumed the character of comedian. He returned to Paris in 1758, and publiſhed the tragedy of Titus, and that of Zelmira. His moſt popular piece was the ſiege of Calais. The magiſtrates of Calais honored him with the freedom of their city, and placed his portrait among thoſe of their benefactors; and Voltaire paid the higheſt compliment to the genius and merit of the poet; which, however, the ill-natured ſatiriſt, after Belloi's death, withdrew. The ſucceſs of the ſiege of Calais was followed by Gaſton and Bayard. His laſt pieces were Peter the cruel, and Gabrielle de Vergi; but ſo little were they admired, that the poet's heart was broken through diſappointment; he fell a prey to a lingering diſeaſe; and though Lewis XVI. with exemplary benevolence ſent him 50 louis d'or, he expired 1775, aged 48. The works of Belloi were publiſhed by Gaillard, in 6 vols. 8vo. with a life and valuable annotations.

Belloni, Jerome, a banker at Rome, made a marquis by pope Benedict XIV. He wrote an eſſay on commerce, and often re-edited, and tranſlated into Engliſh, German, and French. He died 1760.

Bellori, John Peter, an antiquarian, born at Rome. He died 1696, aged 80. He was chief librarian to queen Chriſtina. His writings, which are in 12 different publications, are valuable and curious on the antiquities, monuments, &c. of Rome and Italy.

Bellotti, Peter, an hiſtorical painter of Venice. His portraits were alſo much admired. He died 1700, aged 75.

Belon, Peter, M. D. was born in the Maine, and travelled into Judea, Greece, and Arabia, of which he publiſhed an intereſting account. His other works were on birds, fiſhes, &c. all equally valuable. He was aſſaſſinated near Paris, 1564, in his 46th year.

BELSUNCE, Henry Francis Xavier de, of the society of the Jesuits, became bishop of Marseilles in 1709. His name is immortalized by the humanity of his conduct, for, during the dreadful plague which ravaged Marseilles in 1720, he was seen running from street to street to administer relief to the afflicted, as a physician, a magistrate, and as a spiritual guide. In the town-hall of the city he is represented as bestowing his benediction on some poor wretches who are lying at his feet. So exemplary a conduct drew upon him the love of the people and the favors of his sovereign; but the good bishop refused the more elevated rank of the diocese of Laon, offered him by Lewis XV. observing that Marseilles was dear to him by habit, as well as by calamity. He was honored by the pope with the pallium, which is never granted but to an archbishop, but the highest reward was the applause of the good. He died in 1755, mourned as he deserved. He founded a college at Marseilles for benevolent purposes, that still bears his name. His writings were chiefly pastoral instructions—a history of the bishops of Marseilles, &c.

BELYN O LEYN, a British chief, illustrious for his vigorous resistance against Edwin, in 620.

BEMBO, Peter, a noble Venetian, who studied at Florence, Ferrara, and in Sicily; and not only acquired the ease and delicacy of the Tuscan language, but imbibed a higher taste than his contemporaries for the literature of Greece. He was secretary to pope Leo X. but ill health obliged him to remove from Rome to Padua, and afterwards to Venice. Paul III. raised him to the rank of cardinal, and made him bishop of Bergamo, where he died 1547, aged 77, from a concussion received on his side against a wall, while on horseback. Bembo's life has been written by de la Casa. His writings consist of letters —a history of Venice, in 12 books—speeches —the life of Gui, duke of Urbino, all in Latin. Of his poetical pieces, only one is in Italian. His style is elegant and correct, though frequently he affects too much of the Ciceronian; but the subject of his poetry is often indelicate, and it is shocking to understand that a cardinal could write in a manner that would have disgraced the most profligate debauchee.

BEME, or BESME, a domestic of the Guises, so called because a Bohemian by birth. His real name was Charles Dianowitz. He murdered Coligni, and was rewarded by the cardinal de Lorraine with the hand of one of his legitimate daughters. Beme was afterwards seized by the protestants in 1575, and killed by his keeper, whom he attempted to shoot in order to escape.

BENBOW, John, an English seaman, who fought a most desperate engagement in the Mediterranean, against an African corsair, and for his valor was invited to the Spanish court by Charles II. who loaded him with presents, and recommended him to James II. After the revolution his skill and bravery were employed in the English navy, in the protection of commerce, and in the blockading and bombarding the French ports. He was raised for his services to the rank of a vice admiral and with a squadron he went to the West Indies, where his courage and good conduct called forth the commendation of the commons, whilst they censured the object and views of his expedition. In a second voyage to the West Indies, he fell in with the French fleet on the Spanish coast, which he pursued and attacked with his usual bravery; but his officers refused to do their duty, and the admiral, who had lost a leg in the engagement was thus dishonorably robbed of a most glorious victory. On his arrival at Jamaica, Benbow arrested his cowardly officers, but their punishment could not check the rapid powers of disease. The admiral was exhausted by the severity of his wound, and more by a broken heart, and he fell a prey to a consumptive disorder, and died 1702, aged about 52.

BENBOW, John, son of the admiral was shipwrecked on the coast of Madagascar, the same year that his father died in the West Indies. A long residence among the natives so altered his manners, that when he returned to his country, his friends found no longer the liveliness and ease which they had admired, but a melancholy and habitual taciturnity. He died several years after in privacy. He did not write, as was generally supposed, an account of his stay at Madagascar, but the barren journal which he kept was accidentally burnt at his brother's lodgings in 1714.

BENDA, George, a native of Bohemia, master of the chapel of the duke of Saxe Gotha. In 1778 he settled at Hamburgh, and afterwards went to Vienna, and then returned to Gotha, where he was rewarded with a pension, and where he died 1795, aged 74. His three brothers were like himself eminent as musicians, and his sister also married a musician. He wrote some pieces for the harpsichord, but of all his compositions his Ariadne in Naxos is the most deservedly admired.

BENDISH, Bridget, daughter of general Ireton was grand-daughter of Oliver Cromwell, whom she resembled in dress and personal arrogance. After managing her salt works at Southtown in Norfolk with all the fatigue of a menial servant, she sometimes spent her evening at the public assembly at Yarmouth, where her princely behaviour, and dignified manners, ensured her the respect of her neighbours. This remarkable woman who in public life might have acquired some celebrity by the strong powers of her mind; died in retirement 1727, revering the memory of her grandfather as a hero and a saint.

BENDLOWES, Edward, after studying at St.

John's college, Cambridge, travelled over the greateſt part of Europe, and on his return became the Mecænas of the age. Poets, muſicians, and flatterers ſhared his favors, and reduced him from an income of 700 or 1000l. a year to almoſt poverty; and after a long reſidence at Oxford he died there 1686, aged 73. He wrote ſome poetical pieces, and was the friend of Davenant, Fiſher, &c.

Benedetto, le, or Caſtiglione, a native of Genoa, eminent as a painter of hiſtorical pieces, eſpecially of markets and animals. His beſt pieces are in his native city. His touch is very delicate, and in the clear obſcure, his ſucceſs is wonderfully great. He died at Mantua, 1670, aged 54.

Benedict, St. a native of Italy, who retired at the age of 14, to Sublaco 40 miles from Rome, and devoted his life to the moſt penitential auſterities. Surrounded by crowds of admirers, he became a ſaint, built twelve monaſteries, and laid the foundation of the ſociety of Benedictines, ſo famous in Europe His regula monachorum is the only authentic book he wrote. He died about the year 542 or 547, aged 67.

Benedict I. pope, ſurnamed Bonoſus, ſucceeded John III. 574, and was active and humane, during the calamities of a famine, and the invaſion of the Lombards. He died 578.

Benedict II. ſucceeded Leo II. 684, and died 685.

Benedict III. pope 855, after the death of Leo IV. was oppoſed by Anaſtaſius, and died 858. The reign of pope Joan is placed between the death of Leo and the ſucceſſion of the 3d Benedict, but though the ſtory is ſupported by ſome authors, it is diſcredited by many.

Benedict IV. ſucceeded John IX. and died 903, after a reign of three years.

Benedict V. was elected in 964, in oppoſition to Leo VIII. His ſhort reign was ſtormy, and he was carried to Hamburgh by Otho, who favored his rival. He died 965.

Benedict VI. pope after John XIII. 972, was ſtrangled in priſon by his rival antipope Boniface, two years after.

Benedict VII. ſucceſſor to Donus II. 975, died 983.

Benedict VIII. biſhop of Porto, ſucceeded Sergius IV. 1012. He was oppoſed by Gregory, but ſupported by the emperor Henry II. who came in perſon to Rome, and was crowned, with his wife Cunegonde, by the ſovereign pontiff. To the politician Benedict united the warrior, and he utterly exterminated the Saracens who had invaded Italy 1016. He alſo defeated the Greeks who ravaged Apulia, and died 1024.

Benedict IX. though only 12 years old, aſcended the papal throne after John XIX. 1033, ſupported by the duke of Tuſculum, his father. The Romans diſpleaſed with his debaucheries, obliged him to abdicate, and he ſold his honors as he had purchaſed them, and returned to a monaſtery, where he died 1054.

Benedict X. antipope, was placed in St. Peter's chair 1058, but his election was diſputed, and Nicholas II. was appointed in his room. He died 1059.

Benedict XI. Nicolas Bocaſin, ſon of a ſhepherd, and pope after Boniface VIII. 1303, was poiſoned by ſome cardinals, who cauſed him to be preſented with a baſon full of beautiful figs of which he eat immoderately, and died ſoon after, 1303.

Benedict XII. James de Nouveau, ſurnamed the Baker, becauſe his father was of that trade, was elected 1334, after John XXII. Though he conſidered himſelf incapable of the office, his conduct, however, was dignified and firm, more inclined to maintain the authority of his ſituation than enrich his family. He died 1342.

Benedict XIII. of the family of the Urſini, was biſhop of Macedonia and Benevento. He narrowly eſcaped periſhing by an earthquake which proved fatal to the people of Benevento, and demoliſhed his palace, 1688. He was elected pope 1724, and confirmed in a full ſynod the famous bull unigenitus, and died 1730, aged 81.

Benedict XIV. of Bologna, of the family of the Lambertini, was made a cardinal 1728, and in 1731 archbiſhop of Bologna On the death of Clement XII. in 1740, the conclave was held in ſuſpence during five months, by the prevalence of two factions and Lambertini, by a facetious ſally ſecured the ſuffrages of 44 members in his favor, and the election. "Why ſpend ſo much time?" exclaimed he. "If you wiſh to elect a ſaint place Gotti in the chair,—if a politician Aldrovandi,—but if you wiſh a good companion chooſe me." As he had cultivated learning he was the patron of learned men, and liberally encouraged the fine arts. He died 1758 aged 83.

Benefield, Sebaſtian, D. D. an Engliſh divine, born in Glouceſterſhire, educated at Corpus Chriſti, Oxford. He died aged 59 1630, at Meyſey Hampton Glouceſterſhire of which place he was rector. His works are all on theological ſubjects. He was ſtrongly attached to Calvin's opinions.

Benezet, Anthony, a man who, after engaging in a mercantile line devoted himſelf to the education of youth. He was author of "a caution to Great Britain, and her colonies 1767,"—"an hiſtorical account of Guinea with an enquiry on the ſlave trade," &c. in 1772, in 8vo. His whole life was employed in acts of charity, and his death was univerſally lamented. Several hundred negroes attended his funeral, and an American officer who had been engaged in the continental war returning from his funeral exclaimed that "h

"he had rather be Anthony Benezet in that coffin than George Washington with all his glory."

BENHADAD, king of Syria, 900 B. C. laid siege to Samaria, and was defeated by Ahab king of Israel, who treated him with humanity. He afterwards defeated Ahab, and slew him. In his old age he sent Hazael to consult Elisha the prophet about his sickness, and the perfidious minister at his return stifled his master, and ascended his throne.

BENI, Paul, of the island of Candia, was professor of Padua. He is known by his opposition to the della crusca academy at Florence, whose dictionary he censured in his defence of Tasso and Ariosto, the first of whom he compared to Virgil, and the latter to Homer. He wrote also some treatises on the pastor fido of Guarini, &c. He died 1625.

BENJAMIN, the youngest of Jacob's 12 sons, was born about 1738 B. C. and was tenderly loved by his father, and by his own brother Joseph. The history of these two brothers in the bible is particularly striking, and pathetic. He died in Egypt, aged 111 years.

BENINI, Vincent, a native of Cologna, who practised physic at Padua. He had a press in his house, where he printed editions of eight classic authors. He was author of Latin notes on Celsus,—observations in Italian, on Alamanni's poem called Culture, &c. He died 1764, aged 51.

BENIVIENI, Jerome, a poet of Florence, who imitated the elegant stile of Dante and Petrach. His poems, chiefly on divine love, were highly esteemed. His private character was very amiable. He died 1542, aged 89.

BENNET, Henry, earl of Arlington, was born 1618. He was educated at Christ church Oxford, and espoused the royal cause during the civil wars. He was knighted at Bruges, by Charles II. who employed him as his minister at Madrid, and after the restoration as his secretary of state. Though he was one of the five ministers, Clifford, Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington, and Lauderdale, denominated cabal, he did not enter into their views, nor support the schemes formed to render the monarch absolute. When accused for the ill success of the Dutch war, he ably defended himself before the commons, and was acquitted by a small majority. After serving the king 12 years as secretary, Arlington retired upon the indolent office of chamberlain, and was afterwards employed as a negociator with the prince of Orange; but he was unsuccessful in his endeavors to procure a general peace. He died 1685. In his character Arlington is described by Burnet as a proud man, but his abilities were so strong, and at the same time so versatile, that he was the only person who could manage with success the king's temper. He was a papist in religion, though in power he inveighed with bitterness against the Roman Catholics.

BENNET, Dr. Thomas, was educated at the grammar-school of Salisbury, his native city, and passed to St. John's college Cambridge. In 1700 he preached a funeral sermon on his friend, the rector of St. James, Colchester, and the parishioners pleased with him petitioned Compton bishop of London to appoint him to the vacant benefice, which was liberally granted. In this situation he was followed as a popular preacher for several years, till the other churches were filled with ministers of abilities, and the charms of novelty vanished, and an income of nearly 300l. a year was reduced to 60l. Upon this he removed to London, where he became chaplain of Chelsea hospital, and afterwards lecturer of St. Olave Southwark, and vicar of St. Giles, Cripplegate, worth near 500l. a year. He died of an apoplexy at London 1728, aged 55. He was author of several sermons, religious and political tracts, an essay on the 39 articles, &c. and a Hebrew grammar.

BENNET, Christopher, a native of Somersetshire, educated at Lincoln college, Oxford, and distinguished as a physician. He wrote several treatises on medical subjects, particularly Tabidorum theatrum, seu Phthisicos, &c. Xenodochium, &c. translated into English 1720, and died 1655, aged about 38.

BENNET, Robert, B.D. was educated at Oxford, and made rector of Waddesden, Bucks, from which he was ejected for nonconformity 1662. He afterwards had a private congregation at Aylesbury and at Reading, at which last place he died 1687. He wrote the theological concordance of synonymous words in scripture.

BENOIT, Elie, a protestant of Paris, who fled to Holland on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and became pastor of Delft. He died 1728, aged 88. He wrote histoire de l'edit de Nantes, 5 vols. 4to. Of the lady whom he married, he has given a most disagreeable picture, representing her as morose and avaricious, and for 47 years the disturber of his repose.

BENSERADE, Isaac de, a French poet, born near Roan. Though poor, his wit and his poetical talents rendered him popular; he was noticed by Richelieu, to whom according to some he was related, and a pension was settled upon him. After the death of Richelieu, he attached himself to the duke de Breze, and he was named as envoy to Christina queen of Sweden, an employment which he did not undertake. As a poet his talents were such that for a time he divided the applauses of the town with Voiture. His rondeaux on Ovid are his worst performances. In the last part of his life he retired to Gentilly, where he employed himself in works of piety, and translated almost all the psalms. He was so afflicted with the stone, that he reluctantly submitted to the operation of cutting, but the surgeon puncturing an artery, ran away instead of checking the effusion of blood, and the unfortunate patient expired in the arms of his confessor Conmire, 1690.

BENSON, George, a dissenter, born in Cumberland, berland, 1699. After being educated at Whitehaven, and at the university of Glasgow, he assumed the ministerial character in London, and went to reside for seven years as dissenting teacher at Abingdon, Berks. He removed in 1729, to Southwark, and in 1740 he became the associate of Dr. Lardner, at Crutched Friars. He particularly studied the sacred writings, and following the example of Locke he directed his labors to elucidate scripture, and published a paraphrase and notes, on several of St. Paul's epistles. He wrote besides the life of Christ,—a defence of the reasonableness of prayer,—tracts on persecution,—an history of the planting of Christianity, from the epistles and acts of the apostles, in 2 vols. 4to. a work replete with taste and erudition, and which procured him an honorable degree by diploma from Scotland, and letters of kindness and acknowledgement from the first divines of the age. He died 1763, in his 64th year.

Bent, John Van de, a native of Amsterdam, who died 1690, aged 40. His landscapes are particularly esteemed.

Bentham, Thomas, a native of Yorkshire, fellow of Magdalen college Oxford, 1546. On Elizabeth's accession he was made bishop of Lichfield and Coventry. He was author of an exposition of the acts of the apostles, and translated into English some of the books of the old testament. He died 1578.

Bentham, Edward, canon of Christ church, was born at Ely 1707, and educated at Christ church school, and afterwards admitted of Corpus. He was for a little time vice principal of Magdalen-hall, and 1731 he was elected fellow of Oriel, and 13 years after obtained a stall in Hereford cathedral. He was afterwards named to the divinity chair at Oxford, a respectable office which he accepted with great reluctance. His lectures here were learned and instructive, they were delivered three times a week, during term time, and the course continued one year. In his private character Dr. Bentham was reserved, though his manners were amiable and his conduct mild, pious, and benevolent. He published some sermons and also tracts, and he was preparing an answer to Gibbon's objectionable chapters, when he died in his 69th year, 1776.

Bentham, James, M. A. brother to the preceding, was educated at Ely school, and Trinity college Cambridge, and became prebendary of Ely, and rector of Bowbrick-hill, Bucks. He engaged his attention to church architecture, and published "the history and antiquities of the church of Ely, from the foundation 675 to 1771," in 4to. It was his intention to give an history of ancient architecture in the kingdom, but the avocations of a busy life prevented the completion. By his perseverance turnpike roads were made, travelling was rendered easy, and the unfruitful lands of the island of Ely were converted into valuable fields by draining. He died 1794, aged 82.

Bentinck, William, first earl of Portland, was descended from a noble family in Holland. When the prince of Orange was seized with the small-pox, it was recommended that he should receive the warmth of a young person in the same bed. Bentinck offered himself, and caught the disease in a violent degree, but the danger to which he submitted was amply repaid by the favor of the prince. William brought him with him to England, raised him to the peerage, and granted him valuable lands. The earl faithful to his principles, served the king in various offices civil and military, and attended him in his last moments. He died 1709.

Bentivoglio, Guy, was born at Ferrara 1579, and studied at Padua. He produced a reconciliation between two factions which laid claim to the sovereignty of Ferrara, and for these services he was made chamberlain of the pope's palace, and employed as nuncio to Flanders and in France, and at last in 1621 raised to the dignity of cardinal. He probably would have succeeded to St. Peter's chair, on the death of Urban VII. had he not been attacked by a violent disease produced by his attendance on the conclave during the heats of the summer; so that in consequence of want of rest for 11 successive nights, he expired 1644, in his 65th year. The most known of his works are his history of the civil wars of Flanders—an account of Flanders—and letters and memoirs.

Bentivoglio, Hercules, a native of Bologna, employed by his relation Alfonso duke of Ferrara. He distinguished himself also as a poet, and wrote satires, sonnets, comedies, &c. He died 1583.

Bentley, Richard, son of a mechanic of Wakefield, Yorkshire, became eminent as a critic and a divine. He was of Saint John's Cambridge. The first specimen of his literary fame, was his lectures on Boyle's foundation, in which he displayed great powers of mind, supported by the profound philosophy of Newton and the clear reasoning of Locke, on the being and power of a God. For this he was made librarian at Saint James's, and this situation, whilst it produced a quarrel, gave rise to a long celebrated controversy. Mr. Boyle had obtained the use of a MS. from the library to complete the edition of "the epistles of Phalaris," which he was then going to publish, and when Bentley demanded the book sooner than was expected, the request was considered as an affront, and a war of words arose which drew forth on both sides the most brilliant and spirited exhibition of wit, criticism, and erudition. In 1700, Bentley was made master of Trinity college Cambridge, to which were added the archdeaconry of Ely, a benefice in the island, and the office of chaplain to the king. In the government of his college Bentley was arbitrary, and his fellows complained to the bishop of Ely the visitor, and charged him with embezzling the money of the college, ege, an accuſation which created the moſt vi-rulent contentions, and which, at laſt after 20 years' continuance, eſtabliſhed the innocence of the maſter. As divinity profeſſor he alſo expoſed himſelf to the obloquy of the univer-ity; he refuſed to admit without the fee of four guineas, ſeveral perſons to the degree of doctor, for which meaſure he was ſuſpended and degraded by the univerſity. An appeal was made to the king, and the matter was re-ferred to the judges of the king's bench, who reverſed the proceedings, and directed his ho-norable reſtoration. During theſe ſtruggles Bentley preſerved his unſhaken firmneſs of mind, and his time was devoted to laborious criticiſm. His editions of Terence, Homer, Phædrus, Milton's paradiſe loſt, &c. evince the great powers of his mind, and the moſt exten-ive acquaintance with claſſical literature. After nearly ten years of gradual decay, this ſupe-rior ſcholar died at the college 14th July 1742, aged 80. In his private character Dr. Bentley was hoſpitable, warm in his friendſhip, and reſpected and beloved as the maſter of a family. He left three children. Dr. Bentley alſo publiſhed a Latin epiſtle to Dr. Mill with critical obſervations on Malala's chronology, 691, and an anſwer to Collins's diſcourſe on free thinking.

Bentley, Thomas, nephew to the preced-ng, was author of "the wiſhes," a comedy, epreſented at Drury-lane 1761, but with-drawn in 1782, from ſome apparent alluſions o politics. He alſo wrote Philodamus a tra-edy, and a ſatirical poem "patriotiſm." He lied 1782.

Benwell, William, an able divine, and elegant ſcholar, born at Caverſham, Oxford-hire, in 1765. From Reading ſchool, where is abilities were directed by the claſſic taſte of his brother-in-law, Dr. Valpy, he entered, n 1783, at Trinity college Oxford. In the niverſity the ſame ardent application conti-ued to mark his progreſs, and his Latin poem btained in 1785 the chancellor's prize. The ubject was the plundering of Rome by Ala-ic, and it was treated with all the energy of eſcription, and the majeſtic diguity of the Mantuan bard. Two years after he obtained nother prize for an Engliſh eſſay, "on what rts the moderns have excelled the ancients," n which he diſplayed deep reſearch, in a ſtile haſte and elegant. The ſame year he entered nto orders, and in 1790 was elected fellow of is college, where he gained the reſpect of the ociety, as an active tutor. In 1794, he ob-ained the living of Hale Magna, which he ſoon reſigned for Chilton in Suffolk. In June 1796, e married the eldeſt daughter of J. Loveday, ſq. of Caverſham, and 11 weeks after this ami-ble character was borne to his grave. He re-ded at Milton, Wilts, and during a fever in the illage he exerted himſelf in affording conſola-ion to the poor ſufferers, and unhappily caught he infection, which, after ten days, proved fatal, th Sept. 1796. He was buried at Caver-ſham. At his death, Mr. Benwell was engaged in publiſhing Xenophon's memorablia, of which the half was already printed. As a polite and claſſical ſcholar his name muſt ſtand high, as a divine the ſimplicity of his diſcourſes made its way to the heart of his hearers, by his zeal, his earneſtneſs, and his eloquence, aided by the moſt powerful recommendation of his exem-plary conduct and benevolent manners. As a poet he roſe to the eminence of genius and originality, and though he wrote little, yet the few pieces which have appeared in print, and thoſe which are preſerved in the hands of his friends, exhibit him expreſſing the true ſpirit and the majeſtic graces of the muſe.

Benyowsky, Count Mauritius Auguſtus de, magnate of Hungary and Poland, was born 1741, in the Hungarian province of Nittria. He embraced early the profeſſion of arms, and after ſerving in the imperial armies, he joined the confederation of the Poliſh nobles. He accepted a high command in the army, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf againſt the Ruſſians in va-rious ſkirmiſhes, till ſeveral wounds diſabled him, and he fell into the hands of the enemy. The triumph of the Ruſſians was great, in poſ-ſeſſing the perſon of ſuch an adverſary; but inſtead of reſpecting his misfortunes they in-ſulted his fate, and loading him with irons, confined him in a priſon, where the dead car-caſes of his companions in miſery threatened a peſtilential contagion. He eſcaped, but again was taken, and hurried away through the de-ſarts of Siberia to Kamſchatka, where he found himſelf an inſulted exile and degraded priſoner, 1770. In this diſtant retreat he formed the deſign of eſcaping, and the daughter of Mr. Nilon, the governor of the place, conſented to ſhare his fortunes, and to aſſiſt him in his flight. He ſucceeded in his attempts; he made himſelf maſter of Kamſchatka by force, and accompanied by 86 faithful followers and nine women, among whom was his fair protector, he ſailed on the 11th May 1771, from the har-bour, and paſſing by the iſland of Formoſa and the coaſt of China, he reached, 17th Sept. the port of Macao, from whence he departed for Europe in a French veſſel. He no ſooner landed in France, than he was encouraged by the French court to form a ſettlement at Ma-dagaſcar, and he eagerly embraced the propoſal, and after a reſidence of ſcarce ſeven months in Europe, he ſet ſail for Africa. Here, how-ever, he had to contend with the envy and malice of favorites, courtiers, and governors, who thwarted his views and oppoſed his career of glory. In his diſappointments he forgot his allegiance to the French monarchy, and con-ſidered himſelf as an independent ſovereign. On the 11th October he left his riſing ſettle-ment for Europe, that he might encreaſe his connection, and form reciprocal alliances with the more poliſhed nations of the north, but though he offered his friendſhip and ſervices ſucceſſively to France, Germany, and England, and claimed their ſupport as the independent sovereign of Madagascar, his offers were disregarded, and he embarked again for Africa, 14th April, 1784, from London, accompanied by his family, and a number of settlers. On his return to Madagascar, the governor of the isle of France sent a small force to oppose him. Beriowsky met his invaders with his usual bravery, but his adherents were few and timid, and the hero, abandoned by the 30 natives that were with him, and assisted only by two Europeans, found himself overpowered, and a ball having struck him on the right breast decided the fortune of the day. He fell behind the parapet, but his inhuman enemies dragging him by the hair, saw him expire in a few minutes after, 23d May 1786.

Benzio, Trifone, an Italian poet, born at Assisi. Deformed in person, he compensated for the unkindness of nature by a lively disposition, and the most fascinating powers of conversation. The amiableness of his manners was such, that he was called the Socrates of Rome. He wrote poems in Latin and Italian, and died about 1570.

Beoteo, Angelo, a poet born at Padua. He directed his attention to copy the manners of the vulgar, and he is peculiarly happy in his descriptions of rustic simplicity and grotesque drollery. His principal pieces are la Vaccaria,—la Moschetta, &c. He died 1542.

Berauld, Nicolas, a native of Orleans in the 16th century, preceptor to the Colignys, and famous for his acquaintance with Erasmus and other learned men. He compiled a Græco-Latin Lexicon. His son Francis was also eminent as a scholar, and became principal of the colleges of Montargis and Rochelle.

Berchet, Peter, a French painter, who died 1720, aged 61. He painted the cieling of Trinity college, Oxford.

Bercheur, Peter, a Benedictine, who died 1362. He translated Livy, by order of John king of France, &c. It is remarkable that he invented and introduced various words, which are now of good authority in the French language.

Berengarius, Jacobus, a surgeon of Carpo, the first who cured the venereal distemper by mercurial ointment. His success procured him both fame and money, and he grew so insolent that he wrote in a contemptuous stile to the pope and to the king of Spain, who invited him to practise at their courts. He died 1527.

Berenger, archdeacon of Angers, maintained that the bread and wine of the sacrament were not the real body and blood of Christ, but merely human food. These tenets, before supported by John Scotus Erigena, and afterwards by the Sacramentarians, were violently opposed by Lanfranc, and Berenger was condemned at Paris and at Rome, but though he was compelled to make a public recantation, he died 1088, attached to his opinion.

Berenger I. son of Eberard duke of Friuli, caused himself to be declared king of Italy in 893. He was opposed by Guy of Spoletto, who twice defeated him, but the support of Arnolph king of Germany confirmed him in his power. Prosperity for 20 years attended him, and he had the interest to procure himself to be crowned in 915 emperor of Germany, but his rival Rodolph of Burgundy prevailed against him, and in the dreadful battle of Placentia, Berenger was defeated 922, and two years after cruelly assassinated.

Berenicius, a curious character, who appeared in Holland in 1670, and maintained himself by grinding knives, and sweeping chimnies. He could repeat by heart Horace, Virgil, Homer, Aristophanes, Cicero, Pliny, &c. and he was well versed in all modern languages and could translate passages extempore from gazettes into Greek and Latin verse. He was at last suffocated in a bog into which he had fallen when in a state of intoxication.

Beretin, Peter, a native of Cortona, eminent as a painter, and honored by Alexander VII. and by Ferdinand II. He succeeded best in great subjects, and chiefly excelled in the grace and expression of his heads. He died of the gout 1669, in his 73d year.

Berg, Matthias Vanden, a painter, of Ypres, who died 1687, aged 72.

Berghem, Nicolas, a painter of Haerlem, who died there 1683, aged 59. Though blamed for hasty execution, his designs are great, and the most minute things show equal perfection with the most principal figures.

Bergier, Nicolas, historiographer of France, was author of the history of the great roads of the Roman empire, 2 vols. 4to. He died 1623.

Bergier, Nicolas Sylvester, an ecclesiast born in Franche-comté. He became principal of the college of Besancon, and canon of Paris cathedral, and might have risen to higher preferment, but when offered an abbey, he answered, "I am already rich enough." He died at Paris 1790. He is author of a refutation of the system of nature 2 vols. 12mo. Deism self-confuted, 2 vols. 12mo.—Evidences of Christianity, 2 vols.—and other works.

Bergman, Torbern, a native of Catherineburg, educated at Upsal, and distinguished for his knowledge of medicine and chemistry, and as the friend of Linnæus. In 1761, he was made professor of mathematics and natural philosophy at Upsal, and in 1767 of chemistry. His labors were employed in investigating the secrets of nature, he discovered the property of fixed air, made experiments on the regulus of manganese, the earths ponderosa and magnesia, and other substances. He wrote a treatise on electric attractions, and a theory of the earth, &c. and he was also employed to observe the transit of Venus in 1761. He was rector of Upsal university, and died 1784.

Bering, Vitus, a Danish navigator, in the service of Russia. He was sent by Peter I. 1728, to explore the north coasts of America, but it was only in a third voyage, in 1741, that he discovered any thing remarkable. His ship truck on an island on the coast of Kamschatka, and while repairing the damages sustained there, he died in the place. The island and the straights still bear his name.

BERKELEY, Dr. George, a native of Ireland, celebrated for his writings. He was educated at Kilkenny school and Dublin college. Though falsely stiled a Jacobite, he was introduced to queen Caroline, and his opinions and conversation were courted by men of all parties. By the recommendation of Swift, he went as chaplain to lord Peterborough, ambassador to the king of Sicily, and afterwards, he spent four years on the continent as tutor to the son of Dr. Ashe bishop of Clogher. During his travels through Apulia, he communicated some ingenious observations on the tarantula to Dr. Freind, and he made some valuable collections for a natural history of Sicily, which unfortunately were lost on his passage to Naples. He was chaplain to the duke of Grafton, viceroy of Ireland, where his fortune was encreased by a legacy of about 4000l. from the celebrated Vanessa, who repaid the coldness or cruelty of Swift, by bestowing her property on his more deserving friends. In 1724, he was made dean of Derry, but in the midst of an easy fortune, he formed the wild scheme of erecting a college in the Bermuda islands for the conversion of the savage Americans, and though he was supported by the patronage of the king, and the pretended piety of the minister, and the promise of a grant of 10,000l. he proved the abortion of his hopes, after residing nearly two years at Newport in America, and he returned in disgust to England. He was raised to the see of Cloyne in 1735, and 12 years after, he refused a translation to Clogher. He came to reside in 1752 at Oxford, in quest of literary retirement, as well as to superintend the education of his son; but on the 14th of following January he was seized with a palsy of the heart, whilst his lady was reading a sermon to him, and so calmly did he expire, that his daughter only discovered while presenting him a cup of tea that he was no more. His private character was truly great and exemplary, so that Pope's panegyric is far from misapplied in attributing "To Berkeley every virtue under Heaven." As a scholar and philosopher he ranks high. His theory of vision, published 1709, and his principles of human knowledge 1710, and dialogues between Hylas and Philonous, 1713, in opposition to sceptics and atheists, display great vigor of thought, strength of reasoning, and subtle argumentation. He wrote besides sermons, the minute philosopher, 2 vols. 8vo. a masterly performance, in dialogues, after Plato's manner—some mathematical disquisitions—Siris, a curious inquiry concerning the virtues of tar-water, 1744, a work which he said cost him more labor than any of his performances, &c. &c.

BERKELEY, George, LL. D. second son of the bishop of Cloyne, was born in London, 1733, and after being under the care of his father, he entered at Christ-church, Oxford. He was patronised by Secker, who revered the memory of his father, and together with the livings of St. Clement's Dane, London, and Tythurst church, Sussex, he obtained the chancellorship of Brecknock, and a stall in Canterbury cathedral. He died 1795. He wrote some sermons, one of which, on Charles' martyrdom, has gone through six editions.

BERKELEY, George, earl of, privy counsellor of Charles I. was author of historical applications, and occasional meditations on several subjects, 12mo. a book of great merit. He died 1628.

BERKELEY, sir William, of the same family as the preceding, distinguished himself as vice-admiral in the dreadful engagement with the Dutch 2d June 1666, when he led the van, and fell in his cabin, overpowered by numbers.

BERKENHOUT, Dr. John, a native of Leeds, educated in his native town, and sent to Germany to acquire the modern languages, and qualify himself for the mercantile profession of his father, who was born in Holland. Disdaining the drudgery of the counter, he travelled over Europe; and entered into the Prussian service, which he quitted on the breaking out of hostilities between England and France in 1756, for a troop in his native country. In 1760 he began to study physic at Edinburgh, from whence he passed to Leyden, where he took his degrees, in 1765. He settled at Isleworth, and in 1778 he accompanied the commissioners to America; but being suspected of intrigues with the members of congress at Philadelphia, he was sent to prison; from which he was liberated, and rewarded with a pension on his return home. He died 1791, aged 60, distinguished for his vast erudition, for universal knowledge, and for great powers of mind. The most known of his valuable publications are, pharmacopœia medici—outlines of the natural history of Great Britain and Ireland, 3 vols. 12mo.—first lines of the theory, &c. of philosophical chemistry—biographia literaria—ways and means, or hints for taxation—letters to his son, &c.

BERKHEYDEN, Job and Gerard, two Dutch painters, born at Haerlem. The eldest excelled in landscapes, and was drowned in one of the canals of Holland, 1698, aged 70; the other was happy in his views of towns, palaces, &c. He died 1693.

BERKLEY, sir William, a native of London, educated at Merton college, Oxford, and, in 1666, made governor of Virginia. He wrote an account of the country, in fol. and also the lost lady, a tragi-comedy. He returned 1676, and died 1677.

BERNAERT, Nicasius, a Dutch painter, who died 1663, aged 70.

BERNARD, St. one of the fathers of the church,

church, and the founder of 160 monasteries, was born in Burgundy 1091. As abbot of Clairvaux, he acquired celebrity, and his lectures were frequented by the most famous men. He opposed schismatics, supported the power of the popes, convicted Abelard of heresy at the council of Sens in 1140, and wrought miracles to command the reverence of an admiring vulgar. He died 1153.

BERNARD, of Menthon, a native of Savoy, born 923. He labored strenuously to convert the uncivilized inhabitants of his country to Christianity, and to forward his humane purposes, he founded two monasteries in the passes of the Alps, for the relief of pilgrims and travellers; and they still subsist a monument of his benevolence, and a happy asylum to the weary.

BERNARD, Edward, was born near Towcester, Northamptonshire, 1638, and received his education at Northampton, next at merchant-taylors' school, and at St. John's college, Oxford. He studied not only philosophy and mathematics, but Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, and Coptic. In 1668, he visited Leyden, to consult some oriental manuscripts presented to that university by Scaliger, and in 1673 he was appointed successor to sir Christopher Wren, as Savilian professor of astronomy. In the intended plan of publishing all the ancient mathematicians, he compared whatever was most curious in the Bodleian and other libraries, and presented the public with a specimen of the work; which, however, was never completed. He was sent, in 1676, to Paris, by Charles II. to superintend the education of his two natural children by the duchess of Cleveland; but the reserved manners of the professor were not in unison with the dissipation of a court; and he retired in one year, from a situation which suited neither his taste nor his inclination. As he had been obliged to give up his preferments on his election to the professorship, he began now to be tired with an office which confined his attachments and his pursuits; and he resigned it 1691, to take the living of Brightwell, Berkshire. He died of a consumption, at Oxford, 1696, aged 59. He was mild in disposition, an enemy to disputes, a candid judge of literary labors, tolerant as a churchman, sincere in his friendship, exemplary in his conduct, and eminent for his learning, as his publications and manuscripts fully evince. His works are, a treatise on ancient weights and measures,—private devotions, 1689—orbis eruditi literatura, &c.—etymologicum Britannicum, &c.

BERNARD, James, was born at Nions, in Dauphine, 1658, and educated at Geneva. On the prosecution of the protestants he fled to Switzerland, and to Holland, where he became minister of Ganda, and professor at the Hague. William III. who hated his republican principles, refused to confirm his appointment to a church at Leyden, and it was not till 1705, after the king's death, that he appeared as public preacher there. He also professor of philosophy in the universi but he embraced the system of Descar till acquainted with the sublime discove of Newton. He died 1718, aged 60. writings were mostly periodical, such as toire Abregeé de l'Europe—besides a supp ment to Moreri's dictionary, in 2 vols. fo sermons, &c. &c.

BERNARD, Catharine, was born at Rou and died at Paris 1712. She wrote poe with ease and elegance, and obtained th times the prize at the French academy. H tragedies, Brutus and Laodamia, were recei with applause, and she was rewarded wit pension of 200 crowns by Lewis XIV.

BERNARD, of Thuringia, a fanatical h mit, who, in the 10th century, announced immediate end of the world, and with si effect that a solar eclipse at that time interpreted as a completion of the prophe and all, in consternation, fled to caves mountains.

BERNARD, of Bruffels, a painter, of 16th century, eminent in his hunting piec in which he introduced his patron Charles V

BERNARD, Peter Joseph, son of a sculp at Grenoble educated by the Jesuits of Lyo Though he possessed wit and a lively geni his compositions could not procure him bre so that for two years he was engaged clerk to a public notary, till noticed by Coigni, whose death, in 1756, left him with a patron. He afterwards gained friends Paris, till in 1771, the sudden loss of his m mory cut short the happiness of his life, as t imbecility continued to his death, 1775. wrote some operas, and light pieces, whi for their ease and elegance, have procured h the name of le gentil Bernard.

BERNARD, Dr. Francis, physician to Jam II. was eminent for his learning, and fo collection of books, sold, in 1698, for 160 a high price for the times. He died 16 aged 69. His brother Charles, who was s geon to Anne, also collected a curious libra sold in 1711.

BERNARD, Richard, rector of Batecom in Sometsetshire, died in 1641, author of Th saurus biblicus, a valuable concordance, &c.

BERNARD, Samuel, a historical paint who died at Paris 1687, aged 72. He graved Raphael's history of Attila. His was, on account of his riches, called the I cullus of his age. He was in the court Lewis XIV. and died 1739, aged 88.

BERNARDINE, an ecclesiastic, born at Ma 1380, and educated at Sienna. He was em nent as a preacher, so that several cities Italy solicited him for their bishop. T popularity raised him enemies, who accu him before pope Martin V. of erroneous d trines. He died at Aquila 1444, after foun ing 300 monasteries in Italy. His works ha appeared in fol. and 4to.

BERNAZZANO, a painter of Milan, in the 16th century. He painted ſtrawberries on a wall ſo naturally, that the plaiſter was torn down by the frequent pecking of peacocks.

BERNIA, or BERNI, Francis, an eccleſiaſtic of Florence, where he died 1543. He was patroniſed by Clement XII. and diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo much as a ſatirical poet, that a ſpecies of burleſque was called, among the Italians, Berniaſque. His Orlando Inamorato Riſatto is much eſteemed.

BERNIER, Francis, a native of Angers, who ſtudied at Montpellier, and travelled to the holy land, Cairo and Suez, and the Mogul empire, where he reſided for twelve years and was phyſician to the emperor Aurungzebe. He wrote an account of his travels on his return to Paris, and died 1688.

BERNIER, John, a native of Blois, phyſician to Madame. He wrote medical eſſays, and topographical hiſtories—critique on Rabelais; but in an inferior ſtile. He died poor, at an advanced age, 1668.

BERNINI, or BERNIN, John Lawrence, of Naples, became celebrated for his ſkill in painting, architecture, ſculpture, and mechanics. No leſs than fifteen of his pieces adorn St. Peter's at Rome, the moſt admired of which are the altar and tabernacle, St. Peter's chair, &c. He was noticed in the court of Lewis XV. and died at Rome 1680. It is ſaid, that in viewing the picture of Charles I. by Vanlyke, of which he executed three buſts, he exclaimed, that he had never ſeen a more unfortunate looking face before.

BERNIS, Francis Joachim de Pierre de, a cardinal, born 1715. He was intended for the church; but Fleury, to whom he was introduced, conceived a diſlike for him; and he might have long remained in obſcurity, but madame Pompadour, pleaſed with a ſong which he had written for her, had not patroniſed him. By her influence, he was ſent ambaſſador to Venice; and afterwards his ſervices to the court of Rome were rewarded with a cardinal's hat, in 1758; but, ſoon after, the misfortunes of the French in Germany were attributed to him by Lewis XV. and he was ſent in exile to his abbey. In 1764 he was recalled, and employed as ambaſſador at Rome, where he procured the ſuppreſſion of the Jeſuits, though it is ſaid he diſapproved of the violence of the meaſures. Stiled the protector of the French churches at Rome, his ſole ambition was to live in ſplendor and magnificence at the papal court, but the revolution came to deſtroy his enjoyments, and to reduce him to poverty. He died at Rome 1794. His works, conſiſting of poetical pieces, on the four ſeaſons, the four parts of the days, on religion, an epiſtle to indolence, &c. have appeared in 3 vols. 4to.

BERNOULLI, James, a celebrated mathematician, born at Baſil 1654. He ſtudied in his native town; and purſued the bent of his genius in mathematical learning. He travelled to Geneva, France, Flanders, and England, where his reputation had preceded him, in conſequence of his learned treatiſe on the comet of 1680. He was invited to fill the profeſſorial chair at Heidelberg in 1684; which, however, his union with a Swiſs lady prevented; but three years after he ſucceeded to a vacant chair in his native city. His lectures were frequented by numbers who admired his ingenuity, the extent of his knowledge, and the accuracy of his arguments. Intenſe application brought diſorders, and Bernoulli, reduced by a ſlow fever, expired in 1705, ordering, like another Archimedes, a ſpiral logarithmical curve to be engraved on his tomb, with the words "eadem mutata reſurgo." His diſcoveries in mathematics, eſpecially the properties of the curve, have immortalized his name.

BERNOULLI, John, brother to James, was profeſſor of mathematics at Groningen in 1695, and afterwards ſucceſſor to his brother at Baſil, where he was born in 1667, and where he died in 1748. He viſited France and gained the friendſhip of Mallebranche, la Hire, Caſſini, Newton, Leibnitz, &c. He was engaged for ſome time in a mathematical diſpute with his brother, which was terminated only by death, and he maintained opinions with reſpect to the barometer, which drew ſevere animadverſions from Hartzoeker. His treatiſe on the management of ſhips appeared 1714, and in 1730 his memoir of the elliptical figure of the planets. His works were publiſhed at Geneva 1742, in ſeven vols. 4to. The children of Bernoulli were deſerving of their father's fame. Nicholas the eldeſt, died at Peterſburg in 1726, a few months after he had been called by the Czar to fill the profeſſorial chair, and Daniel and John poſſeſs equal claims to the admiration of men of ſcience and virtue.

BERNOULLI, Daniel, ſon of John Bernoulli, was born at Groningen, 1700, and died 1782. He was intended for a mercantile profeſſion, but following the purſuits of his father, he viſited Italy and Peterſburg, and was appointed to a profeſſorial chair at Baſil. His learning was extenſive, he gained or divided nine prizes with the moſt illuſtrious literati of Europe, an honor attained by no other beſides Euler his pupil and friend. He divided a prize with his father, but the old man felt hurt at the preſumption of the ſon, who had not the wiſdom to conceal his triumph. This quarrel was aggravated, when the ſon embraced Newton's philoſophy, which the father had always oppoſed. Bernoulli ſucceeded his father 1748 in the academy of ſciences, and he was ſucceeded by his brother John, ſo that for 84 years the chair was honorably filled by a Bernoulli. As a proof of his popularity at Baſil it may be mentioned, that it was the ſtrict injunction of every father to his child, to bow with reſpect to Daniel Bernoulli when met in the ſtreets. Once in in his travels he met with a learned ſtranger who was pleaſed with his converſation, and aſked him his name, "I am Daniel Bernoulli," replied he; "and I," anſwered the ſtranger, who ſuppoſed that he was laughed at, "am Iſaac Newton."

Bernstorff, John Harting Erneſt count, an able ſtateſman. After travelling over Europe, he ſettled in Denmark, and became the favorite of Chriſtian VI. He was employed in various embaſſies, and became the prime miniſter of the kingdom. In this office he applied himſelf to the happineſs of his adopted country, her commerce was enlarged, her manufactures encouraged, and every beneficent plan adopted for the proſperity of the ſtate. A ſociety for agriculture and economy was eſtabliſhed; and another for the improvement of the Daniſh language, and of the fine arts; and a learned body was formed, whoſe object was to examine into the hiſtory, &c. of the eaſt, of which the travels of Niebuhr were a moſt intereſting ſpecimen. Bernſtorff, 1768, accompanied his maſter to England, but in 1770, he fell under the royal diſpleaſure, and retired on a penſion to Hamburgh, where he died 1772.

Bernstorff, Andrew Peter Count, nephew to the preceding, was born at Gartow in Lunenburg, 1735, and after ſtudying at Leipſic and Gottingen, and travelling through Europe, he ſettled in Denmark, to ſhare the honors of his uncle. As a negociator with Ruſſia, he conducted himſelf with great ability, and by perſuading Catherine, that it ill became her dignity to retain a ſmall patrimony which made her dependent on the German empire, he obtained the ceſſion of Sleſwick, and part of Holſtein, and thus ſtrengthened Denmark by the acceſſion of a territory, whoſe population amounted to above 100,000 men. In the American war he recommended the armed neutrality, and thus protected commerce againſt the belligerent powers. He retired in 1780 from the helm of the ſtate, but was again recalled four years after by the prince of Denmark, and he had the ſagacity to forbear engaging in the war of 1788 between Ruſſia and Sweden. He died 1797, reſpectfully followed to the grave by the Danes, who admired his patriotiſm and virtues, and who, to commemorate his benevolence and popularity, ſtruck medals to his honor.

Beroaldus, Philip, profeſſor of belles lettres at Bologne. He died there 1505, aged 52. He was diſſipated in his youth, ſo that he dreaded the reſtraints of wedlock. A lady however of ſingular accompliſhments was at laſt united to him, and ſhe produced reformation in his conduct. He poſſeſſed great learning for his age, and wrote both in verſe and proſe, but his chief labors were valuable editions of the claſſics.

Beroaldus, Philip, nephew to the preceding, was librarian under Leo Xth. He wrote panegyrics, epigrams, and light poetry with conſiderable ſucceſs. He died at Rom 1518, aged 40.

Beroaldus, Matthew, a native of Pari author of a chronology in which he rejects a heathen authority, for that of the bible. H became a calviniſt at Geneva, where he die 1584.

Beroaldus, Francis, ſon of Matthew was born at Paris 1558, and died 1612. H poſſeſſed a verſatile genius, and attempted t turn every thing into ridicule. He pretende to be acquainted with various ſecrets, the ph loſopher's ſtone, perpetual motion, &c. H "moyen de parvenir" is a collection of ſatire trivial anecdotes, and puerility.

Berquin, Arnauld, a celebrated Franc writer, born at Bourdeaux. His firſt wor was Idylles, which poſſeſs ſweetneſs, eleganc and pathos, and he afterwards wrote his r mances; but his moſt popular work is his an des enfans, in 6 vols. 12mo. This intereſtin work, which conveys inſtruction to the youth ful mind, and leads it by an agreeable na rative, clothed in ſpirited dialogue, to th admiration and to the love of virtuous action has been frequently edited and tranſlated in the various languages of Europe. He left MSS. other works, comedies, &c. He dic at Paris 1791, aged 42.

Berquin, Lewis de, of Artois, was a cou tier at the court of France. As a proteſta he was twice impriſoned and twice acquitte of hereſy, but as he wiſhed to avenge himſe on his accuſers, he was the third time ſeize and on refuſing to recant, he was condemn to be ſtrangled and burnt, which he underwe with aſtoniſhing fortitude, 1569, in his 40 year.

Berretoui, Nicholas, a painter of M cerata, died 1682, aged 65. His hiſtoric pieces were much admired.

Berriman, William, D.D. was educate at Banbury, afterwards at merchant taylor ſchool and Oriel college. He obtained th living of St. Andrew Underthaft, and a ſe lowſhip of Eton. He died 1750, aged 6 There were publiſhed of his five vols of e cellent ſermons, the three firſt of which we preached at Boyle's and Moyer's lectures, a ſome controverſial writings.

Berruyer, Joſeph Iſaac, a jeſuit, born Rouen, 1682. He died at Paris 1758. H wrote "l'hiſtoire du peuple de dieu," in 1 vols. 4to. a work which abounds in extrav gant ſuppoſitions, and puerile ſtories.

Berry, ſir John, ſon of the clergyman Knowſton, Devonſhire, was a naval office diſtinguiſhed againſt the Buccaneers, at th battle of Southwold bay, and at the demolitio of Tangier under lord Dartmouth. He w reſpected by the duke of York, whom h ſaved from ſhipwreck at the mouth of th Humber, 1682, and he commanded his fle in the invaſion of William of Orange. H was employed after the revolution. He was poiſoned 1691, on board a ſhip at Portſmouth, in his 56th year.

BERSMANN, George, a German, who travelled in France and Italy, where he gave lectures with great reputation. He tranſlated David's pſalms into Latin verſe, and wrote notes on Virgil, Horace, &c. and died 1611, in his 72d year.

BERTAUD, John, born at Caen, died 1611, aged 59. He was chaplain to Catherine de Medicis, and was promoted to the ſee of Seez. He wrote verſes with great eaſe and elegance, but when raiſed to the prelacy, he diſregarded the effuſions of his muſe. His works, conſiſting of ſonnets, canticles, pſalms, &c. were printed in 8vo. He contributed to the converſion of Henry IV. on whom he wrote a funeral oration.

BERTHEAU, Charles, a French proteſtant, of Montpellier, miniſter at the ſynod of Vigan. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he ſettled in London, and was choſen miniſter of the Walloon church, Threadneedle-ſtreet, and there for 44 years he was reſpected as an exemplary paſtor. He publiſhed two volumes of French ſermons, and died 1732, aged 73.

BERTHIER, Guillaume Francois, a jeſuit, born at Iſſondun, known as the conductor of the journal de Trevoux for 17 years. He was an able critic, but his reflections on ſome of Voltaire's pieces, drew upon him the vengeance of the poet, which he treated with becoming diſdain. After the diſſolution of the jeſuits, he was made a royal librarian, and joint preceptor to Lewis XVI. and Monſieur, but in 18 months he reſigned his employments and retired to Offemburg. He returned to France, and died of a fall at Bourges, 1782, aged 78. His tranſlation of the pſalms into French was publiſhed in 1758, in 8 vols. 12mo. He wrote the laſt ſix vols. of "l'Hiſtoire de l'egliſe Gallicane."

BERTHOLET-FLAMEEL, Bartholomew, a painter of Liege. He ſettled at Paris, where he died 1675. His Elijah carried up to heaven is one of his beſt pieces.

BERTHOLON, N. an eminent French writer, born at Lyons, where he died 1799. He was profeſſor of medicine at Montpellier, which he quitted for the hiſtorical chair of Lyons. His works were written with ability, chiefly on electricity, aeroſtation, vegetation, &c. BETTERTON, Thomas, an actor of eminence, born in Tothill-street, 1635, and apprenticed to a bookseller. His first appearance as a player was in 1656; but after the restoration, he was sent by Charles II. to copy the superior ornaments of a Paris theatre, and on his return he added all the powers of his taste and genius to the Drury-lane and Lincoln's-inn-fields theatres, which united about 168 into one company. His abilities drew univer sal approbation; but eager to disengage him self from the oppression of the managers, h procured a patent to erect another theatre i Lincoln's-inn-fields, which opened in 169 But though supported by the royal patronag and the abilities of Congreve, the oppositio of Vanbrugh and Cibber was too powerful and though the "mourning bride," and "th way of the world," appeared with all thei excellencies, the more rapid productions o the other house procured greater success and after three or four seasons of unavailin rivalship, and after endeavouring to establish new opposition, by building the Haymarke in 1706, Betterton yielded in the struggle, an all the actors were again reunited into on society. Love for love was acted for his be nefit in 1709, and Mrs. Bracegirdle and Mr Barry stepped forth from their retirement t support the public favorite, and five hundre pounds were cleared for him. Hamlet wa the next year performed with equal succes and the Maid's tragedy was announced for th following spring; but Betterton exerted him self too much in the part of Melanthus, an the gout, kept off by external application flew to his head and proved fatal, 28th April 1710. He was interred in Westminster-abbey universally lamented, but mourned by non more than by Steele, who published in th Tatler, (No. 167) a moving detail of the me rits of his departed friend. Betterton wrot or altered three plays. His greatest meri however, arises from his theatrical power None, as Cibber says, could act with equa feeling, Othello, Macbeth, Hamlet, Brutus Hotspur, and the spirit of the poet was tran fused into the player, and on his attitude, hi language, eager expectation was suspended and the eye almost imbibed the sentiment be fore it could reach the ear.

BETTS, John, M.D. of Winchester, edu cated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, wa after the restoration one of the king's physi cians. He wrote de ortu & naturâ sanguinis 1669, 8vo.—anatomia Thomæ Parr, &c. Th time of his death is unknown.

BEVERIDGE, William, a native of Barrow in Leicestershire, educated at St. John's col lege, Cambridge. His proficiency in Hebrew was such, that at 18 he published "a treatis on the use of oriental languages." He wa vicar of Ealing, Middlesex, which he afterward gave up for St. Peter's, Cornhill. He wa liberally patronised by Hinchman and Comp ton, both successively bishops of London, an he was made chaplain to William in 168 He, in 1691, refused the see of Bath an Wells, on the deprivation of Dr. Kenn, bu in 1704 he was consecrated bishop of St. Asaph. He strongly recommended to his clergy the catechising of children, and earnestness in public instruction. He died 1707, aged 71. He left the best part of his property to charitable purposes. He published 150 sermons in 12 vols. 8vo. and two vols. folio, besides other theological tracts, &c. in Latin as well as English, &c.

Beverland, Hadrian, a native of Zealand, who shamefully prostituted his abilities in the composition of loose poetry and obscene pieces. His treatise on original sin was not only burnt with public execration, but the author, who boasted of it, was driven from the Hague and Leyden, and at last found an asylum in England. It is said that he repented of the immoral tendency of his writings, of which he made a recantation in his treatise "de fornicatione cavendâ," though his sincerity has been doubted. The death of his friend Vossius involved him in difficulties, and to poverty was added public contempt, and soon after the loss of his mental faculties, which persecuted him with the apprehension that 200 men had conspired his destruction. He died about 1712.

Beverley, John of, a native of Northumberland, abbot of St. Hilda, bishop of Hexham, and in 687 translated to York. He was a learned man, and a great encourager of learning, and founded a college at Beverley. He retired to the obscurity of a cell, and died 721.

Beza, Theodore, a zealous protestant, of Vezelai in Burgundy, educated at Orleans. He was intended for the bar, but he left France for Geneva, with a woman to whom he had promised marriage, and in 1549 he was elected to the Greek professorship of Lausanne. In 1559, he settled as protestant minister at Geneva, where he became the associate of Calvin, whose tenets he maintained with the eloquence of the pulpit, and the arguments of logical disputation. He was delegated to the conference of Poissy before the king of Navarre, and his abilities and moderation commanded universal respect. He remained with Condé during the civil wars of France, and was afterwards engaged in the synods of Rochelle, Nismes, &c. His intense studies early shattered his constitution, and after eight years of gradual decay he expired 1605. His abilities were of the most comprehensive kind. His controversies were with the most respectable scholars of the times, and he evinced the superiority of his cause as well as the extent of his learning. His publications were all on theological subjects, partly in French, and partly in Latin.

BIDDLE, John, was born at Wotton-under-Edge, Glouceſterſhire, and educated at the grammar ſchool there, and at Magdalen-hall, Oxford. He was elected maſter of the free ſchool of St. Mary de Crypt, in Glouceſter, but his refuſal to acknowledge the divinity of the Holy Ghoſt, drew upon him accuſations of hereſy. Though liberated from priſon, he was ſtill unwilling to yield to the arguments which archbiſhop Uſher, in his way through Glouceſter, kindly uſed to remove his doubts and effect a reconciliation. He was ſummoned before the parliament at Weſtminſter, but the 12 arguments which he publiſhed as a criterion of his faith, expoſed him to greater perſecution, and an ordinance was paſſed by the commons to puniſh with death ſuch as denied the doctrine of the Trinity. To the horrors of a priſon were now added thoſe of poverty, but Biddle was a man of learning, and he earned a ſubſiſtence by correcting the ſeptuagint bible, publiſhed by Roger Daniel, a London printer. By the general oblivion act of 1654, he recovered his liberty, but a freſh publication again expoſed him to the rigor of Cromwell's parliament, and at laſt the protector, incited by Griffin, an anabaptiſt, who had experienced the ſuperior powers of his antagoniſt in theological diſputes, gave orders for his baniſhment to St. Mary's caſtle in the iſles of Scilly, in 1655. On the reſtoration, when the liberty of diſſenters was abridged, Biddle, who expounded his doctrines in private as well as in public, was dragged before a magiſtrate. He was fined 100l. and his hearers 20l. each, but from his inability to pay, he was detained, and after 15 weeks of confinement, a ſudden diſeaſe came to put an end to his ſufferings, 1662, in his 47th year. His life has been publiſhed by Mr. Farrington, of the Inner Temple, who extols his piety and his exemplary morals.

BIDLOO, Godfrey, of Amſterdam, was eminent as a phyſician and an anatomical writer. He was profeſſor at the Hague, and afterwards at Leyden, and phyſician to king William, whom he attended in England. He died at Leyden, 1713, aged 64. Some of his poems in Low Dutch were publiſhed in 1719. His great work is anatomia corporis humani, fol.

He was eloquent as a preacher, and was engaged in all the theological diſputes of the times, and aſſiſted in the reviſion of the bible. He died 1616, and was buried in Weſtminſter abbey. He publiſhed a treatiſe of the difference between chriſtian ſubjection and unchriſtian rebellion, and another on the perpetual government of Chriſt's church.

BINGHAM, Joſeph, of Wakefield in Yorkſhire, was educated at the grammar-ſchool there, and at Univerſity college Oxford. Hearing the Trinity attacked in the univerſity pulpit, he took occaſion when he preached before that learned body 1695, to explain in an elaborate manner the three witneſſes mentioned by St. John. The diſcourſe drew upon him the ſevereſt cenſures, and he was obliged to give up his fellowſhip at Univerſity college, and to retire to Headbourne-worthy, a living in Hampſhire, which Dr. Radcliffe conferred upon him. He continued his ſubject in two diſcourſes before the clergy of Wincheſter with general approbation, and he vindicated his conduct by printing the offenſive ſermons with a copious preface. His moſt learned and valuable work in ten vols. 8vo. and two vols. fol. is called "Origines eccleſiaſticæ." His diligence at laſt was rewarded by Trelawney biſhop of Wincheſter, who gave him the living at Havant near Portſmouth, but his improving fortune was overclouded by the ſouth-ſea bubble. He died 1723, in his 55th year.

BINGHAM, Joſeph, ſecond ſon of the preceding, was educated at the Charter-houſe, and at Corpus chriſti Oxford, where he prematurely died at the age of 22, in conſequence of exceſſive application. He afterwards was head maſter of merchant taylors' ſchool, and obtained the livings of St. Martin Outwich, London, and Ditton, Surrey. He died 1795. His poems, on light ſubjects and in a pleaſing and elegant ſtile, were publiſhed in 2 vols. 4to.

Bisset, Charles, M. D. at St. Andrew's, was author of an eſſay on fortifications and of ſome medical tracts. He ſerved in Flanders as an engineer, till the peace of 1748, and three years after ſettled at Skelton in Yorkſhire. He died at Knayton near Thirſk, May, 1791, aged 75. He wrote an eſſay on the theory and conſtruction of fortification, 8vo.—a treatiſe on the ſcurvy, 8vo. &c.

Bisset, Robert, a miſcellaneous author, maſter of an academy in Sloane-ſtreet, Chelſea. He wrote a ſketch of democracy, 8vo.—a life of Edmund Burke, a valuable compoſition 2 vols. 8vo.—hiſtory of the reign of George III.—an edition of the Spectator,—memoirs of living authors, &c. He was a native of Scotland, and was educated at Edinburgh, where he took his degree of I.L. D. after which he ſettled in London. It is ſuppoſed that his death was haſtened by the ruined ſtate of his affairs, and that he fell a victim to a broken heart, 1805, aged 46.

Black, Joſeph, a celebrated chemiſt, born of Engliſh parents at Bourdeaux, 1728, and educated at Belfaſt and Glaſgow. In 1776 he ſucceeded Dr. Cullen as profeſſor of chemiſtry at Edinburgh, and he became diſtinguiſhed by the ſuperior excellence of his lectures and the number of his pupils. He died 1799. He was author of a treatiſe de acido a cibis orto, an inaugural diſſertation,—experiments on magneſia and quicklime,—obſervations on the ready freezing of boiled water,—analyſis of boiling water in Iceland,—lectures on the elements of chemiſtry, two vols. 4to.

Blackburn, William, an eminent architect and ſurveyor, born 1750, in Southwark. He obtained a medal from the royal academy, and the flattering commendation of ſir Joſhua Reynolds, for the beſt drawing of St. Stephen's church Walbrook. When an act was passed in 1779, for the erection of penitentiary houses, to contain 600 males and 300 females, his plans were approved, and rewarded with 100 guineas, and he was appointed to superintend the building, which however was suspended for a time by government. The design was not lost, the confinement of culprits was converted to labor and to reformation of morals, and several prisons were erected on his plan. This ingenious artist died at Preston, on his way to Scotland 1790, in his 40th year. Besides plans for penitentiary houses, he drew elegant plans for villas and mansion houses, &c. and likewise three designs for Hackney new church.

BLACKBURNE, Francis, a native of Richmond, Yorkshire, educated at Hawkshead and Sedburgh schools, and at Catherine-hall, Cambridge. He was promoted to the living of Richmond, to a York prebend, and the archdeaconry of Cleveland. Though supported by the church, he favored with some degree of fondness the tenets of the dissenters, as appears from his confessional, published anonymously, and so popular as to reach a third edition. He wrote also a view of the controversy concerning the intermediate state of the soul, &c. in which he asserts that the soul sleeps in an unconscious state till the resurrection. On the death of Chandler, of the dissenting congregation in the Old Jewry 1766, Blackburne was invited to succeed, which however he refused. He died at Richmond 1787. His works are collected together, in 6 vols. 8vo.

BLACKHALL, Offspring, D. D. was born in London, and educated at Catherine-hall, Cambridge. He was rector of St. Mary, Aldermanbury, London, chaplain to king William, and in 1707 bishop of Exeter. He died 1716. He was a popular preacher at Boyle's lecture, and he defended Charles I. as author of Icon Basilike against Toland. Though orthodox, some have accused him of opposition to the revolution, so that he refused for two years to take the oath of allegiance to king William. His works have been published in two vols. fol. 1723.

BLACKLOCK, Thomas, son of a bricklayer, in Scotland, was deprived of his eye-sight by the small-pox about 1721, before he was six months old. This misfortune was relieved by the assiduities of his friends, his mind was cultivated by the books which were read to him, and at the age of 12 he wrote a small poem not devoid of beauty and elegance. The loss of his father, who was unfortunately crushed to death by the falling of a kiln upon him, left him in his 19th year destitute of friends and society; but the kindness of Dr. Stevenson of Edinburgh was extended to him; and at a grammar-school he became acquainted with the French, and the best Greek and Latin authors. After studying ten years at Edinburgh, he acquired the fame of a polite scholar and an elegant poet. His poems were universally admired, and though misfortune might in the apprehension of an infidel have clouded his thoughts with dissatisfaction, that the book of nature was shut upon him, we admire every where the most sublime piety, resignation to the will of providence, and that tranquillity of mind, which were most fully exhibited in his private character. In 1754, he was placed in an eligible situation in the university of Edinburgh, and his labors were rewarded by an ample sale of his poems. He took orders, and in 1766 obtained the degree of D.D. In 1774 he published "the Graham," a heroic ballad in four cantos, and two years after he wrote some remarks on civil liberty. This amiable man died 1791, aged 70. Both Hume and Spence have been lavish of their praises on his character, and the portrait in this instance drawn by friendship is not exaggerated. He wrote besides consolations deduced from religion, 8vo. &c.

BLACKMORE, sir Richard, from a private school passed to Westminster and Edmund-hall Oxford, and after visiting Italy, took his degrees in physic, at Padua. He was physician to king William, and was knighted, and he also courted popularity as a votary of the muses. Dryden, however, whom he had offended in some of his writings, treated him with scurrility, and Pope, with more illiberality than truth, directed the shafts of his ridicule against him, in a passage in the Dunciad, on which an annotator has placed these words, "a just character of sir R. Blackmore, knight, whose indefatigable muse produced no less than six epic poems, Prince and king Arthur 20 books, Eliza 10, Alfred 12, the Redeemer six, besides Job in folio, the whole book of psalms, the creation seven books, the nature of man three books, and many more." Though thus satirized, Blackmore possessed some merit. Addison spoke with respect of his "Creation," and Dr. Johnson considered it as not unworthy to find a place among the noble efforts of the English muse. Sir Richard wrote also some theological tracts, and medical treatises. He died 1729.

BLACKSTONE, sir William, knt. and LL.D. son of a silkman, was born in Cheapside, London, 1723, the youngest of four children. He received his education at the Charter-house, and Pembroke college Oxford. At the age of 20 he wrote a treatise, called elements of architecture, which, though not made public, yet received the applauses of the learned. He soon quitted the muses, after obtaining Mr. Benson's prize medal for the best verses on Milton, as he has beautifully expressed it in his little poem "the lawyer's farewell to his muse," and entered at the Middle Temple, where he was to become a luminary of the first magnitude. He was fellow of All-souls, where he improved their estates, and promoted the completion of the Codrington library. At the bar he did not possess in a high degree the graces or the powers of oratory, but his writings displayed deep penetration, and the lectures which he delivered as Vinerian profeſſor on the laws of England received the moſt unbounded applauſe. In 1761 he was elected member for Hindon, and ſoon after, on refuſing the chief juſticeſhip of the Iriſh common pleas, he received a patent, with the rank of king's council. In 1768 he was member for Weſtbury, and in 1770 he was appointed puiſne judge of the king's bench, and ſoon after of the common pleas. His intenſe application proved deſtructive to his health, he was afflicted with a ſhortneſs of breath, which was ſucceeded with a ſtupor and inſenſibility that proved fatal 14th Feb. 1780, in his 56th year. In Oxford, where he was reſpected and beloved, he became principal of New-inn-hall, an office which he reſigned with the Vinerian lecturesſhip in 1766. The firſt volume of his valuable commentaries was publiſhed in 1764, and the three following in the four ſucceeding years. He publiſhed alſo reflections on the opinions of Pratt, &c.—the great charter, or charter of the foreſt,—a treatiſe on the law of deſcents and fee-ſimple, &c.

BLACKSTONE, John, an apothecary of London, who died 1753, author of Faſciculus plantarum circa Hareſield, with notes, &c. 12mo.—ſpecimen botanicum.

BLACKWALL, Anthony, a native of Derbyſhire, educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, and elected maſter of the free ſchool of Derby, and about 18 years after of that of Market Boſworth, Leiceſterſhire, where he died, 1730. He was author of a Latin grammar, and editor of Theognis, and publiſhed an introduction to the claſſics, and in 1725 that celebrated work "the ſacred claſſics, defended and illuſtrated," in one vol. 4to. which was followed by a ſecond, ſix years after.

BLACKWELL, Thomas, was born at Aberdeen, 1701, and after ſtudying in the Mariſchal college, he became 1723, Greek profeſſor. In 1737 he publiſhed anonymouſly "an enquiry into the life and writings of Homer, 8vo." which he afterwards accompanied with "proofs" or tranſlation of all the notes in the compoſition. He was appointed in 1748 to be principal of the college, and was the firſt clergyman raiſed to that dignity, ſince the forfeiture of the Mariſchal family in 1716. He died at Edinburgh, in his way to South Britain, 1757, aged 56. His other publications were letters concerning mythology, and the memoirs of the court of Auguſtus, in three vols. 4to.

BLACKWELL, Alexander, a native of Aberdeen, who ſtudied phyſic at Leyden, under Boerhaave. From a phyſician, he became a corrector of the preſs, and a printer, but he failed; and in 1740, he went to Sweden, where he practiſed as a phyſician, and projected the draining the fens and marſhes near the capital. His ſchemes ſucceeded, but ſoon after being ſuſpected of a conſpiracy with count Teſſin, he was tortured, and beheaded 1748. His wife publiſhed a curious herbal, containing 500 cuts of uſeful plants, taken from the life, &c. two vols. folio.

BLACKWOOD, Adam, a native of Dumferline, known as a warm advocate of the unfortunate Mary of Scots. He publiſhed an account of her martyrdom, addreſſed to the princes of Europe. He diſplayed great virulence againſt Elizabeth, whoſe illegitimacy he wiſhed to eſtabliſh. He reſided at Poictiers, and died 1613. He was eminent as a poet, civilian, and divine.

BLADEN, Martin, known as a tranſlator of Cæſar's commentaries, was a lieutenant-colonel under the duke of Marlborough, and member in five parliaments. He was comptroller of the mint, &c. and died 1746. He wrote, beſides the dramatic pieces of Orpheus and Eurydice, a maſque, and Solon, a tragi-comedy, of inferior merit.

BLAEU, or JANSSEN, William, a learned printer, the friend of Tycho Brahe, author of a beautiful atlas in three vols. folio,—treatiſes on the globes, &c. He died in his native town, Amſterdam, 1638, aged 67. His ſons, John and Cornelius, republiſhed his Atlas in 14 vols. folio, which is very ſcarce and valuable.

BLAGRAVE, John, was educated at Reading ſchool and St. John's college Oxford, and devoted himſelf to mathematics at his ſeat of Southcote. He publiſhed four works, the mathematical jewel, &c.—a treatiſe on the making of the familiar ſtaff, for the menſuration of altitudes,—the aſtrolabium uranicum generale,—and the art of dialling. He was of a moſt benevolent diſpoſition, and he gave 10l. to be decided by lot to one of three maids from the three pariſhes of his native town, who had lived for five years in the ſervice of the ſame family. He died 1611.

BLAGRAVE, Joſeph, an aſtrologer of Reading, probably related to the preceding; author of a ſupplement to Culpeper's herbal, and of an introduction to aſtrology, &c. He died 1688.

BLAIR, John, chaplain to ſir William Wallace, and afterwards to the earl of Murray, wrote an elegant Latin poem on the death of his firſt patron, and died in the reign of Robert Bruce.

BLAIR, James, M. A. a native of Scotland, who gained the patronage of Compton biſhop of London, who ſent him as a miſſionary to Virginia in 1685. He diſplayed ſuch ability in this employment, that he was appointed commiſſary, and he then raiſed a ſubſcription, and procured a patent for the erection of a college in Virginia, of which he was nominated the firſt preſident. He was alſo preſident of the council in Virginia, and after preſiding for near 50 years over his college, he died in a good old age, 1743. His works were ſermons in four vols. 8vo.

BLAIR, Patrick, a ſurgeon at Dundee, who firſt acquired reputation by his diſſection of an elephant. He was impriſoned for his attachment to the Stuarts in 1715, but upon his liberation came to London, and gained popularity by his lectures on the ſexes of plants, publiſhed liſhed under the name of botanic eſſays. He afterwards ſettled at Boſton in Lincolnſhire as a phyſician, and publiſhed Pharmaco-botanologia, a claſſical diſſertation in alphabetical order, on Britiſh indigenous and garden plants. in which he proceeded only as far as H.

BLAIR, Robert, an eminent poet, eldeſt ſon of David B. one of the miniſters of Edinburgh. He was appointed miniſter of Athelſtanford, Eaſt Lothian, where he devoted himſelf to literature and botany, in which, from his ſuperior knowledge of the uſe of the microſcope, he was a great proficient. He died 1746, aged 47. The only poem of note which he publiſhed is his "grave," which has enſured him fame and immortality.

BLAIR, John LL.D. a Scotchman educated at Edinburgh. He was uſher in a ſchool in Hedge-lane, and in 1754 he publiſhed his "chronology and hiſtory of the world," illuſtrated with tables, &c. a valuable work improved in 1756 and 1768. He was chaplain to the princeſs dowager of Wales, tutor to the duke of York, and with ſeveral other valuable preferments was made prebendary of Weſtminſter. In 1763 and 1764, he attended his royal pupil in his tour on the continent. He died of the influenza 1782, and no doubt his death was accelerated by the fate of his brother captain Blair, who fell glorioufly in the naval battle of the 12th April 1782. His courſe of lectures on the canons of the old Teſtament has appeared ſince his death.

BLAIR, Hugh, D.D. a celebrated divine, ſon of a merchant, born and educated at Edinburgh. In 1736 he took his maſter's degree, and two years after was licenſed to preach, and 1742 was promoted to the pariſh of Coleſſie, in Fifeſhire. He was ſoon after invited to the ſecond charge of the Canongate church of Edinburgh, and in 1758 he was promoted to the High church, and honored with the degree of D.D. by the ſiſter univerſity of St. Andrew's. In 1759 he gave lectures in rhetoric and belles lettres, and with ſuch effect, that the King in 1762 erected for his encouragement, with a ſalary of 70l. a year, a profeſſorſhip on that branch of literature in the univerſity. His diſſertation in ſupport of the authenticity of Oſſian's poems, appeared in 1763, and in 1777 he publiſhed the firſt volume of his ſermons which met with ſuch applauſe that in 1779 he printed a ſecond volume, and afterwards three more. Theſe diſcourſes became popular, and were tranſlated into foreign languages. Such ſervices in the cauſe of religion and virtue did not paſs unrewarded, and at the inſtance of the queen to whom the ſermons were dedicated, the profeſſor obtained a penſion of 200l. a year, which was encreaſed 100l. more in 1783, when from infirmity he reſigned his offices. His lectures in three vols. appeared in 1783, and obtained as rapid a ſale and as wide a circulation as his ſermons. He died at Edinburgh 27th December 1800, and as a character amiable in private life, and univerſally reſpected as a ſcholar and as an elegant writer, carried with him to the grave the regret of every Briton, who venerates piety, virtue, and benevolence. His life, by Dr. Finlayſon, has been prefixed to a fifth volume of his ſermons.

BLAKE, Robert, was born and educated at Bridgewater, and then at St. Alban-hall, and Wadham college, Oxford. He took his degree of B. A. in 1617, and ſoon after embraced the tenets of the puritans, and was elected member for Bridgewater. During the civil wars he eſpouſed the cauſe of the parliament, and aſſiſted in the defence of Briſtol, and of Taunton, of which he was made governor, and for his ſervices rewarded by the commons with a preſent of 500l. In 1649 he commanded the fleet with Dean and Popham, and purſued prince Rupert to Ireland, where he blocked him up at Kinſale, and thence proceeded to Portugal and Spain, where he ſeized ſeveral valuable ſhips. On his return to England he was made warden of the cinque ports, and inveſted with the chief command in the Dutch war. His abilities were oppoſed by the equally celebrated powers of Van Tromp. The coaſts of England and Holland were witneſſes of the repeated engagements of theſe warlike leaders, in both of whom intrepidity ſupplied the want of numbers, and unſhaken preſence of mind maintained the conteſt where valor ſeemed unable to decide the victory. In the battles fought the Dutch loſt nearly 40 ſhips of war, beſides many ſmaller veſſels, and Blake next ſailed by order of Cromwell to the Mediterranean, where he chaſtiſed the inſolence of the Bey of Tunis, redeemed the Chriſtian captives from ſlavery at Algiers and Tripoli, alarmed the pope in the caſtle of St. Angelo, and by the terror of his name compelled Venice, Tuſcany, and other Italian ſtates to pay homage to the power of the Britiſh uſurper. He next attacked Santa Cruz, in the iſland of Teneriffe, and deſtroyed the whole of the Spaniſh plate fleet that had taken refuge there. This brilliant action was ſo welcome to Cromwell, that a day of thankſgiving was appointed on the occaſion, and a diamond ring worth 500l. was ſent as a preſent to the commander. Blake's health now rapidly declined, and on his return from the Mediterranean, he expired juſt as his fleet entered Plymouth, 17th Auguſt 1657, in his 58th year. His body was interred in Henry VII's chapel, Weſtminſter, but it was removed in 1661 to St. Margaret's church yard. If Blake fought with ſuch zeal for the uſurpation, it is not to be concluded that he was the friend of tyranny. When Charles I. was tried, he exclaimed, with all the bluntneſs of a ſeaman, againſt the proceeding, and offered to yield up his life to ſave that of the unfortunate monarch; and he told his officers when the Dutch expected pected a change of measures from the dismission of the parliament by Cromwell, "It is not for us to mind state affairs, but to keep foreigners from fooling us."—Though loaded with public favors, Blake died in such circumstances, that his property was scarcely encreased 500l. more than he had inherited from his father. Like the founders of Roman freedom, he fought for his country and not for private emolument.

Blake, John Bradley, was born in London, 1745, and educated at Westminster school. Well skilled in chemistry, in mathematics, and in botany, he went to China as supercargo of the India company, and collected and sent to Europe, the seeds of all the vegetables used by the natives for purposes either of medicine, food, or manufactures. He began also a valuable collection of ores and fossils, but application weakened his constitution, he was afflicted with the stone, and the complaint attended by a fever proved fatal. He died at Canton 1773, in his 29th year.

Bochart, Samuel, a proteſtant, born at Rouen, 1599. After ſtudying at Paris, Sedan, and Saumur, he viſited England and Holland. He acquired the public eſteem in his theological diſputations with Veron; and his publications added ſo much to his reputation, that the queen of Sweden invited him to her court, and received him with all the reſpect due to merit and virtue. He died ſuddenly, when delivering an oration in the academy of Caen, 1667, from which circumſtance this elegant epitaph was written by M. Brieux:

Scilicet hæc cuique eſt data ſors æquiſſima, talis
Ut ſit mors, qualis vita peracta fuit.
Muſarum in gremio, teneris qui vixit ab annis,
Muſarum in gremio debuit iſte mori.

Beſides his geographia ſacra, a moſt valuable book, he wrote a treatiſe on the terreſtrial paradiſe—ſermons—a hiſtory of the animals and of the plants and precious ſtones mentioned in ſcripture, &c.

Bochius, John, a native of Bruſſels, called the Virgil of the Low Countries, from the ſuperior power of his muſe. He travelled through Italy, Poland, &c. and became ſecretary to the duke of Parma at Antwerp. He died 1609, aged 54. Beſides elegies, epigrams, &c. he wrote orations, obſervations on the pſalms, &c.

Bodin, John, a native of Angers, who ſtudied law at Touloufe. He came to Paris; but not ſucceeding at the bar, he devoted himſelf to writing books. His wit recommended him to public notice. Henry III. viſited him; and in the company of the duke of Alencon he was in England, where he was flattered to ſee his book on "the republic," approved and read in the univerſity of Cambridge. After the death of Alencon, he ſettled at Laon, where he roſe to conſequence as a lawyer and public ſpeaker. He died of the plague at Laon 1596. His compoſitions were numerous. Beſides his republic, he wrote a commentary on Appian—diſcourſes on coins—law tables—methods of hiſtory, &c.

Bodley, ſir Thomas, celebrated as the founder of the Bodleian library at Oxford, was born at Exeter, 1544, and at the age of 12 he removed with his father to Geneva during Mary's bloody reign. At Geneva he attended the lectures of Chevalerius, Beroaldus, Calvin, and Beza; and on his return to England, on Elizabeth's acceſſion, he entered at Magdalen college, Oxford; and in 1564 became fellow of Merton college. After travelling four years in France, Germany, and Italy, he was introduced at court, and was employed by the queen as a negociator to the different courts of Europe. The ingratitude of the great ſoon diſguſted a mind naturally ſtrong and independent; and in 1597, as he ſays himſelf, he abandoned all public buſineſs, and retired to eaſe and privacy. He now undertook to enrich his favorite Oxford with the moſt magnificent collection of books; a taſk, ſays Camden, ſuited to the dignity of a crowned head. He wrote, February 23, 1597, to Dr. Ravis, the dean of Chriſt-church, and his offers were accepted with raptures; and after the rareſt books had been procured, with great trouble and much expence, in every part of Europe, a building, fit to receive ſo magnificent a collection, was begun, the firſt ſtone of which was laid down, with great ſolemnity, 9th July 1610. Bodley did not live to ſee the completion of this great work; but his fortune, by his will, was applied to the uſe of the foundation; and his example example was followed by the great and opulent, who contributed to the support of the noble institution. The library is under the care of a keeper, to whom a salary of 40l. is allowed, the under-librarian has 10l. and the whole is under the inspection of 8 visitors, who annually, on the 8th of November examine the state of the books, and of this venerable building, which for the value of the collection it contains, may be ranked among the noblest foundations in the world. Bodley died 28th January 1612, and was buried with becoming solemnity in Merton college choir.

Bœcler, John Henry, a native of Franconia, historiographer to Christina of Sweden. He was professor of history at Strasburg, and died 1686, aged 75. His works were, "commentaries on Pliny and on Grotius," whom he praises with great adulation,—"Notitia Sancti Rem. Imp." &c.

Bœhmen, Jacob, a famous Teutonic philosopher and fanatic of Germany. His original occupation was that of shoemaker, and as he possessed a strong bias to religious habits, he studied books of divinity, and was a constant attendant on the worship of his church, till at last he found himself suddenly inspired, and continued, as he says himself, "seven whole days in the most excessive joy, wrapt in the holy sabbath." This fanatical emotion was, in the course of some years, twice repeated; and in 1612 he abandoned his trade, and began to write. His first treatise, called "Aurora, or rising sun," was censured by the magistrates of Gorlitz, and suppressed; but Bœhmen resumed his pen, and for the last five years of his life he published more than 20 books on theological subjects, on visions, &c. On November 18, 1624, it is said that he pretended to hear music, and he declared to his son, that in three hours he should expire. At the expected time he took a tender farewell of his family, and, desiring his son to turn him, he expired, with a deep sigh, exclaiming, "Now I go into paradise!" This fanatic, whose private life was not disgraced by immoral acts, has had many admirers in several parts of Europe. Kahlman was a convert to his opinions, and the quakers in England have adopted several of his tenets.

Boel, Peter, a Flemish painter, who studied at Rome, and died 1680, aged 55. His animals, still life, &c. were much admired.

Boerhaave, Herman, a celebrated physician, born 1668, at Voorhoot, two miles from Leyden. He was intended for the ministry by his father, but an accident turned his thoughts to different pursuits. In his 12th year he suffered the most excruciating pains from an ulcer in his left thigh, which baffled all the powers of his surgeon, and he drew the happiest omen of future greatness, by curing it himself with a fomentation of salt and wine. He studied at Leyden, and acquired the m perfect knowledge of the classics, and becar thoroughly acquainted with mathematics, gebra, and the different branches of natur philosophy. He still however directed chief attention to divinity, but as his pat mony was now nearly exhausted, he found friend in John Vandenburg, of Leyden, w advised him to unite the study of physic theology. Boerhaave complied, he had ready received with a golden medal the a plause of the university by an oration to pro that Cicero understood the doctrines of Ep curus, and he encreased his reputation the follower of Vesalius, Fallopius, and Be tholinus. In his medical studies he soon d covered the shallowness of the authors of t middle ages, but he found a treasure of knov ledge in Hippocrates and Sydenham. Aft extending his researches to botany and ch mistry, he went to Harderwick, where he to his degree of M. D. 1693, and soon after abandoned all thoughts of entering into t ministry from the dread of the prejudic raised against him, on the supposition that favored the tenets of Spinoza. Now devot to the study and practice of physic, he becan celebrated through Europe. As professor physic and botany his lectures were crowd with students eminent for talents and learn ing, by whom he was respected and belo ed. In 1714 he was made rector of the un versity, and in 1728, he was admitted hon rary member of the academy of sciences Paris, and two years after of the royal socie of London. His constitution now began decay. In 1722 he was afflicted for months with poignant arthritic pains, a fearing a relapse, he resigned in 1729 the h nors of professor, which he had held for ne 30 years to the advancement of science a the benefit of mankind. His private labo however continued, but he found himself a fected in 1737 with a difficulty of breathin and from unusual pulsations, he grew appr hensive that he had some polypous concretio between the heart and the lungs. He wro an account of his situation to his friend D Mortimer, and expired 23d Sept. 1738, his 70th year. Boerhaave amassed a lar fortune by his profession, but though he h been stiled penurious, the benevolence of h heart, and the manner in which he conferr favors on the unfortunate, prove that he kne and felt the calls of humanity. Like tho that are eminent either in rank or in virtu he was not without his detractors, but h name must stand recorded in the annals science as a great and a good man. His v luable works are in Latin, and all on medic botanical, and chemical subjects. His fello citizens have erected to his honor in St. P ter's church at Leyden a monument on whi are inscribed these few expressive words "S lutifero Boerhaavi genio sacrum."

Boethius, Boece, or Boeis, Hector, was born at Dundee about 1470, and after ſtudying in his native town, and at Aberdeen, he went to Paris, and was recalled to be principal of the college of Aberdeen. He wrote the lives of the biſhops of Aberdeen in compliment to his patron Elphinſton. He afterwards engaged in an hiſtory of Scotland, in which he diſplayed great reſearch, but too much credulity. He has been cenſured for his fondneſs for legendary tales, but Eraſmus, who knew him, ſpeaks of him as "a man of an extraordinary happy genius, and of great eloquence."

Boffrand, Germain, of Nantes, was an able architect. Several princes employed him, and France has ſtill to boaſt of ſeveral monuments of his genius in her magnificent edifices, in canals, ſluices, and bridges. He has written a general ſtatement of the principles of his art, with an account of all the works which he erected. He died at Paris 1755, aged 88.

Bogan, Zachary, a learned Engliſh divine, born at Little Hempſtone Devonſhire, and educated at St. Alban's hall, and Corpus chriſti, Oxford. He wrote comparatio Homeri cum ſcriptoribus ſacris, &c.—a view of the threats and puniſhments mentioned in ſcripture, 8vo. —additions to Rous's archæologiæ atticæ, &c. He died 1659.

Boileau Despreaux, Nicholas, a celebrated poet, born at Paris 1636. He early loſt his mother, and his infancy was entruſted to a female ſervant who treated him with harſhneſs. His father, who left him an orphan before he was 17, had not formed the moſt promiſing expectations of him, but the dullneſs of youth diſappeared as he approached to maturity. Studying the law, he was admitted advocate in 1656, but he did not poſſeſs the patience requiſite for the bar, and exchanging his purſuits for divinity, he at laſt diſcovered that a degree at the Sorbonne was not calculated to promote the bent of his genius. In literature he now acquired eminence and fame. The publication of his firſt Satires 1666 diſtinguiſhed him above his predeceſſors, and he became the favorite of France and of Europe. His art of poetry added to his reputation, it is a monument of his genius and judgment, and far ſurpaſſes the ars poetica of Horace, in that happy arrangement of his ideas, the harmony of his numbers, and the purity of his language. His Lutrin was written in 1674 at the requeſt of Lamoignon, and the inſignificant quarrels of the treaſurer and eccleſiaſtics of a chapel are magnified by the art of the poet into matters of importance, and every line conveys with the moſt delicate pleaſantry, animated deſcription, and refined ideas. Boileau became a favorite at the court of Lewis XIV. a penſion was ſettled on him, and the king declared he wiſhed his ſubjects to partake the ſame intellectual gratification which he himſelf enjoyed. The monarch engaged the poet to write with Racine an hiſtory of his reign, but the work though begun was never completed. As a proſe writer Boileau poſſeſſed ſuperior merit, as is fully evinced by his elegant tranſlation of Longinus. After enjoying the favors of his ſovereign, and the honors due to his merits, Boileau retired from public life, diſſatisfied with the inſincerity of the world and the profligacy of manners which he had ſatirized with ſpirit and truth, and he ſpent his time in literary privacy, in the ſociety of a few ſelect friends. He died an example of great reſignation and piety, March 2d 1711, in his 75th year. He wrote beſides, odes, ſonnets, 56 epigrams, critical reflections, ſome Latin pieces, &c. As a poet Boileau has deſervedly obtained the applauſes of every man of genius and taſte.

Not

Not only his countrymen boaſt of the ſuperior effuſions of his muſe, but foreigners feel and admire the graces, the ſtrength, and harmony of his verſe, and that delicacy of ſatire and energy of ſtile by which he has raiſed himſelf to immortality.

Boleslaus I. firſt king of Poland, 969. Otho III. gave him the title of king, and made Poland an independent kingdom in 1001. He died 1025.

Boleslaus II. called the bold and the cruel, ſucceeded his father Caſimir I. 1059. He reſtored Bela to the throne of Hungary, and invaded Ruſſia, but his abſence in the field gave ſuch offence to the Poliſh females, that they beſtowed their favors on their ſlaves. The abſent ſoldiers returning to avenge the inſult, the conteſt between the huſbands and the ſlaves was long and bloody. Boleſlaus died in Hungary about 1080.

Boleyn, Anne, daughter of ſir Thomas Boleyn, was wife of Henry VIII. and the occaſion of the reformation. She was in her youth one of the attendants of the Engliſh princeſs, wife to Lewis XII. and afterwards to Claudia the queen of Francis I. and then of the ducheſs of Alencon. About 1525, ſhe returned to England, and when maid of honor to Catherine, ſhe drew upon herſelf the affection of Henry VIII. and by her address ſhe prevailed upon him to divorce his wife, and as the pope refuſed to diſannul his marriage, England was ſeparated from the ſpiritual dominion of Rome. Henry was united to his favorite 1532, by whom he had a daughter, queen Elizabeth, but Anne Boleyn ſo long admired, ſo long courted by the amorous monarch, was ſoon deſpiſed for Jane Seymour, and cruelly beheaded May 19th, 1536. She bore her fate with reſignation; but though branded with ignominy by catholic writers, ſhe muſt appear innocent in the judgment of impartial men, and her accuſation of a criminal connection with her own brother and four other perſons, muſt be attributed to the malice of that tyrant, who made the law and morality ſubſervient to his luſt.

Boleyn, George, brother to queen Anne, ſtudied at Oxford, and was admired for his wit and learning. He was made a peer by the title of lord Rochfort, conſtable of Dover, warden of the Cinque Ports, and engaged in ſeveral embaſſies. He was afterwards tutor in a private family, and then was joined with his father in a patent to hold the office of accomptant general of Ireland. He discharged the duties of his office with great integrity, and died at Dublin 1699. His funeral sermon was preached by bishop Wettenhall, and his life was written by archdeacon Hamilton, in which some of his meditations are introduced.

Bonner, Edmund, bishop of London, was the son of a man of indigent circumstances in Worcestershire, and charitably educated at the expence of the family of Lechmere. He entered 1512 at Broadgate hall, now Pembroke college, and recommended himself to the notice of Wolsey, who procured him ecclesiastical preferments, and favor at court. He was chaplain to the king, and promoted with all his power his divorce from Catherine. He was sent to Rome to plead the king's cause before Clement VII., but he spoke with such vehemence against the holy see, that the pope threatened to throw him into a cauldron of melted lead. As his abilities as a negociator were great, he was employed as ambassador to the courts of Denmark, France, and Germany. In 1538 he was nominated to the see of Hereford, by the recommendation of his patron lord Cromwell, who had succeeded Wolsey, and before his consecration, he was promoted to London. He had formerly opposed the pope's prerogative to rise in Henry's favor, but after his death he withstood the measures adopted by Edward VI. to spread the reformation, and for this he was deprived of his bishopric, and committed to the Marshalsea. This endeared him the more in the eyes of Mary; she no sooner ascended the throne than Bonner was restored to his honors, and made president of the convocation in the stead of Cranmer. In this office he not only excommunicated several of the clergy, but he committed some hundreds to the flames for not renouncing the doctrines of the reformation. On the death of Mary he paid his respects to the new queen, but Elizabeth turned away from a man stained with the blood of suffering innocence, and when summoned before the council, he refused to take the oaths of allegiance, and was again deprived of his bishopric, and imprisoned. He died about the 10th year of his confinement 1569, and as he was excommunicated, his body was privately buried at midnight in St. George's church-yard, Southwark, In his person Bonner was fat and corpulent, his character was ferocious and vindictive, his knowledge of divinity was not extensive, but he was well versed in politics and canon law. He wrote some tracts now forgotten.

BONNET, Charles, a native of Geneva, disturbed from his pursuits in the law by reading la Pluche's spectacle de la nature, and Reaumur's memoirs of insects. Devoted to natural history and metaphysics, he made some valuable discoveries in entomology at the age of 20, and when 27, published his treatise on psychology and his analytical essay on the mental powers, and his system of physics. He died at Geneva 1793, aged 73. He published considerations on organized bodies, &c.

He ſerved as engineer and lieutenant in the navy, and in 1771 was ſent with Verdun and Pingré to America to make obſervations on various iſlands, and in 1774 he continued the ſame reſearches. During the American war he ſerved under d'Eſtaing, as rear admiral. He introduced more uniformity in the building of ſhips of war, and by his experiments contributed much to the improvement of all veſſels. He publiſhed, beſides his diſcoveries in America, &c. in two vols. 4to. the deſcription and the uſe of the circle of reflection, in which he recommended the ſpecular circles of Tobias Mayer, 1787, and other treatiſes, inſerted in the memoirs of the academy of ſciences. The ſmall rod for the menſuration of angles was of his invention, and he alſo introduced a new method to obſerve the length of the pendulum, &c. He died at Paris of a dropſy in the cheſt, 1799.

Borde, Andrew, a native of Suſſex, educated at Oxford. He ſtudied phyſic; and after travelling over the greateſt part of Europe and Africa, he ſettled at Wincheſter, and took his degrees at Montpellier. In his character he was eccentric in the extreme. He was not devoid of wit and learning; but though commended for his ſkill, he never acquired opulence by his profeſſion, as he died in the Fleet, 1549, aged 49. He has been accuſed by Bale of poiſoning himſelf, becauſe he kept a brothel for the Carthuſian monks. He wrote the breviary of health,—ſome medical tracts,—a jeſt book, &c.

Borde, John Benjamin, a writer, born at Paris 1734. He was at firſt the valet of Lewis XV., and on the monarch's death, was appointed farmer-general. Naturally fond of literature, he cultivated it in the midſt of buſineſs. His eſſays on ancient and modern muſic, 4 vols. 4to.—memoires hiſtoriques de Coucy, 2 vols. 8vo.—pieces intereſſantes for the hiſtory of Lewis XIII. and Lewis XIV. 12mo.—letters on Switzerland, 2 vols 8vo.—hiſtory of the South ſea, 3 vols. 8vo.—Swinburne's travels tranſlated—beſides a valuable collection of airs, in 4 vols. 8vo. &c. During the revolution he retired to Rouen, but Robeſpierre diſcovered him, and he was guillotined 1794, aged 60.

Bordeu, Theophilus de, was born 1722 in Bearn, and at the univerſity of Montpellier, at the age of 20, he held a theſis de ſenſu generice conſiderato, in ſo learned a manner as to aſtoniſh his auditors. He gained great reputation at Paris as a phyſician. His conſtitution was early impaired by a flying gout, and a deep melancholy, and he expired under an attack of apoplexy 1776. He publiſhed nine different treatiſes on anatomical and medical ſubjects, much admired.

Bordingius, Andrew, a Daniſh poet, whoſe works, highly eſteemed in Denmark, were printed 1738, at Copenhagen.

Bordone, Paris, a painter of Venice, the favorite of Francis I. He excelled in the delicacy of his ſtrokes and the purity of his outlines, and gained reputation by his portraits of the beauties of the French court. He retired to Venice from France, and died in 1587, aged 75.

Bore, Catharine von, a nun of the convent of Nimptſchen, who, with eight others, quitted the veil on the firſt diſſemination of Luther's principles. The many qualities of her mind, and the beauty of her perſon, recommended her to the notice of the great reformer, who loved her, and, though far more advanced in life, married her, in her 26th year. Luther reaped in her fidelity both happineſs and inſtruction; and though malevolence propagated reports to her diſcredit, it is incontrovertible, that the affections of the huſband were beſtowed on none but a woman of delicacy and virtue. She died 1552, aged 53, leaving three ſons, Paul, Martin and John.

Borelli, John Alphonſus, was born at Naples 1608, and diſtinguiſhed as a philoſopher and mathematician at Florence and Piſa. As he was concerned in the revolt of Meſſina, he fled to Rome, where Chriſtina queen of Sweden alleviated his diſtreſs. He there taught mathematics, and died of a pleuriſy 1679, aged 72. He wrote 13 different treatiſes in Italian and Latin, highly eſteemed.

Borghini, Vincent, a Benedictine monk of Florence. He wrote, beſides an edition of the decameron, of Boccace, "Diſcorſi," on the antiquities, &c. of Florence, a valuable work. He refuſed the archbiſhopric of Piſa, and died 1680, aged 65.

Borgia, Cæſar, a natural ſon of Alexander VI. He no ſooner heard of his father's exaltation than he left Piſa, where he was fixed for his education; but the proſpects which he had formed were obſcured by the coolneſs with which Alexander received him. He complained to his mother Vanozza, who for a while quieted his impatience, but he was diſſatisfied to ſee the dukedom of Gandia conferred upon his elder brother, whilſt the primacy of Valenza was reſerved for himſelf. Afterwards, by the influence of his mother, whoſe greateſt favorite he was, the dignity of cardinal was conferred upon him, and he became the confident of his father's counſels. The elevation of his brother to ſecular power excited his jealouſy, ſo that to gratify his revenge he cauſed him to be murdered by aſſaſſins, and thrown into the Tiber. The pope bitterly lamented his fate, but all enquiries after the murderer were ſilenced by Vanozza, who, juſtly ſuſpected, terrified the aſtoniſhed father, by declaring that if he did not deſiſt, the ſame dagger was ready to ſtab him to the heart. Cæſar ſucceeded to his brother's honors and reſigned the dignity of cardinal, with greater latitude to gratify his avarice, ambition, and cruelty. Aſſaſſins were kept around him, who ſacrificed both friends and foes; but his murderous ſchemes proved nearly fatal. United with his father in the attempt to poiſon nine newly created cardinals that they might ſeize their poſſeſſions, the wine was by miſtake brought to them, ſo that Cæſar eſcaped with difficulty by the power of antidote and ſtrength of conſtitution, but the pope died of it. His crimes were now too public to be unnoticed. Though raiſed to the dukedom of Valentinois by Lewis XII. he was ſent a priſoner to Spain, but he eſcaped to the court of his brother-in-law John king of Navarre, and engaged in the civil war, by which that kingdom was diſtracted, and was killed by the ſtroke of a ſpear under the walls of Viana 1507. This extraordinary character, ſo infamous in principle, has been propoſed by Machiavel as a pattern to princes who would act the part of wiſe and politic tyrants.

Boris, Gudenon, regent of Muſcovy under Foedor, aſſaſſinated Demetrius the brother of Foedor, and afterwards Foedor himſelf. His ſucceſs was of ſhort duration. Griſka, an impoſtor, aroſe, who pretended to be Demetrius, and as his cauſe was eſpouſed by many he was enabled to attack Boris, who died of a broken heart 1605. The ſon of Boris was proclaimed by the Boyards, but the fortunes of the falſe Demetrius prevailed.

Borri, Joſeph Francis, of Milan, was diſtinguiſhed by his extravagant pretenſions as chemiſt and a quack. After playing the prophet at Rome he returned to Milan, where he exacted an oath of ſecrecy from individuals whoſe riches flowed into his hands, with the expectation that the kingdom of God was going to be eſtabliſhed on earth. His ſchemes were ſo well concerted that he nearly ſeized the ſovereign power, till being diſcovered he fled, whilſt the inquiſition paſſed ſentence of condemnation on his character, and publicly burnt his effigy and his writings in 1660. From Straſburg he came to Amſterdam, and there figured as a character of ſuperior dignity. He was courted as an univerſal phyſician, till a revolution in his fortune drove him from the country, loaded with the borrowed jewels of the credulous Hollanders. At Hamburgh he obtained the protection of Chriſtina of Sweden, by pretending to find the philoſopher's ſtone, and he gained the ſame confidence at Copenhagen from the king. When his hypocriſy at laſt became known, he attempted to retire to Hungary, but being accidentally ſeized as a ſpy, his name was reported to the emperor of Germany in the preſence of the popiſh nuncio, who claimed him as an excommunicated heretic. The emperor conſented, provided his life was ſpared, and Borri conveyed to Rome, was condemned to perpetual impriſonment, which was ſoftened by the interference of the duke of Eſtrées, whom he cured in a dangerous illneſs. He died at the caſtle of St. Angelo, in 1695, aged 70.

Borrichius, Olaus, a native of Denmark educated at Copenhagen, where he became profeſſor in poetry, chemiſtry, and botany. After practiſing as a phyſician, and refuſing the rectorſhip of the ſchool of Heſſlow, he travelled and viſited Holland, England, France, Italy, and Germany, and after an abſence of ſix years returned to his native country in 1666. After being dreadfully afflicted with the ſtone, and unſucceſsfully cut for it, he died 1690, aged 64. He publiſhed ſeveral tracts in Latin, on ſubjects of chemiſtry, philoſophy and antiquities, the beſt known of which are de Poetis Græcis & Latinis—antiquæ Romæ imago—de uſu plantarum indigenarum 1688 &c.

Borromeo, Charles, a ſaint of the Romiſh church, born 1538, at the chateau d'Autone, and patroniſed by his maternal uncle, Pius IV. who made him a cardinal and archbiſhop of Milan though only 22 years of age. Theſe dignities we were due to his virtues. Borromeo was an example of meekness and piety, he reformed the abuses of his clergy, relieved the necessitous, and provided institutions for the reclaiming of profligate and debauched women. This however enraged the humilies, an order which he attempted to reform; and one of the brethren, Farina, fired a gun at the worthy prelate while in prayer with his domestics. During a pestilence the attentions of Borromeo to the distressed were unusually exemplary, yet he was accused by the governor of Milan, before Charles V. of attempting innovations in the ecclesiastical institutions of the city, but his innocence was too plain to need defence. This good man died 1594, aged 47, and his name was canonized by Paul V. in 1710. He wrote several works on doctrinal and moral subjects, in 5 vols. folio.

Borromini, Francis, an architect of Bissone, who acquired much reputation at Rome. He deviated from that simplicity which taste and judgment have always pronounced the basis of the beautiful. He died in consequence of a wound which he had given himself in a fit of madness, 1667.

Borzoni, Luciano, of Genoa, was eminent as an historical and portrait painter. He died at Milan 1645, aged 55, His three sons, John Baptist, Carlo, and Francis Marie, were equally great. The two first died young, and the last showed superior genius in his sea pieces, storms &c. He died at Genoa 1679.

Bos, John Baptist du, a native of Beauvais, employed under Torcy in negociations with Germany, Holland, England, and Italy. He received a pension for his services, and died at Paris 1742, aged 72. He wrote critical reflections on poetry and painting, an elegant work, in three vols. 12mo.—history of the French monarchy, &c.

Bos, Lambert, a native of Workum, Greek professor at Franeker, where he died 1717, aged 47. He devoted himself to literature, and published the septuagint two vols. 4to.—the antiquities of Greece,—and other learned works.

Bos, Jerome, a Flemish painter, whose devils, spectres, and incantations, though well represented, had a most disagreeable appearance. He died 1500.

Bos, Lewis Jansen, a Flemish painter. Not only his leaves and flowers were beautiful, but the dew was represented so much like nature as to deserve universal approbation. He died 1507.

Bosc, Pierre du, of Bayeux, was protestant minister at Caen at the age of 23, and maintained with spirit the doctrines he had embraced. When Lewis XIV. published a proclamation against the protestants, Bosc obtained a royal audience, and disarmed the rigor of the catholics; but on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he retired to Holland, where he was minister of the church of Rotterdam till his death, 1692. His sermons, in four vols. 8vo. are masterly pieces.

Boscager, John, a native of Beziers, author of the institute of the Roman and French law, 4to. and of a posthumous work de justitia & jure, 12mo. He died 1684, aged 83.

Boscan, John, of Barcelona, introduced the Italian rhyme into the poetry of his country, and distinguished himself by the elegance of his diction. He wrote Medina, 4to. and Salamanca, 8vo. two poems, besides some sonnets, and died 1543.

Boscawen, Edward, a celebrated admiral, second son of lord Falmouth, was born in Cornwall, and early devoted to the sea service. In 1740 he was commander of the Shoreham, and distinguished himself at Porto Bello, and also at Carthagena, where with a few seamen he took a battery, though annoyed by the most tremendous fire. In 1744 he took the Medix commanded by Hocquart, who again fell into his hands at the battle off Cape Finisterre, under Anson three years after. He in 1747 commanded an expedition to the East Indies, and though he was unsuccessful in his blockade of Pondicherry, he took Madras. On his return he was made one of the lords of the admiralty, and in 1755 he intercepted a French squadron in North America, and again took prisoner for the third time Hocquart in one of the two ships which surrendered. In 1766 he succeeded in the capture of Cape Breton, and Louisburg. In 1759 he went to the Mediterranean, and pursuing the French fleet he took three ships, and burnt two in Lagos bay. These services were acknowledged by the gratitude of the parliament, and the admiral was made general of marine, with a salary of 3000l. a year, but he did not long survive these honors. He died 1761.

Boscu, Balthasar Vanden, a painter of Antwerp, whose conversation pieces are highly admired. He died 1715, aged 40.

Boschaerts, Thomas Willebos, a Flemish painter of Berg. He was patronised by the prince of Orange, and distinguished himself in allegory and coloring. He died 1667, aged 54.

Boscovich, Joseph Roger, a geometrician and Jesuit, born at Ragusa 1711, and professor of mathematics at Rome, Pavia, and Milan. Upon the suppression of the Jesuits, he came to France, and afterwards retired to Milan, where he died 1787. As his knowledge of optics, geometry, and metaphysics was great, he was employed in measuring a degree in Lombardy. His works are on mathematical subjects. He travelled over the greatest part of Europe, and greatly improved the theory of achromatic glasses. His poem de solis & lunæ defectibus is admired.

Bosio, Anthony, of Milan, is known by his Italian description of the tombs and epitaphs of the early Christians at Rome. The work was translated into Latin, and is valuable, in two vols. folio, 1651.

Boson, count of Arles, was king of Provence in 879.

Bosse, Abraham, of Tours, is known as an engraver and an architect. He published some useful treatises on the art of engraving, 8vo.—on perspective, 8vo.—representations of human figures, from the antiques of Rome, &c. and died about 1660.

Bossu, Rene le, was born at Paris 1631, and after studying at Nanterre, he became canon of St. Genevieve. He devoted himself to divinity and belles lettres, on which he read lectures. He published a comparison between Aristotle's and des Cartes' philosophy, and a treatise on epic poetry, the best composition ever written on the subject in French, according to Boileau. He died 1680.

Bossuet, James, was born at Dijon 1627, and studied in the college of Navarre at Paris. He distinguished himself as a preacher at Paris, and was made preceptor to the Dauphin, to whom he dedicated his discourse on universal history, in 1681. He became bishop of Condom, afterwards of Meaux, and in 1695 he was made superior of the college of Navarre. His writings gained universal admiration. As a catholic he displayed firmness and moderation, and it is said that his strong appeals to the protestants drew back many from the new tenets to the pale of the Romish church. His history of the protestant churches, —his history of France, &c. are well known, but his funeral orations in honor of the memory of princes and great men, possess peculiar sublimity. After a life spent in the defence of religion, he died at Paris 1704. The learned evinced their respect for this great man's memory, by the encomiums delivered to crowded audiences, as tributes of gratitude, at Meaux, Paris, and Rome. His works appeared at Paris together 12 vols. 4to.

Boston, Thomas, M. A. a native of Dunse in Scotland, educated at Edinburgh, and minister of Etterick, where he died of a scorbutic disorder 1732, aged 36. He wrote a well-known book "Human nature in its fourfold state," besides other pieces &c.

Boswell, James, eldest son of lord Auchinleck, one of the Scotch judges, was born at Edinburgh 1740. He studied civil law at Glasgow and Edinburgh, and though inclined to a military life, he was called to the Scotch bar. As his heart was open and generous, he cultivated the friendship of men of worth and learning, among whom were lord Somerville, Mr. Temple, and particularly Dr Johnson, to whom he was introduced 1763. A desire of studying men and manners induced him to travel, and after crossing Germany and Switzerland, and paying his respects to the poet of Ferney and to the philosopher of Geneva, he went to Corsica, and the kindness of Paoli was repaid by encomiums in the history which he published of that island; a volume which has to add to the commendation of Johnson the labors of Dutch, German, Italian, and French translators. He returned to Scotland in 1766, and at the jubilee at Stratford on Avon, he supported at a masquerade the favorite character of an armed Corsican chief. As his intimacy with Johnson was founded on reciprocal esteem, it is a happy circumstance that he began early to collect materials for the life of this extraordinary man. Besides Dr. Johnson's life, he published an account of his tour to the Hebrides with the great moralist,—two letters to the people of Scotland,—and essence of the Douglas cause. Boswell had a strong predilection for London, and he not only visited the capital frequently, but at last settled there in 1785, and was called to the English bar. He did not however meet with success, but though he possessed not the superior powers of eloquence, he was distinguished as a lawyer by strong sense and deep penetration. He was suddenly on his return from Auchinleck seized with a disorder which proved fatal, He died at his house in Portland-street 1795, aged 55 Though the man of wit, the pleasing and lively companion, Boswell was subject to moments of constitutional melancholy, and it was during those depressions he wrote his hypochondriac a periodical publication in 1782. His character is painted in flattering colors by Johnson who says in his tour to the Hebrides that "Boswell would help his enquiries, and that his gaiety of disposition and civility of manner were sufficient to counterbalance the inconveniences of travel, in countries less hospitable than he had passed."

Botal, Leonard, physician to Henry III. of France, recommended frequent bleeding in fevers, which other medical men severely condemned. His works appeared 1660, 8vo.

Both, John and Andrew, two Flemish painters, so fond of each other that their pictures were generally executed in common John imitated Claude Lorraine, and his brother copied the manner of Bamboche. John was drowned 1650 in the canal of Venice, and the other died at Utrecht 1656.

Bothwell, James Hepburn, earl, known in Scotch history for his marriage with queen Mary. It is supposed by some that he was concerned in the murder of Darnley, Mary's husband, but though suspected, his innocence was inferred from his acquittal upon the trial. If the death of Darnley did not pave the way to his elevation, he made himself sure by seizing the queen at Edinburgh, and carrying her a prisoner to Dunbar castle, where he prevailed upon her by violence to yield to his wishes and to marry him. Though seemingly secure, and though created earl of Orkney, by the queen, he soon found that his conduct roused the indignation of the kingdom. Mary found not in him that fond husband she expected, and Bothwell became unkind and brutal. A confederacy was formed against him the queen was liberated from his power, an he escaped to the Orkneys, and afterwards to Denmark, where he died 1577. In his last moments, it is said, that with an agonizing conscience, he confessed his own guilt and the queen's innocence of the murder of Darnley.

Boticelli, Alexander, a painter of Florence, who died 1515, aged 78. His Venus rising from the sea, and his Venus adorned by the Graces, were admired.

Bott, John de, an architect born in France. He was in the military service of William III. and afterwards of the king of Prussia, and of the king of Poland. The arsenal of Berlin, the fortifications of Wesel, and several public edifices at Dresden, are monuments of his genius. He died at Dresden 1745, aged 75.

Bott, Thomas, of Derby, was the youngest of six children, and the attention of his mother fully supplied the negligence of his father, who had wasted away his property in gaming. He was minister of a dissenting congregation; but he afterwards studied physic, which he abandoned for the church of England. He obtained Winburg and Edgefield rectories, in Norfolk, and died at Norwich 1754. He wrote some theological tracts, besides sermons.

Bovadilla or Bobadilla, Don Francisco de, a Spaniard, governor general of the Indies in 1500. His conduct was tyrannical, but when he loaded with irons, and sent as prisoners to Europe Diego Columbus and his illustrious brother, to whose zeal the discovery of America was due, Ferdinand and Isabella repented of their choice. The noble sufferers were treated with distinction, Ovando was sent to supersede Bovadilla, who, however, never reached home, as his fleet was shipwrecked, and with an immense quantity of gold sunk to the bottom 1502.

Bouchardon, Edmund, a native of Chaumont, who devoted himself to sculpture, and adorned Paris with various monuments of his genius. He was honored by the king and by the academy, and died 1672, aged 64.

Bouchaud, Matthew Anthony, a native of Paris, professor of the law of nature in the university of Paris. Besides various articles in the encyclopædia, he wrote a commentary on the laws of the 12 tables with notes, &c.—poetical antiquities, &c. He died 1804, aged 85.

Boucher, Francis, painter to Lewis XV. from his excellence in the light and agreeable, was called the painter of the graces, and the Anacreon of painting. He died 1770. His infant Jesus sleeping is much admired.

Boucher, John, a seditious doctor of the Sorbonne, who severely inveighed in his sermons and writings against Henry III. and afterwards against Henry IV. When Paris submitted to the conqueror, he retired into the Netherlands, where he died 1664, aged 94.

Boucherat, Lewis, a native of Paris, raised by his talents and integrity to be chancellor of France. He died 1699, aged 83.

Bouchier, Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, was the first who encouraged printing in England. He sent two persons to Haerlem, where the art was then beginning to flourish, and they bribed one of the compositors of the press to embark with them, and to bring with him a set of letters. This useful foreigner settled at Oxford 1464, and thus that university may claim the honor of printing next to Mentz and Haerlem. Bouchier has been accused of avarice, but it should not be forgotten that the persons he sent to Holland were provided with a thousand marks, 300 of which were his own. He died 1486.

Boucicaut, marechal de France, was eminent as a warrior, and went against Bajazet, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Nicopolis. He was governor of Genoa for Charles VI. but while he seized Milan, all the French were massacred at Genoa, and he himself was defeated, and escaped with difficulty. He afterwards distinguished himself against the Turks and Venetians. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Agincourt, and died in England 1421. He was fond of music, and some of his ballads are still preserved.

Boudot, John, an intelligent bookseller and printer at Paris, author of a valuable Latin dictionary in 14 vols. 4to. usefully abridged in 8vo. He died 1754, aged 69.

Boverick, an English clock-maker in the 17th century, known for his ingenuity in mechanics.

Bovey, Catharine, married, at the age of 15, William Bovey, a gentleman of opulence in Gloucestershire. To great personal charms she united the most benevolent character, so that she is deservedly extolled by sir Richard Steele in his dedication of the two vols. of the ladies' library. She was left a widow early, and died at Haxley, in Gloucestershire, 1726, aged 57. Her maiden name was Riches.

Boufflers, Louis Francois duc de, early distinguished himself by a strong military genius. His defence of Lisle in 1708, for nearly four months against Eugene, gained him universal praise. "I am vain," said Eugene, when master of the place, to Boufflers, "to have conquered Lisle; but I had rather enjoy the glory of defending it like you." He served under Villars, and at the battle of Malplaquet, in 1709, he displayed such vigilance, that neither cannon nor prisoners fell into the hands of the conquerors. He was generous and disinterested, humane and virtuous, and so superior a general, that William III. detaining him prisoner at Namur, declared that he was worth more than 10,000 men. He died at Fontainbleau 1711, aged 68.

Bougainville, John Peter de, was born at Paris 1722. His uncommon application procured him many friends, but his ambition was disappointed in his wish to be admitted into the French academy. He died at the early age of 41, 1763. He wrote a parallel between Thomas Kouli Khan and Alexander,—a translation lation of Polignac's Anti-Lucretius, two vols. 8vo. &c.

Bougainville, M. D. F. a Frenchman, whose discoveries in his navigation round the world, procured as much glory to his nation, as Cook had before acquired for the English. Neither his virtues nor his services shielded him, and he was one of the thousands inhumanly sacrificed at Paris on the 10th of August 1792.

Bougeant, Guillaume Hyacinth, a Jesuit, of Quimper, was professor of humanities at Caen, Nevers, and Paris. He fell under disgrace by the publication of his amusement philosophique, in which he supposes that brutes are animated by demons. He was a man of engaging manners and pleasing conversation; but the disappointments which he endured shortened his life. He died at Paris 1743, aged 53. His publications are respectable, especially his history of the wars, &c. during Richelieu's and Mazarin's administration.—the history of the treaty of Westphalia, &c.

Bouguer, Peter, of Croisie, was distinguished by his knowledge of mathematics. He was with Godin and de la Condamine, in Peru, to ascertain the figure of the earth; but his quarrel with his associates lessened his fame, and drew upon him the character of a rough, ferocious, and unforgiving man. He died 1758, aged 60. His publications are respectable, especially la construction du navire, 4to.—la figure de la terre, 4to—traité d'optique, 4to.—la manœuvre des vaisseux, 4to.

Bouhier, John, of Dijon, was eminent as a lawyer and a scholar. He wrote poetry, translated Petronius and some parts of Virgil and Ovid, besides the Tusculana of Cicero, dissertations, &c. He died 1746, aged 73.

Bouhours, Dominique, a Jesuit, of Paris, celebrated as a critic. He first gave lectures at Clermont, and then became preceptor to the sons of the duke of Longueville. He afterwards attended at Dunkirk the popish refugees from England, and became known by his "entretiens d'Ariste & d'Eugene," an elegant work, which was read with avidity in every part of Europe. This performance so pleased Colbert, that he made him tutor to his son, the marquis of Sequelai. His literary fame was not, however, without attacks, and Menage has levelled against him the well-directed shafts of criticism. His remarks and doubts on the French language are worth attention. He wrote, besides dialogues on the art of thinking well,—the life of Francis Xavier, the apostle of India,—the life of Ignatius,—ingenious thoughts of ancients and moderns, &c. Bouhours closed his useful life, which never ceased to be afflicted with the headach, at Clermont, 1702.

Bouillaud, Ismael, was born at London 1605. Though of protestant parents, he embraced the popish faith. His connexions with the learned were very extensive; but, in the midst of his reputation, he showed himself modest and diffident. He died 1694. He published a discourse on the reformation of some religious orders, an edition of Ducas, in Greek and Latin, fol. &c.

Bouillé, M. le marquis de, a French general. During the American war, he served in the West Indies, and for his services was made lieutenant-general, and knight of the Holy Ghost. He opposed the revolution, and particularly the plans of Necker, and, as the friend of the king, he repressed the insurrection of the garrison of Metz, of which he was governor, in August 1790; but though applauded by the assembly, he was accused by the jacobins as a shedder of blood; and the odium was farther encreased upon the flight of the king to Varennes. Bouillé, who failed in his attempts to liberate his master, boldly defended the measures, and was in consequence pronounced an enemy to his country. An exile from France, he entered the Swedish army in 1791, but soon after enlisted under Condé, and shared the dangers of the heroic, but unfortunate emigrants. His memoirs of the revolution appeared in 1797, and excited great interest. He died in London 1800.

Bouillet, John, a physician, born at Servian, 1690. He died 1777, author of elemens de medicine pratique, 2 vols. 4to.—observations sur l'anasarque & les hydropsies, 4to. &c.

Bouillon, Emanuel Theodosius, an ecclesiastic and cardinal. He served Lewis XIV. as his ambassador at Rome; but he was exiled on pretence of not supporting his master's interest with sufficient energy. He died at Rome 1715, aged 72.

Boulai, Cæsar Egasse du, a native of Lower Maine, historiographer to the university of Paris, and known by his "history of the university of Paris, 6 vols. folio." He died 1678.

Boulainvilliers, Henry de, a native of St. Saise, who wrote an history of the Arabians—14 letters on the ancient French parliaments—the state of France to the time of Hugh Capet—a history of France to the reign of Charles VIII. &c. He died at Paris in 1722; and after his death his unfinished life of Mahomet was published, in which he defends the impostures which it was his duty merely to record.

Boulanger, Nicholas Anthony, of Paris, by application overcame the difficulties of a natural stupidity, and became eminent as a mathematician and architect. He was engineer in the army, and being employed in the care of the highways of Champagne, &c. he observed the various strata of the earth, in cutting through mountains, to alter or improve the direction of rivers and canals. His conjectures on the globe were curious and interesting. He sought for new light in ancient languages; but death cut off his useful career in 1759, in his 37th year. He was of a benevolent temper, and resembled in features the famous Socrates. His works are l'antiquité devoilée, 3 vols. 12mo.—traité du despotisme oriental, 2 vols.

&c. beſides the articles, " deluge, corvée & ſociete," in the enclyclopædia, and a diſſertation on Eliſha add Enoch, &c. His ſentiments were wantonly hoſtile to the Chriſtian religion.

BOULANGER or BOULLEGER, Claude Francois Felix, a native of Amiens, advocate at Paris, and known for extenſive erudition and great powers of memory. He wrote treatiſes on electricity, 8vo.—hiſtorical and critical reſearches on ancient plays, 12mo.—beſides fables in verſe, inferior to la Fontaine. He died 1758, aged 34.

BOULLIER, David Renaud, of Utrecht, was miniſter of Amſterdam and Leyden. His writings, in French and Latin, are chiefly on theological ſubjects, the beſt known of which are, a diſſertation on the exiſtence of God, 1716—letters on the true principles of religion, 2 vols. 12mo. 1741, &c. He died 1759, aged 60.

BOULLONGNE, Louis, a French painter. His Auguſtus ſhutting the temple of Janus, his flight into Egypt, and ſeveral other pieces, preſerved at Paris, are valuable monuments of his genius. He died at Paris 1674.

BOULLONGNE, Bon, eldeſt ſon of the preceding, was educated at Rome, and poſſeſſed a great verſatility of genius, whence he was called the Proteus of painters. He died 1697, aged 43. His younger brother Lewis was equally eminent as a painter. He was patroniſed by Lewis XIV. and died 1733, aged 79.

BOULTER, Hugh, D. D. was born in or near London, and educated at merchant taylors' ſchool, and Chriſt-church, Oxford. He was choſen demy of Magdalen with Addiſon and Wilcox; which circumſtance, from the reſpectability of the three ſtudents, is called the golden election. His learning recommended him to ſir Charles Hodges, ſecretary of ſtate, to Teniſon, the primate, and to the earl of Sunderland, by whoſe patronage he was made chaplain to George I. whom he attended to Hanover in 1719, and afterwards Engliſh tutor to prince Frederick. He was made dean of Chriſt-church and biſhop of Briſtol in 1719. His moderation was ſo conſpicuous, that when the primacy of Ireland became vacant, the king appointed him to that high ſtation, which he accepted with great reluctance. Ireland was then a prey to faction, in conſequence of Wood's ruinous ſchemes with reſpect to the coin; but the primate's efforts were directed to reſtore tranquillity. Though at firſt unpopular, his plans ſucceeded, the ſcarcity of ſilver was remedied, and he became the favorite of the Iriſh. His munificence was unbounded, during the ſcarcity of 1741, and not leſs than 2500 ſouls were daily ſupported at his expence. Hoſpitals were nobly endowed, the children of the indigent clergy were educated, public buildings erected, and not leſs than 30,000l. were devoted to improve the ſmall livings of Ireland. This great and good man viſited, in June 1742, his native country, and died in London the September following, and was interred in Weſtminſter-abbey. Though a man of erudition, he left nothing but a few occaſional ſermons; but his beneficence and charity have gained him immortal fame.

BOUQUERANT, a negro of St. Domingo, who poſſeſſed ſagacity and eloquence, and raiſed himſelf to conſequence among his fellow ſufferers in the colony. He was kiled 1791, bravely fighting in defence of liberty.

BOUQUET, dom Martin, a Benedict of St. Maur, who aſſiſted Montfaucon, and made an uſeful collection of the hiſtorians of France, as far as the 3d volume, to which four more were added after his death, which happened 1754, in his 69th year.

BOUQUET, madam, is celebrated for her humanity during the revolution, in concealing ſome of the proſcribed deputies, though death was the conſequence. After ſupporting theſe unfortunate men for ſome time, and ſeeing their eſcape from her abode but to periſh on the ſcaffold, ſhe was herſelf dragged before the tribunal of Bourdeaux, and ſuffered death.

BOURBON, Charles duc de, ſon of Gilbert count of Montpenſier, conſtable of France, was born 1489, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his valor, eſpecially in the battle of Marignano After ſerving Francis I. he was diſgraced, through the intrigues of Louiſa the queen-mother, whoſe offers of marriage he had rejected, and he eſpouſed the cauſe of Charles V. and contributed to the victory of Pavia. He was placed at the head of the imperial armies; and when the ſoldiers murmured for want of pay, he with bold enthuſiaſm promiſed them riches and victory, and immediately led them againſt Rome. The attack was unexpected, but the valor of Bourbon would have overcome all obſtacles. He placed the firſt ſcaling ladder againſt the wall, and as he was mounting at the head of his troops he received a ſhot, which immediately proved fatal, 6th May, 1527. His victorious ſoldiers buried him with great funereal honors.

BOURBON CONDÉ, Louis duc de, a French general, who gained reputation at the battles of Steinkerque and Nerwinde, and died ſuddenly at Paris 1710, aged 42. His ſon Lewis Henry was employed during the minority of Lewis XV. and died at Chantilly 1740, aged 48.

BOURBON, Nicholas, a native of Vandreuves, employed in the education of Jeanne d'Albert, mother of Henry IV. of France. He retired to literary eaſe, and wrote 8 books of epigrams, which he called Nugæ, beſides his poem on ſmiths (ferraria), of which profeſſion his father was. He died about the middle of the 16th century. His great nephew, who bore the ſame name, was equally known and admired as a Latin poet. His works were publiſhed 1651, in 12mo. He died 1644, aged 70.

BOURCHIER, John, lord Berners, was by the mother's ſide allied to the Plantagenets. He ſtudied at Oxford, and afterwards travelled abroad, and became known by repreſſing the inſur-insurgents in Devonshire and Cornwall 1495. He was chancellor of the exchequer for life under Henry VIII. and made governor of Calais, where he died 1532. He was author of treatises on the duties of the inhabitants of Calais—ite in vineam meam, a comedy, acted in Calais great church—besides translations of romances and of Froissart's chronicle &c.

Bourdaloue, Lewis, a Jesuit, born at Bruges 1632, celebrated as the first and most eloquent preacher of France. His powers were exhibited before the court of Lewis XIV. and the monarch so strongly felt his eloquence, that, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he sent him to preach the catholic doctrines to the new converts of Languedoc. He died 1704, aged 72. His sermons have passed through several editions, in 16 vols. 8vo.

Bourdeilles, Peter de, a courtier in the service of Charles IX. and Henry III. better known by the name of Brantome. His memoires in 15 vols. though irregular, are interesting, as they contain the private history of the French monarchs of his age. He died 1614, aged 87.

Bourdeilles, Claude de, grand-nephew of the preceding, was in the service of Gaston of Orleans, but he retired to a private station. He died 1663, leaving memoirs known under the name of Montresor, 2 vols. 12mo.

Bourdelot, John, of Sens, master of the requests to Mary of Medicis, is better known as a learned critic, and the editor of Lucian, Petronius, and Heliodorus, with notes full of taste and erudition. He wrote, besides an universal history, commentaries on Juvenal, &c. and died suddenly at Paris 1638. His sister's son, who took the name of Bourdelot, was a physician at Paris, and the friend of Condé, of Christina of Sweden, and the author of a sensible treatise on the viper, 12mo. 1651. He wrote also a treatise on mount Ætna, &c. besides a MS. catalogue of medical books, with lives of authors, 1685, aged 76.

Bourdin, Maurice, anti-pope in 1118, under the name of Gregory VIII., was taken by Calixtus II., and died in prison 1121.

Bourdon, Amé, a native of Cambrai, who, at the age of 36, studied physic, and acquired great reputation. He published an anatomical description of the human body, 12mo. besides anatomical lectures; and died 1706, aged 68.

Bourdon, Sebastian, a native of Montpellier, eminent as a painter. He studied at Rome, and acquired great reputation in France. His powers of execution were so strong, that he once laid a wager that he could paint 12 heads after life, and as big as life, in one day, and he won. His best pieces are, the martyrdom of St. Peter in the church of Notre Dame, the seven works of mercy, &c. As he was a protestant, he left France for the protection of Christina queen of Sweden; and died 1662, aged 46.

Bourdonnaye, Bernard Francis Mahe de la, a native of St. Malo's, distinguished as a warrior and negociator. He was governor of the isles of France and Bourbon; and, in the war of 1741, he armed a small squadron, and laid siege to Madras, which he took, and restored to the conquered for a ransom of about 9 millions. On his return to France, he was accused of suffering himself to be corrupted by the enemy, and sent to the Bastille. This undeservedly persecuted man died 1754, in consequence of the severe imprisonment to which he had been exposed.

Bourdot, Charles Anthony, a learned advocate of Paris, author of the "coutumier general," 4 vols. folio. He died 1735, aged 46.

Bourg, Ann du, a counsellor of the parliament of Paris, cruelly put to death and burnt by the influence of Henry II. for embracing the doctrines of Calvin, 1559. He was then 38 years old.

Bourgelat, Claude, of the academy of Berlin, was of infinite service to Prussia, by promoting the establishment of veterinary schools. He wrote some useful treatises on the subject, &c. and died at an advanced age, 1779.

Bourget, dom John, a Benedictine of Seez, eminent for his piety and learning. He was member of the London antiquarian society in 1765. He devoted himself to antiquities and left behind him a curious account of the abbey of Caen, founded by William the Conqueror, and of that of Bec, so well known in English history as being the nursery of several archbishops of Canterbury. He died 1776.

Bourget, Clemence de, a lady of Lyons who possessed so much merit as a writer, a musician, and a poetess, that she was presented to two monarchs who passed through Lyons as the greatest ornament of her native city. She died of a broken heart, in consequence of the loss of her lover, John de Peyrat, who fell at the siege of Beaurepaire 1561.

Bourguet, Lewis, a native of Nimes who fled to Switzerland, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and established at Zurich the manufacture of silk, muslin, and stockings. He was professor of philosophy at Neufchatel and died 1742, aged 64, author of a letter on the formation of salts and crystals—la bibliotheque Italique, 16 vols. 8vo. &c.

Bourgueville, Charles de, lieutenant-general of Caen, is the author of the history of that ancient town. He died 1593.

Bourignon, Antoinette, a celebrated enthusiast, born at Lisle in Flanders. She was so deformed, that it is said a consultation was held in her family to destroy so monstrous a birth. Her mind, however, was of a superior texture. She was bold, ambitious after distinction, and strongly tinctured with superstition. Under the affectation of immaculate chastity, she left her father's house, when he wished to recommend her a husband, and, in the habit of a hermit, she propagated her principles, formed a society of females, whose rule of conduct was the love of God and the gospel. She was exposed to the rudeness of de Saulieu and others, who even attempted violence againſt her perſon. After enjoying the reputation of ſuperior ſanctity for ſome time in Flanders, ſhe came to Amſterdam, where ſhe gained the friendſhip of de Lort, of Mechlin, who, to reward her confidence, left her a large eſtate at his death. She afterwards went to Holſtein and Hamburgh, where ſhe gained proſelytes by her pretenſions to inſpiration, and to frequent interviews with ſupernatural beings. She died at Franeker in the province of Friſe, 1680, in her 64th year. This extraordinary perſon was in her principles nearly a quietiſt. She excluded all external worſhip, and required a ceſſation of reaſon, ſenſe, and underſtanding, that God might ſpread his light over his devotees. Her birth, her introduction as a reformer, and her death, were accompanied by the appearance of three remarkable comets, and this operated powerfully on the minds of her deluded followers. She had proſelytes in Scotland, and among them men of learning and reſpectability. It is remarkable, that ſhe was avaricious, diſobedient to her parents, and ſevere to her domeſtics and dependants. Her works were publiſhed in 21 vols. 8vo.

Bourlet de Vauxcelles, Simon Jerome, a French writer of eminence, who died at Paris 1799, aged 65.

Bourlie, Antoine-de Guiſcard, a native of Perigord, who abandoned his country, and became a penſioner of queen Anne in England. He was accuſed of treaſon in 1711; and when examined before the privy council, he ſtabbed lord Oxford, for which he was ſent to Newgate, where he deſtroyed himſelf.

Bourn, Samuel, a native of Birmingham, educated at Glaſgow. He was miniſter of a diſſenting congregation at Rivington, Lancaſhire, and then removed to Norwich as aſſiſtant to Dr. Taylor. He was author of ſome ſermons, and had a diſpute with Chandler about the duration of future puniſhments. He died at Norwich 1796, aged 83.

Bourne, Vincent, an amiable writer, fellow of Trinity college, Cambridge, and uſher of Weſtminſter ſchool. He publiſhed a volume of elegant poems, re-printed in 4to. 1772, and died young.

Boursault, Edmund, a native of Burgundy, who gained the favor of the court of Lewis XIV. by the wit of his converſation and the vivacity of his muſe. He became ſecretary to the ducheſs of Angouleme, with a penſion of 2000 livres, and his buſineſs was chiefly to turn the gazette into rhyme. His ſatire, directed againſt the Franciſcans and Capuchins, proved nearly fatal to him, and his patrons alone ſaved him from the dungeons of the Baſtille. He was diſmiſſed with diſgrace, and again received into favor, and died of the cholic, 1701, aged 63. Bourſault poſſeſſed merit as a poet. His Æſop in the city, and Æſop at court, are ſtill applauded on the ſtage, for the intereſting ſcenes of life which they exhibit, with happy ſatire and in elegant language. He wrote other plays, romances, letters, and fables, &c. In his private character he was amiable. Though he was politically hoſtile to Boileau, he viſited him at Bourbon with the offer of his purſe and ſervices; and this liberality produced a reconciliation and the cloſeſt intimacy.

Boursier, Lawrence Francis, doctor of the Sorbonne, died at Paris in 1749, aged 70. He was author of ſeveral controverſial books in divinity, and of an able treatiſe called l'action de dieu ſur les creatures, 2 vols. 4to. or 6 vols. 12mo. attacked by Malebranche. He wrote alſo an addreſs to Peter the great when at Paris, for the re-union of the Greek and Latin churches.

Bourvalais, Paul Poiſſon, a French financier, who roſe from obſcurity to opulence by induſtry, and afterwards by diſhoneſt means. He was accuſed of having amaſſed a fortune from the diſtreſſes of the ſtate during the ſucceſſion war, and his wealth was forfeited. He was ſome time after indemnified; but his diſgrace had broken a heart naturally impatient, and he died the year after, 1719.

Bourzeis, Amable de, an eccleſiaſtic, whoſe pen and abilities were employed by Richelieu and Mazarin. He died at Paris 1672, aged 66, author of ſome theological tracts, &c.

Bouvart, Michael Philip, profeſſor of medicine at Paris, was born at Chartres, and died at Paris 1787, aged 66. He acquired celebrity in his profeſſion, and wrote ſome tracts on medicine. He once viſited a banker who was ſeized with melancholy at the proſpect of bankruptcy, and finding that the diſorder of his patient was ſuch as his purſe could remove, he honorably ſent him 20,000 livres to enable him to meet his creditors. His eloge was pronounced by Condorcet.

Bower, Archibald, was born near Dundee in Scotland, 1686, and educated at Douay from whence he paſſed to Rome, 1706, and became a Jeſuit. Either diſlike to the inquiſition of Macerata to which he was counſellor, or his amorous propenſities, ſhook his religious principles, and he reſolved to abandon a life which he now regarded with abhorrence, and he made his eſcape to England, in 1726. He renounced the tenets of the catholic church, and embraced thoſe of the church of England. He became acquainted with lord Aylmer, in whoſe family he paſſed ſeveral years, and then he began to labor for the bookſellers by the publication of the Hiſtoria literaria, which he abandoned in 1734, for a large ſhare in the Univerſal Hiſtory. Unſteady and inſincere in principle he was again reconciled to the Jeſuits in 1745, and two years after, again publiſhed his diſſent from their religion. He wiſhed to convert his money into a life annuity, but the manner ner in which he relates the circumſtance, differs ſo much from the report of his antagoniſts that there is reaſon to ſuppoſe he acted unfairly. The patronage of lord Lyttelton broke the aſperities of his fortunes, he he was made librarian to queen Caroline in 1748, to which was afterwards added the clerkſhip of buck warrants. His hiſtory of the popes was continued to the ſeventh volume a little before his death, but his quarrels with the Jeſuits rendered him ſuſpected both as an hiſtorian and as a man. His inſincerity was diſcovered by Dr. Douglas afterwards biſhop of Saliſbury, and from a favorite writer, he became a ſuſpected character, and all except Lyttelton turned away with indignation from him. His honeſty has alſo been doubted in his reviſion of the ſecond edition of the univerſal hiſtory, for though he received 300l. for his aſſiſtance, he made no additions to the work entruſted to his care. Bower died 1766, aged 80, without any public profeſſion of faith, though his wife atteſted that he died in the proteſtant perſuaſion. His writings were not devoid of merit, and to this and to his love of the marvellous we are to atribute the violence of the controverſy, now forgotten, which at that time engaged the public attention. Not leſs than 22 pamphlets were publiſhed in conſequence of the hiſtory of the popes, and ſcurrility formed the weapons of all parties.

Bowle, John, was educated at Oriel college, Oxford, and died on his birth day, 1788, aged 63. He was the firſt detector of Lauder's forgeries, and author of a letter to Dr. Percy, and editor of Don Quixote in Spaniſh, &c. beſides Marſton's ſatires, &c.

Bowyer, William, a Engliſh printer, born in London, 1699, and educated at Merchant Taylors', and St. John's college, Cambridge. On leaving the univerſity, he followed the buſineſs of his father, who was a printer of eminence, and his firſt publication was Selden's works by Wilkins, three vols. folio. He was printer of the votes of the Houſe of Commons in 1729, by the friendſhip of Onſlow the ſpeaker, which he held for nearly 50 years. In 1761, he was appointed printer to the royal ſociety, and two years after he publiſhed his excellent edition of the New Teſtament two vols. It was not merely in printing books in a ſuperior ſtile that Bowyer diſtinguiſhed himſelf, but in enriching various works with notes, prefaces, and diſſertations. He took, in 1766, John Nichols for his partner. His literary career was finiſhed in 1777, by the publication of Bentley's diſſertations on Phalaris with additional notes. He died November the ſame year, after ſuffering ſeverely for two years from the palſy and the ſtone. His public character was the theme of univerſal admiration, and his private virtues proclaimed him a man of probity and the friend of humanity. His property which was the honorable acquiſition of induſtry, was left to his ſon except ſome legacies and annuities to three poor printers of ſober life, and well verſed in Greek and Latin.

Boxhorn, Mark Zuerius, a native of Bergen-op-Zoom, profeſſor of eloquence, politics, and hiſtory, at Leyden. He wrote Hiſtoria univerſalis, 4to. a uſeful book, beſides poems, and editions of "Scriptores Latini minores."—Poetæ Satyr. minores, &c. He died 1653, aged 41.

Boyce, William, an Engliſh muſician born in London 1710. He was a ſinging boy at St Paul's, but he made ſuch a proficiency that the higheſt expectations were formed of him. His maſter Dr. Greene at his death entruſted his MSS. to his care, and the publication of his anthems; but an incurable deafneſs came as it were to darken all the proſpects of the young proficient. Perſeverance, however, overdame every difficulty, and he was honorably made in 1749 Muſ. D. by the univerſity of Cambridge, and in 1757 maſter of the king's band, and afterwards organiſt and compoſer to the royal chapel. He died 1779. His ſongs were much admired for elegance and taſte, and his anthems, oratorios, and other muſical compoſitions poſſeſſed ſuperior merit.

Boyd, Robert, a native of Trochrig in Renfrewſhire, educated as Saumur. James I. wiſhed to appoint him principal of the univerſity, but he preferred to be miniſter of his native pariſh. He wrote a learned commentary on the epiſtle of the Epheſians, and died 1629, aged 56.

Boyd, Mark Alexander, a native of Galloway, educated under the care of his uncle who was archbiſhop of Glaſgow. He early fled from his inſtructors to Flanders, and engaged in the wars of the united provinces and of France. In Paris he loſt all his property by gaming, but his diſtreſs rouſed him to reflection, and he ſtudied civil law under Cujacius. He returned to Scotland, where he died of a ſlow fever 1601, aged 39. He left in MSS. ſome Latin poems much admired for elegance and taſte.

Boyd, Robert lord, a Scotchman, who was the favorite of the court and of the people, and was raiſed to the peerage, and on the death of the ſecond James made juſticiary of the kingdom, and one of the regents during the king's minority. Ambitious of having no rival, he carried off the young king from Linlithgow to Edinburgh and declared himſelf ſole regent. Every thing was carried on at his pleaſure, and the king's ſiſter was married to his ſon, afterwards lord Arran, till the monarch, extricated from the power of his guardian, ventured to call a parliament in 1499. Afraid of his enemies Boyd fled to England, and died at Alnwick 1470, and his ſon, divorced from his wife fled to Antwerp, where he died 1474. This family are the progenitors of Kilmarnock, who ſuffered in the rebellion of 1745.

Boydell,

BOYDELL, John, an eminent artiſt, born at Dorrington, Shropſhire, and brought up as land ſurveyor under his father. The accidental meeting of ſome landſcapes ſo captivated his attention that he ſtudied engraving. His landſcapes, publiſhed in 1745, proved the ſource of profit as well as celebrity, and he became the friend of artiſts, of genius, and ability. Eager to exhibit the productions of his country he nobly ſtood forth as the public encourager of merit, and by opening the Shakeſpeare gallery in Pall-mall, he diſplayed the beautiful and highly finiſhed labors of the Engliſh ſchool. He was elected an alderman of London, and in 1791, ſerved the office of lord mayor. Senſible of the eſteem of his fellow citizens, he preſented to the corporation ſome valuable pictures, preſerved as monuments of his friendſhip in Guildhall. Mr. Boydell diſpoſed of his property, in the prints, pictures, &c. of the Shakeſpeare gallery by a public lottery. He died in 1804, aged 85.

BOYENVAL, Peter Joſeph, the agent of Fouquier-Tainville in denouncing the wretched victims confined in the Luxembourg and other priſons. After ſhocking ſcenes of inſulting barbarity, this bloody monſter ſuffered on the ſcaffold, with his ferocious employer 1795, aged 26.

BOYER, Abel, was born at Caſtre in France, 1664. The edict of the revocation of Nantes baniſhed him to Geneva, from whence he came to England, where he ſpent the beſt part of his life, and died at Chelſea 1729. He is known by his uſeful French and Engliſh dictionary, and his French grammar, which have paſſed though ſeveral editions. His hiſtory of William and Mary, three vols. 8vo. —his poetical ſtate of Great Britain, a periodical work,—his annals of queen Anne, 11 vols. 8vo.—&c. are inferior works.

BOYER, Claude, was born at Alby, and after applying to the eloquence of the pulpit he became a player. He wrote 22 dramatical pieces, of little merit. He died at Paris, 1698, aged 80.

BOYER, John Baptiſt Nicholas, a phyſician, diſtinguiſhed for his zeal and humanity during the dreadful plague at Marſeilles in 1720. His ſucceſs in combating the violence of contagious diſorders recommended him to the notice of the French king and to the gratitude of Spain and Germany. He gave an edition of the Pharmacopœia Pariſienſis, 4to. and died at Paris 1768, aged 75.

BOYLE, Richard, known by the title of great earl of Cork, was born at Canterbury in 1566. After a private education, he entered at Benet's college Cambridge, and became a ſtudent of the Middle Temple, but as he loſt early his parents, and as his patrimony was ſlender, he went to Dublin in June 1588, in queſt of fortune, with fewer pounds in his pocket than he afterwards acquired thouſands a year. His abilities recommended him, he drew memorials and caſes with accuracy, and acquired a knowledge of public affairs. He married, in 1595, Joan Auſley of Pulborough in Eſſex, who died four years after without children, leaving him 500l. a year in land, which proved the foundation of his future proſperity. He was repreſented to the queen as a traitor, in correſponding with the Spaniards, but he was permitted to anſwer his accuſers, and ſir Henry Wallop, the moſt violent of his perſecutors, was diſgraced by Elizabeth. In conſequence of his merits he was appointed to offices of truſt in Ireland under his friend Carew, earl of Totneſs, and he roſe to conſequence and dignity. He was knighted, made a privy counſellor, and afterwards advanced to the peerage, firſt by the title of lord Boyle, afterwards of earl of Cork. In his elevated ſituation he received many mortifications from the jealouſy of Wentworth, earl of Strafford, when viceroy of Ireland. His whole life was devoted to the ſupport of his country, towns were built on eligible ſpots, and improvements were introduced on his eſtates with ſuch judgment, that Cromwell declared if Ireland had a Cork in every county, rebellion could never have raiſed its head there. He was very active in the rebellion of 1641, in favor of government, and four of his ſons were engaged in the battle of Liſcarrol, the eldeſt of whom was ſlain. He died 1643, aged 78, and wiſhing to publiſh to the world the vaſt fortune which he had collected by induſtry from an obſcure beginning, he cauſed to be placed on his tomb, the motto of his family "God's providence is my inheritance." The moſt memorable circumſtances of his life, written by himſelf, have been publiſhed by Dr. Birch. He was father of ſeven ſons and eight daughters and he had the ſingular happineſs of ſeeing before his death three of the five ſons who ſurvived him, viz. Lewis, Roger, and Francis, raiſed to the peerage.

BOYLE, Roger, earl of Orrery, was fifth ſon of Richard earl of Cork, and born 1621. He was made lord Broghill when only ſeven years old, in reward of his father's ſervices. He was educated in the college of Dublin, and after making the tour of France and Italy, with his eldeſt brother, he engaged in the Iriſh wars. The death of Charles I. proved ſo very dreadful to his feelings that he left the army, and lived in retirement at Marſton in Somerſetſhire, but ſo apprehenſive was he of the parliament, that he prepared to join the royal party on the continent. His views were diſcovered, and Cromwell charged him with the reſolution of abandoning the kingdom; and proved the inutility of denying it, by ſhowing him copies of letters that had paſſed between him and his confidential friends. Broghill was ſo thunderſtruck at the diſcovery that Cromwell prevailed on him to eſpouſe his cauſe rather than to ſubmit to the horrors of a dungeon, and when he was informed that he was to fight only againſt the Iriſh rebels, he accepted the pledges of protection offered him him by the republican general. He displayed so much activity that Cromwell, now protector, honored him with his friendship, and sent him to settle the affairs of Scotland. On the death of Cromwell, Broghill supported his son, but when Richard dropped the reins of government, he looked for future protection from the exiled king, and prepared measures so effectually with sir Charles Coote in the north of Ireland, that the whole declared for Charles II. The restored monarch paid that respect to Broghill which his services deserved, he was made earl of Orrery, and president of Munster. As the supporter of the protestants against the papists, he displayed eloquence, patriotism, and a bold disdain of bribery. His knowledge of law was so extensive that he was offered the seals on the fall of Clarendon, which his debility prevented him to accept. In a political view his abilities were directed to strengthen the government. His merits were not without enemies, Ormond envied his popularity, but all his efforts to remove him from the confidence of the king proved ineffectual. He died 1679, aged 58, leaving two sons and five daughters. His writings were numerous and respectable, and among them tragedies, comedies, &c.

Boyle, Robert, seventh son and 14th child of Richard earl of Cork, was born at Lismore in Munster 1627. He was under a country nurse, trained to a hardy mode of life, and after receiving some instruction in his father's family he was sent to Eton under the care of sir Henry Wotton. In 1638 his father sent him with his brother Francis to Geneva, where, in a severe course of study, he renewed his acquaintance with mathematics. After staying about 21 months at Geneva, he visited Verona, Venice, Florence, Rome, Genoa, and Marseilles, and returned to England in 1644. His father died before his return, but he found an ample settlement, which however the confusion of the time prevented him from possessing. In 1646 he retired to Stalbridge, and regardless of the tumults which agitated his unhappy country, he spent his time in philosophical and chemical studies. His intimacy with learned men promoted the cause of literature, and he was one of the first who about 1645 laid the foundation of that respectable society, called after the restoration the royal society. He fixed his residence in the house of a Mr. Crosse, at Oxford, about 1654, where the philosophical society had removed from London, and it is a pleasure to record, as the friends and companions of his studies, the names of Wilkins, Ward, Wallis, Wren, Willis, Hooke, Pococke, Hyde, Barlow, &c. About 1678, he invented the air-pump, an engine which has thrown new light on the works of the creator. After the restoration he was treated with respect by the king, but he refused the highest ecclesiastical preferment which was offered to him if he entered into orders, observing with becoming independence, that whatever he did in suppo of religion would have greater weight in con ing from a layman. In this he proved th goodness of his heart, for all his studies bo as a man of letters and a man of influen among the great, were zealously directed the promotion of piety, learning, and virtu His character was so universally known a respected, that the grand duke of Tuscan solicited the honor of his correspondence, a Charles II. bestowed upon him in 1665, the reward of his splendid talents, the vaca provostship of Eton, which, however, again the advice of his friends, he modestly decline For the same reason he refused to be preside of the royal society, which his services had much dignified, for independence was th object nearest his heart. The most favored o fice he ever held was that of governor of th corporation for the propagation of the gospe and this he at last resigned when he found th approaching decline of his health. So numero were his friends, and so anxious was the pu lic curiosity with respect to him, that when h strength failed he published an advertiseme and placed an inscription over his door to i form the world that he declined receivi visits, and what in another might have a peared ostentation, in him was the prepar tion of a man of sense, to withdraw fro the tumult of life, and to make his peace wi his Creator. His health rapidly declined, that he expired December 1691, in his 65 year, one week after the death of his b loved sister lady Ranelagh. His charact was drawn by Burnet, who preached at h funeral, with the pencil of truth, but the prai of Boerhaave cannot be taxed with adulatio "Boyle," says this learned man, "the orn ment of his age and country, succeeded the genius and enquiries of the great Ver lam. Which "says he" of all Boyle's wri ings shall I recommend? all of them. T him we owe the secrets of fire, air, wate animals, vegetable, fossils, so that from h works may be reduced the whole system natural knowledge." In his person Boyle w tall, but slender, his countenance was pale a emaciated, and his constitution so delicate th he used cloaks when he appeared abroad, a always regulated himself by the state of h thermometer. For 40 years his spirits we so low and depressed that it is surprizing hc he could find sufficient resolution to wri and to make the difficult experiments whi he performed. He was never married. H disinterestedness in refusing a peerage is w known, his zeal in the propagation of chr tianity is equally noble, and it is recorded his biographers that his charities annual amounted to 1000l. When director of t East India company, he sent to the Indies 5 copies of the gospels and acts of the apostles the Malayan language, as he had in the sa manner three years before conveyed to t Levant several copies of Grotius' treatise the Chriſtian religion, tranſlated into Arabic by Dr. Pococke. As another inſtance of his wiſh to ſupport religion may be mentioned the lecture which he founded at St. Paul's in defence of the goſpel againſt unbelievers. His works have been publiſhed in 5 vols. folio. and in 6 vols. 4to.

Boyle, Charles, earl of Orrery, ſecond ſon of Roger earl of Orrery, was educated at Chriſt-church under Atterbury, afterwards biſhop of Rocheſter, and doctor Friend, and in 1700 was choſen member for Huntingdon. On his brother's death he ſucceeded to the earldom, and afterwards became knight of the thiſtle, major general in the army, &c. He was next envoy from the queen to the ſtates of Flanders and Brabant, and for his ſervices was raiſed to the dignity of the Britiſh peerage. His diſintereſtedneſs was ſuch, that he frequently voted againſt the miniſter, and the apoſtacy was puniſhed by a privation of his offices. In Sept. 1722, he was ſent to the tower, on ſuſpicion of being an aſſociate in Layer's plot, but after ſix months' he was admitted to bail, and his innocence fully aſſerted. He died, after a ſhort illneſs, 1731, aged 55. His writings were Lyſander's life from Plutarch—beſides his edition of Phalaris' epiſtles, which produced the celebrated controverſy with Bentley, in which he was aſſiſted by Aldrich and Atterbury. The aſtronomical apparatus, called Orrery, was ſo named by Graham, in gratitude for marks of protection which he had received.

Boyle, John, earl of Cork and Orrery, the only ſon of the preceding, was for ſix years under Fenton, and after paſſing through Weſtminſter ſchool, he entered at Chriſt-church. He married in 1728 the daughter of lord Orkney, but this union proved the ſource of infelicity by the quatrel of the two earls. This lady died in 1732 at Cork, and ſix years after he married Margaret Hamilton, a lady of Iriſh extraction, with whom he lived in the enjoyment of domeſtic tranquillity, truly ſenſible, as he expreſſes it, that "the noiſe and buſtle of life are deſpicable and taſteleſs, when we have experienced the real delight of a fire-ſide." His time was moſtly ſpent at Marſton in Somerſetſhire, where devoted to literary eaſe, he publiſhed an admired tranſlation of Pliny's letters, two vols. 4to. addreſſed to his ſons, 1751,—beſides letters on the writings of Swift, his reſpected friend, in 8vo. He travelled to Italy in 1754, with the intention of collecting materials for the hiſtory of Florence. He returned to England through Germany and Holland, and after the ſevere loſs of his wife in 1758, and of his eldeſt ſon the following year, he fell a victim to an hereditary gout, 1762, in his 56th year. His letters were publiſhed by Duncombe, with an account of his life, and it appears that he wrote much in the periodical works of the day, eſpecially the World and Connoiſſeur.

Boys, John, an Engliſh divine born in Kent. He was educated at Benet's college, Cambridge, and in 1590 obtained the vicarage of Tilmanſtone, and the rectory of Bettiſhanger in Kent, and afterwards he was promoted to the deanery of Canterbury 1619. He died ſuddenly 1624, aged 54. His works, chiefly on theological ſubjects, were publiſhed one vol. fol. 1629.

Boyse, Boys, or Bois, John, tranſlator of the bible under James I., was born at Nettleſtead, Suffolk, 1560, and educated at Hadley ſchool and St. John's college, Cambridge. After ſtudying medicine, he was opdained and ſucceeded his father as rector of Weſt Stowe, which he reſigned for Boxworth, the living of his father-in-law, 1596. To relieve his wants and to ſupply the extravagance of his wife, he ſold his valuable books. He was ſelected in conſequence of his learning to tranſlate the bible, and was afterwards one of the ſix who met to reviſe the whole at ſtationers' hall. He aſſiſted ſir Henry Saville in the publication of St. Chryſoſtom, but the death of his patron left him in poverty, and inſtead of ſucceeding to a promiſed fellowſhip of Eton, he received only one copy of the work to which he had ſo much contributed. Andrews biſhop of Ely at laſt made him prebendary of his church in 1615. He died 1643, aged 84, leaving ſeveral valuable MSS. In his ſtudies he paid particular attention to the three rules of Dr. Whitaker, he ſtudied always ſtanding, never in a window, and never went to bed with his feet cold.

Boyse, Joſeph, a diſſenting miniſter, born at Leeds, and educated near Kendal. He was at Amſterdam, and afterwards became a preacher in London and Dublin, and had for his coadjutor Thomas Emlyn, well known for his writings. A long friendſhip was ſevered by theological diſputes, and inſtead of becoming the defender of Emlyn, Boyſe publiſhed a book againſt him. He died 1728. He was eminent for his learning and piety, as his works, in two vols. folio, prove.

Boyse, Samuel, ſon of the preceding, was born in 1708, and after a private education at Dublin, he entered at the univerſity of Glaſgow, where he married before his 20th year. A ſcanty ſubſiſtence, a fondneſs for diſſipation, and want of economy, ſoon rendered his ſituation uncomfortable, and he came to Edinburgh, where the publication of ſome pieces of poetry, of genius and judgment, procured him preſents from the opulent, and the patronage of lady Eglinton. To better his condition, he paſſed to London; but neither the recommendation of lord Stormont, nor the notice of Pope, could correct his low and vulgar opinions. He was fond of the meaneſt companions, and ſo poor that he had not, ſays Cibber, a ſhirt, coat, or any kind of apparel, ſo that he ſat up whole days in bed wrapped up in a blanket, and by the moſt fallacious pretences of diſtreſs, procured the benefactions of the compaſſionate. In 1745 he was engaged gaged at Reading in compiling "a review of the transactions of Europe, from the war with Spain in 1739, to the insurrection in Scotland in 1745, &c." but the stipend he received was small, and the loss of his wife disturbed his plans of settlement. Experience, it was hoped, had taught him the necessity of temperance and regularity; but his health now rapidly declined. He died in obscure lodgings near Shoe-lane, 1749, and was buried at the expence of the parish. His works were chiefly poetical, and it is said, that if all he wrote were collected, it would form six moderate volumes. The best known of his poems is called "Deity," commended by Hervey and Fielding, as the effusion of great powers of mind. In him mankind may read that awful lesson, that the best talents, if not guided by virtue and industry, may, instead of producing honor and distinction, degenerate into contempt, vice, and vulgarity.

Boze, Claude Gros de, was born at Lyons, 1680, and distinguished himself by his knowledge of antiquities and medals. He was respected for his private character, as well as his learning. His works were on medallic subjects, besides historical panegyrics on the members of the French academy, of which he was a member, the first 15 vols. of which he published,—and a valuable catalogue of his own library. He died 1753, aged 74.

Bracciolini dell' api, Francis, an Italian poet of Pistoia, who, at the age of 40, became an ecclesiastic, and was patronized by Urban VIII. He wrote several tragedies, comedies, and pastorals,—besides "la croce riacquistata," a poem which the Italians rank next to Tasso's Jerusalem,—and a poem in 23 cantos, on the pope's election, for which, at his patron's desire, he assumed the surname of Della Api, and added to his arms three bees. He died at the age of 80, 1645.

Bracton, Henry de, a native of Devonshire, who studied at Oxford, and in 1244 was made one of the judges itinerant by Henry III. He is known by his excellent work "de legibus & consuetudinibus Angliæ," a most valuable performance, divided into five books, containing, in good language, an interesting detail of the legal learning, the laws and customs of our ancestors. Though blamed for mingling too much of the civil and canon law in his compositions, he has long been held as a writer of the first authority, and esteemed by lord Coke and others, as the first source of legal knowledge.

Bradbury, Thomas, a native of London, educated at Clapham, and distinguished among the nonconformists as an eloquent preacher in defence of calvinistical doctrines and revolution principles. He wrote some theological treatises,—besides three vols. of sermons, &c. He died 1757 aged 85.

Bradford, Samuel, was born in Blackfriars, 1652, and educated at St. Paul's school, the Charter-house, and Benet's college, Cambridge. He went abroad and applied him to physic, and was afterwards reconciled to doctrines of the church, and as the frien Sancroft and the chaplain of king William obtained the rectory of St. Mary-le-bon prebend of Westminster, and the mastershi his own college. In 1718 he became bi of Carlisle, and 1723 of Rochester, whic held to the time of his death, 1731, aged He edited Tillotson's sermons.

Bradford, John, an English martyr, at Manchester. He was for some time c to sir John Harrington, treasurer of the E lish forces at Calais, but afterwards stu divinity, and took his master's degree at C bridge. He was eloquent as a preacher, in Mary's reign, after a long imprisonm he was burnt in Smithfield 1555 Som his letters are extant. It is said that he so struck by a sermon from Latimer on r tution, that he made a restitution of som the king's goods, which he had dishon appropriated to his own use while clerk Calais.

Bradford, John, a Welch poet of t who presided, in 1760, in the bardic cha Glamorganshire. He wrote several n pieces of great merit, preserved in the E green, a magazine in the Welch lang He died 1780.

Bradick, Walter, author of "Choh or royal preacher," a poem of consider merit, was a merchant of Lisbon, wher lost his property by the earthquake. O return to England, loss of sight was adde poverty, till he was relieved by the qu and made a pensioner in the Charter-h where he died 1794.

Bradley, James, D.D. was born i at Shireborn in Gloucestershire, and educ at Northleach, and Baljol college, Oxford. talents were directed to mathematical pur and from his observations with the sector settled, upon the most correct basis, the of the alterations of the fixed stars in c quence of the motion of light, and also nutation of the earth's axis. For his merit he was chosen Savilian professor o tronomy at Oxford, 1721, on the deat Dr. Keill, to which was afterwards, in added the lectureship in experimental p sophy, and with these honors the friendsh the great and the learned, of lord Ma field, sir Isaac Newton, Dr. Halley, &c. 1742, he succeeded Dr. Halley as astron royal at Greenwich, and with a grant of i and the assistance of those able artists, G Graham and Bird, valuable instruments made to enrich this celebrated observa His disinterestedness appeared on his re of the living of Greenwich, but the king tled a pension of 250l. upon him. His st impaired his health, he apprehended th should survive his reason, but an inflamm of the kidnies followed by a suppressio urine, carried him off 1762. Few of his positions besides papers in the philosophical transactions were published, but his valuable observations on astronomy, &c. are carefully preserved in MS. in 13 folio and two quarto volumes.

BRADLEY, Richard, F.R.S. was professor of botany at Cambridge, 1724. His inability to read lectures was made apparent to the university, and his ignorance of the learned languages rendered him ridiculous. Mr. J. Martyn was therefore appointed his substitute as professor, though he himself ventured to deliver lectures on the materia medica at the Bull inn 1729; but his conduct was so offensive, that the university had it in agitation to procure his removal, when he died in 1732. He wrote some things on husbandry, natural history, &c. and permitted the booksellers to use his name in a translation of Xenophon's economics.

BRADSHAW, Henry, a Benedictine of Chester, in the 14th century, author of a poetical chronicle, called the life of St. Werburg.

BRADSHAW, John, serjeant at law, was born in 1586, at Marple hall in Cheshire. He was one of the judges of the sheriff's court in London, and on the trial of Charles I. he was nominated president of that bloody tribunal. Though he behaved with disrespect to his sovereign, some have imagined that he was but the tool of a party, and that his private sentiments were favorable to the royal cause. His attachment to the republicans however was such, that he inveighed against Cromwell, and for his obstinacy he was dismissed from the office of president. He died 1659, but the place of his burial is unknown, though some have mentioned an inscription engraved on a cannon near Martha bay, in Jamaica, which intimates that his ashes were deposited there. He might have wished to fly the insults which attended the bones of those who sat in judgment over Charles, but it is more probable from papers preserved in the British museum that he died in England, and on the 31st October 1659. He was rewarded for his services as president with the estate of Summer-hill, belonging to lord St. Alban's, worth 1000l. a year. It is supposed by some, that he communicated some evidences to Needham, to be inserted in his translation of Selden's Mare clausum.

BRADWARDIN, Thomas, a native of Hatfield in Sussex, educated at Merton college, Oxford, where he was proctor and divinity professor. He was confessor to Edward III. during his wars in France, where as a preacher his eloquence had great influence in restraining the violence of the military. He became archbishop of Canterbury in 1348, and from his learning was called the profound doctor. Among other things he published a tract called Causa Dei,—besides Geometria speculativa—arithmetica speculativa—tractatus proportionum. He died 1549, at Lambeth.

BRADY, Nicholas, D.D. was born at Bandon in Ireland, 1659, and at the age of 12 he came to England, and was educated at Westminster and Christ-church, Oxford. He afterwards returned to Ireland, and took his degrees at the university of Dublin. He showed himself active during the revolution, and thrice successively by his address he saved his native town from conflagration agreeable to the orders of James' generals. He abandoned the preferment which he held in Ireland, and as chaplain to William and Mary he became minister of Richmond and rector of Clapham in Surrey. He died 1726, aged 66. He wrote three vols. of sermons, besides a translation of Virgil's Æneid, and his well known version of the psalms with Mr. Tate.

BRADY, Robert, a native of Norfolk, educated at Caius college, Cambridge, of which he was master 1660. He was in 1670 appointed keeper of the records in the Tower, and soon after regius professor at Cambridge, where he died 1700. He was eminent as a physician. He is best known as the author of an history of England, three vols. fol. in which he zealously supports the royal prerogative.

BRAHE, Tycho, was born at Knudstorp in Denmark 1546, and distinguished himself as an astronomer. He studied at Copenhagen, but so great was his admiration of the skill of astronomers in calculating eclipses to a moment, that he employed all his money in purchasing books for his favorite pursuit, and often spent whole nights with a small celestial globe in his hands in learning the names of the stars. His friends represented astronomy as beneath his rank; but he continued his study with increasing application, and gained the patronage of the Danish king, at whose request he read some popular lectures on the theory of comets. His knowledge was improved by visiting Switzerland, Italy, and Germany, and he would have removed to Basil, if the king of Denmark, with a munificence truly noble, had not retained him, by settling upon him for life the island of Kuen in the Sound, and building a commodious observatory, which he called Uraniburg, and to which he annexed a pension of 2000 crowns, besides preferment. Thus flattered by his sovereign and honored with the visits of the great, especially of James II. of Scotland, when he came to Denmark to marry the princess Anne, Brahe might be said to live happy. Malice however attacked him in his retreat, his enemies vilified his services, he was abandoned by the king, and bidding adieu to Uraniburg, he found an asylum at Prague, under the protection of the emperor, and with a pension of 3000 crowns. He died soon after of a suppression of urine, 1601. Great as an astronomer and chymist, Brahe was too much given to credulity and astrological presages, irritable in his temper, and not always respectable in his connections. He left a widow, two sons and four daughters, with little to inherit but his fame and his misfortunes. The Rodolphine tables and the historia cœlestis, are the beſt of his works, but the wildneſs of his opinions is ſufficiently proved by the abſurdity of the ſyſtem which he endeavoured to eſtabliſh in mere oppoſition to the Copernican.

Brakenburg, Renier, a painter of Haerlem, who died 1649. His pieces are generally on low and vulgar ſubjects, but always diſplay elegance, nature, and intereſt.

Bramante d'Urbino, Lazarus, a diſtinguiſhed architect at Naples and Rome. In conformity to his plan Julius II. rebuilt the church of St. Peter, but though the work was conducted with great expedition, the artiſt did not ſee the completion. He died 1514, aged 70, eight years after the foundations had been laid, and the merit of finiſhing the building was reſerved for Michael Angelo. Bramante was amiable in his private character, and as a poet and muſician he was alſo eminent.

Bramer, Leonard, a painter of Delft, 1596. His reſurrection of Lazarus, preſerved at Rome, is much admired.

Bramhall, John, a native of Pontefract in Yorkſhire, educated at Sydney college, Cambridge. He ſucceeded to a living in the city of York, where he married a clergyman's widow, with whom he received a conſiderable fortune, and, what he regarded more, a valuable collection of books. By his controverſy on religious topics with a ſecular jeſuit, he was noticed by Matthews archbiſhop of York, by whom he was promoted to the prebend of Rippon. About 1633 he went over to Ireland, on the invitation of lord Wentworth, and for his ſervices obtained the archdeaconry of Meath, and in 1634 the biſhopric of Londonderry. He exerted himſelf to unite the churches of Ireland and England, and by his eloquence the two ſiſter countries adopted the ſame form and tenets of faith. His enemies however not only charged him with arminianiſm and popery, but accuſed him of high treaſon, and of attempts to introduce an arbitrary government; and after being ſome time in confinement he was liberated by the influence of Uſher the primate. After ſome time ſpent at Hamburgh and Bruſſels, he reviſited Ireland, but his influence was conſidered as ſo dangerous by the parliament, that his perſon was in the moſt imminent danger, and Cromwell was heard to declare that he would have laviſhed not a little money to ſecure that Iriſh Canterbury, as he called him. On the reſtoration he was tranſlated to Armagh, 1661, and as primate of Ireland, and ſpeaker of the houſe of lords, he diſplayed thoſe abilities of perſuaſion, and that patriotic zeal which he poſſeſſed in ſo eminent a degree. His conſtitution now declined, he was twice ſtruck with the palſy, and a third attack proved fatal, June 1663, in his 70th year. His works on theological ſubjects were reprinted in one folio volume 1677. The moſt valuable of his compoſitions is againſt Hobbes, on liberty and neceſſity.

Brancas Villeneuve, Andrew Francis, was born in the Venaiſſin, and died 175[illegible]. He behaved in this employment with all that zeal and diſintereſtedneſs which characteriſe the true chriſtian, he inſtituted libraries in ſeveral parts of America for the information of the miſſionaries employed in preaching the goſpel, and every method was purſued to render the converſion of negroes and pagans to the goſpel eaſy and certain. Beſides the money ſubſcribed by individuals, or corporations, Dr. Bray contributed the whole of his ſmall fortune to the ſupport of his liberal plans, better gratified in the promotion of public happineſs, than in the poſſeſſion of private wealth. To his great exertions many of the ſocieties in London owe their inſtitution, eſpecially that for the relief of poor proſelytes, that for the reformation of manners, and that for the propagation of the goſpel in foreign parts, &c. This good man, whoſe whole life was devoted to benevolent purpoſes, and who deſervedly received the thanks of king and parliament, died 1730, aged 73. He was author of ſome uſeful publications, particularly his catechetical lectures, apoſtolic charity, &c.

BREBEUF, George de, a French poet, of Normandy. He was noticed, but not rewarded by Mazarin. He traveſtied the firſt book of Lucan, which, by his ingenious mode of raillery, and by the keen ſeverity of his ſatire, created him popularity as well as enemies. He died in 1661, aged 43.

BRIDGEWATER, Francis Egerton duke celebrated as the firſt perſon who planned th cutting of a navigable canal in England, w born 1736. He ſucceeded to his titles on h brother's death 1748; and began, with u wearied zeal, to execute the plans of improv ment which he had early meditated. Wi the aſſiſtance of Brindley, a man of aſtoniſhin powers of mind, but without the polish of education, he surveyed his estate at Worsley, and obtained an act to open a communication by a canal between Manchester and Worsley, and afterwards to return over the river Irwell to Manchester. Though a solid rock opposed his progress, all difficulties were removed, air funnels were made through the hill to discharge the effluvia from below, and the canal was conveyed not only more than a mile under the ground, but over an arch of 40 feet above the surface of the Irwell, so that while vessels pass one another in the dark and subterraneous cavity, others sail on the canal above. Thus the coals in the duke's estate were conveyed, with great facility, to the neighbouring towns, and the commerce of Liverpool was united by the Mersey to Manchester, and to the southern parts of the kingdoms. Though the sums spent on these astonishing works were almost beyond calculation, and nearly ruined the noble projector, yet he saw his plans succeed to his fullest wishes, and, with the infinite benefits which he conferred on the national commerce, he found his income increase in a most rapid progression. This truly great character died 1803.

BRIDGMAN, John, a native of Exeter, educated at Cambridge, where he was master of Magdalen college. He was chaplain to James I. who gave him the rectory of Wigan, Lancashire, and made him bishop of Chester 1618. He was stripped of his honors in the civil wars, and died at Morton, in Cheshire, 1642.

BRIDGMAN, sir Orlando, son of the bishop of Chester, was made, after the restoration, a judge, and afterwards lord chancellor. He showed himself irresolute, often biassed in his decisions by the intrigues of his wife, and he was removed, for refusing to affix the seal to the declaration for liberty of conscience, in 1672.

BRIENNE, Walter de, a native of Champagne, distinguished at the siege of Acre against the Saracens. He was afterwards king of Sicily, and duke of Apulia; and was killed in 1205, in defending the rights of his wife Maria Alberic, by whom he obtained his dukedom. His son, and successor, surnamed the great, distinguished himself also against the Saracens, by whom he was taken prisoner, and cruelly put to death 1251.

BRIENNE, John, was made king of Jerusalem in 1210, which he resigned in favor of his son-in-law, the emperor Frederick II. He afterwards filled the throne of Constantinople, where he repelled the Greeks and Bulgarians. He died in 1237.

BRIETIUS, Philip, a jesuit of Abbeville, known for his parallela geographiæ veteris et novæ, 3 vols. 4to. 1648, an useful work, never completed.

BRIGGS, Henry, a native of Halifax, in Yorkshire, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, made, 1596, first professor of geometry in Gresham college. He resigned in 1619, when made Savilian professor at Oxford. His writings consist of eleven different treatises on mathematical subjects, and also arithmetica logarithmetica, containing logarithms of 30,000 natural numbers. The science of logarithms had been lately discovered by Napier, in Scotland, whom he visited. He died 1630, aged 74.

BRIGGS, William, a native of Norwich, educated at Benet college, Cambridge. As a student of medicine, he travelled through France in search of knowledge, and on his return published a treatise on the eye; and was made physician to the king. He was physician to St. Thomas's hospital, and died 1704.

BRIGHAM, Nicholas, a native of Oxfordshire, educated at Hart-hall, and at one of the inns of court. He was eminent not only as a lawyer, but as a poet, and showed himself so partial to Chaucer that he removed his remains to the south transept of Westminster-abbey, where he erected a monument to him. He wrote memoirs of eminent persons—miscellaneous poems, &c. and died 1559.

BRIGHTMAN, Thomas, rector of Hawnes, Bedfordshire, was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge; and wrote Latin commentaries on the canticles and apocalypse. In this last book, he calls the English church the church of Laodicea, and the angel loved by God the church of Geneva and the Scotch kirk. It is said that he prayed for a sudden death, and as if his wishes were fulfilled, he died in a coach while travelling, with a book in his hand, 1607.

BRILL, Matthew and Paul, two brothers, of Antwerp, eminent painters. They both travelled to Rome, where Matthew died, in 1584, aged 34, and Paul in 1626, aged 72. They painted together to adorn the Vatican; but after the death of his brother, Paul studied landscape, in which he distinguished himself by his imitations of Titian and Carrache.

BRINDLEY, James, was born at Tunsted, in Wormhill parish, Derbyshire, and early displayed astonishing powers in mechanics. After being engaged as a millwright, in Cheshire and Staffordshire, he was called to direct and complete the vast plans which the duke of Bridgewater had conceived, in the conveying of a canal over the Mersey and the Bollan, by means of elevated aqueducts, and subterraneous perforations. Every obstacle was surmounted by the genius of the architect, and the opulence of his employer, and new triumphs were prepared for boldness of mechanism and undaunted ingenuity in the completion of the grand trunk navigation, which, in uniting the Trent and the Mersey, extended 93 miles, and which had, at Hare-castle-hill, a tunnel 2880 yards long, more than 70 yards below the surface of the earth. As Brindley's education had been neglected, his calculations were seldom communicated to paper. When immersed in meditation, he often remained two or three days in bed, and when he had unravelled the difficulties of his plan, he rose, and hastened to execute, without any model or sketch but the strong suggestion of his own head. He was simple in his manners; but though sensible of his great abilities, he never betrayed insolent superiority. To his friends he was communicative, and he wisely showed, that the best purposes of creation are answered by giving encouragement and developing the native instincts and properties of the mind. He died at Turnhurst, in Staffordshire, 1772, aged 56. His end was probably hastened by the intenseness of his application, which produced a hectic fever, and gradually wasted his powers of life. His other more remarkable works were, the canal which joined the navigation of Bristol with that of Liverpool, by the union of the grand trunk near Haywood in Staffordshire, to the Severn near Bewdley—his plan to clear the Liverpool docks from mud,—an engine to raise water, &c. His attatchment to inland navigation was such, that when asked the use of rivers, in the house of commons, he bluntly replied, to feed navigable canals.

BRINVILLIERS, Maria Margaret d' Aubrai, marchioness of, a French lady, known for her intrigues and her crimes. She was, when young, married, in 1651, to the marquis of Brinvilliers, and for some time maintained a character of chastity. The introduction of a young officer, called de St. Croix, into her house, by her husband, however, proved the beginning of her misfortunes and her crimes. She loved this stranger with such ardor that she sacrificed her honor to her passion; but her father, sensible of her conduct, confined her lover in the Bastile, whilst his daughter, as if penitent, devoted herself to religious duties. After a year's confinement, de St. Croix, who had in the prison learned the art of mixing poison, from an Italian of the name of Exili, visited his guilty favorite. He communicated the fatal secret of poison, and she with alacrity received it, and unsuspected, by slow degrees, cut off her father, her two brothers, and her sister, in 1670; and if she spared her husband, it was because he looked with indifference on her lewdness. An accident brought her crimes to light. St. Croix, in working some subtile poison, was suddenly overpowered by its effluvia, and dropped down dead. As no relation appeared to claim his property, it was sealed; but the marchioness insisted with such importunity upon obtaining possession of a particular box, that its contents were examined, and it was discovered to contain papers with directions, full of slow poison. The guilty marchioness escaped to England, and thence to Holland; but she was seized at Liege, and brought to Paris, where she was condemned to have her head cut off, and then to be burned. She underwent the dreadful sentence of the law, 1676, with great firmness, and with the appearance of contrition.

BAQUEMAUT and CAVAGNES, two protestants, cruelly put to death, soon after the massacre of St. Bartholomew, in France, 1572. The cause of their death was a suspicion that they were concerned in the conspiracy of Coligny; but they fell innocent.

BRISSONIUS, Barnaby, a lawyer of eminence of Fontenay, in Poictou. He rendered himself serviceable to Henry III. of France, whose ambassador he was in England, and he was made president of parliament. During the siege of Paris by Henry IV. he was dragged to prison by the friends of the league, and strangled, 1591. He had written some valuable law treatises.

BRISSOT, Peter, a native of Poictou, eminent as a physician. He embraced the doctrines of Galen and Hippocrates, against the prevailing fashion of the times; and then travelled to improve his understanding. In Portugal, by insisting upon the necessity of bleeding in the pleurisy, he incurred the hatred of his medical opponents, and especially of Denys the king's physician. He did not live to see the dispute settled which he had raised in Portugal, and which, in those days of superstition, enlisted even the most awful truths of religion in its defence. He died 1522, aged 44.

BRISSOT, John Pierre, a Frenchman, son of an innkeeper at Chartres, of great natural powers, but of a restless soul. Dissatisfied with the political servitude of his country, he for some time engaged in the publication of the courier de l'Europe, and then turned his thoughts towards criminal jurisprudence. His theory of criminal laws appeared, in 2 vols. 8vo. 1780, with great popularity, and was followed by two discourses which gained the prize at Chalons sur Marne. After the publication of his philosophical library, he visited England, whose language, laws, and manners, he regarded with affectionate reverence, as diffusive of that liberty which he in vain wished to discover at home. On his return to Paris, 1784, he was committed to the Bastile; and this probably tended to inflame his rancor against the monarchy. He was soon liberated by the influence of Orleans, to whose children his wife had been governess. Eager to promote happiness in every part of the earth, he instituted, at Paris, a society for the abolition of negro slavery; and to carry his plans into execution, he passed over to America, to examine the constitution of that new republic. His schemes to establish a colony of Frenchmen, under republican laws, totally failed; but on the revolution he returned to the capital; where he displayed all the ability of a statesman, a demagogue, and a factious partizan. For a while he acquired popularity, supported by the gold, and the intrigues of the infamous Orleans, and as the leader of a party called Brissotins or Girondists, because composed of the members of the Gironde; and though violent, he is to be commended for the mildness which he displayed towards the unfortunate Lewis, whose fate he wished to be suspended till the consolidation of the republic. The verſatility of his talents could not, however, inſure him ſafety. In the midſt of political intrigues he was denounced as the agent of England by Robeſpierre, and, after a mock trial, guillotined, 1793, with his friends and aſſociates. He was in his 39th year. He wrote beſides, thoughts on the means of attaining truth—letters on the hiſtory of England—an examination of the travels of Chattelleux in America, &c. 3 vols. 8vo.

BRITANNICUS, John, an Italian critic, deſcended from Britiſh parents, born at Palazzolo near Breſcia. His notes on Terence, Juvenal, Perſius, Ovid, Statius, &c. were eſteemed. He died at Breſcia, where he taught grammar, 1510.

BRITTON, Thomas, a native of Higham Ferrers, in Northamptonſhire, engaged in London as a ſmall coal-man, to which he afterwards added chemiſtry, and muſic. Though eccentric in his conduct, yet the reſpectability of his character recommended him friends, and though in an humble ſtation, his muſical meetings were attended frequently by many of the great and the opulent. After he had long amuſed the public, a ventriloquiſt was introduced at one of his concerts, who in an unuſual manner proclaimed the approaching death of the muſical coal-man. Britton was ſo alarmed by this apparently inviſible agent, that he fell ill, and expired a few days after, 1714. His curious collection of manuſcripts, muſical inſtruments, &c. was ſold by his widow, by public auction, and procured to her a ſmall pittance for the remainder of life.

BRIZARD or BRITARD, John Baptiſte, a French comic actor. He was born at Orleans, and died at Paris 1790, aged 69, univerſally reſpected. He crowned Voltaire with the poetical laurel on the French theatre.

BROCARDUS, James, a viſionary of Venice, who embraced proteſtantiſm, and, in Holland, violently attacked popery. His zeal as a polemical writer probably overturned the powers of his mind, as, from a warm ſupporter of religion, he enthuſiaſtically pretended to dive into future events, and explain prophecies. His works, printed at Leyden, were publicly diſavowed by the ſenate of Middleburg, in 1581.

BROCKLESBY, Richard, of Minchead, Somerſetſhire, was eminent as a phyſician, and as the friend of Wilkes, Johnſon, and Burke. He ſtudied at Edinburgh and Leyden, and acquired both opulence and fame in London; and nobly preſented Burke with 1000l. that he might thus oblige his friend in his lifetime, rather than leave him that as a legacy. He was admitted at Cambridge ad eundem 1754, and thus obtained a fellowſhip in the college of phyſicians. He ſerved in Germany 1758, as phyſician to the army. He died 1797, aged 75, and left, among other things, beſides an eſſay on the mortality of horned cattle, 8vo. œconomical obſervations for the improvement of hoſpitals, in 8vo. &c.

BRODEAU, John, of Tours, roſe to ſuch eminence as a ſcholar and critic, that Scaliger, Grotius, and others, have beſtowed on him the moſt unbounded encomiums. He ſtudied law, and afterwards philoſophy and belles lettres, of which he became the ſupport and the ornament. After travelling in Italy, he returned to France, where he lived in honorable independence. He died 1563. His annotations on ſeveral of the claſſics were publiſhed after his death.

BROEK, Elias Vandeen, a native of Antwerp, diſtinguiſhed for his maſterly introduction of reptiles and inſects in his pictures of flowers and landſcapes. He died 1711, aged 54.

BROGLIO, Victor Maurice, count de, marſhal of France, was born at Quercy, and diſtinguiſhed in the ſervice of Lewis XIV. He died 1727, aged 80. His ſon, Francis Marie, was alſo marſhal of France, and deſerved the higheſt honors by his conduct in Italy, and in the campaigns of 1733 and 1734. He died 1745. His ſon, alſo a marſhal, was the conqueror of Berngen, and diſtinguiſhed during the ſeven years' war. He quitted France in 1794, and retired to Ruſſia, where he was received with diſtinction, and raiſed to the ſame rank. His ſon, Claudius Victor, prince of Broglio, eſpouſed the party of the republicans at the beginning of the revolution, and was flattered with the title of marſhal. His refuſal to receive as law, while commander of the army of the Rhine, the decree which ſuſpended the king's authority, proved fatal to him. He was called to Paris, condemned to death, and guillotined 1794, aged 37.

BROGNI, John de, a ſwine-herd, of Brogni, in Savoy. He roſe by application to preferment, under the care of two eccleſiaſtics, who had accidentally noticed his healthy appearance. He was patroniſed by Philip of Burgundy and by Clement VII. who raiſed him to the ſee of Viviers, and to the dignity of cardinal. He died at Rome 1426.

BROKESBY, Francis, a native of Leiceſterſhire, educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, and made rector of Rowley in Yorkſhire. He was the friend of Dodwell and of Nelſon, whom he aſſiſted in the compilation of his feaſts and faſts, and he wrote ſeveral treatiſes on moral and religious ſubjects, ſuch as hiſtory of the government of the primitive church, 8vo.—life of Henry Dodwell, &c. He died about 1718.

BROME, Adam de, a favorite of Edward II. founder of Oriel college, Oxford. He died in 1332.

BROME, Alexander de, an attorney of London, in the civil wars, better known for his ſonnets and poetical pieces in which he attacked the round heads with all the keenneſs of ridicule. He publiſhed alſo a verſion of Horace, and the cunning lovers, a comedy. He died 1666, aged 46.

BROME, Richard, a menial ſervant in the family of Ben Jonſon, who roſe by his genius to to great literary eminence, as the author of some comedies, 15 of which still exist. His jovial crew was lately revived at Covent-garden, with great success. He died 1652.

Brompton, John, a monk in the reign of Edward III. abbot of Jerevall, near Richmond, in Yorkshire. The Chronicon, under his name, from 588 to 1198, is probably the work of some unknown author.

Bronchorst, John van, a painter of Flanders, in the 17th century, three of whose historical pieces in oil, and three on glass, adorn the new church at Amsterdam.

Bronchorst, John, a painter of Leyden, who excelled in the representation of animals and birds in water colors. He died 1723, aged 75.

Bronchorst, Peter, of Delft, was an eminent painter. His judgment of Solomon, and his Christ driving the money changers out of the temple, are preserved with great sanctity in his native town. He died 1661, aged 73.

Brongniart, Augustus Lewis, an eminent chemist, who died at Paris 1804. His papers in the public journals, and his analytical table of the combinations and decompositions of substances, &c. possessed merit.

Brook, Ralph, York herald, is known for the errors which he discovered in Camden's Britannia, and which he published, with severe remarks, when treated with harshness by the antiquary. He died 1625, aged 73; and in 1723 his second part of discovery of errors was published.

Brooke, sir Robert, a judge of eminence in the reign of Mary, born at Claverly, in Shropshire, and educated at Oxford and the Middle temple. He died chief justice of the common pleas, 1558. He is author of an abridgement containing an abstract of the year books till the time of Mary, fol.—certain cases adjudged, from 6 Henry VIII. to 4 of queen Mary—reading on the statutes of limitations, &c.

Brooke, Frances, a woman known for her light pieces of poetry—translations—sonnets—Virginia, a tragedy—and a periodical paper, called the old maid, in 1 vol. 12mo. Besides these, she wrote the history of Julia Mandeville, a novel—memoirs of marquis of Forlaix, 4 vols.—the history of Emily Montague—letters from lady Juliet Catesby, &c.—the history of England, from Milton, 4 vols. 12mo.—the siege of Sinope, a tragedy, acted at Covent Garden 1781—and that pleasing and very popular performance, Rosina—and last of all, but not equally respectable, Marian. Her maiden name was Moore, and she married the reverend John Brooke, rector of Colney, in Norfolk, chaplain of Quebec garrison. She died 1789, at Sleaford, surviving her husband only five days. To learning, genius, and taste, she added amiable manners, gentle deportment, and a strong regard for all moral and religious duties.

Brooke, Henry, a writer of eminence, born at Rantavan in Ireland, and educated in the school of Dr. Sheridan, and in Dublin college. At the age of 17 he entered at the Temple, and became the friend of Pope, of Swift, and other great characters. On his speedy return to Ireland, he attended the dying moments of a favorite aunt, who with her last blessings recommended to his protection and kindness her daughter. This young lady, possessed of beauty, soon gained the heart of her youthful guardian; the attachment became mutual, and a public union at last proclaimed their secret marriage. For a while the thoughts of future prospects were lost in domestic enjoyments, but an encreasing family called aloud for immediate exertions, and Brooke, unsuccessful as a chamber counsel, found his genius the best support of his fame. By the friendship of lords Lyttleton and Chatham he was introduced to the prince of Wales, and promised himself independence and honors. His tragedy of Gustavus Vasa was prepared, but unfortunately the politics of the time forbade its introduction on the public stage, as it seemed to breathe sentiments too warm in favor of liberty. This disappointment was succeeded by a rapid sale of the play, and the public by a most uncommon liberality of subscriptions repaid in a tenfold degree the most sanguine expectations of the author. Brooke thus patronized and flattered by the people, purchased a house at Twickenham near Pope, but a dangerous illness rendered it necessary for him to revisit his native air. His gradual recovery promised his speedy return, but contrary to the repeated invitations of his friends he determined to spend the rest of his life in obscurity in Ireland. The violence of party spirit, as well as the influence of a beloved wife who was attached to the peaceful scenes of privacy, were probably the causes of this remarkable seclusion. In his retirement, though he found Garrick unwilling to support his merit by a representation on the London stage, yet he met with some success in Dublin. Profuse in his acts of humanity, he was at last obliged to sell his favorite residence, and the declining health of his wife now tended to lessen his comforts, and the death of that amiable woman, after an union of near 50 years of uninterrupted domestic harmony, put an end to his enjoyments. From this blow his constitution never recovered, he sunk into a state of imbecility, and the powers of his mind never regained their wonted brilliancy. He however beguiled his hours of affliction by the sweet of literature, and at lucid intervals he wrote those unequal works which are occasionally tinctured with mysticism, the fool of quality and Juliet Grenville, and thus gained fresh opportunities of displaying the excellence of his moral character. He died at Dublin 1783 aged 77. Besides the works already enumerated, his best known pieces are universal beauty, a poem in six books—the earl of Westmorland, a tragedy—fables—the earl of Essex, a tragedy—redemption, a poem, &c.

Broome, William, the poet, was born of obſcure parents in Cheſhire. After being ſuperannuated at Eton, and thus loſing the election for King's, he entered at St. John's Cambridge, by the liberal ſubſcriptions of his friends. He was engaged by Pope in furniſhing the notes for his Iliad, and when the Odyſſey was undertaken, Broome was not thought unworthy by his poetical friend of ſharing his labors, and his ſucceſs. The 2d, 6th, 8th, 11th, 12th, 16th, 18th, and 23d, together with all the notes, were written by Broome, who for this received the ſmall ſum of 500l. and 100 copies. While he conſidered his ſervices as ill repaid, Pope not only diſregarded his diſcontent, but meanly exhibited him to public ridicule in the Dunciad and in the Bathos. In 1728, Broome was created LL. D. but he did not riſe to high preferment in the church, and remained the humble incumbent of Eye, and of Oakley Magna in Suffolk. He died at Bath 1745. He tranſlated ſome of Anacreon's odes, beſides a ſmall miſcellany of poems.

Broschi, Carlo, a celebrated ſinger, of Andria in the Neapolitan ſtates, better known by the name of Farinello, which he received from the patronage of three brothers called Farina. A fall from his horſe in his youth rendered caſtration neceſſary, and to this accident he was indebted for his celebrity. After enrapturing the theatres of Naples, Rome, Venice, and Vienna, Broſchi was invited to London, where for three years he diſplayed the ſuperiority of his powers, and was munificently rewarded. In 1737, he left London, and paſſing through Paris, he claimed the admiration of the French king and of his court. In Spain he was treated with great diſtinction, and king Philip not only laviſhed every honor upon him, but regarded him with the confidence of an intimate friend. He held the ſame rank of partiality with Philip's ſucceſſor Ferdinand, and till his death and that of his queen Barbara in 1759, he continued the favorite of the court, deſervedly reſpected for the generoſity of his heart, and the condeſcenſion and affability of his manners. On the ſucceſſion of Charles to the Spaniſh throne, Farinello haſtened to his native country, where, in the neighbourhood of Bologna, he enjoyed the reſt of his life in dignified retirement. Though occaſionally melancholy, he continued tranquil, the powers of his voice remained to the laſt, ſtrong, clear, and melodious, and for three weeks before his death, like the dying ſwan, he daily entertained his admiring friends. He died 1782, in his 78th year. His great readineſs to relieve diſtreſs, and to ſweeten the cup of calamity whenever he found it poſſible, prevented the accumulation of riches, and Farinello, after ſharing the favors of monarchs without feeling his heart biaſſed by flattery, and after remaining unſullied by the vices and extravagances of a theatrical life, lived and died eſteemed as a man of worth.

Brossard, Sebaſtian de, a canon of Meaux, who died 1730, at the age of 70. He excelled as a muſician, and wrote ſeveral treatiſes on the ſcience. His dictionary of muſic is 8vo. is highly valued.

Brosse, Guy de la, a phyſician, author of a treatiſe on the virtues of plants, &c He is better known as the promoter and director of the royal foundation of a garden of medicinal plants in 1626 at Paris, which he enriched by a collection of 2000 plants. He publiſhed a deſcription of the medical plants, beſides a book de la nature des plantes, 1628—deſſin du jardin royal, 8vo. &c.

Brosses, Charles de, preſident of the parliament of Burgundy, was born at Dijon, and died at Paris 1777, aged 68. He wrote letters on the diſcovery of Herculaneum, beſides an hiſtory of the voyages towards the ſouth pole, and a tranſlation of Salluſt, with notes, &c.

Brossette, Claude, an advocate of Lyons, author of an hiſtory of his native town, and of editions of Boileau and Regnier, with notes. He died at Lyons 1746, aged 75.

Brossier, Martha, a woman who by the diſtortions of her countenance impoſed upon the credulous multitude, and the ſuperſtitious clergy in France. Her arts were detected by Henry IV. who was apprehenſive leſt his enemies of the league ſhould take advantage of the impoſture, and after a confinement of 40 days, ſhe was permitted to return to her native town of Romorantin. The avarice of the father however, who ſhared in the ſums beſtowed on the pretended demoniac, hurried her away to Rome, where an ample theatre was expected for the impoſition, but ſhe was diſmiſſed by the pope in 1599, and ſhe died in an hoſpital.

Brotier, the abbé, a Jeſuit of Tanay in the Nivernois. Well verſed in ancient and modern languages, he made every branch of ſcience and literature the object of his ſtudies, and, except in mathematics to which he gave little attention, he excelled in all. With indefatigable zeal he made notes of every thing which he read, and in devoting 12 hours each day to ſtudy, he collected treaſures of valuable information for criticiſm and for compoſition. The diſſolution of the Jeſuits made a revolution in his plans, but he found an abode of friendſhip in the houſe of Mr. de la Tour, a printer of eminence. Here he ſpent the laſt 26 years of life, and publiſhed thoſe editions of Tacitus in four vols. 4to. and in ſeven 12mo. and of Pliny, which derive their merit not only from correctneſs, but moſt valuable diſſertations and annotations. Beſides theſe, he edited Phædrus, and Rapin on gardens, and it is to be much lamented that he never completed his hiſtory of France, for which he had in his younger years provided ample materials. His other works were an examination of the apology of Prades,—a treatiſe on the money of the Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans, compared with thoſe of France, &c. This worthy man man did at Paris 1789, aged 67. His nephew Andrew Charles was eminent as a botanist. During the revolution he was banished to Guyana where he died in 1798.

Broughton, Hugh, an English divine, born at Oldbury, Shropshire, and educated at Cambridge. He wrote against the Roman catholics, and attacked Theodore Beza, and the dissenters. He always devoted to study 12 hours, often 16 every day. His works, which were numerous and on theological subjects, are not held in high esteem. Among them were consent of scriptures or a system of scripture chronology and genealogy, attacked by Reynolds—a discourse on Christ's descent into hell, &c. Broughton was well skilled in Hebrew, and he settled as minister of the English congregation at Middleburg, and returned to England in 1611, and died the next year.

Broughton, Thomas, a learned divine, born in London 1704, and educated at Eton, where he was superannuated, and at Gonville college, Cambrige. The duke of Bedford, to whom he was chaplain, and bishop Sherlock, who gave him Bedminster vicarage near Bristol, raised him to comfortable independence. His publications were valuable, the best known are, christianity distinct from the religion of nature—part of Bayle's dictionary corrected—Dryden's poems—answer to Tindal's christianity as old as the creation—Demosthenes' Olynthiacs and Philippics—Hercules, a musical drama—an historical dictionary of all religions, 2 vols. fol. &c. He died on his living 1774.

Broukhusius, John, or Broekhuizen, a learned Dutchman, born 1649, died 1707. He went to America with his regiment under de Ruyter, and on his return, by being engaged in an unfortunate duel, his life was forfeited to the laws, but preserved by the interference of Grævius He published editions of Tibullus, and Propertius, and also of Aonius Paleario, and Sannazarius, besides some elegant poems in Latin and in Dutch, and a Latin translation of Rapin's parallel of Homer and Virgil.

Brouncker, William Viscount, a native of Castle Lyons in Ireland, attached to the royal cause during the civil wars. He was the first president of the royal society, an office which he adorned by his polite manners and extensive erudition. He was also master of St. Catherine near the Tower, and died 1684, aged 64. Some of his essays are preserved in the philosophical transactions, besides des Cartes' compendium of music translated and published anonymously—letters to Usher, &c.

Brousson, Claude, a native of Nismes, known as a protestant. He had in his own house a meeting of the leading members of his sect, after their churches had been demolished, but though an amnesty was offered to him and his followers by Lewis XIV. he fled to Geneva, and other countries, imploring the compassion of strangers upon his suffering brethren. He was at last seized and broken on the wheel at Montpellier 1698, in his 51st year, on pretence of corresponding with the king's enemies. The states of Holland allowed his widow a pension of 600 florins, besides the 400 granted to himself. He was author of some tracts in French in favor of the protestants—a translation of the New Testament, &c.

Brouwer, Adrian, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem 1608. He expressed with great success the companions of his dissipated hours in the midst of merriment and in the noise of a tavern, for which he was well calculated from the intemperance of his habits. Though poor he never used his pencil but when called upon by want, or the dread of a gaol. He hastened his death by intoxication, to which he fell a victim in his 30th year, 1638. Rubens, who admired his genius, paid great respect to his remains, which had been obscurely deposited in the ground by public subscription.

Brown, Robert, a man of turbulent character and wavering disposition, the founder of the sect of the Brownists. He was educated at Cambridge, but separated from the church, and when cited by the bishop of Norwich, to answer for his opinions, he offered insolence instead of submission. Burleigh, to whom he was related, saved him from ecclesiastical censures; but despising the reproof of archbishop Whitgift to whom his noble friend had recommended him, he withdrew to Holland, where he established a church of his own persuasion. He afterwards returned to England, and though he abused the church, yet he was promoted to a rectory in Northamptonshire. In his 80th year he was sent to Northampton gaol for ill treatment to a magistrate, and there he soon after died 1630, boasting that he had been confined in no less than 32 prisons. His tracts were on theological subjects.

Brown, Thomas, of facetious memory, was educated at Newport school, Shropshire, and at Christ-church, Oxford. From Oxford he went to London, and became master of the school of Kingston on Thames, an office to which he was inadequate both from habit and levity of character. His return to London was greeted by his old companions with raptures, and now independent in principle and unsavored by fortune, he scribbled for bread. Various poems, letters, and dialogues were printed, but though popular and ingenious, they filled not the pocket of the author, nor promised relief. Brown shut the door against lasting intimacy, as he always preferred his joke to his friend, and considered wit, even bordering on indelicacy, superior to moral and religious precepts. Though so lost to serious reflection, it is said, that he viewed his approaching end with dismay. He died 1704. His works were printed in 1707, in four vols.

Brown, Moses, a man who, from a pen-cutter, acquired some eminence as a poet and writer. By the advice of Hervey he took orders, ders, and obtained the vicarage of Olney, Bucks, and the chaplainſhip of Morden college. He publiſhed two dramatic pieces, Polidus or diſtreſſed love, a tragedy—and all bedevilled, a farce—beſides Percy-lodge, a poem —Sunday thoughts, in blank verſe—an edition of Walton's Angler, and piſcatory eclogues, &c. He died 1787, aged 84.

Brown, Ulyſſes Maximilian de, a general in the imperial armies, born at Baſle, 1705. His intrepidity was diſplayed at Belgrade, in Corſica, Parma, Guaſtalla, Banjaluca, Veletri, Placentia, Genoa, and Lobositz. In the famous battle of Prague, May 6th 1757, he was mortally wounded, and died on the 26th June following, aged 52, leaving behind him the character of a moſt conſummate general, and an able negociator. His life was publiſhed 1757.

Brown, James, D. D. an Engliſh divine, born at Rothbury in Northumberland, 1715, and educated at St. John's, Cambridge. During the rebellion in 1745 he behaved with great ſpirit at the ſiege of Carliſle, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a popular preacher, ſo that he gained the patronage of Oſbaldiſton biſhop of Carliſle, who obtained for him the living of Moreland in Weſtmoreland, and afterwards great Horkeſley in Eſſex, and St. Nicholas, Newcaſtle on Tyne. A ſpirit of independence ſtrongly marked his character, he was conſcious of the power of his mind as a writer, and rejected every attempt to influence his reaſon. The conſequence which he had acquired introduced him to the great, and even procured an invitation from the empreſs of Ruſſia, to come to Peterſburg, to direct her eſtabliſhments for the education and improvement of her ſubjects. This propoſal was cheerfully accepted; but while preparing for his journey, a ſudden attack of the gout and rheumatiſm ſo enfeebled his conſtitution, and diminiſhed the powers of his mind, that, in a fatal moment of melancholy, he cut his throat with a razor, 1766, in his 51ſt year. His moſt popular works were "an eſtimate of the manners and principles of the time," of which ſeven editions were printed in little more than a year, 1757,—a ſecond volume of the eſtimate,—honor, a poem,—eſſay on ſatire,—eſſays on Shafteſbury,—characteriſtics, —Barbaroſſa, a tragedy, 1755, and next year Athelſtan, a tragedy, acted with great popularity under Garrick,—a dialogue of the dead between Ariſtides and Pericles,—a political performance to defend Mr. Pitt's character, &c.

Brown, John, a painter, born at Edinburgh 1752, died 1787. He travelled in Italy, and viſited the remains of antiquity at Rome and in Sicily. He chiefly excelled in the expreſſion of the features; his great characteriſtics were delicacy, taſte, and correctneſs. Beſides eminence as a draftſman, he poſſeſſed the abilities of the elegant ſcholar and the ſolid philoſopher, as his letters on the poetry and muſic of the Italian opera fully evince. Theſe not intended for publication were publiſhed by his friend lord Moboddo, to whom they were addreſſed, for the benefit of his widow.

Brown, John, a Scotch phyſician author of a ſyſtem of medicine, tranſlated into Engliſh, two vols. 8vo. a work ingenious and generally correct. As he had riſen to medical diſtinction not by a regular education and as he quarrelled with his friend Cullen, he drew upon himſelf the ſneers of the medical world, who contemptuouſly called his followers Brunoniſts. He died in London 178, aged about 52, a victim it is ſaid, to intemperate habits and licentious indulgences. He was a ſtrong ſupporter of ſtimulants, which act on what he calls the correſpondent excitability in the body.

Browne, George, an Auguſtine monk, who embraced the tenets of Luther and recommended himſelf to Henry VIII. by whom he was made archbiſhop of Dublin 1535. He ſo promoted the views of his maſter, at Ireland was guided by his councils. He was made primate by Edward VI. in the room of Dowdal, ejected; but Mary ſtripped him of all his honors, and he died two years after, 1556.

Browne, William, an Engliſh poet, born at Taviſtock, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford. He was for a little time of the Inner Temple, London, and was then tutor in the families of Carnarvon and Pembroke. He publiſhed Britannia's paſtorals in two parts—and the ſhepherd's pipe in ſeven eclogues,—works of merit, and recommended by Selden, Drayton, and other judges of poetical fame. He died in his native county 1645, where he had purchaſed an eſtate. His works appeared in 3 vols. 12mo. 177

Browne, ſir Thomas, born in Cheapſide 1605, was educated at Wincheſter ſchool, and Pembroke college, Oxford. After taking his two firſt degrees at Oxford, he travelled through France and Italy, and was created M.D. at Leyden. On his return to London 1634, he publiſhed his religio medici a book replete with ſound ſenſe and great information. In 1636, he ſettled at Norwich, where he acquired an extenſive practice. He was in 1671 knighted by Charles II. and retained his reputation as an excellent ſcholar and an experienced phyſician till the time of his death, 1682. He publiſhed, beſides his "religio" a treatiſe on vulgar errors, a work of great merit, beſides a diſcourſe on ſepulchral urns, &c.

Browne, Edward, ſon of the above, was educated at Norwich ſchool, at Cambridge, and Merton college, Oxford, where he took the degree of M.D. 1667. He viſited ſeveral parts of Germany, Theſſaly, and Italy, of which he publiſhed an intereſting account, and became phyſician to Charles II. and to Bartholomew hoſpital. The king ſaid of him, that he was as learned as any of the college, and and aswell bred as any at court. He died 1708, aged 66, at Northfleet. Besides his travels he wrote several lives in the translation o Plutarch, published in his time.

Browne, Simon, of Shepton-Mallet, Somersetshire, was pastor of a congregation at Portsmouth, and afterwards at the Old Jewry, wherein was admired for his eloquence, and respected for his conduct. The death of his wife and his only son in 1723, had such an effect upon him that it deprived him of his reason Unable to officiate he retired to his native town, where, remote from society, he considered himself as struck by the Almight deprived of his rational soul, and sunk to the level of the brute creation. He died 132, aged 52; and what is remarkable, he composed about two years before his death in his more luminous intervals, two works in defen of christianity, against Woolston and Tind in which he displayed all the powers of a sod understanding. He wrote a dedication to quen Caroline, but on account of some incohent expressions it was suppressed by the advice of his friends, but afterwards inserted in the Adventurer N° 88.

Brwne, sir Anthony, a judge born in Essex and educated at Oxford. Under Mary he w made serjeant at law, and in 1558, promed to the office of chief justice of the comm pleas, which he resigned on Elizabeth's accession, though he sat as puisné judge of that court till his death in 1567. He was violent papist, and wrote arguments for Marjueen of Scots, her right of succession to the english crown, &c Brwne, Peter, a native of Ireland, provost Trinity college, Dublin, and afterwards bishop of Cork, where he died 1735. He wote in defence of christianity against Tola; a work which, as Toland observed, raised him to the rank of bishop, the progress exter nd limits of the human understanding —2 ls. of sermons,—besides a tract against the com ot drinking to the memory of the dead.

Brwne, Isaac Hawkins, an English poet born 706, at Burton upon Trent. He was educd at Lichfield, Westminster, and Trinity lege, Cambridge, from wl ence, after takinhis degree of M.A. he removed to Linc's Inn. Here he wrote some poetical piecesespecially "on design and beauty," and l" pipe of tobacco." He served in parliame for Wenlock, and died 176c. His most popular work was "de animi immortalitate in two volumes, a composition which displd his great classical taste, as a happy imita of Virgil and Lucretius, and of which several translations quickly appeared, the best of wh were those of Soame Jenings and Mr. tice. The poems of this excellent scholand amiable man were published by his son in 1768, in a large 8vo.

Brwne, sir William, a physician who practd with success at Lynn in Norfolk, and settled in London, where he died 1774, aged 82. He left two prize medals to Cambridge, for the rising poets of the university. He wrote many ingenious pieces in prose and verse, in Latin and in English, besides a translation of Gregory's elements of catoptrics and dioptrics. He was a man of genuine wit, and had a great command of temper; and when Foote introduced him, in consequence of his dispute with the college of physicians, in his Devil upon two sticks, and caricatured him as a tall figure, with his wig and identical coat, the physician disdaining to resent the affront, sent the actor his card, to compliment him in his happy representation, accompanying it with his muff, which he said had been omitted in the play.

Browne, Edward, an English divine, author of a heavy work in 2 vols. folio, 1690, called Fasciculus rerum expetend. & fugiend.

Browne, Patrick, of Crossboyne in Ireland, studied physic at Paris and took his degree of M.D. at Leyden. He resided for some years in the West Indies, and published a natural and civil history of Jamaica in folio, and also maps of the island 1756. He died in Ireland 1790.

Brownrig, Ralph, of Ipswich, was educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge, and became master of Catherine hall, and vice chancellor of that university, and in 1641, bishop of Exeter. During the civil wars he was deprived of his offices and passed his life in retirement. It is said that he once advised Cromwell to restore Charles II. to his throne. Two years before his death, which happened in 1659, in his 67th year, he was made preacher at the Temple. His sermons were published in three vols.

Bruce, James, a famous traveller, descended from the ancient race of Scottish kings. He was born at Kinnaird, and educated at Harrow, and afterwards at Edinburgh. The indisposition of his wife, induced him to travel to the south of France, and in consequence of her death he prolonged his absence from home by visiting Portugal and Spain. On his return he accepted the consulship of Algiers in 1763, and after learning the languages of Africa, he formed the project of exploring the most unknown parts of that continent. In 1768 he visited Aleppo, and entering Egypt, penetrated into Abyssinia, where for nearly six years he remained examining the antiquities, the manners, and institutions of a people known to Europeans only by name. The history of this excursion was published in five vols. 4to. 1790, but so marvellous did the circumstances related by the traveller appear, that few credited his narrative. Some events however, have thrown authenticity on his history. During his absence his relations claimed his property, and would have divided the spoil, had not the traveller returned at the critical moment, in 1773. Soon after, to prevent a similar event, he married. He was unfortunately killed by a fall a fall down his ſtaircaſe at Kinnard, 1794, in his 65th year. The King, it is ſaid, purchaſed his drawings for 2000l, and paid for the engraving of the plates in his travels. His muſeum contained a curious collection formed during his travels.

Brucioli, Anthony, of Florence, was baniſhed for oppoſing the houſe of Medicis. When reſtored by a revolution, he drew upon himſelf the public odium as being ſuſpected of favoring the opinions of Luther, and he retired to Venice, where his brothers were printers, and where he publiſhed, in 1532, his tranſlation of the bible in Italian, with a prolix commentary in ſeven vols. fol. He wrote tranſlations of Pliny's hiſtory, and ſome pieces of Ariſtotle and Cicero, beſides dialogues, editions of Petrarch and Bocace. He died after 1554.

Brucker, John James, of Augſburg, ſtudied at Jena. He became member of the Berlin academy of ſciences, and miniſter of Augſburg, where he died 1770, aged 74. His chief work is hiſtoria critica philoſophiæ, ſix vols. 4to. abridged by Enfield, in two vols. 4to.

Bruere, Charles de la, a French writer, author of ſome operas, a comedy, a hiſtory of Charlemagne, &c. He died 1754, aged 39.

Brueys, David Auguſtine, of Aix, by writing againſt Boſſuet's expoſition of the faith, was converted by the prelate from proteſtantiſm to the Catholic religion. He ſoon after wrote plays, and again turned his thoughts to theological controverſy. He died at Montpellier 1723, aged 83. His dramatic pieces were in three vols. 12mo.

Bruges, John de, a Flemiſh painter of the 15th century, ſaid to be the firſt painter in oil, an invention attributed by ſome to his brother.

Bruguieres, John William, of Montpellier, ſtudied medicine and natural hiſtory. Though his father, wiſhing him to ſettle at home, gave him a wife, he quitted his connections three months after his marriage, and embarked in a voyage to the ſouth ſeas. He was thus enabled to make a valuable collection of curioſities in the animal and vegetable kingdoms. After his return he ſettled at Montpellier, but the accidental diſcovery of a coal mine, and of ſome foſſils and petrefactions, awakened in him a ſtrong deſire of explaining the nature of minerals. He repaired to Paris, and after preparing an intereſting account of vermes for the encyclopedie methodique, he embarked for the Levant. A weak conſtitution, however, prevented his departure, and he died at Ancona, 1799, of a fever. He wrote a valuable account of the vermes, molluſcæ, zoophylæ, foſſils and ſhells of the torrid zone.

Bruhier d'Ablaincourt, Jean Jaques, an ingenious phyſician of Beauvais, who died 1756. He is author of letters on divers ſubjects, a treatiſe on fevers 1746, &c.

Bruin, John de, profeſſor of philoſophy and mathematics at Utrecht, was a ſkilful operator in the diſſection of animals. He died in 1675, aged 55. He wrote ſeveral valuable treatiſes, de vi altrice,—de corporum gravitate & levitate,—de lucis cauſâ & origine, &c.

Brulart, Nicholas, a Frenchman, eminent for his ſervices in political affairs under Henry IV. He was chancellor of the kingdom, and died 1624, aged 80.

Brumoy, Peter, a French Jeſuit, born at Rouen. He wrote the theatre of the Greeks, in which he diſplays great correctneſs and elegant taſte. He wrote beſides miſcellaneous pieces in verſe and proſe, four vols. 12mo. and died in 1742, aged 52.

Brun, Charles le, a famous painter, of Scotch extraction, ſon of a ſtatuary, born in France in 1619. At the age of three he drew figures with charcoal, and when 12 made a picture of his uncle ſo exact, that it is ſtill admired. He ſtudied under Vouet and Pouſſin, and was patroniſed by Seguier, Mazarin, and Colbert, and the honors which he received from the king, were fully deſerved. His moſt famous pieces were St. Stephen, the family of Darius, five pieces in the hiſtory of Alexander, beſides the beautiful paintings which adorned the palace of Fontainbleau and Verſailles, eſpecially the ſtaircaſe of the latter, in which he was engaged fourteen years. Brun died 1690, at his houſe in the Gabelins. He wrote a treatiſe on phyſiognomy, and another on the character of the paſſions.

Brun, Lawrence le, of Nantes, died at Paris, in 1653, aged 56. He wrote Virgilius Chriſtianus, and Ovidius Chriſtianus, imitating the ſubjects of the Latin bards with greater piety than taſte. He wrote beſides the Ignatiad in 12 books, on the pilgrimage of Ignatius, &c.

Brun, Jean Baptiſt le, a French writer, who died at Orleans in 1731. His works were on divinity ſubjects. He prepared an edition of Lactantius, publiſhed in two vols. 4to. 1748.

Brunck, Richard Phi ip Frederic, a celebrated ſcholar of Straſburg, who died 1803, aged 84. He publiſhed, beſides other works, learned editions of Æſchylus, Anacreon, Sophocles, Ariſtophanes, Apollonius Rhodius, and Virgil, compared with MSS. and valuable by annotations—and alſo analecta veterum poetarum Græc. 4 vols. 8vo. repeatedly edited, &c.

Brunehaut, a daughter of Athanagild, king of the Viſigoths, married, in 508, Sigebert I. king of Auſtraſia. After his death, ſhe married Merovee, ſon of Childeric king of Soiſſons; but this was diſpleaſing to her father-in-law, and ſhe retired to Auſtraſia, where ſhe aſſumed the regency, during her ſon's minority. When baniſhed from Auſtraſia for her miſconduct, ſhe went to the court of Thierry, her grandſon, king of Burgundy, whom ſhe perſuaded to take Paris from Clotaire. Ever reſtleſs and vindictive, ſhe is known for her great crimes, her debaucheries, and cruelties. She was publicly accuſed of cauſing the death of ten kings; and her death was as ignominious as her life had been abandoned. She was betrayed trayed into the hands of Clotaire, who ordered her to be dragged to death by a wild horſe, 613.

Brunellschi, Philip, of Florence was a goldſmith and clockmaker, diſtinguiſhed for his knowledge of architecture. The dome of St. Mary's church at Florence is among the monuments of his genius. He was patroniſed by the Medicis; and died 1444, aged 67.

Brunetto, Latini, a poet and hiſtorian of Florence, diſtinguiſhed as an ambaſſador, and more as the maſter of Dante. He is author of "Il Teſoro." He died 1295.

Bruni, Anthony, an Italian poet, in the ſervice of the duke d'Urbino. He wrote lyrics, miſcellaneous pieces, &c. His heroic epiſtles were much admired for the beautiful engravings which accompanied them, from the deſigns of Dominichino. He died 1635.

Brunner, John Conrad, a phyſician of Switzerland, who ſtudied at Straſburg and Paris, and died at Manheim in 1727, aged 74. He was author of ſeveral treatiſes on medicine in Latin; and he defended the opinion, that the pancreas is unneceſſary to the ſupport of animal life, in a 4to. vol.

Bruno, Jordano, a native of Nola, who viſited Geneva, Paris, and London, where he became the friend of Philip Sidney and Fulke Greville. In various cities of Germany he drew eccleſiaſtical cenſures upon him, and at laſt was apprehended at Venice, where he was ſentenced by the inquiſition to be burnt at a ſtake, 1600 Though an atheiſt, he believed the effects of magic and ſorcery. He wrote, among other things, a curious book called Spaccio della beſtia, &c. dedicated to ſir Philip Sidney.

Brunsfeld, Otho, a phyſician of Metz, who embraced the opinions of Luther. He was regent of the public ſchool at Straſburg. He publiſhed herbarum vivæ icones, in fol. 3 vols. and a biographical catalogue of early phyſicians. He died at Bern 1534

Brunswick, Maximil. Jul. Leopold duke of, nephew to the king of Pruſſia, ſerved in the army, and during a ſudden inundation of the Oder, near Frankfort, attempting to ſave ſome of the unfortunate inhabitants from the waters, he fell a ſacrifice to his humanity, 24th April 1785, aged 63.

Bruschius, Gaſpar, a Latin hiſtorian of Egra in Bohemia, born in 1518. He publiſhed various works on eccleſiaſtical affairs, and was murdered in a foreſt near Rotterdam. His eccleſiaſtical hiſtory of Germany is particularly eſteemed.

Brusoni, Jerome, a Venetian writer, born at Legnago. He was of the Carthuſian fraternity, which it is ſaid he quitted three different times. He publiſhed 50 different works, and died 1680, aged 70. His beſt work is his hiſtory of Italy, from 1623 to 1679, in fol.

Brutus, John Michael, a learned Venetian, who travelled over Spain, France, England, Germany, &c. and acquired an extenſive knowledge of the hiſtory and manners of Europe. He was invited by Stephen of Poland to reſide at Cracow, to compoſe a hiſtory of that kingdom; and after the death of his patron, he fixed his abode at Prague, with the title of imperial hiſtoriographer. His notes on Cæſar, Horace, and Cicero, diſplay great abilities. In his letters to great men and princes, Brutus laid aſide the ſlaviſh deference which modern times have introduced, and addreſſed them with all the ſimplicity of an ancient Roman. His hiſtory of Florence was ſaid to depreciate the merits of the Medicis, and therefore improved offenſive to the duke. The time of his death is unknown. He was born in 1518.

Bruyere, John de la, of Dourdan, was appointed by Boſſuet preceptor of hiſtory to the duke of Burgundy. He died 1699, aged 52. He is author of "characters," after the manner of Theophraſtus, a work highly eſteemed in France, in a ſtile rapid and nervous. This book, as might be expected, procured the author many admirers, and more enemies; but its merits are ſuch, that it will always be conſidered as a compoſition of eſtabliſhed excellence.

Bruyn, Cornelius, a painter of the Hague. He travelled through Ruſſia, and the Eaſt Indies for ſeveral years, of which he publiſhed an intereſting account. The beſt edition is that of Rouen in 1725, five vols. 4to.

Bruys, Francis, of Serrieres in the Maconnois, died at Dijon in his 30th year, 1738. He publiſhed an hiſtory of the popes in five vols. 4to.—a critique of literary journals, beſides memoires hiſtoriques critiques, &c two vols.

Bruys, Peter de, founder of the Petro-Bruſſians, was a native of Languedoc. He maintained that churches were of no uſe, he oppoſed infant baptiſm, recommended the deſtruction of crucifixes and other ornaments; he forbad the offering of prayers for the dead, and declared that the body of Chriſt was not in the ſacrament. After committing great exceſſes to eſtabliſh his tenets, he was ſeized and burnt alive at St. Gilles, 1130.

Bruzen de la Martinicle, Anthony Auguſtine, of Dieppe, was educated at Paris under Richard Simon his uncle, and was patroniſed by the dukes of Mecklenburg and Parma, and by the king of Naples, who granted him an honorable penſion. He died at the Hague 1749, aged 83. His great work is the grand Dictionaire Hiſtorique, &c. 1730, in 10 vols. folio, reprinted at Paris, ſix vols. 1768, with corrections; an uſeful performance.

Bryan, Francis, or Briant, an Engliſhman, educated at Oxford. He was knighted for his bravery againſt the French, and then employed in various embaſſies, and made gentleman of the king's privy chamber. He died juſticiary of Ireland 1548. His ſongs and ſonnets have been printed with thoſe of his friend Surrey, and of ſir Thomas Wyatt.

Bryant, Jacob, an eminent Engliſh ſcholar, educated educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge, where he became M. A. 1744. He publiſhed obſervations and enquiries relating to various parts of ancient hiſtory, 8vo. 1767, and a new ſyſtem or analyſis of mythology, wherein an attempt is made to diveſt tradition of fable, and to reduce truth to its original purity, three vols. 4to.—a work of great merit. He wrote beſides valuable diſſertations on Balaam, Samſon, Jonah,—obſervations on diſputed paſſages in Joſephus, Juſtin Martyr, &c. —a treatiſe on the authenticity of the holy ſcriptures,—pamphlets on the Rowlian controverſy, and againſt Prieſtley on neceſſity,—obſervations on the plagues of Egypt,—diſſertation on the war of Troy, a work of ſingular character, which, with all the weapons of claſſical knowledge and deep and profound erudition, endeavours to deſtroy our reſpect for the authenticity of the Iliad, and to repreſent Homer not as the bard of Grecian and Trojan heroes, but as the builder of a well wrought fiction. Mr. Bryant was tutor to the ſons of the late duke of Marlborough, and in conſequence obtained a lucrative appointment in the ordnance office. He ſpent the reſt of life in the enjoyment of learned eaſe, and in his favorite retirement in Berkſhire near Windſor. This venerable ſcholar died in 1804, aged 89, in conſequence of a mortification in his leg, occaſioned by his ſtriking it violently againſt a chair whilſt attempting to reach a book from a ſhelf.

Buc, George, a learned antiquary, born in Lincolnſhire, and knighted by James I. to whom he was maſter of the revels. He wrote the life of Richard III. in five books, and ſupported the opinion that he was not deformed, an idea maintained by Horace Walpole,—a treatiſe on the antient colleges, and ſchools of learning, &c.

Bucer, Martin, a Dominican, of Alſace, who embraced the tenets of Luther. He afterwards inclined to Zuinglius, and, in his zeal, attempted in vain to reconcile theſe two powerful leaders. For 20 years he exerted himſelf at Straſburg to eſtabliſh the proteſtant cauſe, but his oppoſition to the catholics at Augſburg, rendered him unpopular, and at the invitations of Cranmer he ſettled in England. Edward VI. treated him with great kindneſs, and he was appointed theological profeſſor at Cambridge, 1549, where he died two years after. Five years after, the perſecutions of Mary were extended to his remains, which were ignominiouſly burned, but the inſult was repaired by the good ſenſe of Elizabeth. In learning, judgment, and moderation, Bucer was inferior to none of the great reformers, and with Melancthon he may be conſidered as the beſt calculated to maintain unanimity among contending churches, and oppoſite ſects. His numerous writings in Latin and German, were on theological ſubjects.

Buchan, Elſpeth or Elizabeth, a modern fanatic, who married Robert Buchan, a common workman in Glaſgow. Her frequent peruſal of ſcripture, and the literal interpretation of its myſtical paſſages, ſo worked upon her paſſions, that ſhe conſidered herſelf as a new prophet in 1779, and, inculcating the immediate diſſolution of the world, ſhe gained to her party a great number of the diſſolute and ignorant. Theſe Buchanites, as they were called, travelled through ſeveral parts of Scotland, and as they had no thought for the morrow and conſidered that they ſhould be fed like the ravens of the air, and clothed like the lillies of the field, their doctrines appeared faſcinating to the vulgar. Mrs. Buchan died May 1791, aged 53, and her followers were ſoon diſperſed.

Buchanan, George, a Scotchman, born near Kellerne in Lenox, 1506. He was well educated, and at Paris and in Scotland, he acquired that learning which contributed ſo much to the honor of his country. He early embraced the tenets of Luther, and at Paris became acquainted with the earl of Caſſilis, with whom for five years he was engaged as an inſtructor. After the death of Caſſilis, he was preceptor to the famous Moray, but the ſeverity of his ſatire againſt the monks, eſpecially his piece called Francis canus, rendered his ſituation ſo dangerous that he fled to England, and then to France. For three years he lived in obſcurity at Bourdeaux, and wrote four Latin tragedies, to draw his pupils from the allegories of the moderns to the imitation of the purer models of Greece and Rome. Cardinal Beaton, however, purſued him in his retirement, and he left Bourdeaux for Coimbra, where he was admired for his lectures in philoſophy and claſſical learning. His being a foreigner ſoon rendered him ſuſpected, and he was confined in a monaſtery, where he tranſlated the pſalms of David into Latin. When ſet at liberty he embarked for England, and then returned to France, where in 1554, the elegant dedication of his tragedy of Jephtha procured him the friendſhip of de Coſſi, who made him for five years preceptor to his ſon. In 1566, he was made principal of St. Leonard's college, St. Andrew's, and invited by Mary of Scots to be preceptor to her ſon; but he forgot his gratitude in the misfortunes of that unhappy princeſs, and in his "Detection" ſeverely arraigned her character. His appointment was confirmed by the ſtates, and from him James VI. derived much of his knowledge of literature and his critical taſte. In the 13 laſt years of his life, Buchanan wrote the hiſtory of his country, but though nervous and perſpicuous, it is occaſionally deficient in fidelity and accuracy. He died at Edinburgh 1582. His character is painted in various and oppoſite colors by proteſtants and catholics, but poſterity views him as an able ſcholar, whoſe mind was ſtored with all the fire, and the graces of antient literature, and who, in a barbarous age, revived the beauties and the sublimities of the Roman muse. His works were published together, two vols. fol. 1714.

BUCKELDIUS, William, a native of Volder, who died at Biervliet in 1449. He was honored with a monument by the Dutch, who gratefully remembered his ingenious invention of the mode of curing herrings.

BUCKERIDGE, John, of Draycot near Marlborough, was recommended by his worth and eloquence to king James, before whom he preached at Hampton court, to bring the Melvins and other Scotch presbyterians to a knowledge of the doctrines of the English church. He was made bishop of Rochester in 1611, and of Ely in 1628, and died three years after. He wrote sermons, but his chief work is de potestate papæ, &c. adversus Bellarmin.

BUCKHOLD, John, a butcher of Leyden, who headed the fanatical anabaptists at Munster, over whom he made himself king. After an obstinate siege Munster was taken, and the leader ignominiously put to death 1536.

BUCKINGHAM, Vid. VILLIERS.

BUCQUET, John Michael Baptist, a physician of Paris, where he died 1780, aged 34, a victim to excessive application. He was noticed for his abilities in every branch of medical knowledge, and made professor of chemistry. His lectures were popular and interesting.

BUDÆUS, William, was born in Paris in 1467. As he was heir to a splendid fortune, he was early introduced in the schools of Paris and the university of Orleans, but he was regardless of study, and attached to every species of dissipation, till at last the follies of youth subsided, and from the most debauched he became the most studious and virtuous man of his age. He not only cultivated literature, but patronised it, and to his advice France is indebted for the foundation of her royal college. He was employed by Francis I. as ambassador to Leo X. and died at Paris 1540. His works which are valuable were printed 1557, in four vols. fol. Budæus was the frequent correspondent of Erasmus, but the eminence of these two men rendered them jealous of each other's reputation.

BUDDÆUS, John Francis, of Anclan in Pomerania, was professor at the university of Cobourg, Halle, and Jena. He was learned and indefatigable in his studies, and died at Jena 1729, aged 62. He wrote elementa philosophiæ, &c. three vols. 8vo.—a system of theology, two vols. 4to. &c.

BUDGELL, Eustace, was born at St. Thomas near Exeter, and educated at Christ church, Oxford, from whence he removed to the Inner Temple. Instead of studying the law, he cultivated polite literature, and became the associate of persons of rank and fashion. When Addison, who was cousin to his mother, was secretary to Wharton the viceroy of Ireland, Budgell accompanied him, as one of the clerks of his office. About this time he began his literary career, and with Steele and Addison divided the public favor, as a writer in the Spectator, where his numbers were marked with X. He afterwards contributed to the Guardian, where his papers are designated with an asterisk. The elevation of Addison to higher offices was shared by his friend, who now became an active member of the Irish parliament, and was appointed accomptant general of the kingdom. A dispute with Webster the secretary of the duke of Bolton the succeeding viceroy, destroyed the prospects of Budgell, who retorted against his antagonist, and did not even spare his patron. The lampoons were too scurrilous to be forgiven, Budgell was removed from his office, and, by his intemperate vindication, he drew upon himself not only the ridicule of the public, but the strongest reprehensions of his friend Addison. To this and other disappointments, Budgell had to add in 1720, the failure of the South Sea scheme in which he lost above 20,000l, and his discomfiture in his attempts to gain a seat in parliament, which cost him more than 5000l. Thus baffled and ruined in his fortunes, he looked for support in his pen, but his attacks on Walpole and the ministry left little doubt that his senses were impaired by the misfortunes which he had met in the world. He was engaged in the Craftsman, and afterwards published about 100 numbers of a weekly pamphlet called the Bee; but though the duchess of Marlborough, to whose husband he was distantly related, gave him 1000l. and Dr. Tindal left him by his will 2000l. yet he continued to be involved in debts which he could not discharge, and exposed to lawsuits. To this bar he had recourse, but this failed, and in the midst of his despair he took a boat at Somerset stairs, after having previously filled his pockets with stones, and directing the waterman to shoot the bridge, he, when under the arches threw himself into the river and never rose more. This melancholy event happened in 1736, and might have been apprehended from the disordered state of mind and conduct which for some days preceded it. On his table he left a written paper containing these words,

"What Cato did, and Addison approved,
"Cannot be wrong."

Budgell as a writer was ingenious and interesting, scarce inferior to the elegant taste of Addison, and rising above the greater part of English essayists. In his conduct he was impetuous, irascible, and proud, in his opinions sceptic, in his morals a profligate. He wrote besides the life of the Boyles, and translated Theophrastus' characters, and by some was supposed to be concerned in Tindal's christianity as old as the creation.

BUFFALMACO, Bonamico, an historical painter, of Florence. He advised Bruno to represent the figures of his paintings with labels labels, ſo as to introduce a living ſcene. He died 1340, aged 79.

BUFFON, George Louis le Clerc count de, a learned French philoſopher, born at Montbard in Burgundy, 1707. His father deſtined him for the law, but nature had marked him for philoſophy. After travelling in Italy, where the works of art were diſregarded for the more attractive charms of nature, and after viſiting for three ſhort months the Engliſh dominions, he ſettled at home, and began his career of fame by devoting every day 14 hours to ſtudy. At the death of his mother he inherited about 12,000l. per annum, but neither pleaſure nor opulence diverted his occupations. In compoſition he exhibited the ſevereſt correctneſs; his works when finiſhed were ſet aſide, and ſome time after, he returned to the taſk with all the ſcrutinizing eye of criticiſm. Though devoted to the ſciences, yet he was fond of company; his table diſplayed hoſpitality, and his converſation was eaſy, and void of all affectation of pedantry and ſuperior knowledge. His favorite authors were Monteſquieu, Fenelon, and Richardſon. He lived to a good old age, and died 1788. His death was haſtened by the violence of diſeaſe; 56 ſtones were found in his bladder, which his medical attendants declared they could have removed, if he had ſubmitted to the operation. His funeral was honorably attended by the learned, and 20,000 ſpectators aſſembled to view his remains borne to the vault of Montbard, where he wiſhed to be placed near his wife. Buffon tranſlated Newton's fluxions, and Hales' ſtatics, but his great and immortal work is his "Hiſtoire naturelle, 35 vols. 4to. or 62 12mo. 1749—1765.—Though his writings are entitled to celebrity, yet he is not without his faults. Some critics have expoſed to ridicule the ſyſtem which, in dividing the whole animal world into ſix claſſes, ranks in the ſame order men and quadrupeds, the lion with the bat, the horſe with the hog, as beaſts of burden, and the crab and the oyſter, as inſects with lice and fleas, and the ſhell fiſh as a worm. De la Cepede, his friend, in his eulogium, with equal truth and flattery ſuſpends in the temple of genius the four lamps of Monteſquieu, Voltaire, Rouſſeau, and Buffon. In his private character Buffon was a libertine. The works of men of genius, he would exclaim, are few, only thoſe of Newton, Monteſquieu, Leibnitz, and my own. His ſon was guillotined in 1793, exclaiming triumphantly on the ſcaffold, "citizens, my name is Buffon."

BUGENHAGEN, John, of Wollin in Pomerania, was the adverſary, and then the friend of Luther. He preached the new tenets over Germany, with great ſucceſs, and died at Wittemberg 1558, aged 73. He wrote commentaries on the ſcripture, &c.

BUGIARDINI, Juliano, a landſcape painter of Florence, who died 1556, aged 75.

BUISTER, Philip, a ſculptor of Bruſſels, who died at Paris 1688, aged 93. His ſtatues adorn Verſailles and Paris.

BULL, John, a native of Somerſet ire, admitted 1586 bachelor of muſic at Oxford, and doctor at Cambridge. He was organiſt to the queen's chapel, and on the eſtabliſhment of Greſham college, he was elected profeſſor of muſic, and permitted to deliver his lectures in Engliſh. He travelled in Germany and France, and at laſt ſettled in the Netherlands, where the archduke patronized him. He died at Lubec about 1615, aged little more than 50.

BULL, George, biſhop of St. David's, was born at Wells 1634. After being at ſchool at Wells and Tiverton, he entered at Exeter college, Oxford, in 1648; but refuſing to take the oath of allegiance, he left the univerſity for Somerſetſhire, where the good ſenſe of one of his ſiſters removed every appearance of levity, which the inexperience of youth might have drawn over his character. Under William Thomas, a puritan of extenſive learning, he made great progreſs in divinity, and, at the age of 21, he was ordained by Skinner, the ejected biſhop of Oxford, and ſoon after appointed miniſter of St. George's near Briſtol. Here he gained the eſteem of his pariſhioners, and by an extempore uſe of the prayers of the liturgy, at this time publicly forbidden, he recommended himſelf to the good opinion of all parties. He was rector of Suddington in Glouceſterſhire; and during the 27 years of his reſidence, he compoſed the greateſt part of his works. His defence of the Nicene creed procured him, in 1685, the degree of D.D. from the univerſity of Oxford; and after being prebend of Glouceſter, rector of Avening, and archdeacon of Llandaff, he was elevated to the ſee of St. David's in 1705, where he died 1709. His chief works, beſides the Defenſio fidei Nicenæ, are his harmonia apoſtolica—apologia—examen cenſuræ—judicium eccleſiæ catholicæ, a work for which he was thanked by Boſſuet and other French eccleſiaſtics—primitiva apoſtolica traditio de J. C. divinatione, beſides various diſcourſes, publiſhed by Nelſon, in 4 vols. 8vo. His learning, as his editor Nelſon, obſerves, was tempered with that modeſt and humble opinion of it that made it ſhine with greater luſtre. He not only inculcated, but in his conduct diſplayed, all the endearing virtues of benignity, humility, prudence, piety, and purity of primitive chriſtianity; and in his laſt moments exhibited that reſignation which was the beſt proof of his hopes and reliance on the great truths of the goſpel.

BULLER, Francis, an Engliſh judge. From Weſtminſter ſchool he entered at the Temple, and was called to the bar in 1763. By his marriage alliance with lord Bathurſt, he obtained the dignity of Welſh judge, and ſoon after that of juſtice in the king's bench. His abilities, his knowledge, and his integrity, enſured him the friendſhip of lord Mansfield, who wished him to be his successor; but the interest of lord Kenyon prevailed, in consequence of which sir Francis, now a baronet, removed to the common pleas. He died suddenly 1800, respected as a good lawyer and an impartial judge. He published, in 1772, an introduction to the law of nisi prius, a work of merit.

Bullet, John Baptist, died 1775, aged 76, at Besancon, where he was dean of the university. He published history of the establishment of Christianity, from Jewish and pagan authors, in 4to.—the existence of God demonstrated from nature—dissertation on the history of France, 8vo.—answers to unbelievers—memoirs on the Celtic tongue, 3 vols. fol. &c.

Bulleyn, William, an English physician, born in the isle of Ely, and educated both at Oxford and Cambridge. He travelled on the continent for knowledge, and settled at Durham, where he practised with success. Tanner reports, that he was a clergyman as well as a physician, and that he was rector of Elaxall in Suffolk. He published medical works, no longer in repute; and was universally esteemed as a polished scholar and as a man of probity, benevolence, and piety. He died in London 1576.

Bullialdus, Ismael, an astronomer, born at Laon in the isle of France. He travelled in his youth, and visited Hevelius at Dantzic. He died at Paris 1694, aged 89. His works were, de naturâ lucis—Philolaus, in 4 books, with tables of the system, revived by Copernicus—treatise on spiral lines—and astronomiæ et philol. fundamenta, &c.

Bulliard, N. a French botanist of eminence, author of Flora Parisiensis, 8vo.—the herbal of France, 13 vols. fol. 1780—dictionaire elementaire de botanique, fol. &c. He died at Paris 1793, aged 41.

Bullinger, Henry, of Bengarten, near Zurich, was educated at Cologne. He inclined to the doctrines of the Carthusians; but the writings of Melancthon fixed his faith, and, instead of supporting the church of Rome, he became a warm advocate for the protestants. In 1529 he settled as protestant minister in his native town. He was the pupil of Zuinglius, and on the death of that reformer he succeeded as pastor of Zurich, where he had taken refuge with his affrighted family. He died 1575. His works, all on polemical subjects, are in 10 vols. His kindness to the English who fled to Switzerland from the persecutions of Mary, deserves commendation. He confuted the pope's bull which excommunicated queen Elizabeth, and as minister of Zurich, he exerted himself successfully for the poor, and for the religious education of his parishioners.

Boileau, Louis, a native of Rouen, secretary to the French king, and afterwards Benedictine monk of St. Maur. He wrote an abridgement of the history of the Benedictine order—essay on the monastic history of t east, &c. and died 1693, aged 78.

Bulwer, John, an English physician in t 16th century, author of several works on ph siognomy—the language of the hand—and i structions to the deaf and dumb. His m curious book is Anthropometamorphosis, which he mentions what various shapes a dresses men have assumed in the different ag of the world.

Bunel, Peter, a native of Toulouse, d tinguished as a correct writer of the La language. He died of a fever at Turin 1546, aged 47, as he was making the tour Italy as tutor to the son of his friend de Fa His epistles were published by Stevens.

Bunel, Jacob, a native of Blois, 1558, em nent as a painter. He executed, among oth things, that finished piece representing t descent of the Holy Ghost, preserved Rome.

Bunyan, John, son of a tinker, was bo at Elstow, near Bedford. The trifling instru tion which he received, was forgotten in th indulgence of every vicious propensity; b his career was stopped by the sudden darti of a voice from heaven into his soul, say h biographers, which bade him either to lea his sins, or follow them and perish in he From this, his mode of life was altered, an after being a soldier in the parliament arm at the siege of Leicester, he established him self as a baptist preacher at Bedford; but, the holder of a conventicle, he was adjudge to be imprisoned for life. During his con finement, he wrote several of his works, an maintained himself by making long tagge thread laces, till, after more than twelve lon years' imprisonment, he was liberated by th interference of Barlow, bishop of Lincol Restored to liberty, he travelled through Eng land to comfort the brethren of his persua sion; and on the publication of the act o toleration by James II. he built a meetin house at Bedford. He died of a fever, in Lon don, in 1688, aged 60. His works were col lected and published in 2 vols. fol. 1736-7 The most celebrated of these, is his Pilgrim' progress, a work which, under an allegorica form, recommends the sublimest truths an purest virtues. It was written during his im prisonment, and has passed through more than fifty editions, and been translated into various languages.

Buonacorsi, Philip, a native of Tuscany He removed from Rome upon being suspected of forming a conspiracy against Paul II. and settled in Poland. He was employed in se veral embassies and as prime minister, and died at Cracow 1496, aged 59. He wrote a life of Attila—of Ladislaus king of Poland before Casimir, &c. highly esteemed.

Buonacorsi, or Perrin del Vaga, a painter of Tuscany, suckled by a she-goat Though poor, and engaged in painting church candles, his genius raised him to eminence.

He

He died ſuddenly 1547, in his 47th year, when engaged in the ceiling of the hall of kings at the Vatican.

BUONAFEDE, Appiano, a native of Comacio, known as a poet and elegant writer. The beſt of his poems is the iconology of great men, in Italian, often edited; and the beſt proſe performance is the hiſtory and ſpirit of every ſort of philoſophy, 6 vols. 4to. He died at Rome 1792.

BUONAMICI, Lazarus, of Baſſano, was educated at Padua. He was tutor in the Campeggi family, and afterwards profeſſor of belles lettres in the Sapienza college at Rome. At the ſacking of the city 1527 he eſcaped with the loſs of all his property, and three years after went to Padua, where he read lectures on rhetoric. His letters and poems were publiſhed 1572. He died 1552, aged 73.

BUONAMICI, Caſtruccio, a native of Lucca, who left the church for a military life, and bore arms in the ſervice of the king of Naples. He devoted much of his time to ſtudy, and publiſhed the hiſtory of the war of Velletri, in 4to. 1746, and, four years after, the hiſtory of the laſt war of Italy, in 3 vols. 4to. Theſe works are highly eſteemed for the purity of the Latinity, and the accuracy of the narration. The author died in his native city 1791, in his 50th year.

BUONAROTTI, or BUONAROTA. Michael Angelo, a celebrated painter. Vid. ANGELO.

BUONDELMONTE, a Florentine, in the 13th century, who had promiſed to marry a daughter of the Amidei, but afterwards eſpouſed the fairer daughter of the Donati. This provoked the reſentment of the ſlighted fair and her relations, and by their intrigues the youthful bridegroom was aſſaſſinated. This murder was no ſooner known, than the whole city was in commotion. The nobility divided into two parts, and the quarrel became general, ſo that the friends of Buondelmonte took the name or Guelfs, and ſupported the power of the pope, and their opponents that of Gibelins, who were attached to the intereſts of the emperor. The animoſity thus excited laſted for many centuries in the city of Florence.

BUONFIGLIO, Joſeph Conſtant, a Neapolitan, author of two excellent books, the ancient and modern hiſtory of Sicily and Venice, 2 vols. 4to. 1604—and the hiſtory of Meſſina, 1606, 4to.

BUONTALENTI, Bernardo, was diſtinguiſhed for his knowledge of architecture, of ſculpture, of hydraulics, and alſo for his miniatures. His madonnas were greatly admired. When an infant, the houſe of his father, on the Arno, fell down, and deſtroyed all the inhabitants beſides himſelf. His diſtreſs was made known to the duke of Florence, who nobly patroniſed him, and enabled him to become the honor of his country. He died 1608, aged 61.

BURCHELLO, Dominico, a barber at Florence, by his wit and genius the favorite of his countrymen. He wrote ſonnets and light-tef pieces, which have gained the admiration of critics, and rank him high among Italian poets. Occaſionally obſcure, and ſometimes enigmatical, he is cenſured for the little reſpect which he paid to good manners. He died at Rome 1448, aged 68.

BURE, William de, a bookſeller at Paris, known for his great knowledge of old and valuable books. His bibliographie inſtructive, 7 vols. 8vo.—and muſæum typographicum, 12mo. are much eſteemed. He died 1782.

BURETTE, Peter John, a phyſician of Paris, who died 1747, aged 82. He was ſon of a muſician and played before Lewis XIV.; but at 18 he quitted that profeſſion for literature. He became a poliſhed ſcholar; and beſides his many contributions to the memoires of the academy, on the games of the ancients, and other ſubjects, he was engaged in the journal des ſavans. His treatiſe on the ſymphony of the ancients is much admired. He was alſo an able orientaliſt, and as a profeſſor of medicine in the royal college, and a reader on the materia medica, he acquired great applauſe.

BURGER, Godfred Auguſtus, a German who ſtudied divinity at Halle, and law at Gottingen. Poetry and the productions of Shakeſpeare, however, gave him more pleaſure than other employment. He was engaged in the periodical publication of the almanac of the muſes from 1770 to 1775, and of the German muſeum, and tranſlated the tragedy of Macbeth, which was acted at Hamburgh. His Leonora, ſo wild and terrific, is well known in England. Burger, who was fickle in his purſuits, was for ſome years engaged as a ſteward to baron Uſlar, and as a farmer; and in the latter part of his life he was profeſſor at Gottingen. He was three times married, and was divorced from his third wife, who was herſelf a poeteſs, but of an immoral character. He died of a conſumption 1794, aged 46.

BURGES, Cornelius, a native of Somerſetſhire, educated at Oxford. He was chaplain to Charles I. but in the civil wars ſided with the parliament, and enriched himſelf by the plunder of the church. He died 1665. Some of his ſermons, &c. have been printed.

BURGH, Ulick de, marquis of Clanricarde, was author of memoirs relative to the Iriſh rebellion, a work inſtructive and intereſting. He died 1657.

BURGH, James, a popular writer, born at Madderty in Perthſhire. After ſtudying at St. Andrew's for the clerical profeſſion, he engaged in the linen trade. Diſappointed at home, he came to England, where he engaged in correcting the preſs, and then he went as aſſiſtant in the grammar ſchool at Marlow, where he publiſhed 1746, Britain's remembrancer, a book univerſally read, and conſidered as the production of ſome of the biſhops. On leaving Marlow he went to Enfield, and afterwards, in 1747, he opened a ſchool at Stoke Newington, and three years after removed to Newington Green, where for 19 years he trained many reſpectable pupils. In 1771, he retired to the enjoyment of competence at Iſlington; but he was ſoon after attacked by a ſtone in his bladder, and after ſuffering much pain, was releaſed 1775, in his 61ſt year. His other writings were thoughts on education,—political diſquiſitions, 3 vols.—Crito or eſſays, 12 vols.—the dignity of human nature, &c. one vol. 4to. or two vols. 8vo.—the art of ſpeaking, 8vo.—beſides other treatiſes. His anſwer to Lindſey's apology for reſigning his living, was ſo popular that the univerſity of Oxford preſented him the degree of doctor of laws.

BURGOYNE, John, a general in the army known for his defence of Portugal in 1762, againſt the Spaniards, for his ſeizure of Ticonderago, and for the fatal day of Saratoga, 17th Oct. 1777, in which, after two battles, he ſurrendered the Britiſh army to general Gates. He was ſuppoſed to be the natural ſon of lord Bingley. He was author of four dramatic pieces, of which the Maid of the oak, a comic opera—Bon ton, an entertainment—and the Heireſs, a comedy, written in ſprightly and elegant dialogue, were received with great applauſe on the public theatres. He wrote beſides ſeveral epilogues, and ſome fugitive pieces. He died 1792.

BURIDAN, John, a French philoſopher in the 14th century. He was profeſſor and rector of the univerſity of Paris, from which being expelled by the realiſts, he retired to Germany, where he founded the univerſity of Vienna. He wrote commentaries on Ariſtotle's logic, ethics, &c. Buridan's aſs ſtanding between two buſhels of wheat was proverbial in the ſchools for a long time, but of this the origin is little known.

BURIGNY, Leveſque de, a native of Rheims, who died at Paris, 1785, aged 94. He wrote a treatiſe on the authority of the pope, four vols. 12mo.—a learned hiſtory of pagan philoſophy,—general hiſtory of Sicily, two vols. 4to.—revolution of Conſtantinople, three vols. 12mo. &c.

BURKE, Edmund, a celebrated ſtateſman, ſon of an attorney at Carlow in Ireland, and educated at Ballytore, under Shackleton a quaker, and afterwards at Trinity college, Dublin, where, after three years' reſidence, he took his bachelor's degree, 1749. He afterwards applied for the logic profeſſorſhip at Glaſgow, and when unſucceſsful he came to London, and entered at the Middle Temple. Though poſſeſſed of elocution, he conſidered literature and politics as the field moſt favorable for his genius. For ſome time he ſubſiſted on the labors of his pen, and his vindication of natural ſociety, or a view of the miſeries and evils ariſing to mankind, in a letter to lord————, by a late noble writer, gained him reputation, for the general admiration regarding Bolingbroke as the author, ſoon redounded to the honor of the anonymous writer. His eſſay on the ſublime, in 1757, encreaſed his fame, and recommended him to the notice of the great and the learned. In 1758 Dodſley began at his ſuggeſtion the annual regiſter, which owed much of its celebrity to his pen. In 1761 he viſited Ireland, as the companion of his friend Singleſpeech Hamilton, by whoſe intereſt he procured a penſion of 300l. on the Iriſh eſtabliſhment, and on his return he was introduced to lord Rockingham firſt lord of the treaſury, who made him his ſecretary. Though the Rockingham adminiſtration was of ſhort exiſtence, Burke retained his attachment to his friends, and, during the American war, diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a warm advocate for the liberties of the coloniſts. He was in 1774 honorably elected member for Briſtol; but an unlucky opinion in favor of the commerce of Ireland, and of the Roman catholics, brought the orator into diſgrace with his conſtituents, at the election of 1780. He was afterwards member for Maldon, and during the ſhort exiſtence of the Rockingham adminiſtration was paymaſter general, and held a ſeat in the privy council, and afterwards in the coalition he ſhared the triumphs and the diſgrace of his friends. He continued a zealous opponent to Mr. Pitt, and particularly attacked him on the regency bill. The deſtruction of the French monarchy, however, which cauſed ſuch ſatisfaction among his friends, created diſtruſt in Mr. Burke, and with a prophetic voice he proclaimed the miſfortunes which awaited his country, if ſhe followed the example of her ferocious neighbours, in attempts to alter or new model her conſtitution. This opinion produced a ſeparation between Mr. Burke and his former aſſociates, and the publication of his famous reflections on the French revolution, rouſed the feelings and divided the ſentiments of the nation. While the author inveighed againſt the diſorders of anarchy, Paine in his anſwer, in the rights of man, and other inſidious writers, attempted to render palatable doctrines, which tended ſo eſtabliſh republicaniſm over the ruins of rank, of property, of happineſs, and domeſtic virtue. Theſe literary ſervices aided by the moſt eloquent language in parliament reconciled Mr. Burke to the Pitt adminiſtration, and a penſion was honorably beſtowed upon him by the king, which, though it drew upon him the ſarcaſms of party, was applauded by every friend of virtue and true loyalty. Animated by an enthuſiaſm, which electrified the whole nation, and as the advocate for the war, he was conſidered by many as the bulwark of the country, whilſt others attributed his zeal to the effects of a frantic imagination. Some time before his death Mr. Burke retired from public life; but he ſunk three years after a melancholy victim to the recent loſs of his only ſon, and expired at his ſeat near Beaconsfield, July 8th 1797, aged 67. His eſſay on the ſublime and beautiful, is considered as a valuable performance—and his vindication of natural society, is a happy imitation of the great Bolingbroke. While engaged for Dodsley in the Annual register, he gave to that publication, by the animated language, and elegant diction of his pen, a value which it has since lost. His "reflections," were so interesting in the public opinion, that in a few weeks 18,000 copies were sold. Dr. Parr in his Bellendenus has paid a deserved compliment to the merits and virtues of the venerable senator, whose character will always stand high, notwithstanding the blemish which impartiality views with sorrow, in his rancorous conduct in the accusation of Mr. Hastings. His other writings were thoughts on the causes of the present discontents,—a letter to a member of the national assembly,—an appeal from the new whigs to the old,—letters to a noble lord on the subjects in discussion with the duke of Bedford, —thoughts on a regicide peace,—letter to a noble lord, in which he sarcastically inveighed against the duke of Bedford, for his remarks on his having accepted a pension, &c. In his last moments, it is said, that he caused Addison's paper from the Spectator, on the immortality of the soul, to be read to him. Burke rose from an inferior station to eminence in public life, and had the merit to support his elevation by the most affable conduct, by benevolence of heart, dignified manners, and the most correct notions, and exemplary practice of moral and religious duties.

Burkitt, William, of Hitcham, Northamptonshire, was educated at Stowe-market school, and Pembroke-hall, Cambridge. He was vicar of Dedham in Essex, where he adorned his office by a pious elocution, and by a friendly and charitable demeanor. He died 1703, aged 53. The best known of his works is his commentary on the New Testament.

Burlamaqui, John James, a native of Geneva, professor of civil law, and afterwards tutor to the prince of Hesse Cassel. He was made counsellor of state on his return to Geneva, and died there 1748, aged 54. His principles of natural law, and of political law, three vols. 12mo. are two popular works.

Burleigh. Vid. Cecil.

Burman, Francis, of Leyden, was professor of theology at Utrecht, where he died 1679, aged 51. He wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, and the historical books of the Old Testament in Dutch—an abridgement of theology, &c.

Burman, Peter, son of Francis, was born at Utrecht, and became professor of history and eloquence, and rector of the university of Leyden. He was in his temper so quarrelsome, and in his manners so immoral that his contemporaries regarded him with contempt, and at his death, in 1740, no one was found to honor his memory with the usual respect of a common eulogy. His chief attacks of ridicule were directed against Le Clerc. Bentley thought highly of his abilities. He wrote a book on Roman taxes, and edited Virgil, Ovid, Petronius, Quintilian, Suetonius, Justin, Velleius, Phædrus, Valerius Flaccus, Lucan, &c.

Burman, John, of the same family, was professor of botany and medicine at Amsterdam, and published two curious books,—rariorum Afric. plantarum decades x. 4to. with plates in 4to.—thesaurus Zeylanicus 4to.

Burn, Richard, was born at Kirkby Stephen, Westmoreland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. He died at Orton, where he had been vicar 49 years, 1789. He was chancellor of Carlisle and justice of the peace for Westmoreland and Cumberland, and known as the author of the office of justice of peace, and on the ecclesiastical laws, two works of respectability, besides the history and antiquities of Westmoreland and Cumberland.

Burn, John, son of the preceding, was educated to the law, but did not practise. He edited his father's works, improved with valuable additions. He died 1802, aged 58.

Burnet, Gilbert, bishop of Salisbury, was born at Edinburgh 1643. He was educated at Aberdeen, and under his father he early acquired habits of industry, and never, till the infirmities of age, discontinued the custom of rising every morning at four o'clock to prosecute his studies. At 18 he was admitted expectant preacher, but he refused the offer of a benefice, and in 1663 he visited Oxford and Cambridge for six months, and then passed over into Holland, where he studied Hebrew, and by a friendly intercourse with men of every religious persuasion, he fixed his principles of universal toleration, without regard to tribe or sect. On his return to Scotland in 1665, he was ordained and appointed divinity professor of Glasgow; but his attempts to reconcile the contending parties in ecclesiastical affairs rendered him unpopular. He next engaged to write the history of the dukes of Hamilton, and recommended himself so much to the earl of Lauderdale, and to the king's ministers in London by his superior abilities, that he was offered a Scotch bishopric which he declined. Soon after he was suspected, and treated with harshness by the king, who ordered his name to be erased from the list of chaplains. To avoid the enmity of Lauderdale, he settled in London, where he was made preacher of the Rolls chapel, and lecturer of St. Clement's. His two first volumes of the History of the Reformation about this time received as an honorable testimony of merit the thanks of both houses of parliament. He likewise became acquainted with the profligate Rochester, and by his conversation he reclaimed him, and saw him atone for his debaucheries by a most penitential death. On the change of administration in 1682, Burnet's conduct gave offence, and his attendance on lord Russel at his trial created such indignation at court, that he was by the king's command discharged from his offices at the Rolls' chapel and at St. Clement's. In his travels in France and Italy, he was received with every mark of reſpect by the French king, and by pope Innocent XI. The acceſſion of James II. to the throne formed a new era in the life of Burnet. Unwilling to return home, he ſettled in Holland, and the attention paid to him by the prince and princeſs of Orange, proved ſo offenſive to the Engliſh monarch that he cauſed his ambaſſador to demand his baniſhment from the ſtates, an interference which was rejected, as he was under the protection of the laws as a naturalized ſubject and the huſband of a Dutch lady. He accompanied the prince on his invaſion of England, and was ſo zealous in his cauſe, both by his pamphlets and his pulpit eloquence, that William when ſeated on the throne advanced him to the ſee of Saliſbury. In this new office he was moderate but dignified, though his aſſertions that William's title to the crown was founded on conqueſt, proved highly diſagreeable to both houſes, and the offenſive paper was burnt by the hands of the hangman. He reſided in his dioceſe the beſt part of his time, and though engaged as preceptor to the duke of Glouceſter, he devoted himſelf much to improve the comforts of his clergy, by augmenting poor livings, and advancing the intereſts of religion by his writings. He died 1715, in his 72d year. Beſides the works mentioned, and a third volume of the reformation, &c. he wrote the Hiſtory of his own times,—an excellent treatiſe on the paſtoral care,—an expoſition of the 39 articles,—and ſermons. His ſon Thomas publiſhed an account of his life annexed to the hiſtory of his own times. Of his three ſons, the eldeſt, William, died 1729, governor of New England,—the ſecond, Gilbert, was chaplain to the king, and engaged in the Bangorian controverſy as the champion of Hoadly,—and Thomas became a judge of the common pleas, and died 1753.

BURNET, Elizabeth, third wife of biſhop Burnet, was daughter of ſir Richard Blake, and born in London 1661. At 18 ſhe married Robert Berkeley eſquire, with whom ſhe reſided in Holland, and after being a widow 7 years ſhe in 1700 married the biſhop of Saliſbury. Her fortune was employed to the moſt benevolent purpoſes, and in her maternal attention to the children of her laſt huſband. She publiſhed a method of devotion, a book of merit, which was reprinted four years after her death. She died 1709.

BURNET, Dr. Thomas, a writer born at Croft in Yorkſhire, and educated at North Allerton ſchool and Clare-hall Cambridge. As tutor to the ſon of the marquis of Wincheſter, and afterwards to lord Oſſory, he gained the eſteem of men of rank and political influence, and was appointed in 1685, to the maſterſhip of the charter-houſe. In this ſituation he diſplayed a conſcientious regard for the ſtatutes of the ſociety, by refuſing to admit one Popham a penſioner of the houſe, without his taking the oaths, in conſequence of the diſpenſation granted by James II. The revolution opened the road for future preferment, but the publication of his "Archæologiæ philoſophicæ, &c." drew upon him public cenſure, and his attempt to allegoriſe the account of the fall of Adam expoſed him to the indignation of his eccleſiaſtical readers, who thought they viewed in him an infidel writer. Every endeavour to vindicate himſelf was unſatisfactory, he was removed from the clerkſhip of the cloſet to the king, and then loſt the ſee of Canterbury on the death of Tillotſon. Thus baniſhed from royal favor, he retired to the tranquillity of the charter-houſe, where he died 1715, aged about 80. His chief work is his theory of the earth, publiſhed originally in Latin, and afterwards improved in an Engliſh dreſs, at the recommendation of Charles II. The celebrity which this book acquired, directed the inquiries of philoſophers to examine its merits, and though it is proved fully by Flamſtead, and particularly Keill, to be a ſyſtem built on wrong data, and more the effort of fanciful invention than of mathematical preciſion, yet it is popular, and will be admired, as poſſeſſing uncommon beauties, and intereſting details. He wrote beſides two other learned Latin works—de fide & officiis chriſtianorum—& de ſtatu mortuorum, & reſurgentium,—beſides other pieces, in which he queſtions the eternity of future puniſhments, and adopts the doctrine of the millennium.

BURNET, Dr. Thomas, a Scotch phyſician, of whoſe birth, life, and death, nothing is recorded. He wrote—theſaurus medicinæ practicæ, 1673, 4to. London—Hippocrates contractus, &c.

BURNS, Robert, a Scotch poet of merit, born 1759, at Ayr. Though a ploughman, humbly educated, he roſe to high poetic fame by the untutored powers of his genius. His writings are all in the Scotch dialect which undoubtedly leſſens their merit, though they poſſeſs uncommon beauty and elegant ſimplicity. Burns no ſooner appeared in print than he was drawn from the plough to aſſociate with men of letters and opulence. By the exertions of his friends and Dr. Blacklock in particular, a ſubſcription of nearly 1100l. was raiſed for him, and a place in the exciſe was obtained, and a farm, where he might exerciſe his genius in noble independence. Theſe generous efforts were unavailing; Burns, tranſplanted from the plough, was a withered plant; he contracted bad habits, which, added to a natural propenſity for licentious pleaſures, ſhattered his exiſtence, and he ſunk into an untimely grave 1796. He left behind him a widow and four children, whom the benevolent public, guided by Dr. Currie of Liverpool, who edited his poems and letters in four vols. 8vo. 1800, raiſed above the miſeries of low and often vicious indigence, by the profit of 1000l. obtained from publication.

BURROUGH, Edward, a native of Weſtmoreland, who from a churchman became a preſbyterian and afterwards a quaker. As a preacher he was bold, and reprehended Cromwell for his ſeverities. He obtained from Charles II. the ſuſpenſion of the perſecutions againſt the quakers of New England. He was impriſoned, and died of the gaol diſtemper in Newgate, 1663, aged 29. His tracts, &c. were collected in one vol. folio.

BURROUGHES, Jeremiah, a nonconformiſt, educated at Cambridge. He retired to Holland, and during the civil wars he returned to London, and became preacher of Stepney, and Cripplegate churches. He wrote a commentary on Hoſea—ſermons on contentment and reſignation—Irenicum, or in favor of Chriſtian peace, &c. He died in London 1646.

BURROW, James, maſter of the crown office, was in 1772 preſident of the royal ſociety, which he reſigned the next year to ſir John Pringle, and was at that time knighted. He publiſhed four vols. of reports, beſides deciſions of the court of king's bench—an eſſay on punctuation—anecdotes of Oliver Cromwell and his family, &c. He died 1782.

BURTON, Henry, of Birſall in Yorkſhire, was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He was tutor to the ſons of the earl of Monmouth. He was next clerk of the cloſet to prince Henry, and after his death to Charles, who on his acceſſion diſcarded him. This affront was reſented by Burton, who, inflamed with the ſpirit of the times, railed againſt the epiſcopal bench, eſpecially Neill and Laud. As rector of St. Matthew's in Friday-ſtreet, he preached and publiſhed two ſermons, which were conſidered as libellous, and for them he was ſummoned before the ſtar-chamber, and condemned to pay 5000l. to be expoſed on the pillory, to have his ears cut off, to be degraded from his eccleſiaſtical honors, and be impriſoned for life. After enduring this puniſhment for 12 weeks in Lancaſter gaol, he was removed, from the commiſeration of the populace, to Cornet caſtle in Guernſey, 1637, from which, three years after, he was liberated by parliament, who voted to him 6000l. This he never received, but he was reſtored to his living, and by embracing the opinions of the puritans and independents he retained his popularity till his death in 1648, aged 69. His writings were all controverſial.

BURTON, William, of Lindley in Leiceſterſhire, was educated at Sutton Coldfield ſchool, and Brazen-noſe college, Oxford. He afterwards was member of the Inner Temple, and barriſter and reporter in the court of common pleas. His favorite ſtudies were genealogy, heraldry, and antiquities, and he publiſhed his great work on the hiſtory of his native county, in fol. 1622. This compoſition, valuable on account of its antiquity, is not free from errors. Burton was a ſufferer by the civil wars. He chiefly lived at his favorite ſeat, Falde, near Tutbury, Staffordſhire, and was intimate with ſir Robert Cotton, Michael Drayton, &c. He died at Falde 1645, aged 70. His ſon, Caſſibelan, inheriting his virtues and learning, publiſhed a poetical tranſlation of Martial in 1658, and died 1681, aged 72.

BURTON, Robert, brother to the preceding, was educated at the ſame ſchool and college. He became afterwards ſtudent of Chriſt-church, and obtained the livings of St. Thomas, Oxford, and Segrave in Leiceſterſhire, which he retained till his death 1639, aged 63. He was a man of extenſive learning but of a melancholy turn of mind, and addicted to aſtrology. His anatomy of melancholy, by Democritus junior, as he calls himſelf, fully eſtabliſhed his character for erudition and eccentricity. The work continued long a favorite of the public and his bookſeller it is ſaid gained a handſome eſtate by the ſale. As Burton died about the time which he had predicted by calculating his nativity, ſome ſuſpected that to give celebrity to the accuracy of his art he deſtroyed himſelf. Sterne is ſaid to have borrowed much from his writings.

BURTON, Ezekias, fellow of Magdalen college, Cambridge, and prebendary of Norwich, was a ſtrenuous advocate for toleration in ſupport of the plans of his patron lord Bridgeman. He died of a malignant fever, 1681. His diſcourſes were publiſhed by Tillotſon in two vols.

BURTON, William, was born in Auſtin-friars, London, educated at Glouceſter-hall, Oxford, and after being uſher to Thomas Farnaby, he was made maſter of the ſchool of Kingſton on Thames. He was eminent as an univerſal ſcholar, and an able antiquary. He died 1657. He wrote Græcæ linguæ hiſtoria —Veteris linguæ Perſicæ hiſtoria, publiſhed with the preceding—a commentary on Antoninus' Itinerary, relating to Britain, in folio.

BURTON, William, of Rippon in Yorkſhire, was educated at Chriſt church, Oxford. He was diſſuaded by his friends from joining the pretender at Mancheſter in 1745. He practiſed as a phyſician, and wrote the hiſtory of Yorkſhire, in two vols. fol. He died at York 1759, aged 62.

BURTON, John, D. D. of Wembworth, Devonſhire, was educated at Okehampton and Ely ſchools, and at Corpus Chriſti college, Oxford, where he was near 15 years an indefatigable tutor. In 1733, he was elected to a fellowſhip of Eton college, and then ſucceeded Dr. Littleton, as vicar of Mapledurham, Oxfordſhire. He found on his living his predeceſſor's widow and her three infant daughters, in an unprotected ſtate, and the benevolence with which he treated the mother at laſt ended in marriage. His retirement here was employed in improving his neighbourhood, and in ſuggeſting hints for removing obſtructions in the navigation of the Thames. After the death of his wife in 1748, he ſpent his time at Eton, Eton, where he was revered by the pupils of that reſpectable foundation. At an advanced period of life, when his eyeſight began to fail, he publiſhed his ſcattered pieces called opuſcula miſcellanea, but ſoon after an erylipelous fever deſtroyed his faculties and rendered him a melancholy monument of fallen greatneſs. He died 1771, aged 76.

Bury, Arthur, D. D. a native of Devonſhire, educated at Exeter college, Oxford, from which he was ejected by the parliamentary viſitors. At the reſtoration he obtained a prebend of Exeter, and in 1665 was made rector of Exeter college, and chaplain to the king. His "naked goſpel," in which he avowed the principles of the Socinians, cauſed his ejection from his preferment, and the work was burnt by order of the univerſity of Oxford. He vindicated his conduct in ſome pamphlets, and died about the end of the 17th century, near Exeter.

Bury, Elizabeth, daughter of capt. Lawrence, of Linton, Cambridgeſhire, married for her 2d huſband Samuel Bury, a diſſenting miniſter of Briſtol. She excelled in her knowledge of divinity, of mathematics, and of the learned languages, eſpecially Hebrew. Her life and diary were publiſhed by her laſt huſband. She died at Briſtol, 1720, aged 76.

Burzuie, a learned Perſian philoſopher and phyſician, in the reign of Choſroes ſurnamed Nuſchirvan the juſt.

Bus, Cæſar de, of Cavaillon, atoned for the irregularities of youth, by a pious life. He wrote familiar inſtruction on the chriſtian doctrine, once very popular, and died 1607, aged 63.

Busbequius, Auger Giſſen, a natural ſon of the lord of Buſbec, was born at Commines in Flanders. He viſited London in the ſuite of the imperial ambaſſador, and in 1554 went himſelf at the head of an embaſſy to the capital of Turkey, where he made a valuable collection of coins, manuſcripts, and inſcriptions. He publiſhed an account of his travels, printed 1633, highly commended by Thuanus. He died 1592, aged 70.

Busby, Richard, a celebrated ſchoolmaſter, born at Lutton in Lincolnſhire, 1606, and educated at Weſtminſter ſchool, of which, after taking his degrees at Chriſt-church, Oxford, he was appointed maſter 1640. For 55 years he preſided over the inſtitution, and many of his pupils filled the higheſt offices of the church and ſtate with ability. At the reſtoration he was made prebendary of Weſtminſter by Charles II. and took his degree of D. D. He died 1695, in his 89th year, and was buried in Weſtminſter abbey, where a fine monument is erected to his memory, with a Latin inſcription to commemorate his great abilities and uſeful ſervices. He wrote ſome books for the uſe of his ſchool, where they are ſtill retained as a monument of his erudition, and critical diſcernment.

Buschetto da Dalichio, an eminent architect of the 11th century. The cathedral of Piſa, one of the fineſt of the buildings of Italy, was erected by him.

Busching, Dr. Anthony Frederic, a native of Stadhagen in Pruſſia, paſtor of the Lutheran church at Preſburg. He was author of a new treatiſe on geography in German, two vols 1754. This work was tranſlated into Engliſh in ſix vols. 4to. 1768-1779. He died 1793 aged 69, at Berlin.

Buschius, Herman, a German author of commentaries on the claſſics, &c. He contributed much to the reſtoration of learning, and ably ſeconded Luther 1534, aged 66.

Bushell, Thomas, of Worceſterſhire, educated at Baliol college, was in the ſervice of Bacon the chancellor, and upon his diſgrace retired to Oxfordſhire. He was a ſtrong royaliſt, and received Charles I. and his queen at his ſeat, and was made maſter of the royal mines in Wales. In this appointment he eſtabliſhed a mint, and coined money, which he ſent to the monarch at Oxford. At the reſtoration he was permitted to work the lead mines of Mendip in Somerſetſhire. He died 1674, aged 80. He wrote ſpeeches and ſongs.

Busleiden, Jerome, was in the ſervice of Charles V. He was the friend of Eraſmus ſir T. More, &c. and he founded in Louvain the college of the three tongues, Hebrew Greek, and Latin. He died 1517.

Bussiere, John de, a Jeſuit, author of an hiſtory of France, 2 vols. 4to.—an abridgement of univerſal hiſtory, &c. He died 1678 aged 71.

Bussy, Roger Rabutin count of, a French writer, born 1618, in Normandy. He roſe to high rank in the army, but in his amours des Gaules he took ſuch liberty with the character of the French ladies, that he was deprived of his honors, and thruſt into the Baſtille, 1665. The following year he was liberated, to live in exile in Burgundy. As a writer he is eminent for his wit, the elegance of his diction, and the intereſting manner of his narratives. He wrote beſides memoirs,—letters, in ſeven vols.—poems, &c. He died 1693.

Butler, William, a phyſician, of Ipſwich educated at Clare-hall, Cambridge. He practiſed at Cambridge without a degree, but the oddity of his manners, and the bold method in which he treated his patients, often ſucceſsfully, rendered him a favorite in his profeſſion Some anecdotes of him are recorded, which exhibit him more as a capricious boy, or a madman, than a man of ſound ſenſe. He died 1618, aged 82. He left no writings behind him

Butler, Charles, of Hampſhire, was author of a book on bees, called the feminine monarchy, and of a treatiſe on muſic. He was maſter of Baſingſtoke ſchool, and vicar of Lawrence Wotton, and died 1647.

Butler, Samuel, the poet, was born at

Stren

Strensham, Worcestershire. From Worcester grammar-school he was sent to Cambridge, but never was matriculated, and seven years after he became the clerk of Jefferys, a justice of the peace. Here he devoted himself to poetry and literary pursuits, as well as to music and painting. Afterwards he was in the family of the countess of Kent, where he had access to a valuable library, and conversed with the great Selden, whose amanuensis he occasionally was. Afterwards he was in Bedfordshire, in the house of sir Samuel Luke, one of Cromwell's officers. Here no doubt he planned, if he did not write, his Hudibras, as the knight was intended for the hero of the poem. At the restoration he was appointed steward of Ludlow castle, and in 1663 he published the first part of his Hudibras in three cantos, and the merit of the poem was no sooner known at court, than the king and the royalist party received it with enthusiastic applause. The next year the second part was published, and a third in 1678; but the golden dreams of the poet were disappointed; and though the nation expected it, and the merit of the poem had the strongest claim to public remuneration, yet Butler sunk in want and obscurity. In vain his friends interested themselves in his favor, the monarch enjoyed the wit of Hudibras, but forgot his necessities, in the midst of his flatterers and concubines, and though it is said that the poet once received 300 guineas from the royal purse, his general treatment denies the assertion. From this shameful neglect of pining virtue, we are to lament the discontinuation of Hudibras. Butler who did more by the sarcastic powers of his muse, in exposing to ridicule the fanatical republicans, than all the courtiers of Charles, refused to write more for the amusement of an ungrateful nation, and the poem remained unfinished. Butler soon after died 1680, and was buried in Covent-garden church-yard, at the expence of Mr. Longueville, who had in vain solicited a subscription for his decent interment in Westminster-abbey. Sixty years after, the memory of the poet was rescued from oblivion, and a monument was erected to him in Westminster-abbey by Mr. Barber, a printer, mayor of London, who, from his respect to departed genius, deserves to be recorded as the most disinterested friend of the poet. Thyer published some time after Butler's death 3 vols. of his posthumous works, and afterwards two; but they throw no light upon the history of his sufferings. The best edition of his Hudibras, is by Dr. Zachary Grey, 2 vols. 8vo.

Butler, Joseph, an English prelate, born at Wantage in 1692. His father, who was a tradesman, but a presbyterian, intending him for the ministry of his persuasion, placed him with Jeremiah Jones of Tewkesbury, in Gloucestershire, where he had Isaac Watts for his schoolfellow. Before he left this place, he wrote some remarks on Dr. Samuel Clark's first sermon at Boyle's lecture, which are annexed to the treatise on the being of God. The principles of the dissenters were now examined with soberness by this youthful scholar, and, after mature deliberation, rejected for the doctrines of the established church; and Butler entered at Oriel college, where he formed a lasting intimacy with Edward Talbot, the son of the bishop of Durham. In consequence of this, he was appointed preacher at the Rolls, and made rector of Haughton and Stanhope, and prebendary of Rochester. In 1736 he was clerk of the closet to queen Caroline, and, two years after, nominated to the see of Bristol and deanery of St. Paul's. In 1746 he was clerk of the closet to the king, and, four years after, he was translated to Durham, a dignity which he did not long enjoy, as he died at Bath 1752. This prelate was respectable in private as well as in public life. The powers of his mind were great, clear, and comprehensive, and from his deep learning, and pious regard for virtue and religion, arose that excellent and immortal publication entitled, The analogy of religion, natural and revealed, &c. in 8vo. 1736. This valuable work has been analysed by Dr. Halifax, and the objections raised against the bishop, and the imputation of popery, have been satisfactorily removed. He published also some sermons, &c.

Butler, James, duke of Ormond, an able statesman, born 1610, at Clerkenwell, London. He distinguished himself against the rebels of Ireland, for which he was created a marquis. During the civil wars he was lieutenant of Ireland; but upon the invasion of Cromwell, he retired to France, and was employed by Charles II. in negociating with the royalists in England. On the restoration, he was created a duke, and viceroy of Ireland. Here he prevented Blood from seizing his person and the castle of Dublin; and some years after he again escaped, by the interference of his servants, from the violence of the same assassin, who dragged him from his coach in St. James's-street, with the intention of hanging him at Tyburn. The duke died 1688, in his 78th year.

Butler, Thomas, earl of Ossory, son of the preceding, was born at Kilkenny 1634. He was confined for eight months by Cromwell; and then went over to Flanders. After the restoration, he was made a lieutenant-general in Ireland, and in 1666 raised to an English peerage. He served against the Dutch, and shared the glories of lord Albemarle's victory. In consequence of these services he was made admiral of the whole fleet, in the absence of prince Rupert. In 1677 he commanded the English in the service of the prince of Orange, and at the battle of Mons he gathered fresh laurels. In the senate he vindicated his father so ably against Shaftesbury, that the veteran orator was confounded and abashed. He died 1680, aged 46. His father said he would not exchange his dead son for for any living ſon in chriſtendom, ſo reſpectable and popular was his character.

Butt, George, D.D. an Engliſh divine, born at Lichfield 1741. From Stafford ſchool he went to Weſtminſter, and then to Chriſt-church, Oxford. He was, by ſir Edward Winnington, in 1771, preſented to the livings of Stanford and Clifton, Worceſterſhire, and in 1787 he obtained from lord Foley the vicarage of Kidderminſter. He was attacked by a paralytic ſtroke in June 1795, and yielded with ſerenity to a gradual decay, which proved fatal the 30th Sept. following. Dr. Butt was diſtinguiſhed as a preacher, ardent yet meek, pathetic yet unaffected, directing the powers of his eloquence with the pure ſpirit of devotion, and the mild graces of chriſtian charity. As a poet, he poſſeſſed originality, force, and ſublimity, and what the muſe inſpired was expreſſed with the energy of true genius. In private life he was deſervedly admired for the urbanity of his manners, and the ſteadineſs of his friendſhip. His converſation was cheerful, often ſparkling with wit, but never offenſive for illiberality or coarſeneſs of ideas. He publiſhed a volume of ſermons, and a verſification of Iſaiah, and in 1793 he collected and publiſhed his poems, in 2 vols 8vo. A well written account of his life has appeared from the claſſical pen of his friend Dr. Valpy.

Butts, ſir William, a phyſician to Henry VIII. educated at Gonvile hall, Cambridge. He was knighted by the king, and was one of the founders of the royal college of phyſicians He is introduced by Shakeſpeare in his Henry VIII. as the friend of Cranmer. He died 1545.

Buxton, Jedediah, an extraordinary calculator, born at Elmeton, near Cheſterfield, in Derbyſhire. Though the ſon of a ſchool-maſter, and the grandſon of a clergyman, he knew neither to write nor read. His powers of meditation were ſo aſtoniſhing, that, in the midſt of the moſt confuſed noiſes, he would reply with accuracy to the moſt difficult queſtions. He was accidentally aſked by a ſtranger how many cubical eighths of an inch there were in a body, whoſe three ſides were 23,145,789 yards, 5,642,732 yards, and 54,965 yards; and though ſurrounded by a hundred laborers, he, in five hours, gave a correct anſwer to the aſtoniſhed inquirer. Other inſtances are mentioned of his retentive memory; and it is ſaid, that, by walking, he could meaſure any piece of land with as much exactneſs as if he had marked it with a chain. The great object of his heart, next to figures, was to ſee the royal family; and to gratify this, he walked to London, in 1754, but returned in diſappointment. While in the capital, he was introduced to the royal ſociety, and viſited Drury-lane at the repreſentation of Richard III. where it was expected the novelty of the ſcene and the ſplendor of the exhibition would engage his attention. Nothing, however, ſtruck him; but he employed himſelf in numbering the ſteps of the dancers, and counting, with great nicety, all the words which Garrick had uttered during the performance He died at the age of 70, about the year 1774.

Buxtorff, John, a learned Hebrean, born at Camen in Weſtphalia, profeſſor at Baſil where he died of the plague 1629, aged 65. He wrote an Hebrew grammar—a lexicon Chaldaicum talmudicum & rabbinicum, fol.—a Hebrew bible—ſynagoga Judaica, or the religious ceremonies of the Jews—a ſmall Hebrew and Chaldaic lexicon, 12mo.—the thaurus linguæ Hebraicæ, 2 vols. 8vo. &c.

Buxtorff, John, ſon and ſucceſſor to the preceding, was born at Baſil, where he died in 1664, aged 65. He wrote a valuable Hebrew concordance—a defence of the points and vowels of the Hebrew text againſt Lewis Capellus—diſſertations on Jewiſh hiſtory and literature, &c.

Buxtorff, John, nephew of the preceeding, ſucceeded him in the oriental chair at Baſil, an honor which four of the family enjoyed during a whole century. He ably vindicated the uſe of vowels and points, and publiſhed ſeveral learned diſſertations on the Hebrew language, beſides verſes, ſermons, &c. He died in 1732.

Buy de Mornas, Claude, of Lyons, died at Paris 1783. He is author of a valuable atlas of geography and hiſtory, 4 vols. 4to. 1762-1770, and coſmography, in 8vo. 1770.

Buzot, Francis Nicholas Leonard, one of the heroes of the French revolution, born at Evreux, 1760. He was in the convention ſurnamed the evil prophet, becauſe he conſtantly inveighed againſt pretended plots. He attacked the Orleans' party, and particularly Danton and Robeſpierre, in conſequence of which his deſtruction was decreed. He was proſcribed 1793, but eſcaped, and wandered poor and deſtitute in the department of Calvados, where he was at laſt found dead by the ſide of his friend Pethion. Some have attributed his death to aſſaſſination, and others to ſuicide. The Jacobins, to render him more odious, called him king Buzot.

Byfield, Nicholas, a native of Warwickſhire, educated at Exeter college, Oxford. He ſettled at Cheſter, and afterwards removed to Iſleworth, where he died 1662. He was a ſtrong calviniſt, and wrote ſome voluminous tracts on divinity. His ſon Adoniram eſpouſed the cauſe of the parliament in the civil wars.

Byng, George, lord Torrington, was born 1663. He roſe by merit in the navy, and in 1704, with the rank of rear admiral of the red, he contributed to the capture of Gibraltar. For his ſervices at the battle of Mulaga he was knighted, and in 1718, he was ſent commander in chief of the fleet in the Mediterranean, where he bravely protected the coaſt of Italy againſt the Spaniards. On his return home George I. acknowledged, in the handſomeſt manner, his ſervices, made him treaſure ſurer of the navy, and rear admiral of England, and raiſed him to the honors of a viſcount, and in 1727 George II. made him firſt lord of the admiralty, which he filled till his death, 1733.

Byng, John, ſon of the above, ſerved in the glorious expeditions of his father, and was raiſed to the rank of admiral. His attempts to relieve Fort St. Philip in Minorca, when blockaded by a French fleet, proved abortive, and his heſitation in engaging the enemy, when a bold attack might perhaps have gained the victory, drew the clamors of the nation againſt him. He was condemned by a court-martial, and was ſhot at Portſmouth 1757, meeting death with calm reſignation.

Bynkershoek, Cornelius Van, of Middleburg, was preſident of the council in Holland, and law profeſſor at Leyden. He is author of obſervations on the Roman laws—an admired treatiſe on the right of ambaſſadors, &c. He died 1743, aged 80.

Byrom, John, the inventor of a ſyſtem of ſhort-hand writing, was born at Kerſal near Mancheſter, and educated at the Charterhouſe, and Trinity college, Cambridge. At the univerſity he wrote his beautiful paſtoral of Colin to Phœbe, which appeared in the firſt volume of the Spectator, as well as two ingenious eſſays on dreams. As he did not take orders he loſt his fellowſhip, and went to Montpellier for the recovery of his health, but the writings of Malebranche, Bourignon, &c. ſhook his principles, and he imbibed the tenets of viſionary enthuſiaſm. On his return he ſtudied phyſic, and ſoon after againſt the wiſhes of her parents, he married one of his couſins, and ſhared with her poverty and diſtreſs. To maintain himſelf he taught at Mancheſter a new method of ſhort-hand writing, which he had invented at Cambridge, and he afterwards removed to London. Here he obtained a handſome competence, and regularly ſpent his ſummers with his increaſing family at Mancheſter till the death of his elder brother, without iſſue, and his ſucceſſion to his eſtate, gave him independence. He ſpent in domeſtic retirement, in the company of his worthy wife, the remaining years of his life, in writing a variety of pieces of poetry. He died at Mancheſter 1763, aged 72, leaving behind him the character of an inoffenſive man, who, to conſiderable learning and poetical genius, united mild and amiable manners. His pen was never dipped in the gall of ſatire or ridicule.

Bythner, Victorinus, a native of Poland, eminent for his knowledge of Hebrew. He came to Oxford, and read lectures in Hebrew, and afterwards removed to Cambridge, and then into Cornwall, where he practiſed phyſic. His beſt known work is—Lyra prophetica Davidis regis, &c. He died 1664.

He gave lectures of philoſophy at Milan, and of divinity at Bologna, and as he ſupported the authority of the eccleſiaſtical ſtates, he was received with great diſtinction when introduced to the pope, and lodged in the Vatican. Terrified by the murder of one of his ſervants, he retired to the convent of Minerva, where he died 1637, aged 70. His works are ſo numerous that it would require pages to enumerate them, but the chief are the—Continuation of Baronius' annals, in 9 vols. fol. from the year 1118,—and lives of the popes, 3 vols.

C.

Cab, Ben Zobair, an Arabian poet, who died in the firſt year of the hegira. He is known as the opponent, and afterwards as the friend, of Mahomet.

Cabasilas, Nilus, archbiſhop of Theſſalonica, wrote againſt the claims of the biſhop of Rome to univerſal ſupremacy, and to infallibility, in the 14th century.

Cabestan or Cabestaing, William de, a provencal poet in the ſervice of Tricline, wife of Raymond de Scillans. He gained ſo much the affection of his miſtreſs that the jealous huſband murdered him, and dreſſed his heart, which he placed on the table before his guilty wife. She eat of the horrid food, and when informed of it died of grief, 1213.

Cabot, Sebaſtian, ſon of a Venetian, was born at Briſtol 1467. Under the eye of his father he learnt mathematics and coſmography, and by accompanying him in ſeveral voyages he became eminent in the art of navigation. In 1497 he was engaged with his father by Henry VII. for the diſcovery of a north-weſt paſſage to India, and after touching at Prima Viſta and St. John's iſland, they ſailed as far as cape Florida. In ſucceeding voyages a settlement was made on the coast of Newfoundland, and Sebastian, by being the first European who touched the new continent, established a greater claim to give his name to those unknown regions than either Americus Vespucius or even Columbus himself. Sebastian, under Henry VIII. tried to penetrate to the East Indies by the south, but want of support disappointed his hopes, and he penetrated only as far as the Brazils, and visited Hispaniola and Porto Rico. In 1524 Cabot was employed by the king of Spain to sail to the Moluccas by the streights of Magellan, but the mutinous spirit of his crew checked his progress, and he stopped at Paraguay, from whence, after five years' residence, he returned to Europe, and was treated with coldness by the court. Disgusted with the Spaniards, Cabot returned to Bristol, where his merits recommended him to Edward VI., and Somerset the protector, and from his great knowledge he was consulted as an oracle on commercial affairs, and was appointed governor of the company of the merchant adventurers. In 1552 he planned a voyage for the discovery of the northern parts of the world, and to him England owes her first mercantile connection with Russia, by the establishment of the Russia company. After a most useful life, this patriotic man died aged about 70. It is remarked of him, that he first observed the variation of the needle. He published a map of the world, besides an account of his voyages in the southern parts of the world, 1583, fol.

CABRAL, or CABRERA, Pedro Alvares, a Portuguese, sent in 1500 by Emanuel with a fleet to the East Indies. A storm drove him on the coast of Brazil, where he called the place where he landed Santa Cruz, and he afterwards reached his destination, and compelled the chief of Calicut to submit to his arms. He returned to Europe in 1501, loaded with the curiosities of the east.

CADALOUS, bishop of Parma, made pope under the title of Honorius II., died 1064.

CADAMOSTO, Lewis, a Venetian navigator, born 1422. He engaged in the service of Henry of Portugal, and in 1455 he proceeded to Madeira, and visited the Canaries and the coast of Africa as far as the Gambia. The next year he proceeded as far as the river St. Dominic, and on his return to Portugal he was received with great honor. He returned to Venice, where he died 1464.

CADOGAN, William Bromley, second son of lord Cadogan, was educated at Westminster, and Christ-church, Oxford. He obtained the livings of St. Giles' Reading, and St. Luke's Chelsea. In the discharge of his duty he was indefatigably zealous, but inclined strongly to the methodists, though he retained the forms of the church of England. Some of his sermons have been published, He died 1797, aged 46, and his parishioners at Reading, in respect to his memory, all put on mourning.

CÆSAR, Julius, a learned civilian, born at Tottenham 1557, and educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford. He was master of the court of requests under Elizabeth, judge of the admiralty, and master of St. Catherine's near the Tower, and under James I. he was knighted and appointed chancellor of the exchequer which he resigned on succeeding to the mastership of the rolls 1614. He was a man of great learning and integrity, charitable and benevolent. He died 1636. His manuscripts which were valuable, were sold by auction in 1757, for more than 300l.

CÆSARALPINUS, Andreas, a philosopher of Arezzo, physician to Clement VIII. He was a man of great erudition, and from some passages in his writings it has been conjectured that he was acquainted with the circulation of the blood. He was also well skilled in botany and published a treatise de plantis, & quæstiones peripateticæ, and died at Rome 1603 aged 54.

CAGLIARI, Paul, a native of Verona, son of a sculptor, better known by the name of Paul Veronese. He was distinguished as a painter; and for his admirable execution, and the majesty of his compositions, he was called by the Italians "the happy painter." His first pieces were drawn at Mantua, but after adorning many of the cities of Italy with the fine executions of his pencil, he settled at Venice. Here he received the most flattering compliments from several crowned heads, who urgently invited him to settle in their dominions, a distinction which he rejected, as firmly attached to his country, and eager to promote her glory and her fame. He died of a fever at Venice in 1588, aged 56, and had a tomb and brazen statue erected to his honor in the church of St. Sebastian. His two sons Gabriel and Charles, were likewise painters, and to the genius of their father joined an unusual degree of fraternal affection. Charles died 1596, aged 26, and Gabriel fell a victim to the plague 1631, aged 63. Paul had also a brother Benedict, eminent as a sculptor and painter. He assisted his nephews in completing their father's unfinished pictures, and as his style resembled that of his brother, the pieces of Benedict often pass for the more celebrated compositions of Paul. He died 1598, aged 66.

CAGLIOSTRO, Count Alexander, an impostor, born at Palermo 1743. His real name was Joseph Balsamo. He was of mean parentage, and at the age of 13 he became a novice novice to the friars of mercy at Cartagirone, where his irregularities expoſed him to ſevere chaſtiſement. A ſeries of frauds, of impoſtures, of villainy, and it is even ſaid of murder, obliged him to fly from Palermo, and after practiſing ſome of his ſtratagems at Rome and Meſſina, he viſited the iſlands of the Archipelago and Alexandria, and afterwards exhibited his impoſtures in almoſt every city of Europe. He was at laſt arreſted at Rome, and died in the caſtle of St. Angelo 1794. A compendium of his life publiſhed by the apoſtolical chamber at Rome, contains a curious account of a man who, by a verſatile genius, a ſuperficial knowledge of philoſophy and chemiſtry, and a pretended intercourſe with ſupernatural agents, impoſed upon the credulity not only of the vulgar, but of the great, the learned, and opulent.

CAHUSAC, Lewis de, a French writer, born at Montauban. On publiſhing his tragedy of Pharamond, a piece which had great ſucceſs, he came to Paris, and became ſecretary to count de Clermont. He wrote ſome romances, beſides ſeveral operas, received with great applauſe. The poet, who poſſeſſed abilities, was in his manners arrogant, and ſo tender of his reputation, that it is ſaid his ſenſibility turned his head. He died at Paris 1759.

CAIAPHAS, the high prieſt of the Jews, before whom our Saviour was carried, and by whom he was condemned. He deſtroyed himſelf when diſmiſſed from office by Vitellius.

CAIET, Peter Victor Palma, of Montrichard, from a calviniſt became a catholic, and died 1610, aged 85, doctor of the Sorbonne, and Hebrew profeſſor in the royal college. He was highly favored by Catharine of Bourbon, and Henry IV. admitted him to court, notwithſtanding the ſlovenly appearance of his dreſs. He was for ſome time employed in ſearching for the philoſopher's ſtone. Moſt of his works are controverſial, but his chronologie ſeptennaire in 8vo. from the peace of Vervins to 1604, and his chronologie novennaire, in 3 vols. are valuable compoſitions.

CAIETAN, a cardinal of Gaieta, 1469. He diſplayed great talents as profeſſor of philoſophy and divinity at Paris and at Rome, till his book in ſupport of the pope raiſed him to the rank of cardinal and to the ſee of Palermo. He was employed by the pope in ſeveral negociations, but eſpecially in oppoſing Luther, whom he found it impoſſible either to ſilence or check. He died 1534, aged 65. He was a man of great learning as a logician, and philoſopher and divine. Beſides commentaries on Ariſtotle's philoſophy, and Thomas Aquinas' theology, he publiſhed a literal tranſlation of the greateſt part of the books of the old and new teſtaments.

CAILLE, Nicholas Lewis de la, a French mathematician and aſtronomer, born at Rumigny, 1714, and educated at the college of Liſieux at Paris. He became the diſciple of Caſſini, and with de Thury projected the meridian line, which extended from the obſervatory to the extremities of France. In 1739 he was named profeſſor of mathematics of the college of Mazarin, and in 1750 he went to the cape of Good Hope, to ſee the ſtars of the ſouthern hemiſphere, of 10,000 of which in the courſe of two years he determined the exact poſition. The whole of his time was employed in the ſervice of aſtronomy, mathematics, and navigation, but unfortunately a malignant fever terminated his labors in 1762, in his 48th year. He poſſeſſes the great character of clearneſs, accuracy, and preciſion. His works contain ſeveral volumes in 4to. and 8vo. beſides detached papers, &c.

CAIN, the eldeſt ſon of Adam, devoted himſelf to agriculture, but finding the oblations of his brother Abel more propitiouſly received than his own, he ſlew him in the year 130 after the creation. He was curſed for his cruelty, and wandered towards the eaſt of Eden, and built a city, which he called by the name of his ſon Enoch.

CAIRO, Franciſco, a painter of Milan, born 1598, who ſtudied at Rome and Venice. His pictures are on religious ſubjects, and poſſeſs ſuperior excellence.

CAIUS or KAYES, Dr. John, a phyſician, born at Norwich, 1510, educated at Norwich ſchool and Gonvil-hall, Cambridge. He viſited France, Flanders, and Germany, and after ſtudying at Padua, he took his degree of M. D. 1541, and three years after returned to England. He became phyſician to Edward VI. and to his two ſiſters, till a ſuſpicion of favoring the catholics diſcarded him 1568. He died at Cambridge 1573, and by the munificent donation of ſome eſtates, he erected his hall into a college, now called Gonvil and Caius college. His monument is in the chapel with theſe two words, "Fui Caius." He wrote the hiſtory of Cambridge, and other works.

CAIUS, John, poet laureat to Edward IV., travelled into Italy, and tranſlated the hiſtory of the ſiege of Rhodes.

He was eminent in the knowledge of the learned languages, in poetry, and all kinds of worth. At the requeſt of Catherine Parr, he tranſlated Eraſmus' paraphraſe on St. Mark, and publiſhed a book on the antiquity of the univerſity of Oxford, to which Caius of Cambridge replied,—beſides a tranſlation of Ariſtotle's de mirab. mundi,—Euripides' tragedies, &c.

CALAMY, Edmund, a preſbyterian divine, born at London 1600, and educated at Pembroke hall Cambridge. Felton, biſhop of Ely, made him one of his chaplains, and gave him the vicarage of St. Mary's, Swaffham-prior, Cambridgeſhire, which he reſigned to be lecturer of Bury, Suffolk, where he continued

10 years. Though he conformed to the church of England, he ſoon embraced the popular party, and was engaged in the treatiſe againſt epiſcopacy, called Smectymnuus, from the initials of the five authors, Stephen Marſhal, Edmund Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcomen, and William Spurſtow. He was member of the aſſembly of divines, and in his ſermons before the parliament, and the citizens of London, he diſplayed the eloquent preacher and zealous partizan. He however reſiſted the uſurpation of Cromwell, and promoted the reſtoration of Charles II. with ſuch loyalty, that he was offered the biſhopric of Lichfield, which he declined. He was one of the commiſſioners at the conference at the Savoy, and was ſoon after ejected from St. Mary Aldermanbury for nonconformity. An occaſional ſermon in his late pariſh church, in the abſence of the vicar, ſo offended his hearers, that he was ſent to Newgate by the lord mayor, but in a few days diſcharged. The ſight of the conflagration of London is ſaid to have broke his heart. He died 1666. He was a man of a bold undaunted ſpirit, who poſſeſſed all the bluntneſs and puritanical pride of the times. He publiſhed ſingle ſermons and controverſial treatiſes.

CALAMY, Benjamin, ſon of the preceding, from St. Paul's ſchool entered at Catherine hall Cambridge. He was miniſter of St. Mary Aldermanbury, and chaplain to the king. In 1683, he publiſhed a ſermon, for which he was attacked by Delaune, a warm nonconformiſt, whom government ſent to Newgate. Calamy interfered with Jeffries for the unhappy libeller; but all applications were unavailing, and Delaune, fined a ſum which he could not pay, died a victim to the oppreſſive meaſures of the times, and his wife and children ſhared the ſame fate in the ſame confinement. Dr. Calamy obtained four valuable livings, and the prebend of Harleſton, in the cathedral of St. Paul; but his happineſs was interrupted by the ſufferings of his friend Corniſh, who was tried and executed for high treaſon. The applications of friendſhip for mercy could not influence the inexorable Jeffries; and the execution of Corniſh broke the heart of his ſurviving friend, who died 1686. His funeral ſermon was preached by Sherlock, afterwards dean of St. Paul's. He publiſhed ſermons.

CALAMY, Edmund, grandſon of Edmund Calamy, by his ſon Edmund, was born 1671. He was educated at merchant taylors', where an intimate friendſhip was begun with Dawes, afterwards archbiſhop of York, and Boulter, primate of Ireland; and after ſtudying logic and philoſophical knowledge, he paſſed to Utrecht. Here he ſtudied civil law and philoſophy, and acquired ſuch a character, that a profeſſor's chair at Edinburgh was offered to him. On his return to England, he brought letters of recommendation to Drs. Pocock and Bernard, of Oxford, by whoſe influence he was admitted to the Bodleian library. H ſtudies were directed to divinity, and as he i clined to the nonconformiſts, he became a active miniſter in the meeting-houſes of Lo don, and ſucceeded, in 1703, Alſop, at Wel minſter. He abridged Baxter's hiſtory of l life, and afterwards continued the work by copious account of ſuch miniſters as we ejected for their religious opinions to the tin of queen Anne. The book was attacked l Hoadly, afterwards biſhop of Wincheſter. 1709, Calamy was honored, on his viſit Scotland, with the degree of D.D. by t three univerſities of Edinburgh, Glaſgow, a Aberdeen. He publiſhed, in 1718, a vin cation of his grandfather and others again the reflections of Echard. Calamy died 173 He was a man of great erudition, remarkab for the candor and benevolence of his diſp ſition, and the moderation of his religious op nions. His writings were moſtly controverſi beſides 2 vols. of ſermons, and 4 of Baxte hiſtory.

CALAS, John, an unfortunate merchant Toulouſe, of the proteſtant religion. Wh his ſon Mark Antony, who had embraced t catholic tenets, had committed ſuicide, t father was ſeized by government as guilty the murder. No proof could be broug againſt him, but the jealouſy entertain againſt his religion; and though the improb bility of a father, of the age of 65, murderi his own ſon, a robuſt young man aged 29, a in a houſe where his family were reſide was ſelf-evident, yet he was condemned, a broke on the wheel, 1762. This treatme was reported to the French king by the ag nized widow, but the wiſhes of the monar were fruſtrated by the jealouſy of his miniſte who thought that they granted too much the proteſtants if they allowed the reviſal the ſentence. His widow died in 1792, ag 94.

CALASIO, Marius, a Franciſcan at Ro profeſſor of Hebrew. He publiſhed a co cordance of the Hebrew bible, in 4 large vo in fol. 1621, republiſhed in London in 4 vo 1747, by Romaine, &c.

CALDERWOOD, David, a Scotch divine. He ſtudied divinity, and became an active oppoſer of epiſcopacy in Scotland. He was miniſter of Crelling, but his reſiſtance to the attempts of James I. to unite the churches of England and Scotland drew down upon him the ſuſpicions of the court; and when he proteſted againſt the meaſures pursued by parliament he was ſummoned to anſwer for his ſeditious conduct. His obſtinate refuſal to ſubmit to interrogatories, occaſioned his impriſonment, and baniſhment from the kingdom. He retired to Holland, where he publiſhed his celebrated treatiſe, Altare Damaſcenum, ſeu eccleſia Anglicanæ politia, &c. 1623. He afterwards returned to Scotland, where he collected memorials of the eccleſiaſtical affairs of Scotland from the reformation to James's death. The time of his death is not preciſely known.

CALDWALL, Richard, a phyſician born in Staffordſhire about 1513, and educated at Brazen-noſe. He was cenſor, and afterwards preſident of the college of phyſicians, where he founded a chirurgical lecture with a handſome ſalary. native town, master of requests, intendant of Metz, and in 1783 was successor of of Necker as comptroller general of the finances. This required abilities and undaunted firmness, and he possessed them; and though he found an empty treasury, and the nation discontented with the extravagance of the court, he adopted such measures as restored credit to the state, and rendered the expenditure subservient to the resources of the country. To carry his schemes of reform he advised the king to convene the nobles of the kingdom. The plan was grand, and might have been productive of good in another age, but unfortunately the nobles and clergy were alarmed at the thought of losing their privileges, and the minister, not ably supported by the timid monarch, yielded to the storm, and took refuge in England, where he composed his requete au roi, and his reponse a l'ecrit de M. Necker. At the end of the revolution he revisited his country, and died at Paris 1802. He wrote, besides, an essay on agriculture 12mo,—observations sur plusieurs matieres de droit civil & contumier, 4to.—de l'etat de la France present & a venir, 1790, 8vo, a work of great merit,—des finances publiques de la France 8vo. &c.

In 1624 he resigned the seals to the king, confessing himself to be of the Roman catholic persuasion, but notwithstanding this, he continued in favor, and was created lord Baltimore in 1625. He twice visited Newfoundland, where the king had granted him a large tract of land, but finding that his property there was exposed to the plunder of French vessels, he abandoned it for the neighbourhood of Virginia, when Charles I. granted him a patent for Maryland. He died at London 1632, and his son who inherited his enterprising spirit, planted a colony of about 200 families which bore the name Baltimore.

Calvert, James, of York, was educat at Clare-hall Cambridge. After being silenc at Topcliff by the act of uniformity he r moved to York, where he composed work called Naphthali. He for some tin employed himself in the education of some the sons of his opulent neighbours, and di 1698.

Calvin, John, a celebrated reformer bo at Noyon in Picardy 1509. He studied Paris, and in consequence of the extraordina marks of his early piety he was intended his father for the church, and in 1527 he w presented to the rectory of Marteville, whi two years after he resigned for Pont l'Eveq near Noyon. His extensive knowledge the holy scriptures disgusted him with the perstitions of Rome, and with the approbati of his father he resigned his ecclesiastical h nors, and studied the law. Under de l'Et and Alciat, he made great progress in that ence, and further improved his knowledge divinity. Eager to defend the reformat he displayed his zeal against the Sorbonne Paris, and with difficulty escaped from t vengeance of the catholics. From France retired to Basil, and attracted public att tion by his celebrated dedication to Franci in his apology for the reformers, a composit which divides the applauses of the learned w that of Thuanus to his history and that of C saubon to Polybius. When persecution cea Calvin settled at Geneva, and yielding to solicitation of Farel, and of the magistrate the city, he became in 1536 their minis and professor of divinity. The check howe which he wished to impose upon the immo ities of the people, soon rendered him un pular, and when he refused to administer sacrament indiscriminately, the public indig tion was so violent against him, that he was fired to leave Geneva in two days. He reti to Strasburg, where he established a French formed church, and two years after he with Bucer at the diet of Worms and Ratis for the protestants, and had a long confere with Melancthon. But though flattered Germany, Calvin had a secret affection Geneva, and no sooner did the people solici reconciliation than he returned, in 1541, prevailed upon them to establish a church cipline, and a consistorial jurisdiction with power of inflicting censures and canonical nishments. The power thus bestowed unf tunately was abused. The reformer, who loudly exclaimed against the tyranny of Ro directed his persecution against Servetus physician, who had in an ambiguous style w ten upon the trinity; and his vengeance not appeased till the unfortunate heretic expired in the flames. This severity rai enemies to Calvin, but his ardor was undaunt and in the midst of his avocations, he direc by his letters the many churches of Germa

Fran

France, England, and Poland, which looked up to him as their ſupreme governor. Diſintereſted in his conduct, zealous only in the cauſe of reformation, poſſeſſed of a clear underſtanding, and happy memory, he exerciſed his extenſive talents in the ſupport of truth. His creed however was either, from ſingularity or oppoſition, contrary to the tenets of the other proteſtants, and the untenable doctrines which he propagated about an abſolute predeſtination have tended to render his followers, not only during his age, but in ſucceeding times, gloomy, preſumptuous, obſtinate, and uncharitable. He died 1564, and though he had long enjoyed high reputation and exerciſed unbounded authority, he left only 300 crowns to his heirs, including his library, the books of which ſold afterwards at a great price. By the advice of Bucer, Calvin married, at Straſburg, Idoletta de Bure, widow of an anabaptiſt whom he had converted, and by her he had a ſon who died in his infancy. The death of his wife, in 1549, afflicted him greatly. The works of Calvin were printed in 12 vols. fol. Geneva, and in nine Amſterdam, in 1667. They are chiefly on theological and controverſial ſubjects, but they diſplay his great erudition; and Scaliger has obſerved, that no commentator has better hit the ſenſe of the prophets than he; and he commends him farther for not attempting the explanation of the book of revelations.

Calvisius, Sethus, a learned German, diſtinguiſhed as an accurate chronologer. His elenchus calendariiæ Gregorio XIII. was publiſhed in 1611; and in 1623, three years after his death, appeared his improved chronology; the labor of 20 long years.

Cambaceres, N. a native of Montpellier, whoſe eloquence was much admired at court, and was rewarded by the archbiſhopric of Rouen. He died 1802, aged 80. His nephew was the ſecond conſul with Bonaparte, after the abolition of the directory.

Cambert, a French muſician, in the ſervice of Ann of Auſtria. He firſt introduced operas in France, but when his labors were eclipſed by the performances of Lulli, he came over to England in 1672, where Charles made him maſter of his band. He died 1677. Beſides operas and muſical pieces, he is known for his exquiſite taſte in touching the organ.

Cambis-velleron, Joſeph Lewis Dominic, marquis de, of Avignon, was learned and polite, and ſerved ſome time in the army. He died 1772. He publiſhed a valuable catalogue raiſonné of the MSS. in his cabinet, two vols. 8vo. &c.

Cambridge, Richard Owen, a learned Engliſhman, born in London, 1714, and educated at Eton ſchool, and Oxford. He in 1737 entered at Lincoln's-inn, and in 1741 ſettled at Whitminſter, Glouceſterſhire. He publiſhed the Scribleriad, a poem, 1744—and in 1761 an hiſtory of the war on the coaſt of Coromandel, and contributed ſome valuable papers to the World. His works were collected by his ſon G. O. Cambridge M. A. with his life, two vols. 4to. 1803. He died much reſpected in private life, as a cheerful companion, exemplary in his conduct, and virtuous and benevolent in practice, 1802. He was inventor of a curious double boat, which is ſaid to poſſeſs great ſwiftneſs in ſailing with equal ſafety, formed with two diſtinct boats, 50 feet long, though but 18 inches wide, connected together by a deck at the diſtance of 12 feet.

Camden, William, a celebrated antiquarian, born at London, 1551. After ſtudying at Chriſt's-hoſpital and St. Paul's ſchool, he entered as a ſervitor at Magdalen college, Oxford, from whence he removed to Broadgate-hall now Pembroke college, and then to Chriſt-church. The prejudices of theſe popiſh days prevented him from obtaining a fellowſhip at All-ſouls, and from being admitted to his firſt degree, and it was not till 1573 that he was made B.A. an honor long due to his learning. He was appointed in 1575 ſecond maſter of Weſtminſter-ſchool, and during his relaxation he compiled his valuable work the Britannia, or hiſtory of the ancient Britons, their origin, manners, and laws, which appeared in Latin, 1586, and paſſed rapidly through ſeveral editions. Piers biſhop of Saliſbury in 1588 conferred on him the prebend of Ilfracomb, though he never was in holy orders, and the ſame year he took the degree of M. A. In 1593 he ſucceeded to the headſhip of Weſtminſter ſchool, and four years afterwards he publiſhed a Greek grammar, which though long popular, muſt be conſidered as an epitome of the grammar of his predeceſſors. In 1597 Camden removed from his laborious office, on being appointed Clarencieux king of arms, an employment more congenial to his taſte. In 1600 he publiſhed an account of the monuments of the kings, queens, &c. in Weſtminſter abbey, and three years after at Frankfort, a collection of ancient hiſtorians, called "Anglica, Normanica, Hibernica, Cambrica, a veteribus deſcripta, &c. The next year he publiſhed remains of a greater work concerning Britain, &c. the materials of which had been communicated to him when he wrote his Britannia. He publiſhed in 1607 a complete edition of his Britannia in folio, greatly enlarged, of which a tranſlation was given in 1695 by Dr. Gibſon afterwards biſhop of London, and in 1615, appeared his Annales rerum Anglicanarum, during queen Elizabeth's reign, the continuation of which was finiſhed in 1617 but not publiſhed in his life time. Camden died at Chiſſelhurſt in Kent, 1623, and though he had directed to be buried where he died, his remains were depoſited in great pomp in Weſtminſter abbey oppoſite Chaucer, where on a white marble monument his effigies is repreſented as holding a book, on which is inſcribed Britannia. Camden was reſpected as a man not only of extenſive learning, and juſt taſte, but of amiable manners, eaſy and candid in his converſation, and the friend of learned men. His reputation was ſo well eſtabliſhed, that foreigners conſidered their travels incomplete, if not permitted to converſe with the author of the Britannia, and it is ſaid that not leſs than ſix German nobles in one day requeſted him to write his lemma in their book. Camden founded a lectureſhip on hiſtory at Oxford, and bequeathed his books and papers to ſir Robert Cotton of Conington.

CAMERARIUS, Joachimus, a German, born at Bamberg, in 1500, and educated at Leipſic. He became the friend of Eraſmus, and alſo of Melancthon, whoſe life he wrote. During the troubles of Germany, he viſited Pruſſia, and was made profeſſor of belles lettres at Nuremberg. In 1527, he married a woman of reſpectable connections, with whom he lived 46 years, and by whom he had five ſons and four daughters, who all grew up to be an honor to their family. He was in 1536 drawn from his retirement by the prince of Wirtemburg, to reſtore the ancient diſcipline of the univerſity of Tubingen, and afterwards he aſſiſted in the eſtabliſhment of the Leipſic univerſity. He died at Leipſic 1575, full of years and honor, ſurviving his wife not quite a year. His literary labors were great, as he tranſlated Herodotus, Demoſthenes, Euclid, Xenophon, Homer, Theocritus, Sophocles, Lucian, Theodoret, &c. and he was deſervedly called by Voſſius the phœnix of Germany. Eraſmus however has ſpoken of him with ſome degree of indifference.

CAMERARIUS, Joachim, ſon of the preceding, devoted himſelf to the ſtudy of medicine, botany, and chemiſtry. He wrote ſome treatiſes on botany, and died 1598, aged 68, at Nuremberg.

CAMERON, John, a Scotchman, profeſſor of Greek at Glaſgow, and afterwards divinity lecturer at Montauban, where he died 1625, in conſequence of blows received in the ſtreets from ſome zealot whom he had offended. He publiſhed "defence of grace," &c. His works appeared in three vols. 4to. 1677.

CAMOENS, Lewis, a Portugueſe poet, deſervedly called the Virgil of his country. He was born at Liſbon 1527, and ſtudied at Coimbra. He loſt one of his eyes in a campaign againſt the Moors at Ceuta, and afterwards paſſed to the Eaſt Indies, in hopes of bettering his fortunes. Here he began his celebrated Luſiad, but on his return he had the misfortune to be ſhipwrecked, and with difficulty ſaved his life, ſwimming with his right hand, and ſupporting his poem with his left. He finiſhed his poem 1569, and dedicated it to king Sebaſtian, but his hopes of patronage were cruelly diſappointed. The merits of the poet were neglected by the monarch, and Camoens, feeling all the miſeries of indigent virtue, expired in the midſt of his ungrateful countrymen, a prey to the deepeſt wretchedneſs, 1579. Admired for the boldneſs of his deſcriptions, the unaffected diſplay of his learning, and the happieſt flights of a ſublime imagination, C moens is yet cenſured for the obſcurity ſome of his verſes, and for an injudicious mi ture of heathen mythology and chriſtian truth The Luſiad however will always rank high the liſt of heroic poems. It has been tranſlat into French once, twice into Italian, four tim into Spaniſh, and into Engliſh by Fanſhaw, b ſides the elegant verſion of Mr. Mickle.

CAMPANELLA, Thomas, an Italian philoſ pher, born at Stilo in Calabria, 1568. H extenſive knowledge of the antient claſſ enabled him to examine the tenets of the pe patetic philoſophy, and to prove them bu upon falſe foundations. The brilliant eloquen which he diſplayed in his diſputations on th ology with philoſophers of eſtabliſhed repu tion, encreaſed with his fame the number his rivals, and he was accuſed, before the inqu ſition, of having obtained by magic that exte of learning which he poſſeſſed. He fled up this from Naples to Rome, and afterwards Florence, and on his way to Bologna his p pers were ſeized, but his perſon remained u moleſted. Some expreſſions however whi dropped ſome years after, againſt the Spa ards, procured his arreſt. He appeared 1599, at Naples as a criminal, and was ſev times put to the rack and condemned to p petual impriſonment. His ſufferings were laſt leſſened by the interference of the pc with Philip IV. of Spain in 1626, and wh reſtored to liberty he retired to France, wh Richelieu gave him a penſion of 2000 livr He died in the monaſtery of the Dominic 1639. His writings were numerous, the b known of which are de rectâ ratione ſtuden aphoriſmata politica, &c.

His poſition to ſome of the meaſures of Rome r dered him unpopular with the pope, and removed to his ſee of Terrano where he d 1477, aged 48. He wrote the life of the mous commander Andrew Braccio, beſides o tions, letters, Latin poems, moral and polit treatiſes, &c.

CAMPBELL, Archibald, ſon of the ear Argyle, became known for his ſtrong partia to the covenanters, though he retained his tachment to Charles I. by whom he was c ated a marquis. He oppoſed Cromwell's vaſion of Scotland, and placed the crown the head of Charles II. when his coronat took place at Scone in 1651. But notw ſtanding his attachment to the king, he ſeized in London when he came to congra late Charles on his reſtoration, and upon be condemned as guilty of high treaſon was headed as a traitor at Edinburgh croſs. wrote inſtructions to a ſon, &c.

CAMPBELL, Archibald, earl of Argyle, ſon of the preceding, diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the battle of Dunbar. In conſequence of the interception of one of his letters, in which he ſpoke of the ingratitude of courts, he was tried before the parliament of Scotland, for ſowing diſſenſions between the king and the ſubject by falſe information. He was condemned to loſe his head, and would have ſuffered had not Clarendon interfered. Argyle was reſtored to royal favor, and made privy counſellor, and one of the lords of the treaſury. Being afterwards iniquitouſly condemned to ſuffer death, he eſcaped, and after concealing himſelf in London, he went to Holland, and ſoon returned, to ſupport the rebellion of Monmouth. He was however abandoned by thoſe who ought to have ſhared his dangers, and he was taken, and, in purſuance of his former ſentence, was beheaded 1685.

CAMPBELL, George, D. D. was educated at St. Andrew's, and made profeſſor of church hiſtory 1728. He publiſhed a diſcourſe on miracles, beſides a vindication of the chriſtian religion, 8vo. &c. and died 1757, aged 61.

CAMPBELL, George, of Aberdeen, was educated at the Mariſchal college, of which he became the principal in 1759, and profeſſor of divinity in 1771. He died 1796, aged 77. Among his works his tranſlation of the four goſpels is valuable. His anſwer to Hume on miracles was alſo much admired.

CAMPBELL, John, an eminent writer on biography, hiſtory, and politics, born at Edinburgh, 1708. At the age of five he left Scotland for the neighbourhood of Windſor, and became clerk to an attorney, but he relinquiſhed the occupation for the life of an author. In his 30th year he publiſhed the military life of prince Eugene and of Marlborough, in 2 vols. fol. He was afterwards engaged in the ancient univerſal hiſtory, and in 1739 publiſhed the travels of Edward Brown, and the memoirs of Ripperda, and next the conciſe hiſtory of Spaniſh America. In 1742 the two firſt volumes of his hiſtory of Engliſh admirals appeared, to which two years after two volumes more were added, a work of great merit, ſince improved by Dr. Berkenhout. He publiſhed 1743 Hermippus revived, and in 1744 appeared his "voyages and travels," on the plan of Dr. Harris. Beſides other popular publications he was engaged in the Biographia Britannica, which firſt appeared in weekly numbers in 1745, and in 1750 he publiſhed his preſent ſtate of Europe, a work extremely popular, and next he engaged in the modern univerſal hiſtory which appeared in detached parts in 16 vols. fol. His laſt work was "a political ſurvey of Britain," in 2 vols. 4to. 1774, in which he diſplayed extraordinary labor and extenſive knowledge. For theſe labors the author was honored in 1754 by the univerſity of Glaſgow with the degree of LL. D. and in 1774 the empreſs of Ruſſia preſented him, in teſtimony of her regard, with her picture. In 1736 he married miſs Vobe, with whom he lived happily 40 years, and by whom he had ſeven children, one only of whom with their mother ſarvived him. He lived ſo retired that few had the happineſs of his acquaintance, but thoſe that viſited him found him amiable in his manners, inſtructive in his converſation, mild, humane, and religious. He died of a decline at his houſe, Queen-ſquare, Ormond-ſtreet, 1775, aged nearly 68.

CAMPBELL, John, 2d duke of Argyle, and duke of Greenwich, was ſon of Archibald duke of Argyle. He ſerved under the great Marlborough at the battles of Ramilies, of Oudenarde, and Malplaquet, and aſſiſted at the ſiege of Liſle and of Ghent. His ſupport of the union with Scotland rendered him unpopular among his countrymen, but his merits were acknowledged by all parties. George I. on his acceſſion reſtored him to the command of Scotland, of which he had before been deprived, and in 1715 he bravely attacked lord Mar's army at Dumblain, and obliged the pretender to retire from the kingdom. In 1718 he was made duke of Greenwich, but his oppoſition to Walpole procured his diſmiſſal, though he was reſtored on the miniſter's diſgrace. He died 1743.

CAMPBELL, Archibald, a Scotchman, biſhop of Aberdeen, which he reſigned in 1724. He was a man of great learning, and intimate with the moſt famous men of his time. He died 1744, author of the doctrine of a middle ſtate between death and the reſurrection, fol. 1721, a work curious and intereſting.

CAMPEGGIO, Lorenzo, a Roman cardinal, born at Milan 1474. He was profeſſor of civil law at Bologna, aud married, but on the death of his wife he embraced the eccleſiaſtical profeſſion, and in 1512 was made a biſhop, and afterwards a cardinal by Leo X. He came to England 1519, as nuncio, and was made biſhop of Saliſbury, and in 1524 paſſed into Germany, to attempt to reſiſt the reformation. He afterwards returned to England to ſettle the affairs about the divorce of Henry VIII. and Catherine of Arragon, and when recalled in 1529 by the pope, he went to the diet of Auguſburg. He died at Rome 1539. He was a man of learning and deep political knowledge, and acquainted with Eraſmus and other learned men. Some of his letters are publiſhed.

CAMPIAN, Edmund, a writer, born in London 1540, and educated at Chriſt's hoſpital, and St. John's college Oxford. In 1568 he went to Ireland, and wrote an hiſtory of the country in two books, but being ſuſpected of favoring the catholics, he fled to the low countries. Here he renounced proteſtaniſm, and entered among the Jeſuits at Douay, and then paſſed to Rome. He wrote a tragedy called Nectar and Ambroſia, acted before the emperor at Vienna, and for ſix years he taught rhetoric and philoſophy at Prague, till he was commiſſioned by Gregory XIII. to paſs over to England in 1580. Here he uſed all the arts of cunning and inſinuation, but though he challenged the Engliſh clergy to a trial of ſkill, yet he diſcovered too much vehemence, and when diſcovered by the emiſſaries of Walſingham, he was dragged to the tower, and being found guilty of high treaſon for adhering to the pope, the queen's enemy, he was hanged and quartered at Tyburn, 1581. He was a man of great learning, an eloquent orator, and a ſubtile diſputant. His writings were on controverſial ſubjects, now forgotten.

CAMPISTRON, Jean Galbert, a French poet, born at Toulouſe in 1615, the ſecretary and the friend of the duke of Vendome. He merited to be ranked little inferior to Racine in the merit of his dramatic compoſitions. He died of an apoplexy 1723, at the age of 67. His plays, three vols. 12mo. have paſſed through many editions.

CAMPO, Antonio, an Italian author, born at Cremona, of which he wrote an intereſting hiſtory in folio, 1585.

CAMPRA, Andrew, a muſician of Aix, admired for his ſuperior knowledge of muſic, and for his popular ballets and tragic operas. He died at Verſailles 1744, aged 84.

CAMUS, John Peter, of Paris, was made biſhop of Bellay by Henry IV. 1609. As a preacher he was eloquent, but at the ſame time indulged an ironical turn, eſpecially againſt the monks, which cauſed them to complain of his conduct to Richelieu. He reſigned his ſee after an enjoyment of 20 years, and died in the hoſpital of incurables at Paris 1652, aged 70. Among his numerous works are mentioned, pious romances.

CAMUS, Stephen Le, a native of Paris, biſhop of Grenoble 1571. He was an exemplary prelate, and very auſtere, always ſleeping on ſtraw, and wearing a hair ſhirt. He was made a cardinal by Innocent II. and died 1707, aged 75. He was author of ſome paſtoral letters, &c.

CAMUS, Charles Stephen Lewis, a French mathematician, who died 1768, aged 58. He wrote a courſe on mathematics, 4 vols. 8vo.—beſides treatiſes on arithmetic, &c.

CANANI, John Baptiſt, of Ferrara, profeſſor of medicine and anatomy there, wrote humani corporis picturata diſſectio, now very rare, and is ſaid to have diſcovered the valves of the veins. He died 1590, aged 75.

CANDIAC, John Lewis Eliz. de Montcalm, a child of aſtoniſhing powers. At the age of four he learned Latin, and when ſix he could read Greek and Hebrew to the aſtoniſhment of the learned. This prodigy of premature ſuperiority in learning, was cut off by a complication of diſeaſes at Paris, 1726, aged ſeven years.

CANGE, Charles du Freſne du, a learned Frenchman, born at Amiens, and made treaſurer of France. He ſtudied ancient and modern hiſtory, and publiſhed ſome valuable works. He died 1688, aged 78. Lewis XIV. preſented a penſion to his children, in memory of their father's learning. The moſt valuable of his works are hiſtory of the eaſtern empire under the French emperors of Conſtantinople, fol.—Latin gloſſary, 3 vols. fol.—a Greek gloſſary of the middle ages, 2 vols. fol.—annals of Zonaras, &c.—hiſtoria Byzant. illuſtrata in fol. &c.

CANGIAGO or CAMBISI, Lewis, a painter of Genoa, whoſe works were in high repute in Spain and Italy. He died in Spain, 1585, aged 58.

CANITZ, Baron of, a German poet and ſtateſman, born at Berlin, 1654. He travelled through Europe, and was engaged in negociations by the king of Pruſſia. He took Horace for his model in his German compoſitions, and was ſo popular a poet that his works were publiſhed for the 10th time in 1750 in 8vo. He died at Berlin 1699, aged 45.

CANN, John, an Engliſhman, who fled to Amſterdam at the reſtoration, and became a leader of the Browniſts. He publiſhed a bible with marginal notes, well received by the public, and often edited.

CANO, Alonzo, a native of Grenada, eminent as a painter, ſculptor, and architect. He was patronized by Olivares, and made director general of the king's works at Madrid. The palaces and churches of Madrid were adorned with his elegant labors. He had the ſingular misfortune of finding on his return home one evening his houſe plundered, his wife murdered, and his Italian ſervant fled; and while he ſuſpected the treachery of his domeſtic, in conſequence of his reſentful temper, he was himſelf ſeized as the perpetrator of the horrid deed, but no tortures could force him to confeſs fefs a crime of which he was not guilty. He afterwards entered into the church to eſcape further perſecution, and died 1676, aged 76.

CANTACUZENUS, Johannes, a Byzantine hiſtorian, nearly related to the imperial family. His knowledge in literature and in arms was ſo great, that he became the favorite of the court and people, and was made firſt lord of the bedchamber to Andronicus. He retained his offices under his grandſon of the ſame name, who made him generaliſſimo of his forces, and would have admitted him to the throne, if he had conſented. At his death the emperor left the guardianſhip of his ſon John Palæologus to Cantacuzenus; but the jealouſy of the empreſs thwarted his benevolent ſchemes, till at laſt he aſſumed himſelf the imperial purple, at the requeſt of the nobles at Adrianople, 1342. He was victorious over his enemies, and he adopted the conquered Palæologus for his aſſociate on the throne, and gave him his daughter Helen in marriage to cement their reconciliation. Cantacuzenus at laſt, wearied with ſovereignty, retired to a monaſtery accompanied by his wife. Here he wrote an hiſtory in Greek of his own times, in four books, from 1320 to 1355. He wrote beſides ſome theological works.

CANTARINI, Simon, a painter, of Pezaro, who died at Verona 1648, aged 36.

CANTEMIR, Demetrius, a Tartar of illuſtrious birth. He expected to ſucceed his father as governor of Moldavia; but he was ſupplanted, and when ſent to defend the province againſt the Ruſſians, he betrayed it to the czar Peter. He retired to Ukraine, where he died, much lamented, 1723, aged 50. He wrote a Latin hiſtory of the riſe and fall of the Ottoman empire in Ruſſia, dedicated to the czar—the ſyſtem of Mahomet's religion—the ſtate of Moldavia, in Latin.

CANTEMIR, Antiochus, ſon of the preceding, diſplayed his abilities in ſeveral embaſſies at London and Paris. He was the firſt who introduced the graces of poetry among the Ruſſians. He was author of ſome odes, ſatires, and fables, beſides a tranſlation of Anacreon and of the epiſtles of Horace. He died 1744, aged 34.

CANTERUS, William, an eminent ſcholar, born at Utrecht, and educated chiefly at Louvain and Paris. He viſited Germany, Italy, and Venice, where he purchaſed ſome valuable manuſcripts; and on his return to Louvain devoted himſelf to his favorite ſtudies. An application ſo intenſe, which regularly began at 7 in the morning, and continued till midnight, with the intervention of ſcarce four hours for exerciſe and refreſhment, could not inſure longevity, and conſequently Canterus fell a ſacrifice to his ſtudies. and died in his 33d year, 1575. His mind was ſtored with vaſt erudition, and from his acquaintance with ſix languages, beſides that of his country, the greateſt expectations might have been formed from him. His works were purely philological, ſuch as, novarum lectionum libri octo—ſyntagma de ratione emendandi Græcos autores—notæ, ſcholia, &c. in Euripid. Sophocl. Æſchyl. Cic. Propert. Auſon. Arnob. &c.

CANTON, John, an ingenious philoſopher, born at Stroud, in Gloucesterſhire, 1718. He was early initiated in mathematics, but ſoon after engaged in the buſineſs of his father as a broadcloth weaver. He, however, eluded the vigilance of his father, who forbade him to ſtudy by candle-light; and at laſt conſtructed, by the help of a common knife alone, a ſtone dial which, beſides the hours of the day, ſhowed the ſun's riſing, and his place in the ecliptic, with other particulars. The ingenuity of the ſon procured the encouragement of the father, who placed on the front of his houſe the favorite dial. This was admired by the curious, and Canton was invited to the undiſturbed uſe of ſome valuable libraries. Martin's grammar, and a pair of globes, then firſt ſeen, raiſed his genius to noble exertions. He was invited to London by Dr. Miles, and engaged himſelf with Mr. Watkins at an academy in Spital-ſquare. Here he purſued his ſtudies, and ſucceeded Watkins in his ſchool. In 1745, the diſcovery of the Leyden phial in electricity attracted his attention. In 1750 he was elected member of the royal ſociety for his method of making artificial magnets, and he obtained their gold medal. He was alſo honored with a degree by the univerſity of Aberdeen. He was the firſt perſon in England who, on July 20, 1752, aſcertained the truth of Dr. Franklin's hypotheſis of the ſimilarity of lightning and electricity, by attracting fire from the clouds; and this recommended him ſtrongly to the notice of the American philoſopher. His diſcoveries in philoſophy continued to be important, and his opinions were communicated to the royal ſociety in various papers, on the ſhooting of ſtars, the electrical properties of the tourmalin, the variation of the needle, the tranſit of Venus in 1761, the compreſſibility of water, the making of phoſphorus, the fixing of electrical conductors on buildings, the luminouſneſs of the ſea, &c. He beſides treated of other ſubjects not only in the tranſactions of the ſociety, but in the Gentleman's magazine. He died of a dropſy in his cheſt, 1772, in his 54th year. In private life he was an amiable and ſenſible man, mild in his manners, and affable in his conduct. He was ſucceeded in his ſchool by his eldeſt ſon, William, who inherited much of his love for ſcience.

CANTWELL, Andrew, a phyſician of Tipperary, who died 1764. He acquired celebrity by his practice and publications. He wrote Latin diſſertations on medicine, fevers, and ſecretions—hiſtory of remedy for weakneſs of the eyes—account of the ſmall pox, &c.

CANUS, or CANO, Sebaſtian, a Spaniard, who accompanied Magellan in his voyage round the world, and, after his death, purſued his courſe to Sunda, and round the cape of Good Hope. He returned to Spain 1522, after ſailing round the world in three years and four weeks. There was another, James, a Portugueſe, who diſcovered the kingdom of Congo, in 1484.

CANUTE, a king of Denmark and Norway, ſovereign alſo of England. He reſigned his crown for a monaſtery, where he died 1026.

CANUTE, or KNUD, ſurnamed the Great, ſucceeded Sweyn as king of Denmark, and afterwards undertook an expedition againſt England. He attacked Edmund Ironſide with ſuch ſucceſs, that the two rivals agreed to divide the country between them, and while Edmund took the land at the ſouth of the Thames, his opponent claimed the north as his own. When Edmund was murdered by Edric, 1017, Canute ſeized the whole kingdom, and endeavoured to eſtabliſh himſelf by the puniſhment of Edric and of the nobles, and by the laying of a heavy tax on the people. His reign though ſevere, was impartial, as he regarded both nations equally as his ſubjects. He repreſſed the invaſion of the Swedes, and killed their king in battle; and afterwards he made a pilgrimage to Rome. He died at Shafteſbury 1035.

CANUTE IV. king of Denmark after Harold, 1080, was ſurnamed the Pious. His liberal donations to the church raiſed an inſurrection againſt him, in which he was ſlain by one of his ſubjects, 1087.

CANUTI, Dominico, an Italian painter, whoſe pieces are preſerved at Rome and Bologna. He died 1678, aged 55 years.

CAPASSO, Nicholas, a native of Fratta, in Naples, profeſſor of civil law there. He was eminent as a poet, and he ſpent more than twenty years in tranſlating Homer into the Neapolitan patois; a work eſteemed by judges of this vulgar idiom. His poetical pieces poſſeſs merit, but his proſe is not much eſteemed. He died at Naples 1743, aged 75.

CAPECIO, Scipio, a Neapolitan Latin poet of the 16th century, who ſucceſsfully imitated Lucretius' book de rerum naturâ. He wrote beſides, elegies, epigrams, &c.

CAPEL, Arthur lord, a nobleman, whoſe attachment to Charles I. proved fatal to him. At firſt he favored the parliament, and voted for the death of Strafford, of which he ſincerely repented: and when he ſaw the violence of the republicans, he ſided with the king, and was created lord Capel. He boldly defended Colcheſter; but upon the ſurrender, he in violation of a promiſe of quarter, was beheaded on the ſcaffold, 1649. While in priſon, he wrote ſome beautiful verſes.

CAPEL, Arthur, ſon of the preceding, was made earl of Eſſex by Charles II. and employed as ambaſſador to Denmark, and as viceroy of Ireland. He ſupported the excluſion ſingly of the duke of York, for which he was ſtruck off the liſt of privy counſellors, and in 1683 accuſed by Howard as an accomplice in the Ryehouſe plot. He was ſoon after found with his throat cut with a razor, but though evidently murdered, the coroner's jury pronounced a verdict of felo de ſe.

CAPELL, Edward, was born at Troſton near Bury, Suffolk, 1713, and educated at Bury ſchool. Being appointed inſpector of plays, he turned his thoughts to an immaculate edition of Shakeſpeare. Three and twenty years were employed in ſearching old manuſcripts, and in examining various readings but the public were diſappointed in their expectation of illuſtrative notes and commentaries to adorn an edition of 10 vols. 8vo. The labors of Malone, Stevens, and others, checked the ardor of Capell to finiſh what he had ſo long promiſed, and, after forty years, the annotations appeared as poſthumous, in 3 vols. 4to. This publication is in itſelf valuable, and throws great light on the characters of Shakeſpeare. Capell died 1781. He wrote beſides Proluſions, &c. and altered Antony and Cleopatra.

CAPELLO, Bianca, a Venetian lady, who after marrying a perſon of inferior rank, retired to Florence, where ſhe became the miſtreſs of Francis the grand duke of Coſmo's ſon. After the death of her huſband, ſhe prevailed upon her lover to marry her, and ſhe was formally recogniſed, as a true daughter of Venice. Though poſſeſſed of great powers of mind, ſhe ſhowed herſelf odious at Florence, ſo that her memory is ſtill held in abhorrence. The ſudden death of her huſband and of herſelf, within a few days of each other, 1587, was attributed to poiſon adminiſtered, it is ſaid, by cardinal Ferdinand, their brother.

CAPELLUS, Lewis, a French proteſtant divine of Sedan, profeſſor of divinity and oriental languages at Saumur. He engaged in a controverſy with the younger Buxtorff concerning the antiquity of the Hebrew points; and whilſt his adverſary maintained, that they were coeval with the language, he ſupported, that they were unknown before the diſperſion of the Jews, and that they were invented by the rabbis of Tiberias, about 600 years after Chriſt. The learned were on this occaſion divided. The Germans ſupported the opinion of the Buxtorffs, while Capellus was ſeconded by all the abilities of the proteſtants, by Luther, Calvin, Zuinglius, and afterwards by Scaliger, the Caſaubons, the Heinſii, Grotius, Salmaſius, and others. Beſides his controverſial books, he wrote critica ſacra in which he was engaged for thirty ſix years; a work of merit. Capellus died at Saumur 1658, aged nearly 80.

CAPISTRAN, John, a preacher in the Romiſh church. He declaimed againſt the Turks, and was ſo ſucceſsful in a diſcourſe againſt gaming, at Nuremburg, that his auditors burnt all their cards and dice in his preſence. He headed a cruſade againſt the Huſſites, and for his ſervices to the church was canonized in 1690, 234 years after his death. His writings have ſunk into oblivion.

CAPORALI, Cæsar, an Italian writer of Perugia. He was governor of Atri, and died at Castiglione in 1601. He possessed vivacity and an inexhaustible fund of genuine wit. He wrote two comedies, besides the life of Mecænas, and burlesque poems.

CAPPE, Newcome, a dissenting minister, who died 1801, at York. He was author of some sermons on the government and providence of God, 8vo.—illustrations of some scripture passages, &c.

CAPPERONIER, Claude, a Frenchman of Montdidier in Picardy. Though brought up to the business of a tanner, he studied the learned languages, and was offered the chair of professor of the Greek language at Basil. He died at Paris in 1744, aged 73. He published an edition of Quintilian, &c.

CAPRANICA, Nicholas, a learned Italian, secretary to Martin V. and raised to a bishopric, and to the rank of cardinal. This last honor, however, was not confirmed, in consequence of the death of the pope. He was employed by Eugenius in various embassies, and commanded the Roman army against Francis Sforza, by whom he was defeated and wounded. He died 1458, aged 58.

CARACCI, Lewis, Augustine, and Hannibal celebrated painters of the Lombard school, all natives of Bologna. The two last were brothers, sons of a taylor, and Lewis was their cousin, and son of a butcher. Lewis, discouraged at first in his profession, persevered by the advice of Tintoret, and by studying the pieces of the greatest masters, he soon excelled in design and coloring. He had the satisfaction of having his two cousins in the number of his pupils, and with them he united in laying the foundation of that school, which has become so celebrated for the great genius of its students. A choice collection was made of antique statues, and valuable books, and a skilful anatomist exerted his talents in explaining the motions and the power of the muscles and the limbs of the human frame. The fame of the Caraccis soon spread through Italy, and Hannibal, whose powers of memory were so retentive that he never failed to recollect what he once saw, was invited by cardinal Farnese to adorn the gallery of his palace. He was soon followed by Augustine, but on a quarrel between the brothers, Augustine retired to Parma, where after some years spent in dissipation, and in consequent remorse, he died 1602, aged 45. The labors of Hannibal however, which render the Farnese gallery such an object of admiration, were unhandsomely rewarded by his employer, and for the immortal executions of his pencil during eight long years he received a sum scarce equivalent to 200l. This ill treatment quite overpowered his faculties, and in his agony of rage, he vowed never to touch again his pencil, a resolution which his wants made him violate. Though occasionally deprived of his senses, yet he proved licentious in his morals, and hastened his own death by his debaucheries, at Naples 1609, in his 49th year. While Hannibal was engaged at Rome, Lewis remained at Bologna, admired by the clergy, whose churches he adorned by his pieces. He died at Bologna in 1619, aged 63. The most admired piece of Augustine, is the communion of St. Jerome, at Bologna. The works of Hannibal are chiefly admired as possessing all the sweetness and purity, the judicious distribution of coloring, and the delicate correctness of the most approved masters. He had so much veneration for the labors of Raphael, that he ordered himself to be buried in the same tomb. Augustine had a natural son Antonio, who studied under Hannibal, and who displayed such taste in his pieces, that had he lived he might have surpassed the fame of his immortal relation. He died 1618, at the age of 35.—From the school of the Caraccis sprung those illustrious painters, who have done so much for their own glory, and the reputation of their instructors, Guido, Dominichino, Lanfrancho, &c.

CARACCIO, Anthony, a Roman nobleman of the 15th century. He wrote tragedies, besides an admired epic poem, 40 cantos, called Imperio vendicato, in 1690, in 4to.

CARACCIOLI, Lewis Anthony, a native of Paris. He was for some time in the service of the king of Poland, and on his return to France devoted himself to literature, and died 1803, aged 80. He published letters 4 vols, 12mo. imposed upon the world as the correspondence of Ganganelli. A nearer examination proved the deceit, when Ganganelli was represented as speaking of Herculaneum, before it was discovered, and of the writing of Gesner before they were published. These letters possess merit, and are written in an elegant style.

CARAMUEL DE LOBKOVITSH, John, a native of Madrid, who, from a bishop, became a soldier and a general, and again exchanged military honors for the crozier. He died 1682, aged 76. He was possessed of great powers of mind, and was said to be endowed with genius to the eighth degree, with eloquence to the fifth, and with judgment to the second. His works are all on controversial subjects.

CARAVAGIO, Michael Angelo Amerigi da, son of a mason of Caravagio, was born 1569. He acquired celebrity as a painter, but he was so quarrelsome that he found few friends, many rivals, and more enemies. After a life of misfortunes encreased by licentiousness, in the midst of poverty and persecution, he expired on the common road 1609, in his 40th year. From his correct adherence to nature, he was surnamed the naturalist; but though Rubens himself acknowledged him as his superior in the clear-obscure, yet he failed in large compositions. Unable once to pay his reckoning at an alehouse he painted the sign afresh, in so highly finished a style, that afterwards wards it brought the owner a very conſiderable ſum.

CARDAN, Jerome, an Italian, natural ſon of an advocate of Milan, born at Pavia 1501. He ſtudied at Pavia, and after taking his degree of M.D. at Padua, he engaged as a profeſſor of medicine and of mathematics in ſeveral univerſities of Italy. In 1552 he viſited Scotland at the requeſt of the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, whom he cured of a violent aſthma that had baffled the ſkill of all phyſicians. He afterwards travelled through London, where he calculated the nativity of Edward VI. and he returned after an abſence of 10 months to Milan. Here and at Pavia he continued his lectures, but ſome offence procured his impriſonment at Bologna, 1571. After which he went to Rome, where he lived in privacy, and died 1575. Cardan was in his conduct eccentric, when free from pain he excited the moſt diſagreeable ſenſations by biting his lips, ſqueezing his fingers or whipping his legs, that thus he might obtain relief from thoſe ſallies of the imagination and lively impreſſions on the brain which diſturbed the ſerene compoſure of his mind. Though poor he never diſgraced himſelf by any immoral action, but he was too often pleaſed to ſpeak on ſubjects which might give uneaſineſs to his hearers, and he was immoderately attached to gaming. When he had caſt his nativity, it is ſaid that he abſtained from food, and thus he deſtroyed nature that he might exactly fulfil his prophecy. He wrote various things which diſplayed the wildneſs of his opinions. His works were printed at Lyons in 10 vols. fol.

CARDI, Ludovici, a painter born at Cigoli. He died 1613, aged 54. His Ecce homo, and a dead Chriſt with the Virgin and Nicodemus, in the Pitti palace at Florence, are much admired.

CARDONNE, Dionis Dominis de, a Frenchman, keeper of the MSS. in the royal library of Paris, and profeſſor of the Turkiſh and Perſian languages, died 1783. His works were an hiſtory of Africa and Spain under the Arabs, 3 vols. 12mo.—miſcellanies of oriental literature, 4 vols. 12mo. &c.

CAREW, George, a native of Devonſhire, educated at Broadgate hall, Oxford. He next followed a military life, and behaved with great ſpirit in Ireland, and in the voyage to Cadiz. He was made preſident of Munſter by Elizabeth, and by James governor of Guernſey, and created baron Carew of Clopton. Charles raiſed him afterwards to the dignity of earl Totneſs. He died in the Savoy 1629, aged 72. He was univerſally eſteemed as a man of worth, and wrote the hiſtory of the late wars in Ireland, publiſhed in folio, 1633.

CAREW, Thomas, a native of Glouceſterſhire, educated at Corpus Chriſti, Oxford. His wit recommended him to the notice not only of Ben Jonſon and Davenant, but of Charles I. who made him a gentleman of his privy chamber. He died about 1639, leaving ſeveral poems, and a maſque called Cœlum Britannicum, performed at Whitehall by the king and ſome of his favorites, in 1633.

CAREW, Richard, author of the ſurvey of Cornwall, was born at Anthony in Cornwall and educated at Chriſt-church, Oxford. He removed to the Middle Temple, and afterwards travelling abroad he ſettled in his native county where he became a juſtice of the peace, and high ſheriff in 1586. He devoted himſelf to antiquarian purſuits, and was intimate with the learned men of his time, eſpecially Spelman. He died 1620, aged 65, and an inſcription on his tomb deſcribed him as another Livy, another Maro, another Papirian. His ſurvey, though praiſed by Camden, is not regarded by Gough as a valuable performance.

CAREW, George, brother to the preceding was educated at Oxford, and became ſecretary to chancellor Hatton. Elizabeth knighted him and appointed him as her ambaſſador to Poland. In the following reign he was commiſſioner for the union of the two kingdoms, and he reſided as ambaſſador in the French court for four years, where he furniſhed Thuanus with ſome uſeful information for the completion of the 121ſt book of his hiſtory. He died 1613. He wrote a relation of the ſtate of France, with the characters of Henry IV. and of the principal perſons of the court, a work of great merit.

CAREW, Bampfylde Moore, an eccentric character, ſon of a clergyman at Bickleigh Devon. He was educated at Tiverton ſchool but withdrew from his parents to aſſociate with gypſies. The adventures of a mendicant had greater charms than the ſplendors of polliſhed ſociety, and Carew, the friend, the companion, the hero of the gypſies, was elected their king. It is ſaid that he was twice tranſported from Exeter to North America, for enticing dogs to follow him, but artful were his expedients that he both times returned before the ſhip which conveyed him from Europe. In his wanderings he gloried in extorting charity under aſſumed character either as the ſhattered ſailor, the unfortunate tradeſman, the broken ſoldier, or the diſtreſſed clergyman. He died about 1770, aged 77.

CAREW, ſir Alexander, a Corniſh gentleman, member for his county in 1640. He voted for the death of Strafford, and was made governor of St. Nicholas' iſland at Plymouth. In this office he made overtures to deliver up the garriſon, but his intentions were diſcovered, and he was dragged to London, and beheaded on Tower-hill 1644.

CAREY, Harry, a man who, to poetical and muſical talents, joined the more dangerous power of wit and ſatire. He wrote ſome dramas for Goodman-fields theatre, and ridiculed modern tragedies in his chrononhotonthologos in 1734. He was a great enemy to the Italian operas and Italian ſingers, and wrote the popular ſong of "God ſave great George our king." He was perſecuted by indigence, which unfortunately aided by melancholy dejection, incited him to commit ſuicide. He deſtroyed himſelf in 1744. His ſongs were publiſhed by him in 1740, and his dramatic pieces in 1743. Though the author of ſo many ballads it is remarkable that none offend againſt morality and virtue. His ſon George Savile, who at one time was on the Covent-garden ſtage, wrote a lecture on mimicry, dramatic pieces, &c.

CARIBERT or CHARIBERT, king of Paris after his father Clotaire I. 561, was a popular monarch. He was, however, licentious in his manners; and, after putting away his queen, he married two of her ſervants, of the meaneſt condition. During his reign, the mayors of the palace acquired that great power which proved fatal to the monarchy. He died 567.

CARLETON, ſir Dudley, was born at Baldon Brightwell, Oxfordſhire, and educated at Chriſt-church. He attended ſir Ralph Winwood as his ſecretary into the Low Countries, and went as ambaſſador to Venice, Savoy, France, and the United Provinces. Charles created him baron Imbercourt, viſcount Dorcheſter. He died ſecretary of ſtate 1631, aged 58. He wrote various pamphlets, beſides letters from Holland during his embaſſy, from 1616 to 1620, &c.

CARLETON, George, a native of Norham, Northumberland, maintained at Edmund hall, Oxford, by Bernard Gilpin. In 1580 he was fellow of Merton, and in 1617 was biſhop of Llandaff. He was ſent by James, with three other divines, to the ſynod of Dort. On his return, he was tranſlated to Chicheſter, and died nine years after, 1628, aged 69. He wrote ſeveral theological tracts, beſides the life of his patron Gilpin.

CARLINI, Agoſtino, a native of Genoa, who ſettled early in England, and became keeper of the royal academy in London. He was an artiſt of celebrity. He died 1790.

CARLOMAN, eldeſt ſon of Charles Martel, ſucceeded in the kingdom of Auſtraſia 741. After defeating the Germans, he retired to the obſcurity of a cloiſter, and died at Vienne in Dauphiné, 755.—Another, ſon of Lewis the German, ſhared the kingdom of Bavaria with his brothers Lewis and Charles, and became king of Italy and emperor. He died 880, without iſſue.—Another, brother of Lewis III. obtained Aquitain and Burgundy. On his brother's death, in 882, he became ſole king of France, and died 884.

CARLONE, John, a Genoeſe painter, who excelled in the art of foreſhortening. He died aged 40, 1630.

CARLOS, don, ſon of Philip king of Spain, was deformed in his perſon, and violent in his temper. He ſhowed himſelf diſobedient to his father, and attempted to excite an inſurrection. His conduct, and determined oppoſition to his father, proved his ruin, and Philip, incenſed by the ingratitude of his ſon, cauſed him to be ſeized, and condemned to death. He died 1568, it is ſuppoſed, by poiſon, or, according to others, by being ſtrangled, or by opening his veins in a bath. Some authors ſay, that Philip treated him with this cruelty becauſe he attempted to gain the affections of his mother-in-law, Elizabeth of France, whom formerly he had courted.

CARLYLE, Joſeph Dacres, a learned orientaliſt, born at Carliſle. He was educated at Carliſle ſchool and Chriſt college, Cambridge, and in 1777 obtained a fellowſhip at Queen's. He ſtudied Arabic and the oriental languages, in which he made great progreſs, with the aſſiſtance of a native of Bagdad, reſident at Cambridge. After ten years' reſidence at college, he ſettled at Carliſle, and in 1794 ſucceeded Dr. Craven as Arabic profeſſor, and in 1795 was made chancellor of Carliſle. In 1799 he went to Conſtantinople in lord Elgin's embaſſy, and obtained admiſſion into the libraries of the city, and made excurſions into Aſia Minor, examined the ſite of Troy, viſited Egypt, Syria, and the Holy Land, and he returned through Italy and Germany to England. For his ſervices he was made rector of the valuable living of Newcaſtle-upon-Tyne; but while he promiſed himſelf long life, his conſtitution haſtened to a rapid decay, and he expired, univerſally lamented, 1804. He was then employed in the publication of a bible in Arabic, and in completing his obſervations on the Troad.

CARMICHAEL, Gerrhom, a native of Glaſgow, educated there, and made profeſſor of moral philoſophy. He died 1738, aged 56. He wrote notes on Puffendorf, beſides a ſyſtem of moral philoſophy.

CARMICHAEL, Frederic, ſon of the preceding, was educated at Aberdeen, and became one of the miniſters of Edinburgh. He died of a fever 1751, aged 45. He publiſhed ſermons, much admired for elegance and neatneſs.

CARO, Hannibal, an Italian poet and orator of Civita Nuova. He tranſlated the Æneid, in blank verſe, 2 vols. 4to. with ſo much ſpirit, that ſome judges have declared the compoſition ſcarce inferior to the original. His poems and ſonnets were much admired, and appeared 4to. He publiſhed alſo letters, 3 vols, 8vo.—a tranſlation of Ariſtotle's rhetoric—and orations of Gregory Nazianzen. He died at Rome 1566.

CAROLINE, daughter of the margrave of Brandenburg Anſpach, was born 1682. Her hand was ſolicited by Charles III. of Spain, afterwards emperor; but ſhe refuſed him, and in 1705 married the ſon of the elector of Hanover, by whom ſhe had four ſons and five daughters. She was crowned queen of England 1727; and during the reign of her huſband diſplayed great dignity, moderation, and ſagacity. She died 1737.

CAROLOSTADT or CARLOSTADIUS, Andrew

drew Bodenſtein, a native of Carloſtadt in Franconia, dean of Wittemberg 1512, the year when Luther took his doctor's degree. He eſpouſed the reformer's tenets; but a diſpute led him into extremes, ſo that he ventured to deny tranſubſtantiation. He was profeſſor of divinity and miniſter of Baſil; and was the firſt proteſtant divine who married. He died at baſil 1541.

CARPENTER, Nathaniel, a native of Hatherleigh in Devon, educated at Edmund hall, Oxford, and Exeter college. He was raiſed to a deanery in Ireland, and died at Dublin 1635. He was eminent for his knowledge of mathematics; and he ably oppoſed the Ariſtotelian philoſophy. He wrote geography, in two books, beſides Architophel, &c.

CARPENTER, Peter, a Frenchman of Charleville, aſſiſted in the edition of the gloſſary of Ducange, in 6 vols. fol. and wrote, beſides, alphabetum tyronianum, fol. 1747. He died at Paris, 1767, aged 70.

CARPI, Ugo da, a painter, celebrated for the diſcovery of chiaro-obſcuro. This he performed by means of two pieces of waxwork, one of which delineated the outlines and ſhadows, and the other impreſſed the colors. He died 1500.

CARPONE, Julio, a Venetian painter, who died 1674, aged 63. He was correct in his bacchanals, triumphs, and ſacrifices.

CARPZOVIUS, Benedict, a native of Brandenburg, profeſſor of law at Wittemberg. He died 1624, aged 59, and left four ſons of great literary celebrity.

CARR, Robert, a Scotchman, firſt noticed by James I. in 1609. The monarch condeſcended to teach Latin to his favorite, and raiſed him to the title of duke of Somerſet; but though he ſaved him afterwards from puniſhment for his murder of ſir Thomas Overbury, he diſcarded him from his favor, ſo that he died forgotten 1638.

CARRA, John Lewis, a French demagogue, born at Pont de Veſles in 1743, and brought up to the law. On the breaking out of the revolution, he came to Paris, where he publiſhed a popular journal; and in conſequence of his ſervices in the cauſe of the republic he was made member of the convention. Reſtleſs and ambitious he favored the Girondiſts, and for ſome time was employed as commiſſioner with the army. He was accuſed of being in the pay of England, and of plotting the excluſion of the Bourbons, with the intention of raiſing the duke of York to the throne. When his party was proſcribed by Robeſpierre, he was with them hurried to the guillotine, 1793. He was author of new principles of philoſophy, 2 vols. 4to.—an hiſtory of Moldavia and Wallachia, 12mo.—an eſſay on aerial navigation—examinations of animal magnetiſm, &c.

CARRACCI. Vid. CARACCI.

CARRANZA, Bartholomew, a Dominican prieſt, who accompanied Philip when he married Mary of England. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the council of Trent, and was archbiſhop of Toledo. He was accuſed of hereſy afterwards, and died in the convent of Minerva 1576. He wrote a collection of councils, ſome theological tracts, &c.

CARRE, Lewis, died 1711, aged 48, author of mathematical treatiſes—on meaſuring ſurfaces and ſolids—on finding the center of gravitation, percuſſion, and oſcillation, &c.

CARRIER, John Baptiſt, an infamous republican, born 1756. He was bred up to the law, and when deputy to the national convention, he was ſent to la Vendée, with a number of aſſaſſins. At Nantes, the ſcene of his barbarities, he often in one day cauſed twenty-four perſons to be put to death, though young and innocent, and, by a new mode of torment, placed them, male and female together, in the moſt indecent poſture, in barges, on the Loire, and then ſunk the veſſels in the middle of the river. After perpetrating every crime of cruelty, luſt, and avarice, he was recalled, and at laſt condemned to a deſerved death, and guillotined, 1794.

CARRIERA, Roſa Alba, a Venetian portrait painter in crayons. She came to Paris, where ſhe was admitted member of the academy of painting 1720. After painting the royal family, ſhe went to Vienna, and died at Venice 1761.

CARSTARES, William, a Scotchman, born at Cathcart, and educated at Utrecht. He was the confidential friend of the prince of Orange before his invaſion of Britain. At the revolution, William appointed him his chaplain for Scotland, and conſulted him without reſerve on every occaſion. Anne on her acceſſion continued him chaplain for Scotland; but he retired from court, and was elected principal of the college of Edinburgh. He died univerſally reſpected, in 1715. His ſtate papers, letters, &c. were publiſhed in 1774, in a 4to. vol. by M'Cormick. He was in his character benevolent and patriotic, liberal and humane.

CARTE, Thomas, an Engliſh hiſtorian, born at Clifton, Warwickſhire, 1686. He was educated at Univerſity college, Oxford, and proceeded M. A. at Cambridge. When in orders, he officiated as reader of the abbey-church Bath, where he ably vindicated the memory of Charles I. and publiſhed his firſt compoſition, the Iriſh maſſacre ſet in a clear light. On George's acceſſion, as he refuſed to take the oaths, and as he aſſumed the lay habit, he has been accuſed of being concerned in the rebellion of 1715. He continued his attachment to the Stuarts, and was ſecretary to Atterbury, ſo that being ſuſpected by government, on the impriſonment of the prelate, 1000l. were offered for his apprehenſion. Eſcaping to France, he remained in exile, under the aſſumed name of Philips, for ſix or ſeven years, employed in literary purſuits, till queen Caroline procured his recal. After his return he publiſhed his hiſtory of James duke of Ormond, in 3 vols. folio. In 1738 he iſſued propoſals for a new hiſtory of England, and whilſt he collected materials in public and private libraries, ſo great was the popularity of his name that ſubſcriptions appeared for his encouragement to the amount of 600l. a-year. Not only individuals, but many public companies and the city of London honorably appeared to ſupport the labors of the national hiſtorian. The 1ſt vol. was publiſhed in 1747, and the 4th, which extends the hiſtory to the year 1654, and which was poſthumous, in 1755. The work is a compoſition of great merit, and diſplays the author's abilities in a very reſpectable view. That there are partialities in the narrative cannot be denied: but the hiſtory is valuable for information on many curious, important, and intereſting facts. When the firſt volume appeared, a violent outcry was raiſed againſt the author, for inſerting, in a note, that a certain Chriſtopher Lovel had been healed of the evil at Avignon by the holy touch of the pretender, and even the corporation of London, yielding to the general prejudice, haſtily withdrew their liberal ſubſcription. Carte died at Caldecot-houſe, near Abingdon, Berks, 1754. His papers were left to his widow, who afterwards married a catholic, and they were depoſited in the Bodleian library in 1778. Theſe manuſcripts were eſteemed ſo important, that lord Hardwick obtained the peruſal of them for 200l. and M'Pherſon for 300l. Carte wrote the hiſtory of the revolutions of Portugal—a collection of original letters and papers on the affairs of England, 2 vols. 8vo.—and other hiſtorical pieces.

CARTEIL, Chriſtopher, a naval officer, in the ſervice of the prince of Orange, born in Cornwall. He commanded a fleet which ſailed from Holland to Muſcovy, and was ſent by Elizabeth with Drake to the Weſt Indies, where he diſplayed courage at the taking of St. Jago, Carthagena, and St. Auguſtin. He died in London 1593, aged 43.

CARTER, Francis, an Engliſh writer, who died 1783. He publiſhed a journey from Malaga to Gibraltar, 2 vols. 8vo. with plates, valuable for the engraved coins it contains, from the cabinet of the Spaniſh medalliſt Flores. He began an account of the earlieſt printed Spaniſh books, which remains incomplete.

CARTER, Elizabeth, a learned Engliſh lady, born at Deal. Her talents were cultivated by her father, who inſtructed her in the learned languages. As a ſpecimen of her erudition ſhe publiſhed the works of Epictetus with an elegant tranſlation, and with notes and a learned introduction; a performance received in the moſt flattering manner by the learned world. Her poems on ſeveral occaſions were publiſhed in 1762, and ſhe alſo contributed two papers to the Rambler, Nos. 44, on religion and ſuperſtition, and 100, on modiſh pleaſure. She wrote beſides ſome ſcattered pieces, an ode to wiſdom inſerted in Richardſon's Clariſſa, &c. and diſplayed great ſimplicity of ſentiment, with ſublime ideas, and the pureſt morality. She died in very good circumſtances reſpected by numerous friends, in London 1806, aged 89.

CARTERET, John, earl Granville, was educated at Weſtminſter and Chriſt-church, Oxford. The zeal which he diſplayed in ſupporting the Hanoverian ſucceſſion recommended him to George I. by whom he was in 1719 ſent to Sweden, where he reconciled the kings of Sweden and Denmark. In 1721 he was ſecretary of ſtate, and went in 1724 to Ireland as viceroy, and again filled the ſame high appointment with equal credit, at the acceſſion of George II. till 1730. He eſpouſed Walpole, and on his removal he obtained the place of ſecretary of ſtate, 1742; and though before he had blamed continental alliances, he purſued them like his predeceſſor. He died 1763, reſpected as a man of learning, and the friend and patron of learned men.

CARTEROMACO, Scipio, a native of Piſtoia, Greek profeſſor at Venice. He died at Rome 1513, much reſpected as a ſcholar and as a man. Beſides an edition of Ptolemy's geography, he publiſhed a Latin oration of Ariſtides' Greek oration, &c.

CARTES, René des, a celebrated French philoſopher, born at la Haye in Touraine, 1596, and educated by the Jeſuits of la Fleche. His father urged him early to purſue a military life, and he laſt entered into the ſervice of the prince of Orange. Literature and philoſophy, however, ſtill continued his favorite purſuits amidſt the buſtle of the camp, and during the truce between the Spaniards and the Dutch, he diſplayed his great ſuperiority of mathematical knowledge, and publiſhed a Latin treatiſe on muſic. In 1619 he entered into the ſervice of the duke of Bavaria, and two years after he quitted the army, and travelled through the various countries on the borders of the Baltic. Upon his return to Paris, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of philoſophy with uncommon ardor, but he was of an unſettled wavering ſtate, frequently changing his habitation, and fixing his reſidence ſometimes at Amſterdam, ſometimes near Francker, and ſometimes at Deventer. In 1637 appeared his four treatiſes concerning method, dioptrics, meteors, and geometry, and about this time he received a friendly invitation from ſir Charles Cavendiſh to ſettle in England, which a few years before he had viſited, but the troubles of the times prevented him. Lewis XIII. invited him alſo in vain, Deſcartes refuſed to quit his retirement, though the French monarch liberally ſettled upon him a penſion of 3000 livres. His reputation was ſo well eſtabliſhed that princes were anxious to refer their literary diſputes to his arbitration. He correſponded with Elizabeth the daughter of the elector palatine, king of Bohemia; and Chriſtina tina of Sweden not only paid him the moſt flattering teſtimony, but preſſed him moſt earneſtly to ſettle in her dominions. Deſcartes, accepting the liberal invitation, came to Stockholm in October 1648, and was admitted to the confidence of the queen, whom he attended every morning at five o'clock, to inſtruct her in philoſophical knowledge. Senſible of the merit of the ſtranger, Chriſtina formed the moſt generous plans for the improvement of her ſubjects, and in handſomely rewarding the philoſopher, ſhe meditated the eſtabliſhment of an academy under his guidance as director, but death prevented theſe munificent intentions. Deſcartes died 11th February 1650, aged 54. His body was interred at Stockholm, but 17 years after it was removed to Paris. He never was married, but by a woman who co-habited with him, he had one daughter. Deſcartes is deſervedly eſteemed as a man of genius, well acquainted with mathematics and philoſophy, poſſeſſed of a ſtrong mind capable of profound meditation, of patient enquiry, but not devoid of great warmth of imagination. His treatiſe of the world is an ingenious performance, but the doctrine of vortices cannot ſtand the examination of truth and of the Newtonian philoſophy. He advanced far beyond his predeceſſors, and if he had done nothing beſides introduciug a ſpirit of enquiry into the myſterious operations of nature, he would have labored much for the benefit of mankind. He publiſhed alſo a treatiſe on mechanics, beſides letters, &c.

CARTIER, James, a French navigator, born at St. Maloes. Under Francis I. he diſcovered in 1534 the beſt part of Canada, of which he publiſhed an account.

CARTWRIGHT, Chriſtopher, an Engliſh divine ſkilled in Hebrew. He was born at York, and died 1652, aged 50 years. He wrote Electa Rabbinica in Geneſim and Exodum.

CARTWRIGHT, Thomas, a puritan, born in Hertfordſhire, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He devoted himſelf ſo rigorouſly to ſtudy, that he did not allow himſelf more than five hours' ſleep in the night, a cuſtom which he followed through life. About 1553, he left Cambridge to be articled as clerk to a counſellor, but in 1560 he returned and became fellow of his own college, and afterwards of Trinity. When Elizabeth viſited the univerſity, Cartwright was among the few ſelected to diſpute before their ſovereign, but his popularity was aſſailed when he ventured to inveigh againſt the eccleſiaſtical government of the church. The chancellor of the univerſity, ſir William Cecil, was directed by Grindal to proceed againſt him, and he was not only forbidden to propagate his doctrines, but deprived of the divinity Margaret profeſſorſhip, and of his fellowſhip. Thus diſgraced, he travelled into Germany, and was choſen miniſter of the Engliſh merchants at Antwerp, and afterwards at Middleburg. About two years after he returned to England and boldly undertook the defence of the puritans. His pamphlet received a ſpirited reply from Dr. Whitgift; but after a paper war, continued with more acrimony than moderation, Cartwright found it ſafer to leave the kingdom, whilſt his victorious opponent was raiſed to the ſee of Worceſter. He then officiated as miniſter to the Engliſh factories, and received a ſtrong invitation from James VI. of Scotland to fill a profeſſorſhip at St. Andrew's, which he declined. When he returned he was ſent to priſon, but was liberated by the interference of Burleigh and Leiceſter, the laſt of whom made him maſter of his newly founded hoſpital at Warwick. After many perſecutions and repeated impriſonments, which James endeavoured to alleviate by application to Elizabeth, Cartwright died 1603, in his 68th year. His publications were moſtly theological, and diſplayed his character as a man of great perſeverance, extenſive learning, genuine piety, generous, diſintereſted, and benevolent. His practical commentary on the four goſpels, and his commentary on proverbs, were eſteemed.

CARTWRIGHT, William, of Northway near Tewkſbury, was educated at Cirenceſter and Weſtminſter ſchools, and Chriſt-church, Oxford. He was patroniſed by biſhop Duppa, and eſteemed by Ben Jonſon and the wits of the times. He wrote 4 plays—beſides poems—ſermons, &c. He died 1644, aged 33.

CARTWRIGHT, Thomas, of Northampton, was educated at Queen's college, Oxford. At the reſtoration he was made chaplain to the king, and prebendary of St. Paul's, and on Pierſon's death raiſed to the ſee of Cheſter. He favored the proceedings of James II. whom he accompanied to France, and to Ireland. He died at Dublin 1689, aged 55. His ſermons, &c. have been publiſhed.

CARVALHO D'ACOSTA, Anthony, of Liſbon, was eminent for his knowledge of mathematics, hydrography, and aſtronomy; but more as the author of a topographical deſcription of Portugal, 3 vols. folio. He wrote beſides a compendium of geography, and a method of ſtudying aſtronomy, and died poor 1715, aged 65.

CARVER, Jonathan, a native of New England, who during the American war commanded an independent company of provincials againſt Canada. He had before viſited the interior parts of North America, of which he publiſhed an account, 1776. He wrote alſo a treatiſe on the culture of tobacco. He died in 1780, it is ſaid, for want of the common neceſſaries of life, aged 48.

CARY, Robert, was born at Cookington, Devon, and educated at Oxford. He was preſented to the living of Portlemouth in Devonſhire, and inclined to the tenets of the preſbyterians. Upon the reſtoration he congratulated Charles II. and was made archdeacon deacon of Exeter; but he was ejected in 1664, by the intrigues of ſome of his enemies, and continued in retirement at his rectory where he died in 1688, aged 73. He publiſhed a chronological account of antient times, in fol.

CARY, Lucius, eldeſt ſon of Henry firſt viſcount Falkland, was born at Burford, Oxfordſhire. 1610, and educated at Trinity college, Dublin, and St. John's, Cambridge. After viſiting the continent he ſettled within ten miles of Oxford; but though maſter of a moſt ample fortune, he did not devote his time to frivolous or intemperate purſuits; but courted the company of the moſt learned men of the univerſity. So laborious were his ſtudies that before he reached his 23d year he had read all the Greek and Latin fathers. He ſerved in the army of Eſſex as a volunteer againſt the Scots, and in 1640 was member for Newport, Hants, a place which he again repreſented in the next parliament. In this new ſcene the candor of the commons ſeemed ſo plauſible, that he inveighed againſt the arbitrary meaſures of the court and declared himſelf for the proſecution of Strafford, and of Finch, and for the excluſion of the biſhops from the houſe of peers. But reflection wrought a change in his political ſentiments, and the next time that the diſqualification of the biſhops was mentioned in the houſe, he oppoſed it with dignity. On this occaſion his ſincerity was ſuſpected, but the goodneſs of his heart forbad the aſperſion of his character, and when he received with indifference the compliments of the court, and manfully rejected the honors which the ſovereign propoſed to confer upon him, it then became evident that his conduct was the effect of principle and not of party. At laſt however he was made ſecretary to the king; but he refuſed to follow the practice of his predeceſſors in encouraging and maintaining ſpies, and in opening ſuſpected letters. Eager to ſupport the cauſe of loyalty, he ſigned with other lords a declaration, that the king's intentions were friendly to the parliament, and he levied ſome ſoldiers for his ſervice. When at Oxford with the king, he accompanied him to the public library, and Charles, deſirous to make a trial of his fortune by the Sortes Virgilianæ, opened a Virgil, where he read that paſſage in the 615th and following lines of the 4th book of the Æneid which contains the dreadful imprecation of Dido againſt Æneas. The words were ſo awfully ſtriking, and painted the king's fate ſo pathetically, that he felt the application, and Falkland to divert his attention expreſſed his wiſh to try his fortune too, and ſhow how puerile it was to dwell upon ſuch accidental things. The paſſage upon which he fixed his eyes began at the 152d line of the 11th Æneid, and in the lamentations of Evander on the untimely fall of his favorite Pallas was remarkably prophetic of the melancholy fate which awaited him. The civil wars operated powerfully upon his mind; inſtead of a ſerene, placid, and lively countenance, he now betrayed gloomineſs, inward ſorrow, and dejection. Reſerve ſucceeded to an affable behaviour; the negligence of his dreſs fully evinced the great perturbation of his ſoul, and often in the midſt of the deepeſt ſilence he would exclaim, peace, peace! Though obliged by his office to be near the king's perſon, yet he frequently expoſed himſelf in the thickeſt of the battle, and obſerved to his friends who wiſhed to check his ardor, that his impatience for peace proceeded not from puſillanimity. In the morning of the battle of Newbury, it is ſaid, that with a cheerful countenance he aſſured his followers, that, weary of the times, he would leave them before night. He dreſſed himſelf in a clean ſhirt, obſerving that ſhould he be ſlain, his body ſhould not be found in foul linen; then putting himſelf in the firſt ranks he ruſhed on the enemy, and was ſoon after ſhot with a muſquet in the lower part of the belly, and falling from his horſe remained under heaps of ſlain till the next morning. This illuſtrious character, who thus fell in his 34th year, was univerſally reſpected as one of the brighteſt ornaments of the age. His mind was amply ſtored with all the riches of antient and modern literature, and the goodneſs of his heart was equal to the vaſt reſources of his mind. Mild and gentle in his manners, pious, virtuous, charitable, and religious in his conduct, he was admired even by his enemies. He was ſo attached to probity, that like Epaminondas, he turned with abhorrence from every appearance of deceit and falſehood. His ſaying was, that he pitied unlearned gentlemen in a rainy day. He is the author of ſome poems,—ſpeeches in parliament,—a diſcourſe on epiſcopacy,—on the infallibility of the church of Rome,—and other pieces.

CARY, Henry, earl of Monmouth, was couſin-german to Elizabeth, and was educated with Charles I. He tranſlated from various authors ſeven folios, two octavos, and a 12mo. and died 1661, aged 65.

CARY, Felix, a learned French writer, of Marſeilles. He wrote an hiſtory of Marſeilles, of Thrace, and the Boſphorus by medals. He died 1754, aged 55.

CARYL, Joſeph, a nonconformiſt, author of a commentary on Job, in three vols. 4to. He was member of Exeter college, and a popular preacher at Lincoln's-inn, and ſome years after at St. Magnus London-bridge. He was in favor with Cromwell, whom he attended as chaplain in Scotland. He publiſhed ſermons, and died 1673.

CARYLL, John, a Roman catholic, born in Suſſex. He was ſecretary Mary queen of James II. and he followed fortunes of his fugitive maſter, by whom is created earl Caryll. He was in Eng. the reign of queen Anne, and was intr. ith Pope, to whom he recommended the ject of the Rape of the Lock, which the poet inſcribed to him. He wrote two plays, beſides a tranſlation of the pſalms of David, &c. He was living in 1717.

CASA, John de, an Italian of the 16th century, born at Florence. He was engaged in negociations under the popes, at Venice and other places, and was archbiſhop of Benevento 1544. His works, in Latin and Italian, were much eſteemed, particularly his—Galateus, ſeu de morum elegantiâ, a poem, with notes, 8vo. He wrote beſides ſome beautiful Italian poems, the lives of cardinals Contarini and Bembo, and other works, collected together in five vols. 4to. Though a cardinal he was diſſolute in his manners, and had a natural ſon whom he called Quirino. He died at Rome 1556, aged 53.

CASANOVA, Mark Anthony, a Latin poet of Rome, who in his imitations of Martial diſplayed great keenneſs of ſatire. He alſo imitated Catullus. His poems are in the Deliciæ poetarum Italorum. He died 1527.

CASAS, Bartholomew de las, a native of Seville, who at the age of 19 accompanied his father in the expedition of Columbus to the Weſt Indies, in 1493. On his return to Europe he became an eccleſiaſtic, and in his appointments in Cuba, he began to diſplay that humanity which ſo much honors his heart as the advocate of the poor Indians whom his countrymen murdered. More fully to plead their cauſe he appeared before Charles V. and unfolded ſuch a tale of perſecution, that the monarch made ordinances to puniſh the cruelty of his governors, and protect his Indian ſubjects. Theſe ſcenes of horror however were too far from Europe to be checked, and in ſpite of las Caſas, and of Charles, the Indians were tortured, plundered, and wantonly put to death. Even Sepulveda defended the conduct of the Spaniards, by the example of the Iſraelites towards the people of Canaan. But this horrible book, though printed at Rome, was proſcribed in Spain, and refuted by las Caſas now biſhop of Chiapa. Soto the king's confeſſor examined the allegations of las Caſas againſt the Spaniards, but Charles did not adopt that ſyſtem of humanity which becomes the father of a people. After more than 50 years ſpent in alleviating the diſtreſſes of the Indians, las Caſas, worn out with infirmities, left America in 1551, and returned to Madrid, where he died 1566. This truly good chriſtian did not eſcape the perſecution of his ungrateful country; though engaged in every act of charity he was repreſented in odious colors to the court, by the malice of thoſe tyrants whoſe cruelties he expoſed. His "deſtruction of the Indians" has been tranſlated into ſeveral languages, and together with his rights of ſovereigns, &c. ſhows him to have been a pious and amiable character.

CASATI, Paul, a Jeſuit of Placentia, died at Parma 1707, aged 90. His learning recommended him to Chriſtina of Sweden, whom he perſuaded to abjure her religion and turn catholic. His writings are on mathematical ſubjects, beſides a treatiſe on optics, which he wrote, when 88 years old, and blind.

CASAUBON, Iſaac, a learned critic, born at Geneva 1559. He ſtudied at Geneva, and at the age of 23 ſucceeded his maſter Portus as Greek profeſſor. He publiſhed in 1583, his notes on Diogenes Laertius, dedicated to his father, and the next year appeared his lectures on Theocritus, inſcribed to Henry Stephen the printer, whoſe daughter he married. In 1587 he publiſhed his commentary on Strabo and his new teſtament; the next year his notes on Dionyſius Halicarnaſſus; and the next year notes on Polyænus; and the year after Ariſtotle. The following years were equally prolific in learned labors, till in 1596, he became profeſſor at Montpellier, but ſoon after went to Paris, and being introduced to Henry IV. he was promiſed patronage from the court. The monarch, through the jealouſy of the literati of Paris, unable to give him a profeſſorſhip appointed him one of the proteſtant judges at the conference between biſhop Perron and du Pleſſis Mornay. Some time after he was made librarian to the king, and while writing annotations on the claſſics, he devoted ſome time to the Arabic language, and completed a dictionary, and tranſlated ſome of the authors into Latin. Henry, who admired Caſaubon, wiſhed him to become a catholic, and recommended him to confer with Perron, but this inſtead of ſhaking, eſtabliſhed more firmly his faith as a proteſtant. Caſaubon, who had publiſhed at Lyons his Athenæus, now gave to the world his Polybius in 1602, with a dedication to the king, much admired as a maſter-piece of its kind. The death of his patron, and at the ſame time his religion, induced him to abandon France for a reſidence in England. His reputation preceded him, he reached England 1610, and was honorably received by James, who admitted him to his table, granted him a penſion of 300l. and made him prebendary of Weſtminſter and of Canterbury. He did not long enjoy theſe favors, he fell a victim to a violent diſorder in the bladder 1614, in his 55th year. He was father of 20 children by his wife.

CASAUBON, Meric, ſon of the preceding, was born at Geneva 1599. He was educated firſt at Sedan, and afterwards at Chriſt-church. His defence of his father againſt the catholics made him known to king James, and ſome time after he was preſented to the living of Bledon in Somerſetſhire, and in 1628 to a prebend of Canterbury, and afterwards to other benefices. The civil wars, however, robbed him of all his preferment, and he was perſecuted as a ſuſpicious perſon, and impriſoned. Cromwell wiſhed to engage him to write an account of the civil wars, but he rejected it with diſdain. He was alſo ſolicited by Chriſtina of Sweden to preſide over her univerſities with a handſome ſalary, but he declined declined the offer, and chose rather to live in England. At the restoration Casaubon was reinstituted in all his preferments, which he enjoyed till his death, 1671, in his 72d year. His talents were great as a scholar and a critic, as his editions of the classics and his many other publications fully prove. It is however singular that he should defend the existence of witches.

Case, Thomas, A. M. a nonconformist, who in the civil wars preached against the royalists. He was born at Boxley in Kent, and educated at Christ church. He was at one time minister of St. Mary Magdalene, Milkstreet, and afterwards of St. Giles' in the fields, and was imprisoned in the tower for conspiring in Love's plot. He waited with other ministers on Charles in 1660, at the Hague, and was one of the commissioners at the Savoy. He died 1682, aged 84 years. His works are chiefly sermons.

Case, John, a native of Lyme in Dorsetshire, known as an empiric and successor of Lilly. He wrote the angelical guide, showing men and women their lot and chance in this elementary life, 1697, 8vo. But his celebrity arose from the success of his pills. His door was pointed out to enquiring patients by these two lines, which procured more money than all the verses which Dryden ever wrote:

" Within this place
" Lives doctor Case."

Once at a tavern doctor Radcliffe pledged him with " here, brother Case, I drink to all the fools your patients." " Thank you, replied the empiric, let me have all the fools, and you may take the rest."

Casel, John, a native of Gottingen, professor of rhetoric and philosophy at Helmstadt, where he died 1613. He wrote some learned works.

Cases, Peter James, a painter, born at Paris, where he died, aged 79. The correctness of his style, and the excellence of his draperies, make him rank as one of the first painters of the French school.

Casimir Matthias Sarbiewski, a Jesuit of Poland, professor of philosophy and theology at Wilna, whose Latin odes, epodes, and epigrams, are little inferior to the productions of the best poets of Greece and Rome. Grotius and others have set his fame above that of Horace. He was preacher to king Ladislaus V. and died at Warsaw 1640, aged 45, and unfortunately before he had completed his Lescíade, a heroic poem in 12 books, in imitation of Virgil.

Casimir I. a king of Poland, son and successor of Micislas, 1034. He privately retired to a monastery at Paris, from which he was, by the affection of the Poles, drawn to civilize his country. He married the daughter of the duke of Russia, and died 1058, in the 24th year of his reign.

Casimir, II. king of Poland, youngest son of Boleslaus III. deserved the surname of the just, by his humanity. He succeeded his brother Miceslaus, 1177, and died 1194, aged 77.

Casimir, III. surnamed Great, succeeded Ladislaus 1333 He defeated John of Bohemia, and conquered Russia. He died by a fall from his horse 1370.

Casimir, IV. son of Jagellon, was raised to the Polish throne 1447. He made war against the Teutonic knights, and by an edict commanded that the Latin tongue should become the vernacular language, which continues to be observed to this day. He died 1492.

Casimir, John, son of Sigismund III. from a cardinal became a king. He was defeated by Charles Gustavus of Sweden, whom afterwards he conquered. He also defeated the Russians in Lithuania, but resigned the crown and retired to France, where he died 1672.

Caslon, William, an eminent letter-founder, born in 1692, at Hales Owen in Shropshire. He was originally apprentice to an engraver of ornaments on gun-barrels, but the neat lettering of a book in a bookseller's shop, accidentally recommended him to the notice of Mr. Bowyer, who not only encouraged him in undertaking a letter-foundery, but lent him 500l. to make a respectable beginning. His ingenuity soon procured a large concern, he cut the fount for printing the new testament in Arabic, for the use of the poorer christians in the east, and he executed his fount of English letters with such neatness, that types were no longer imported from Holland. After residing in Helmet-row, Old-street, he settled in Chiswell-street, where his foundery became the largest in the known world. He retired from business, and settled at Bethnal-green, where he died 1766, aged 74. His eldest son, William, succeeded him in his business.

Cassagnes, James abbé de, a French poet. His wish to distinguish himself as a pulpit orator, was so fatally checked by Boileau, who in the same line associated him with Cotin, one of the most ineloquent preachers of the age, that he fell into a melancholy delirium, and actually died in a madhouse 1679. He translated Sallust and some of Cicero's works into French, &c.

Cassana, Nicholo, a painter, born at Venice. His conspiracy of Catiline, containing nine figures as large as life, and his portrait of queen Ann, are greatly admired. He died in London 1713, aged 54.

Cassandra Fidele, a Venetian lady well acquainted with the learned languages and philosophy. Her letters and discourses were published at Padua. She died 1567, aged 102.

Cassentino, Jacobo di, an eminent painter, the founder of the Florentine academy. He died 1356, aged 80.

Casserio, Julio, a native of Placentia. He was domestic in the family of Fabricius ab aqua-pendente and was instructed by his master, and succeeded him as professor of anatom and medicine at Padua. He wrote de vocis auditusque organis historia, fol.—anatomical tables,—and other works, and died 1616

Cassini, Johannes Dominicus, a celebrated astronomer born in Piedmont 1635. He studied at Genoa, and displayed such poetical powers, that some of his pieces were published when only 11 years old. He accidentally met a book on astronomy, and devoted himself with such success to that science, that at the age of 15 he was invited to teach mathematics at Bologna. The appearance of a comet in 1652, enabled him to make observations on those bodies, and to establish the doctrine that they were not meteors, but governed by regular laws. He afterwards determined the apogee and eccentricity of a planet from its true and mean place, a problem which Kepler and Bullialdus are said to have given up as insolvable. He was also employed in settling differences that had arisen in consequence of the inundations of the Po, and was inspector general of the fortifications of the Urbino, and of the rivers in the ecclesiastical states. He made various important discoveries concerning the planets, and settled the theory of Jupiter's satellites. Lewis XIV. obtained the pope's permission to allow him an absence of six years, and he visited in consequence the capital of France in 1669, and was made royal astronomer. When his six years were expired, the pope made him forfeit his emoluments as he did not return; and Colbert therefore prevailed upon him to become a naturalized subject of France. As the first occupier of the new built observatory at Paris, he proceeded rapidly in his examination of the heavens. The revolution of Jupiter round its axis was determined, four sattellites more were added to Saturn, and the meridian line in 1695, was proved not to have varied since it had been fixed 40 years before, at Bologna. This great astronomer, after continuing the meridian line through France, died 1712.

Cassini, John James, son and successor of the preceding, was born at Paris. He inherited the talents of his father, and described the perpendicular of the meridian of France, from St. Maloes through Paris to Strasburg. He asserted, contrary to Newton's opinion, that the earth was an oblong spheroid; which was proved to be false by the report of the mathematicians sent by the French king to measure a degree of the meridian at the equator, and at the polar circle. He also turned his thoughts to electricity, in which he made some experiments. He died at the age of 84, in 1756. His works greatly esteemed, were elements of astronomy, with astronomical tables, two vols. 4to.—magnitude and figure of the earth.

Cassini de Thury, Cæsar Francis, second son and successor of John James, was born at Paris, 1714. At the age of ten he calculated the phases of the sun in a total eclipse, and he engaged afterwards in the verification of the meridian passing through the observatory at Paris, and completed a geometrical description of France, with very minute particulars. His labors were supported by the learned, and the munificence of the court. He died of the small-pox, 1784, leaving behind him an amiable and respected character. He was succeeded by his son John Dominic.

Castagno, Andrew del, a painter of Tuscany. He obtained the secret of painting in oil from Dominico de Venise, and afterwards assassinated him. Dominico, who knew not his murderer, hastened to the house of his perfidious friend, and expired in his arms. The bloody deed remained undiscovered, till Castagno revealed it on his death bed. He finished in 1478 the execution of the conspirators against the Medicis.

Castaldi, Cornelius, a native of Feltri, eminent as a poet. He founded a college at Padua, where he died 1537, aged 57. His poems, consisting of Latin and Italian pieces, are much esteemed.

Castalio, Sebastian, of Chatillon on the Rhone, was the friend of Calvin, by whose influence he became regent in the college of Geneva. He translated the bible into elegant Latin, and displayed his extensive knowledge of Greek and Hebrew by other publications. His opinions with respect to Solomon's song and Christ's descent into hell, and about predestination and grace, procured him many enemies; and he at last incurred the displeasure of Calvin and of Theodore Beza, who reviled him as a papist. His colloquia sacra, in elegant Latin, appeared in four vols. 12mo.

Casteels, Peter, a painter of Antwerp, who died at Richmond in Surrey, 1749, aged 65. He published in 1726, 12 plates of birds, designed and etched by himself.

Castel, Lewis Bertrand, a Jesuit of Montpellier, the friend of Fontenelle, and other learned men. His vrai system de physique generale de Newton, in 4to, 1743, gained him universal reputation as a philosopher and a man of science. His optic of colors, 12mo. —his treatise on gravity, 2 vols. 12mo. —and his system of mathematics, 4to. were also much esteemed. He died 1757, aged 69.

Castell, Edmund, D.D. a learned divine, born in 1606, at Hatley, Cambridgeshire, and educated at Emanuel college. He afterwards removed to St. John's, for the convenience of the library in the compilation of his lexicon heptaglotton, a valuable work, in which he was engaged for 17 years, and upon which he expended upwards of 12,000l. Such sacrifices deserved liberal patronage, but his preferment was at first only the small vicarage of Hatfield Peverell in Essex, afterwards the rectory of Wodeham Walter, and then that of Higham Gobion, Bedfordshire. Afterwards he became king's chaplain, professor of Arabic at Cambridge, and prebendary of Canterbury. The lexicon was published in 1669, but the work remained remained almoſt entirely unfold upon his hands. He aſſiſted in a very extenſive degree the labors of Dr. Walton, in the publication of his polyglott bible. Dr. Caſtell died 1685, aged 79.

Castelli, Benedict, of Breſcia aſſiſted Galileo in his aſtronomical obſervations. He was afterwards profeſſor of mathematics at Piſa, and then at Rome, and died 1644.

Castelnau, Michael, a Frenchman, ambaſſador from Charles IX. and Henry III. in England. He died 1592. The memoirs of his embaſſies were printed in 2 vols. folio, 1669, and in three vols. folio.

Castlenau, Julia de, wife of count de Murat, wrote in a pleaſing ſtile, les lutrins de Kernoſi 12mo—des contes de fés two vols.—le voyage de Campagné, and died 1716, aged 45.

Castelvetro, Lewis, a learned Italian of Modena. He was ſuſpected of having embraced the tenets of Luther, and being brought before the inquiſition at Rome, he made his eſcape to Baſil, where he devoted himſelf to literature, and died 1571, aged 66.

Castiglione, Joſeph, a native of Ancona, governor of Corneto 1598, and diſtinguiſhed as a poet and critic. He was author of an hiſtory of his own times in Latin verſe, &c. He died 1616.

Castiglione, Balthazar, an Italian nobleman, born 1478, in the dutchy of Mantua. He ſerved in the army, under Sforza duke of Milan, and afterwards was ſent by Urbino, ambaſſador to Julius II. and afterwards to Lewis XII. of France, and Henry VII. of England. He publiſhed at Rome 1516 his celebrated "Courtier," a work highly admired for its moral and political inſtructions, and for the elegance of the Italian. He married the daughter of Bentivoglio, who died four years after, leaving him a ſon and two daughters. His abilities proved ſerviceable to the holy ſee, and were employed in ſeveral negociations with Charles V. and Francis I. He died at Toledo, 1529. Sixteen months after, the body was removed by his mother from Toledo, to a church at Mantua which he himſelf had built. Beſides the Courtier, Caſtiglione wrote ſome elegant Latin and Tuſcan poems, inſerted in the deliciæ poet. Ital.

Castillo-y-saavedra, Antony del, a Spaniſh painter of Cordova, where he died 1667, aged 64. He excelled in hiſtorical and landſcape painting; but his coloring is deficient in grace and in taſte.

Castries, N. marſhal de, a French general, who ſerved in the ſeven years' war. He was called to the aſſembly of the notables in 1787, but diſapproved of the violence of his colleagues, and left France. He died at Wolfenbuttle in Brunſwick, Jan. 1800.

Castro, John de, a native of Liſbon, who went with Gama to the eaſt, and publiſhed a deſcription of the Red ſea. On his return to Europe he was appointed over a fleet, and went with Charles V. againſt Tunis, and afterwards was ſent as governor of the Eaſt Indies by the Portugueſe. He died at Diu, which he had rendered almoſt impregnable 1548, aged 48.

Castro, Paul de, of Caſtro, was profeſſor of law at Florence, Bologna, Sienna, and Padua. His works poſſeſſed great merit, and were in 8 vols. fol. He died 1437. It became proverbial to ſay of him, after the words of Cujas, qui non habet Paulum de Caſtro, tunicam vendat & emat.

Castruccio, Caſtracani, a celebrated general, who was a foundling, diſcovered by the monk Antonio, and his ſiſter in a heap of leaves in a vineyard at Lucca in Tuſcany, in 1284. He was tenderly brought up and intended for the church; but his fondneſs for military exerciſes made him prefer the profeſſion of arms. He entered in his 18th year as a lieutenant in the army of the Ghibelins, and the valor which he diſplayed recommended him to the good opinion of Guinigi the general, and he ſoon roſe to the higheſt honors, and was at laſt declared by the people of Lucca their ſovereign prince. Beloved at home and reſpected abroad, he meditated the extenſion of his power over the neighbouring ſtates. The Florentines viewed his elevation with jealous enmity, and 30,000 foot, and 10,000 horſe appeared in the field, 22,000 of which the active general deſtroyed, with the loſs of only 160 of his own men. Fatigued after the bloody conteſt, and regardleſs of a chill north wind which blew upon him, he was ſeized with an ague, which carried him off in a few days, when he expected to riſe to the ſovereignty of Italy. He died in his 44th year 1328, admired in his life-time, and regretted after his death. Machiavel has written his life, and repreſented him as a moſt extraordinary character, of great preſence of mind, benevolence of temper, and undaunted firmneſs, not leſs in proſperity than adverſity.

Cat, Claude Nicholas le, of Bleraucourt in Picardy, was a ſurgeon. In 1723 he publiſhed a letter on the aurora borealis of that year, and in 1731 he became the ſurgeon of the hotel Dieu at Rouen, where five years after, he formed a public ſchool of anatomy. He was penſioned with 2000 livres by the French king in 1759, and ſeven years after raiſed to nobility. He wrote on the theory of hearing, 1758, 8vo.—on the nervous fluid, 1765, 8vo.—on oſteology, 1767, 8vo.—on the ſenſes, 2 vols. 12mo. &c. and died 1768, aged 68.

Catellan, Maria Claire Priſcilla Marguerite de, a lady of Narbonne, who died at Toulouſe 1745, aged 83. Her odes were crowned by the Toulouſe academicans.

Catesby, Mark, an Engliſh naturaliſt. He reſided for ſeven years in Virginia, and at the requeſt of ſir Hans Sloane, and others, he viſited the Carolinas, and the Bahama iſlands, for the improvement of knowledge. On his return to England, 1726, he gave to the public his natural hiſtory of Carolina, Florida, and the Bahamas, mas, 2 vols. fol. with colored plates. He was made fellow of the royal society, and died in London, 1749, aged 69.

CATHARINE, a daughter of Charles VI. of France, married Henry V. of England, and after his death Owen Tudor, a Welchman, by whom she had Edmund, the father of Henry VII. She died 1438.

CATHARINE of ARRAGON, daughter of Ferdinand V. of Castile, married Arthur son of Henry VII. in 1501, and on his death, five months after, Henry afterwards the VIII. Her conduct as a wife was most exemplary, and places her character in the most amiable point of view. Her divorce from Henry, produced the reformation of England. She wrote some religious pieces, and died at Kimbolton, universally respected.

CATHARINE DE MEDICIS, queen of France, daughter of Lorenzo de Medicis, married, in 1534, Henry duke of Orleans, son of Francis I. Though at first she had no children, afterwards she had ten, three of whom became successively kings of France, and a daughter queen of Navarre. Her husband died 1559; and during the short reign of her son Francis, she obtained no influence in the cabinet, from the superior power of the Guises; but on the elevation of Charles IX. then only 11 years, she became regent, and showed the infamous features of her mind by the murders of St. Bartholomew. Despised for her cruelties, and the slave of lust, this worthless woman died 1589, aged 70.

CATHARINE OF SIENNA, a Romish saint, who, at the age of 8, is said to have vowed perpetual celibacy. She wrote several things in a fanatical stile. Her letters have been printed. She died 1380, aged 33. Another saint who founded a convent in Bologna, and died 1463.

CATHARINE OF PORTUGAL, daughter of John IV. and wife of Charles II. of England, was treated with unkindness by her husband, and after his death she returned to Portugal, where she was regent during the imbecile state of her brother Peter. She conquered the Spaniards, and died 1705, aged 67.

CATHARINE OF BOURBON, sister of Henry IV. married 1599, Henry of Lorraine. She died without children, 1604, aged 46.

CATHARINE ALEXIEVNA, empress of Russia, a native of Ringen, in Livonia, born of obscure parents. She was instructed in the house of a Lutherian clergyman; but his death left her destitute, and she retired to Marienburg. There, in 1701, she espoused a dragoon of the Swedish fortress in that city; but, on the day of her nuptials, and before their consummation, the bridegroom fell in the field of battle, and the captive Catharine became the property of general Bauer, who saw and admired her beauty. In her 17th year, she became the mistress of Peter the great, and so much captivated him, that, on the 29th of May 1711, he privately married her, and the following February announced her as his empress. On his death, in 1725, she was proclaimed as sovereign of all the Russias: and she deserved the high dignity. The grand designs of the Czar were completed by her genius, and a mild system of government insured her the affection of her subjects. She died 1727, aged 38. Notwithstanding the noble qualities of her character, and her services to her husband, especially at Pruth, she was suspected of being faithless to his bed.

CATHARINE II. empress of Russia, daughter of Christian Augustus of Anhalt-Zerbst, in Upper Saxony, at the age of 14, married the duke of Holstein, afterwards Peter III. The mental imbecility of her husband rendered Catharine dissatisfied and faithless, and, on the death of the empress, in 1762, the young monarch found an ambitious rival, instead of a submissive consort. By a well managed plot she seized her husband, 1762, and after three days' confinement he expired in the castle of Robscha, whilst his murderer proclaimed herself sole sovereign empress, and insured the stability of her government by the wisest measures. Prince Iwan, grandson of Peter, an inoffensive youth, was secretly cut off; and the empress, sure of the tranquillity of her dominions, imposed on Poland her favorite Poniatowski, as king, by the name of Stanislaus Augustus, in 1764. Great as a sovereign, but dissolute as a woman, Catharine was engaged for ten years in a Turkish war, and lastly with the Swedes, whilst at home she indulged the most sensual gratifications, in the company of favorites, whom, however, she rewarded with liberality. The patronage which she extended to genius, and the benevolent motives of her government, will always appear as illustrious features in her character. The bloody capture of Ismael, however, and the partition of Poland, must excite indignation against her. She died suddenly of an apoplectic fit 1797, and was succeeded by her son Paul, who in 1800, was succeeded by Alexander. Catharine introduced inoculation into Russia, and, to recommend it to her subjects, she herself first submitted to the operation.

CATINAT, Nicholas, was born at Paris 1637, and left the law for a military life. He soon distinguished himself in this new career, and at Maestricht, Besancon, Valenciennes, St. Omer, Ghent, &c. he displayed such acts of bravery, that he was promoted to the highest offices. He defeated the duke of Savoy in 1688, and took the best part of his dominions, and in the war of 1701, he at the head of the French army opposed Eugene, who commanded the Germans in Italy. Even Eugene bore testimony to his greatness by saying, on the indecision of the French court in appointing a general, "If Villeroi commands, I shall beat him; if Vendome, the struggle will be great; but if it be Catinat; I shall be beaten." Misfortunes however attended this campaign, disunion reigned among the generals, and Catinat to this owed his ill success. He was wounded at Chiari, and retreated behind the Oglio, and in disgrace submitted to serve as second to Villeroi. He died at St. Gratian, 1712, aged 74.

CATINEAU, N. a native of Beaupreau, who in the revolution headed the Vendeans. He afterwards resigned the command to Bonchamp, and soon after fell at the siege of Nantes.

CATROU, Francis, a learned Jesuit born at Paris 1659, and died 1737. Besides his translation of Virgil, and an history of the Mogul empire, he wrote an history of the fanaticism of the protestants, quakers, &c.

CATTHO, Angelo, of Tarentum, was in the service of the duke of Burgundy, and of Lewis XI. as astrologer and physician. He pretended to foretell future events, and died at Beneventum 1497.

CATZ, James, a native of Zealand, known as a politician and poet. During Cromwell's usurpation he came as ambassador to London. On his return he retired to his favorite studies, and died 1660, aged 83. His poems in Dutch, are highly esteemed by his countrymen.

CAVALCANTI, Bartholomew, an Italian, who served Paul III. and died at Padua 1562, aged 59. He wrote excellent treatises on rhetoric, and on the best forms of a republic.

CAVALIER, John, son of a peasant at Cevennes, is famous for his bravery in the wars of the Camisards, against Lewis XIV. He defeated the bravest of the king's troops, and Villars at last concluded a truce with him, and he was received into the pay of the king, but fearing treachery, he quitted France, and went to England. He distinguished himself afterwards in Spain, at the battle of Almanza, and was made governor of Jersey, where it is supposed that he died about 1765.

CAVALIERI, Bonaventure, an Italian disciple to Galileo, and professor at Bologna, where he died 1647. He wrote on geometry, logarithms, trigonometry, conic sections, &c.

CAVALLINI, Pietro, a painter born at Rome. His mosaic over the entrance of St. Peter's is much admired, as well as the Virgin and child in one of the churches of Rome. He died 1364, aged 85.

CAVE, Dr. William, was born in 1637, and educated at St. John's, Cambridge. He was successively minister of Hasely, Oxfordshire, Great Allhallows, and Islington near London, and afterwards chaplain to Charles II. and canon of Windsor. He wrote an history of the lives, acts, deaths, &c. of the christian fathers during the three first centuries of the church, and his historia literaria, published in 1688, containing an account of all writers either against or in favor of christianity to the 14th century. He died 1713.

CAVE, Edward, known as the first editor of the Gentleman's magazine, was born at Newton in Warwickshire 1681, and educated at Rugby. Here he gained the good opinion of his master, but when the follies of his school-fellows, more wealthy than himself, were unhandsomely attributed to him, he left Rugby, and after being with a collector of excise, and a timber merchant, he became apprentice to Mr. Collins a printer. He soon rose to consequence in his profession, and by the interest of his wife's relations, he obtained a small place in the post office, whilst he continued to print pamphlets. He was engaged by the stationers to correct the gradus ad parnassum, and edited a criminal calendar, and other periodical publications. As clerk of the franks in the post office, he examined the right of franking with more freedom than pleased the members, and he was cited before the house, though nothing was ever advanced against his integrity. In 1733 he began the Gentleman's magazine, a publication which by unexpected success, contributed to the independence of his fortune, and which still maintains its reputation. He died 1754. He was a man of great perseverance and application, but in his manners he was cold and reserved; his heart however was warm and charitable.

CAVEDONE, Jacomo, an Italian painter, whose misfortunes, it is said, overpowered his intellects, so that he died poor, in a stable, at Bologna, 1660, aged 80.

CAVENDISH, Thomas, was born at Frimly, in Suffolk. He determined to repair, at the expence of the Spaniards, his fortune, which youthful extravagance had ruined, and with two ships which he built, he sailed from Plymouth 1586. After crossing the streights of Magellan, he seized many prizes in the Pacific Ocean, and especially an Acapulco ship, which he burned, after taking 60,000l. of gold from her cargo. Having thus surrounded the globe, he returned to Plymouth on the 9th September 1588; but the riches which he brought home were quickly wasted away, and three years after he again embarked in pursuit of new adventures. He reached the streights of Magellan 1592, but the tempestuous weather obliged him to return, and his ill success so preyed upon his heart, that he died of grief on the coast of Brazil.

CAVENDISH, sir William, of Suffolk, was gentleman usher in cardinal Wolsey's household. His attachment to his patron was so sincere, that he refused to abandon him even in his disgrace; and this fidelity was observed by Henry VIII. who knighted him, and conferred upon him several lucrative offices. He was in favor at the court of Edward VI. and with his successor Mary, and died 1557, aged about 52. He was three times married, and by his last wife, who was a widow, he left three sons and three daughters. Sir William was the progenitor of the dukes of Devonshire and Newcastle. He published a life of Wolsey.

CAVENDISH, William, duke of Newcastle, grandson of the preceding, was born in 1592. His elegant manners recommended him to James I. by whom he was made knight of the bath, and viscount Mansfield. Charles I. created him earl of Newcaſtle-on-Tyne. He entertained Charles at Welbeck, and he preſented him with 10,000l. and a body of 200 knights. After the battle of Marſton-moor he fled to Hamburgh, and afterwards to Amſterdam and Paris. In his exile he foreſaw the fall of the commonwealth; and he returned with the king, by whom he was created duke of Newcaſtle. He died 1676, aged 84. Beſides a treatiſe on government, &c. he publiſhed ſeveral plays and poems, and a celebrated treatiſe on horſemanſhip. His ſecond wife, ſiſter to lord Lucas, wrote his life, beſides various poems and plays.

CAVENDISH, William, firſt duke of Devonſhire, was born 1640. He ſat in the long parliament, for Derbyſhire, and in 1665 accompanied the duke of York as a volunteer in the fleet. Four years after, he was in the ſuite of the ambaſſador to France; and at the opera at Paris he was rudely inſulted, and ſeverely wounded by three of the king's officers; a heinous offence, pardoned only by his interceſſion for the culprits. In parliament, Cavendiſh was bold, manly, and patriotic; he promoted the inquiry into the murder of Godfrey; he ſupported the impeachments of Danby and of Scraggs; and not only appeared at the trial of lord Ruſſel to vindicate his character, but, after his condemnation, he offered to exchange clothes with him. In the reign of James, he preſerved the ſame unyielding ſpirit; and when inſulted by colonel Culpepper, the favorite of the king, he, though in the preſence chamber, took him by the noſe, and dragged him out of the room. He was fined for this 30,000l. and, though a peer, impriſoned till the mulct was diſcharged. He eſcaped to Chatſworth; and when ſeized he gave him for the faithful payment a bond, which William III. afterwards cancelled. He with other peers invited the prince of Orange to invade the kingdom; and on his landing, he joined him with a reſpectable number of followers. At the coronation of William and Mary he acted as lord high ſteward; and, 1691, he attended the monarch to the Hague, where he entertained ſeveral ſovereign princes at his table. In 1694 he was created duke of Devonſhire, and, during the king's abſence, was nominated one of the lords juſtices. Under Anne, he was engaged in the ſettlement of the act of union with Scotland. He died 1707. Cavendiſh was an elegant ſcholar, as well as an able ſtateſman; and Chatſworth remains a noble ſpecimen of his taſte and genius. He wrote poetry with great eaſe, and his ode on the death of queen Mary is deſervedly commended.

CAVENDISH, lord John, ſon of the fourth duke of Devonſhire, was diſtinguiſhed as the friend of lord Rockingham, and the opponent of lord North. He was twice chancellor of the exchequer, and he died 1796, of an apoplectic ſtroke.

CAVENDISH, lord Frederic, of the family of Devonſhire, choſe a military life, and roſe to the rank of field marſhal. He was repreſentative for Derbyſhire, and afterwards for Derby, in ſeveral parliaments. In the action of St. Cas, 1758, he was taken priſoner; and when permitted to return to his country, on his parole, he at firſt refuſed, leſt his voting in the houſe of commons ſhould be conſidered as a violation of his parole. He, with Wolfe, Monkton, and Keppel, united in an agreement together, at the beginning of the ſeven years' war, not to marry till peace, not to be interrupted by domeſtic concerns. He died at Twickenham 1803.

CAULET, Francis Stephen de, a French prelate, who oppoſed the right aſſumed by the king of diſpoſing of vacant eccleſiaſtical benefices. He died 1680, univerſally reſpected.

CAVOYE, Lewis marquis de, a French military officer, who removed an Engliſh fire ſhip, which threatened the deſtruction of a whole fleet; for which he was honorably rewarded. He was the friend of Turenne, of Racine, and other learned men; and died 1716, aged 76.

CAUSSIN, Nicolas, a Jeſuit, born at Troyes, counſellor to Lewis XIII. He oppoſed Richelieu, by whom he was diſmiſſed from attendance on the king's perſon. He returned to Paris after the cardinal's death; and died 1651, aged 71. His book de ſacrâ et profanâ eloquentiâ, is well known in England, and his "court ſainte," has been tranſlated into ſeveral languages.

CAWDREY, Daniel, a nonconformiſt, educated at Peter-houſe, Cambridge, and ejected from his living. He was a member of the Weſtminſter aſſembly of divines, and wrote ſermons, treatiſes, and pieces againſt the eſtabliſhed church. He died 1664.

CAWTON, Thomas, of Colcheſter, was educated at Rotterdam and Utrecht, and afterwards at Merton college, Oxford. He was a nonconformiſt, and preached to a diſſenting congregation at Weſtminſter. He died of a conſumption in 1677, aged about 40. He was a good Hebrew ſcholar, on which language he wrote a diſſertation, beſides a treatiſe on divine providence—a diſcourſe on the Syriac verſion—and the life of his father, who was miniſter of St. Bartholomew, behind the Exchange.

CAXTON, William, the firſt Engliſh printer, was born at Weald, in Kent; and was bound to Mr. Robert Large, a mercer, afterwards lord mayor of London. His maſter at his death left him a handſome legacy. He went as agent to the mercers' company into Holland, and was empowered by Edward IV. to make a treaty of commerce with the duke of Burgundy. During his reſidence abroad he became, with ſome expence, acquainted with the newly diſcovered art of printing; and at the requeſt of Margaret of York, ducheſs of Burgundy, he publiſhed his "recuyell of the hiſtory of Troy," the firſt book ever ever printed in Engliſh, tranſlated by himſelf, 1471. In 1474 he publiſhed in Engliſh, his game of chefs; a curious work, purchaſed for 40 guineas, by the earl of Pembroke, of Mr. Granger. His laſt work was, "the holy lives of the fathers hermites living in the deſerts," 1491, in which year he died.

CAYLUS, Anne Claude count de, a French writer, born at Paris 1692. He left the army at the peace of Raſtadt, and travelled to Italy and the Levant. His "relics," of Egyptian and other antiquities, in 7 vols. 4to. 1752-67, is a valuable work. He wrote alſo a deſcription of the gems in the royal cabinet, the lives of celebrated painters and engravers of the French academy; and, from a paſſage in Pliny, he diſcovered the ancient mode of encauſtic painting, and of tinging marble. He died 1765.

CAZES, Peter James, a French painter. His woman with an iſſue of blood, in the church of Notre Dame, is regarded as a moſt perfect and valuable piece. He died 1754, aged 78.

CAZOTTE, James, a native of Dijon, mayor of Pierry, near Epernay. He was for his loyalty dragged to the abbaye priſon, in 1792; and when the fatal September came, his daughter, aged 17, who had ſhared his misfortunes, accompanied him to the bloody tribunal, where aſſaſſins mocked the forms of juſtice. The blows aimed at the father were repelled by the heroic daughter, with ſuch effect, that the murderers, aſtoniſhed at her conduct, permitted her and her parent to eſcape. A few days after Cazotte was again arreſted, and condemned to die. He was guillotined 1792, aged 71. He wrote ſome things in proſe and verſe, in 6 vols. 12mo. and 2 vols. 8vo.

CEBA, Anſaldo, a Genoeſe, known as a politician, hiſtorian, orator, and poet. His treatiſe on epic poetry is more valued than his poems. He died 1623, aged 58. He wrote alſo Eſther and Camilla, two heroic poems, &c.

CECCO DE ASCOLI, or Francis de Gli Stabili of Aſcoli, profeſſor of aſtrology and philoſophy at Bologna, became phyſician to the duke of Calabria. Being ſuſpected of magic, he was ſeized by the inquiſition, and condemned to be burnt. This cruel ſentence was executed 1327. His poem l'Acerta was for ſome time popular.

CECIL, William, lord Burleigh, was born at Bourn, Lincolnſhire, 1521, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. From Cambridge he removed to Gray's inn, and ſoon became diſtinguiſhed at the bar. Upon the death of his wife, ſiſter of ſir John Cheek, he married a daughter of ſir Anthony Cooke, a lady of great learning, and by this matrimonial connection, he was made maſter of requeſts by Somerſet, knighted, and created ſecretary of ſtate, and chancellor of the garter. In Mary's reign, though he had favored the cauſe of Jane Gray, he was often conſulted, and retained the good opinion of her miniſters. Under Elizabeth, he was again ſecretary, and maſter of the court of wards, and chancellor of Cambridge, and in 1571 was created lord Burleigh. He died 1598, aged 78. Though twenty-ſeven years high treaſurer of England, he yet died not opulent, and while he managed with honeſt frugality the revenues of the kingdom, he, with inflexible integrity, diſdained to enrich himſelf by baſe means. Beſides Latin poems, he wrote ſome pamphlets in defence of the queen and her government, and other treatiſes.

CELESTIN I. pope after Boniface II. died 432, after filling the chair ten years.

CELESTIN II. pope, after Innocent II. died 1143, after being elected only five months.

CELESTIN III. ſucceeded Clement III. 1191, and died ſeven years after.

CELESTIN IV. was pope only eighteen days, and died 1241.

CELESTIN V. pope 1294, could with difficulty be prevailed upon to leave his humble cell for a throne. He reſigned the tiara by the inſinuations of Cajetan, who ſucceeded him by the title of Boniface VIII. He was impriſoned in a caſtle in Campania, and died there 1296.

CELLARIUS, Chriſtopher, a learned man, born at Malcalde in Franconia. He ſtudied claſſical learning and the oriental languages at Jena, and became profeſſor of Hebrew and moral philoſophy at Weiſſenfels, and in 1673, rector of Weimar college. Three years after he removed to Zeits, and in 1678 he accepted the rectory of Merſburg college. Though partial to Merſburg, at the requeſt of the king of Pruſſia he became profeſſor of eloquence and hiſtory in the college of Halle, in 1693, and here he compoſed the beſt part of his works. He died 1703, aged 69. His works were numerous and valuable, chiefly on geography, hiſtory, grammar, and the oriental languages, beſides learned editions of more than twenty Latin and Greek authors.

CELLINI, Benevenuto, a ſculptor and engraver of Florence. He was originally apprentice to a jeweller and goldſmith, and as an excellent muſician, became the favorite of pope Clement VII. and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ingenuity in making medals and rings. The pope entruſted to his care the caſtle of St. Angelo, when Rome was beſieged by Bourbon, and Cellini yielded to his aſſailant only after a vigorous reſiſtance, and by an honorable capitulation. The temper of Cellini did not accord with his other great qualities. Fickle and capricious, he was ever embroiled in quarrels; and diſſatisfied with his country, he travelled to Paris, to ſeek employment under Francis I. but ſoon returned to Italy. From Rome, where he was for ſome time impriſoned on a charge of having robbed the caſtle of St. Angelo, he wished to revisit Paris; and afterwards settled there. Flattered at Paris, Cellini was offended with madame d'Estampes the king's favorite, and abandoned the kingdom for Florence; where a fresh insult dismissed him again, after a short absence, to return. He died at Florence 1570. His life, with curious anecdotes, was translated from the Tuscan language into English, in 2 vols. 8vo. 1771.

Celtes, Conrad, a Latin poet of Sweinfurt, died at Vienna 1508, aged 49, after having obtained the honor of the poetic laurel. He was patronised by Maximilian. His works are elegiac verses, odes, epigrams, besides an account of the city of Nuremberg, and a poem on the manners of the Germans. His style is not inelegant, nor devoid of wit.

Centlivre, Susannah, a celebrated comic writer, born at Holbeach in Lincolnshire. Her maiden name was Freeman. To a handsome person she united great genius and a creative fancy; and though some anecdotes are related concerning her imprudence in youth, as the mistress of Anthony Hammond, with whom she lived at Cambridge disguised in men's clothes, yet her mind was elegantly cultivated. She wrote fifteen plays, besides little poems, &c. which procured her respectable patrons. Her plots are peculiarly happy, and the "busy body" and "a bold stroke for a wife," have long commanded the public applause. She was married three times; first to the nephew of sir Stephen Fox, who died soon after; and secondly to an officer, who fell in a duel two years after. Her last husband was cook to queen Anne. She died in very respectable circumstances, 1723. She was long the correspondent of the wits of the times; of Steele, Rowe, Budgell, Sewell, &c. and she was honored with a place in Pope's Dunciad. Her dramas have appeared in 3 vols. 12mo.

Centorio, Ascanius, of Milan, in the 16th century, eminent as a soldier and philosopher. He published some valuable military and historical memoirs of the wars of his own time, &c.

Ceratinus, James, or Teyng, of Horn, in Holland, a name which he rendered into Greek, for his own appellation. He was Greek professor by means of Erasmus, and died at Louvain 1530. He published a translation of Chrysostom on the priesthood, into Latin, a Græco-Latin lexicon, &c.

Cerceau, John Anthony du, a Jesuit of Paris, known as a Latin poet. His Latin poems gained him reputation; but his French verses, in imitation of Marot, were little above mediocrity. He died near Tours, 1730, aged 60.

Cerda, John Lewis de la, a Jesuit of Toledo, esteemed for his learning. His commentaries on Virgil are very valuable; but those on Tertullian do not possess merit. He died in 1643, aged above 80.

Cerdon, a heretic of the 2nd century, who asserted that Christ had not a real body, and that there were two principles, one good, creator of heaven, the other bad, creator of the earth. He rejected the old testament, and considered only part of the new authentic.

Cerisantes, Mark Duncan de, son of a Scotch physician, settled at Saumur, gained the notice of Richelieu, who sent him ambassador to Constantinople, and afterwards to Sweden, from which, through his ill conduct, he was recalled. From Paris he went to Naples, and assisted Guise in the support of the Neapolitan insurgents. He died during the siege of Naples 1648. He wrote a Latin account of his journey to Constantinople, two Latin odes, &c.

Cermenati, John de, an Italian historian, who published in Latin an elegant account of Milan.

Cerutti, Joseph Antony Joachim, of Turin, was educated by the Jesuits. When young, he obtained two prizes from the academies of Dijon and Toulouse, and when his order was abolished he wrote an apology for the Jesuits, but offended the parliament of Paris, and was obliged to make a public recantation. He lived for 15 years under the protection of the duchess des Brancas, and at the revolution obtained a seat in the national assembly. He was the editor of the feuille villageoise, a revolutionary paper, and died 1792.

Cervantes, Vid. Saavedra.

Cervetto, father to the violoncello performer of that name, came late in life to play the bass at Drury-lane. He died 1783, aged 103. When once Garrick was performing sir John Brute, and the audience in profound silence fixed their eyes on the incomparable actor, poor Cervetto from the orchestra uttered a loud yawn, which by its suddenness excited a violent laughter through the house. Garrick offended, sent for the musician, who assuaged the rage of the hero, by saying with a shrug, "I beg ten thousand pardons, but I always do so ven I am ver much please."

Cesarini, Julian, a Roman ecclesiastic, employed by Martin V. as a nuncio, and sent to oppose the Hussites in Bohemia. Under Eugenius, he was sent to the council of Basil, and afterwards to that of Ferrara. He was afterwards in Hungary, and by his persuasion Ladislaus broke his treaty with the Turks, and in consequence of it fell at the battle of Varna 1444, where the cardinal was also slain.

Cesarini, Virginio, a Roman, chamberlain to Urban VIII. His learning was so great, great, that a medal was ſtruck to his honor, on which he appeared with Mirandula crowned with laurel. His poems, in Italian and in Latin, are much admired for elegance and vivacity. He died 1624, aged 29.

CESPEDES, Paul, a Spaniſh painter and writer. His treatiſe on ancient and modern painting poſſeſſed merit, and his laſt ſupper at Cordova has long been admired. He died 1608, aged above 70.

CEZELI, Conſtance de, wife of Barri de St. Aunez, governor of Leucate under Henry IV. is diſtinguiſhed for her bravery. Her huſband being taken priſoner by the Spaniards 1570, ſhe put herſelf at the head of her brave neighbours, and though the enemy threatened to put to death her huſband, ſhe refuſed to give up the garriſon. The Spaniards, irritated with her oppoſition, put her huſband to death and raiſed the ſiege; but when the garriſon wiſhed to make reprifals on ſome captives, the courageous widow ſtepped as an advocate for their lives, and they were ſpared.

CHABANON, N. de, member of the academy of belles lettres, died at Paris 1792, aged 60. He wrote a tranſlation of Pindar, and of Theocritus,—beſides a diſſertation on Homer,—the life of Dante—a treatiſe on muſic, two vols. 8vo.—dramatic pieces, &c. and died 1780.

CHABOT, Francis, a capuchin, who at the revolution became a violent jacobin. He was guillotined as an accomplice of Danton, 1794, aged 35.

CHAIS, Charles, was born at Geneva 1701, and educated for the church. He was choſen paſtor at the Hague 1728, where he exerted himſelf by great purity of life in the ſupport of religion. He died there 1786, aged 85. Beſides the bible with a valuable commentary in 6 vols. 4to. he wrote ſome divinity tracts, an apology for inoculation, &c.

CHAISE, Father de la, a French Jeſuit, born near Lyons. He was patroniſed by Mazarin, and became confeſſor and favorite to Lewis XIV. After the cardinal's death, he ſupported with great dexterity his influence with the king, and prevailed upon him to marry madame de Maintenon. He maintained his ſituation of favorite to the laſt, and was even conſulted on his death bed by the king about the choice of his ſucceſſor. He died 1709, aged 83.

CHALCONDYLES, Demetrius, a native of Athens, diſciple to Theodore Gaza. At the taking of Conſtantinople, he eſcaped into Italy, and at Florence under the Medicis, and at Milan under Lewis Sforza, he taught the Greek language. He died at Milan 1510, aged above 80. Beſides a learned edition of Suidas, Florence, 1499, he publiſhed a Greek grammar and other tracts.

CHALCONDYLES, Laonicus, a native of Athens, in the 15th century, author of a Greek hiſtory of the Turks, in 10 books, from 1298 to 1462. It was publiſhed with a Latin tranſlation 1650 folio.

CHALES, Claudius Francis de, a Jeſuit of Chamberi, royal profeſſor of hydrography at Marſeilles, and of mathematics at Lyons. He was afterwards profeſſor of theology and then removed to the mathematical chair. He was author of a complete courſe of mathematics, 4 vols. 8vo.—a treatiſe on navigation and reſearches on the center of gravity, &c. and died at Turin 1678, aged 57.

CHALIER, Marie Joſeph, a French revoluioniſt, born in 1747, in Dauphiné. From an eccleſiaſtic he became a traveller, and ſettled at Lyons as a merchant. In the revolution he admired Marat, and determined to imitate him at Lyons, by ſacrificing to ſuſpicion every man of probity, virtue, and opulence. At the head of the jacobins he propoſed to erect a guillotine for the deſtruction of 900 perſons, whom he had marked for ſlaughter, but he himſelf was accuſed and guillotined 1793. When Lyons was taken by the jacobins, the body of the bloody incendiary was dug up, and his aſhes in a ſilver urn, carried in triumph to the convention.

CHALLE, Charles Michael Angelo, profeſſor in the Paris academy of painting, was ennobled for his great abilities. He was a ſucceſsful imitator of Guido and Salvator Roſa, and died 1778, aged 60.

CHALONER, ſir Thomas, was born in London 1515, and educated at Cambridge. He was in the ſuite of the ambaſſador to Charles V. of Germany, and was ſo pleaſed with the character of the emperor, that he attended him in the expedition to Algiers 1541, where he was ſhipwrecked, and with difficulty ſaved his life. On his return he was clerk to the council, and was knighted by Somerſet, at the battle of Muſſelburg. Elizabeth employed him as ambaſſador in Germany, and afterwards in Spain, where he conducted himſelf with ſingular addreſs between the oppoſite factions of Gomez and of Alva. He died ſoon after his return 1565. He wrote ſome Latin poems beſides a tranſlation of Moriæ encomium by Eraſmus.

CHALONER, ſir Thomas, ſon of the above was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. He in 1591, was knighted, and appointed tutor to Henry prince of Wales. On his eſtate in Yorkſhire, he diſcovered alum mines, the firſt known in England, which were ſeized by the crown, but during the civil wars reſtored to his family. He died 1615.

CHALONER,

CHALONER, James, son of sir Thomas, was born in London and educated at Brazennose, Oxford. In the rebellion he espoused the cause of the parliament, and was appointed one of the unfortunate king's judges. He was afterwards governor of Peel castle in the isle of Man, and at the restoration he poisoned himself when his person was going to be arrested. He was author of a treatise on the isle of Man, generally joined to King's vale royal of Cheshire, fol. 1656. His brother Thomas was also one of the king's judges, and fled to Middleburgh in Holland at the restoration, where he died 1661. He was author of a treatise in which he pretended to have discovered the tomb of Moses on mount Nebo, 1657, in 8vo.

CHALONER, Edward, fellow of All-souls in 1611, and head of Alban hall, Oxford, was an able disputant, and a learned divine. He died of the plague at Oxford, 1625, aged 35. His sermons, 13 in number, were greatly admired.

CHALOTAIS, Lewis Rene Caradeuc de la, author of a spirited work on the Jesuits, 2 vols. 1762, was attorney at Rennes, and was imprisoned for his opposition to the commandant of the province. He died 1715, author of an essay on national education, 8vo.

CHAMBERLAINE, Robert, of Lancashire, was educated at Exeter college. He wrote nocturnal lucubrations,—epigrams and epitaphs,—the swaggering damsel,—Sicelides, a pastoral, &c. and died in the 17th century.

CHAMBERLAYNE, Edward, born at Odington, Gloucestershire, was educated at Gloucester school, and Edmund hall, Oxford. During the civil wars he made the tour of Europe, and after the restoration he went with lord Carlisle as secretary to Stockholm. He died at Chelsea 1703, aged 87, and at his death ordered some of his books to be covered with wax and deposited in his grave that they might be useful to future ages. Of his books the best known is Angliæ Notitia, which has passed through 34 editions

CHAMBERLAYNE, John, son of the preceding, was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, and continued his father's present state of England He wrote other books, but though well skilled in 16 languages, and a man of excellent character, he never rose higher than to the office of gentleman usher to George of Denmark. He died 1724

CHAMBERS, Ephraim, author of a valuable dictionary, was born at Milton in Westmoreland. His parents were presbyterians, and he was educated for trade, and accordingly he was placed with Mr. Senex the globe maker. In the house of this ingenious mechanic he formed the whole plan of his dictionary, which after many years' labor appeared in 1728, in 2 vols. fol. The work was published for four guineas with a respectable list of subscribers, and so flattering was the reception, that the author was elected F. R. S. In ten years another edition was called for, and in the next year 1739, the third edition appeared, the fourth in 1741, and the fifth five years after. So rapid a sale of so voluminous a work, is a striking proof of its utility. Besides the Cyclopædia, Chambers wrote some pieces in the literary magazine, and was engaged with Martin, to translate the philosophical memoirs of the French academy of sciences. When in declining health, Chambers passed to the south of France, and died on his return to Canonbury house, Islington, 1740. The Cyclopædia after the author's death, was enriched with two supplementary folio volumes by Mr. Scott and Dr. Hill, and afterwards with new improvements by Dr. Rees, in four vols. fol.

CHAMBERS, sir William, F. R. A. S. S. an eminent architect, surveyor general of the board of works, treasurer of the royal academy, and knight of the polar star in Sweden. He was of Scotch extraction, and was born at Stockholm where his father was resident. He went at 18 to the East Indies, in the service of Sweden, and brought back to Europe that taste for Chinese and Asiatic architecture, which became so popular in England. He settled in this country, and planned the buildings of Somerset-house. His stair-cases, and his designs for the interior ornaments of buildings, are said to be particularly admired. He wrote a treatise on civil architecture, and died in London, 1796.

CHAMBERS, sir Robert, a learned judge, born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne 1737. From the school of his native town, he removed to Lincoln college, Oxford, and afterwards was fellow of University. In 1766 he succeeded sir William Blackstone as Vinerian professor, and as head of New-inn hall, and in 1773 he was appointed second judge in the Bengal supreme court of judicature. He was knighted in 1778, and in 1791 he became chief justice on the resignation of sir Elijah Impey, and in 1797 was elected president of the Asiatic society. He returned two years after to England, and in the latter end of 1802, passing on the continent for the benefit of his health, he died at Paris 1803. As a judge, a scholar, and a man, sir Robert was highly respected. That integrity which should mark the public character was particularly eminent in him, and the benevolence of his heart ennobled all his other virtues. He was a zealous friend to the religious establishment of his country and blended a deep sense of religion, and of a retribution to come in all the actions of his life. He wrote little though he possessed powers to instruct and improve mankind in the walks of literature. The collection of oriental books and MSS. which he made was very valuable, and was disposed of after his death.

CHAMIER, Daniel, a protestant of eminence, born in Dauphiné. He was professor of divinity at Montauban, and was killed at the siege of the place by a cannon-ball 1621. He was a warm advocate for the protestants, and and drew up it is ſaid the famous edict of Nantes. His defence of the reformed church againſt Bellarmine in four vols. folio. is much eſteemed, &c.

CHAMILLART, Michael de, a native of Caen, counſellor in the parliament of Paris. He was accidentally introduced to Lewis XIV. as an excellent billiard player, and the monarch, who was partial to this game, appointed him comptroller general of the finances and miniſter at war. He was unfit for theſe employments, and had the good ſenſe to reſign them, 1709. He died 1721, aged 70.

CHAMOUSSET, Charles Humbert Pierron de, of Paris, ſucceeded his father as judge in the parliament of the city. To be ſerviceable to the poor, he ſtudied medicine, and wrote a plan of reform for the great hoſpital of Paris, called Hotel-dieu. In the purſuit of his humane ſchemes, he was recommended to Choiſeul, who procured him the appointment of intendant-general of the military hoſpitals of France. He ſuggeſted the eſtabliſhment of a penny-poſt office at Paris, beſides plans for the abolition of beggars, the bringing of good water to Paris, the aſſociation for a ſubſcription among the poor, to ſupport themſelves during illneſs, &c. This amiable man died 1773, aged 56.

CHAMPAGNE, Philip de, a painter, born at Bruſſels 1602. His works were numerous, and decorated the churches and palaces of Paris; but his beſt piece is the ceiling of the king's apartment at Vincennes. He died 1674.

CHAMPEAUX, William de, a native of Champeaux, in Brie, profeſſor of philoſophy at Paris, where he had Abelard among his pupils. He was in 1113 made biſhop of Chalons, and died eight years after. He wrote a treatiſe on the origin of the ſoul.

CHAMPFORT N. a native of Paris, at firſt clerk to an attorney. He publiſhed the journal encyclopedique, and the elogies of Moliere and la Fontaine, which received the prize at the French academy, he next completed the French vocabulary, and the dictionary of the theatres, and this laſt work induced him to try dramatic compoſition in which he happily ſucceeded. His Muſtapha and Zeangir, a tragedy, and his young Indian, and his merchant of Smyrna, two comedies, obtained deſerved applauſe, and his fables, epiſtles, ſtories, and lighter pieces of poetry were all equally admired. He was the friend of the revolution; but when impriſoned by Robeſpierre, he in a fit of melancholy deſtroyed himſelf 1794.

CHAMPIER, Symphorien, a native of Lyons, educated at Pavia. He was phyſician to the duke of Lorraine, and was knighted for his military courage in Italy. He wrote various works on his profeſſion, and founded the college of phyſicians at Lyons. He died about 1540.

CHAMPION, Joſeph, a native of Chatham, 1709, eminent as a penman. He kept a boarding ſchool in St. Paul's church-yard, and then in Bedford-ſtreet. His works are practical arithmetic,—tutor's aſſiſtant with 40 plates—comparative penmanſhip, 24 folio plates, a curious performance, &c.

CHAMPLAIN, Samuel de, of Saintonge, was ſent by Henry IV. on a voyage of diſcovery to America. He eſtabliſhed a colony in Canada, and built Quebec, of which he was the firſt governor. One of the American lakes bears his name. He died about 1635. He wrote voyages de la Nouvelle France, or Canada, 4to. 1632.

CHAMPMESLE, Mary Deſmares de, a French actreſs. From a ſtrolling company, ſhe roſe to be a popular actreſs at Paris, and gained the friendſhip of Racine, who inſtructed her in ſome of his tragedies. She died greatly reſpected 1698, aged 54. Her huſband alſo an actor, wrote ſome dramatic pieces in two vols. 12mo.

CHANCELLOR, Richard, an Engliſh navigator. He went with ſir Hugh Willoughby to diſcover a north-weſt paſſage to China in 1553, under the direction of Sebaſtian Cabot; but when his companions periſhed on the coaſt of Lapland, where they had ſtopped to winter, he had the good fortune to reach the Ruſſian ſhores, where by means of the letters of introduction which he had with him, the grand duke John Baſilovitz received him with kindneſs, and permitted him a free trade with the country. On his return to England, Chancellor found his patron Edward dead; but Mary was ſenſible of the advantages of commerce, a company was eſtabliſhed, and the lucky adventurer again permitted to reviſit Ruſſia. On his return home, accompanied by a Ruſſian ambaſſador, he unfortunately was wrecked on the coaſt of Norway, and while he endeavoured to provide for the ſafety of the foreigners with him, he fell a victim to the climate. The Ruſſians ſafely reached London, 1557.

CHANDLER, Mary, an Engliſh poeteſs born at Malmſbury 1687. Though a milliner, at Bath, her mind was naturally ſtored with the treaſures of poetry, and ſhe derived aſſiſtance from the beſt poets of the nation. She preferred Horace to Virgil or Homer, as being more natural and leſs overloaded with fables. Her poem on the Bath, was applauded by Pope. She was deformed, but her countenance was pleaſing. She died 1745, aged 57.

CHANDLER, Samuel, a diſſenting miniſter, born at Hungerford, Berks, 1693. He was educated at Bridgewater, and afterwards at Gloucester, Glouceſter and Tewkſbury. In 1716 he was choſen miniſter of a diſſenting congregation at Peckham, and acquired popularity by his eloquence; but his circumſtances were reduced by the ſouth ſea ſcheme, which ſwallowed up the whole of his wife's property, and obliged him to maintain himſelf for two or three years as a bookſeller in the poultry. In 1725 he publiſhed his vindication of the Chriſtian religion, delivered in the pulpit at the Old Jewry. This work was applauded by Secker. Some time after, he was complimented with the degree of D. D. by the univerſities of Edinburgh and Glaſgow, and he was elected F.R. and A.S.S. On the death of George II. he compared the king to David, which procured a ſevere attack upon him in a pamphlet called the hiſtory of the man of God's own heart. Dr. Chandler, in defence of his diſcourſe, wrote an elaborate work, in two vols. 8vo. He died 1766, aged 73. Chandler was a man of great learning, eloquent as a preacher, and univerſally reſpected, not only by people of his own perſuaſion, but by many of the eſtabliſhed church. He wrote commentaries on Joel,—hiſtory of the perſecution and vindication of the old teſtament, &c.

CHANDLER, Edward, an Engliſh prelate, educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge. He was chaplain to Lloyd of Lichfield and Coventry, whom he ſucceeded in his ſee 1717, and 13 years after he was tranſlated to Durham, where he died 1750, aged about 80. He publiſhed a chronological diſſertation prefixed to Arnold's commentary on Eccleſiaſticus—a biographical preface to Cudworth's treatiſe on morality—ſingle ſermons, &c.—but his beſt work is his defence of Chriſtianity from the prophecies of the old Teſtament, with a refutation of objections, &c.

CHAPELAIN, John, a French poet, born at Paris. He died there 1674, aged 79. As the ſucceſſor of Malherbe in epic poetry, he was reſpected; but his Pucelle, a heroic poem, diſappointed his friends, who in vain ſought for the diſplay of thoſe abilities which they had ranked with Virgil himſelf. He was very rich, but lived as a moſt ſordid miſer.

CHAPELLE, Claude Emanuel Lullier, a French poet. He was intimate with Moliere, and was admired not only by the wits of the age, but the king. He was voluptuous and extravagant, and more given to intoxication than became his character or fortune. He died 1616, aged 65. He wrote, beſides poems, that ingenious work called Voyage de Bachaumont.

CHAPELLIER, Iſaac Rene Guy de, a native of Rennes, diſtinguiſhed in the conſtituent aſſembly as a zealous advocate for the liberty of the people. He became too late ſenſible of his conduct, and when he attempted to repair the injuries which his meaſures had cauſed, he was accuſed, and guillotined 1792, aged 39.

CHAPMAN, George, an Engliſh poet, who ſettled in London, where Shakeſpeare, Sidney, Spenſer, and Daniel, became his friends. He expected preferment from Walſingham, and Somerſet; but his hopes ended in diſappointment. Beſides 17 dramatic pieces, one of which was the famous maſk called the Temple, he tranſlated Homer's Iliad and Odyſſey, and attempted Heſiod and Muſæus. Pope, who has borrowed much from him calls him an enthuſiaſt in poetry, but the remark is invidious, as Chapman poſſeſſed reſpectable poetical powers, and was a man of ſome genius. He died 1634, aged 77.

CHAPMAN, John D. D. a divine, educated at Eton, and at King's college, Cambridge. He obtained the livings of Merſham and Adlington Kent, from Potter, to whom he was chaplain, and at the death of this prelate, as his executor he preſented himſelf to the precentorſhip of Lincoln, which was confirmed by chancellor Henley, but ſet aſide by the houſe of lords. He died 1784, in his 80th year. The univerſity of Oxford preſented him the degree of D.D. His writings were remarks on Middleton's letter to Waterland—Euſebius two vols. 8vo. in which he defended chriſtianity againſt Morgan and Tindal—Hiſtory of ancient Hebrews vindicated—ſermons, &c.

CHAPONE, Mrs. Sarah, an Engliſh writer, born in Northamptonſhire. Her marriage proved unhappy, but the comforts which ſhe was denied in domeſtic life, ſhe acquired in literature. One of her firſt productions was Fidelia, a ſimple ſtory in the Adventurer, and afterwards ſhe roſe to celebrity by a poem prefixed to Mrs. Carter's Epictetus, and by her letters on the improvement of the mind addreſſed to a young lady 1775. She wrote alſo miſcellanies in proſe and verſe, eſſays, &c. and died at Hadley in Middleſex, 1801, aged 75.

CHAPPEL, William, a learned divine, born at Lexington Notts 1572, and educated at Mansfield ſchool, and Chriſt church college, Cambridge. When James viſited the univerſity in 1624, Chappel diſputed before him, and when he had defeated his opponent Dr. Roberts, the monarch, attempting to ſupply his place, was equally diſcomfited. In 1633, he was made dean of Caſhel, by Laud, who inſiſted ſoon after on his becoming provoſt of Trinity college, Dublin, an office which he in vain declined. In 1638 he was made biſhop of Cork, Cloyne, and Roſs, and two years after he reſigned the provoſtſhip. He was impeached in the commons, on pretence of perjury and treaſon, and for favoring the catholic cauſe, though at Cambridge, he was accuſed of puritanism. He eſcaped from the impending ſtorm by obtaining leave to croſs to Wales, but here he was ſeized and impriſoned. Liberated with difficulty, he went to Briſtol, and thence to Derby, where he ended his days in ſtudious retirement 1649. He was the author of Methodus concionandi, tranſlated into Engliſh, beſides memoirs of his own life, &c. The whole duty of man has alſo been attributed to him.

CHARAS, Moſes, a native of Uſez, who practiſed at Paris. His treatiſe on treacle, and his pharmacopœia, in 2 vols. 4to. partly delivered in a courſe of lectures and tranſlated not only into the languages of Europe, but into the Chineſe, are valuable. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he left France, and came to England, and afterwards viſited Spain, to attend Charles II. Here in the hands of the inquiſition, he changed his creed at the age of 72, and returned to Paris, where he died 1698, aged 80.

CHARDIN, ſir John, ſon of a jeweller, was born at Paris, but came to England, where Charles II. knighted him. He travelled into Perſia and the Eaſt Indies. His voyages, tranſlated into Engliſh, German, and Flemiſh, are much eſteemed. He died at London 1713, aged 70.

CHARETTE DE LA COINTRIE, Francis Athanaſius de, a French royaliſt, celebrated for his able reſiſtance in la Vendée againſt the republicans. He was originally in the French navy, and headed the Bretons, who reſented the cruelties practiced daily againſt loyalty and innocence. The republicans agreed on a ceſſation of arms with him, and he might have remained a peaceful citizen, had not his enemies violated the treaty. In a ſecond engagement he was overpowered by numbers, and after being dangerouſly wounded in the head and loſing three of the fingers of his left hand, he eſcaped from the field of battle. He was ſeized in a wood, where he had concealed himſelf, and was dragged to Nantes, where he was ſhot 1796. When deſired to kneel he refuſed, but baring his breaſt, gave the word of command to the ſoldiers to fire.

CHARKE, Charlotte, youngeſt daughter of Colly Cibber, was educated in a manner more fitting the character of a boy than a girl. She early married Charke, a violin performer, whoſe debaucheries ſoon produced a ſeparation, and threw a thoughtleſs wife into the vortex of diſſipation. The ſtage for a while ſupported Mrs. Charke, and from a humble part ſhe roſe to capital characters. Her temper proved the ſource of many calamities, ſhe quarelled with Fleetwood the manager, and though reconciled, ſhe again tranſgreſſed, and at laſt had recourſe to the ſcanty pittance of a ſtrolling company. In 1755 ſhe publiſhed a narrative of her own life, but with no great ſucceſs. She died four years after in great diſtreſs.

CHARLEMAGNE, or CHARLES the great, and firſt king of France, and firſt emperor of the Weſt, was ſon of Pepin. He ſucceeded, on the death of his father, to ſome German provinces, and after the deceaſe of his brother Carloman 741, as king of France. He now defeated the Saxons, and after rendering himſelf maſter of Germany and Italy, and dreaded in Spain, he went to Rome, and in the year 800 renewed in his perſon the empire of the Cæſars, and was crowned by Leo III. emperor of the Weſt. This new power was acknowledged by neighbouring princes, and Charles diſplayed his magnificence in his pompous reception of the ambaſſadors of Nicephorus emperor of the Eaſt. Great in war, he was equally illuſtrious in peace, he encouraged the arts, and made his palace the aſylum of learned men. He erected academies and ſchools at Paris and in various parts of his dominions, and eſtabliſhed ſalutary laws, and promoted commerce and induſtry among his ſubjects. He died 814, aged 71, after reigning 47 years over France, and 14 over the empire, and he was buried in the cathedral of Aix la Chapelle. He appointed his only ſurviving ſon Lewis emperor and king, and beſtowed Italy on Bernard, the illegitimate ſon of his ſon Pepin.

CHARLES II. ſurnamed the bald, ſucceeded to the French crown 840. He was elected emperor 875, and he obtained a great victory over his brother Lothaire, at Fontenay in Burgundy. Finding his enemies too powerful, he fled into Italy and was poiſoned at Briord, 877, by one of his ſervants.

CHARLES III. or ſimple, was born 879, and ſucceeded to the throne of France 893. His abilities were unequal to the labor of government, and he was obliged to reſign ſome of his provinces to his enemies. He afterwards defeated Haganon his rebellious miniſter, but another battle, fought by Hugh the great, proved fatal to his fortunes. He eſcaped, but died ſeven years after in cruel confinement at Peronne, 929, aged 50.

CHARLES IV. the fair, ſucceeded to the French throne on the death of his brother Philip the tall 1322. His reign was diſturbed by quarrels with England. He died 1328, aged 34, after a weak reign.

CHARLES V. or wiſe, ſucceeded to the throne of France 1364. By his courage and the ſucceſſes of his general du Gueſclin, he repaired the loſſes which the monarchy had ſuffered under his father John, and the Engliſh were gradually diſpoſſeſſed of their provinces in France. After a reign of 16 years, Charles, who had made the happineſs of his people his particular care, died 1380, aged 43.

CHARLES VI. or well-beloved, was ſon of Charles V. whom he ſucceeded in 1380, at the age of 12. The ambitious views of his three uncles the dukes of Anjou, Berri, and Britany, weakened the kingdom, when unanimity was ſo neceſſary againſt the victorious Engliſh. The unhappy delirium with which the monarch was ſeized, completed the ruin of the nation, while civil war on one ſide depopulated the country, and the glorious victory of Agincourt, on the other, left Charles little beſides the empty title of king. Henry V. of England was crowned at Paris, but his death, in 1422, and that of Charles ſoon after produced a change in affairs.

CHARLES VII. ſurnamed the victorious, ſucceeded his father Charles VI. 1422. He poſſeſſed great vigor, and though at firſt a king more in name than power, he bravely refiſted his victorious enemies. Misfortunes however proved too great for his reſources. Orleans was ready to fall into the hands of the Engliſh, when Joan of Arc was preſented to him as the future deliverer of his country. Joan, as the pretended miſſionary of Heaven, quickly drove the Engliſh, retook the conquered provinces, and ſaw her monarch crowned under her victorious ſtandard at Rheims. Thus wonderfully reſtored to his dominions, Charles too often forgot his duties in the arms of his miſtreſſes, and ſuffered his people to be plundered by worthleſs favorites. He died 1461, aged 58.

CHARLES VIII. called the affable, aſcended the throne 1483. He determined to acquire military glory by the invaſion of Italy, and rapidly found himſelf almoſt all at once maſter of Florence, Rome, Capua, and Naples. Proud of ſucceſs and flattered by the pope, he cauſed himſelf to be crowned emperor of Conſtantinople and king of Naples; but the princes of Italy roſe againſt him, and ſix months after Charles eſcaped with difficulty into France, and only after the famous battle of Fouroua, in which his army of 8000 men routed a force five times more numerous. Whilſt he meditated revenge, he was ſuddenly carried off by an apoplexy, at Amboiſe, 1498, aged 27.

CHARLES IX. ſucceeded to the throne, after the death of his brother Francis II. 1560. His minority was guided by his mother Catharine de Medicis, but while the kingdom was torn by factions, Charles, full of diſſimulation and hypocriſy, cruelly meditated that fatal maſſacre of St. Bartholomew in 1572, which leaves ſo indelible a ſtigma on his name. Though ſome have conſidered the bloody deed as the machination of his mother and of her counſellors, Charles deeply participated in the crime. Theſe horrid ſcenes, it is ſaid, preſented themſelves in dreadful array to his terrified imagination, and on his death-bed produced the appalling exhibition of a tortured conſcience and an avenging Heaven. He died 1574, aged 24.

CHARLES the fat, was elected king of Italy, and emperor 881. Though he obtained all the crowns which once adorned the head of Charlemagne, he did not poſſeſs abilities to ſupport their glory. Driven from his throne, he was reduced to privacy, dependant on the bounty of Arnold, duke of Carinthia. He died of grief near Conſtance 888.

CHARLES IV. ſon of John of Luxemburg, and grandſon of the emperor Henry VII. aſcended the throne 1347. His reign is famous for the golden bull, enacted at Nuremberg 1356. This celebrated agreement was uſhered forth with curious reaſons drawn from ſuperſtition, and while it gave Germany a conſtitution, it proved the neceſſity of ſeven electors, by the ſeven gifts of the holy ghoſt, and the ſeven branches of the holy candleſtick. Charles, more fond of the pomp of royalty than of the proſperity of his kingdom, yet deſerved reſpect by the protection which he extended to literature. He died at Prague 1378.

CHARLES V. eldeſt ſon of Philip, archduke of Auſtria, was born at Ghent 1500. He was proclaimed king of Spain 1516, and two years after elected emperor of Germany, after his grandfather Maximilian. His elevation was diſputed by Francis I. of France, who aſpired to the ſame honors, and a fierce war was kindled between the two powers. Charles, ſupported by Henry VIII. of England, by Adrian VI., by the Florentines and Venetians, proved ſucceſsful againſt the French, who were driven from Italy. Marſeilles was beſieged, and at the fatal battle of Pavia 1525, Francis fell into the hands of his enemy. This conqueſt did not improve the affairs of Charles; inſtead of marching into France, he negociated with his priſoner, and when the fate of war placed Rome and the pope in his power, he found that his ſucceſſes armed the princes of Europe againſt him. The peace of Cambrai in 1529 ended the diſſenſions of the continent; but Charles, ambitious of glory, croſſed in 1535 the Mediterranean, to gather laurels in Africa. He defeated Barbaroſſa, and after entering victorious into Tunis, and reſtoring liberty to 22,000 Chriſtian ſlaves, he replaced Mulei-Haſſen on the throne. Charles, in 1536, again turned his arms againſt Francis; but the peace of Nice in 1538 reſtored tranquillity between the rival monarchs. Charles, in 1541, meditated the conqueſt of Algiers; but the expedition proved unfortunate, and a war with France in 1542 promiſed more important conqueſts to his gigantic ambition. Though leagued with the Engliſh, his army was defeated at Ceriſoles, and he made peace at Crepy 1545. Whilſt he endeavoured to oppoſe the principles of Luther, Charles found himſelf obliged by the perſeverance of Maurice elector of Saxony, and Joachim of Brandenburg, to ſign the treaty of Paſſau in 1552, and to accord liberty of conſcience to the proteſtants of Germany. At laſt, worn out by infirmities, diſſatisfied with the world, and ſenſible of the vanity of all human grandeur, he formed the reſolution of reſigning his princely honors. He placed the imperial crown on the head of his brother Ferdinand, and appointed his ſon Philip king of Spain, 25th Oct. 1555, and, to the aſtoniſhment of the world, retired to the privacy of a monaſtic life. In the monaſtery of St. Juſte, on the borders of Caſtile, Charles attempted to forget the temptations of ſovereign power, but whilſt his hours were paſſed in the cultivation of his garden, in mechanical purſuits, and monaſtic diſcipline, ſome have imagined that he ſighed for the dignities, which he had ſuperſtitiouſly abandoned. That he evinced his contempt of mortal honors, appears by his celebrating his own obſequies in his lifetime, and wiſhing to be forgotten by the world. This farce of ſepulture ſoon became real, the following day he was attacked by a violent fever which proved proved fatal the 22d Sept. 1558. With weakneſſes, Charles poſſeſſed great virtues, and his reign is intereſting in the hiſtory of Europe, by the ſchiſm which ſhook the power of Rome, and eſtabliſhed the proteſtant tenets, and by the revolution in commerce, ſcience, and navigation, which the diſcoveries of Columbus effected.

CHARLES VI. fifth ſon of the emperor Leopold, was proclaimed, in 1703, king of Spain, under the title of Charles III. Though oppoſed by Philip V. he continued the war of ſucceſſion; and when emperor of Germany, 1711, he ſtill maintained his claim, by the valor of his generals. In 1714, Charles obtained, in exchange for Spain, the kingdoms of Naples and Sardinia, the Netherlands, and Milan and Mantua. In 1716 a war was undertaken againſt the Turks. The quadruple alliance in 1728, between Vienna, England, France, and the States general, enabled the emperor to obtain an equivalent for Sardinia, which the Spaniards had rapidly conquered. By the pragmatic ſanction, Charles could give his Auſtrian ſtates, in default of male iſſue, to his daughters; and he might have cloſed his reign in honorable peace, had he not interfered in the affairs of Poland. He died 1740, aged 55, and was the 16th and laſt emperor of the houſe of Auſtria in the male line.

CHARLES VII. ſon of Maximilian Emanuel, elector of Bavaria, ſucceeded as elector 1726; and upon the death of Charles VI. he laid claim to Bohemia, Auſtria, and the Tyrol, and refuſed to acknowledge the pragmatic ſanction, and the rights of Maria Thereſa to the imperial throne. Supported by Lewis XV. he was crowned king of Bohemia, at Prague, and emperor at Frankfort, 1742; but Maria Thereſa, ſupported by the Engliſh, defeated the French and Bavarian forces, and Charles in his turn found himſelf poſſeſſed only of the empty title of emperor. He died ſoon after 1745, aged 48.

CHARLES I. king of Spain, was Charles V. emperor of Germany.

CHARLES II. ſon and ſucceſſor of Philip IV. in Spain, 1665, was twice married, but had no iſſue. By his will, made 1698, he called to the Spaniſh throne the prince of Bavaria, the nephew of his queen; but, in 1700, he declared Philip of Anjou his ſucceſſor. He died the ſame year, aged 39; and the unſettled ſucceſſion proved the ſource of civil diſcord. Charles was the laſt of the eldeſt branch of Auſtria, who reigned in Spain.

CHARLES III. king of Spain, on the death of his brother Ferdinand VI. 1759, exchanged Sicily for the Spaniſh dominions. His attempts to raiſe the Spaniards from their natural indolence proved abortive, and though, in the war with England, he retook Minorca, he ſaw his commerce ruined, and his treaſures at Havannah fall into the hands of his enemies. He died 1789.

CHARLES I. king of England, ſon of James I. and Anne of Denmark, was born at Dumferling, 1600. On his father's acceſſion, he was created duke of York, and on the death of his brother Henry he became prince of Wales. He ſucceeded his father in 1625, and that year married Henrietta, daughter of Henry the great, whom he had admired at Paris during his romantic excurſion to ſee the infanta of Spain. The Spaniſh war in which the kingdom was engaged was conducted with ill ſucceſs by the favorite Buckingham; and when the parliament inveighed againſt him, Charles, inſtead of diſmiſſing, reſolved to ſupport him. Another parliament proved equally unruly, and was diſſolved with equal indignation by the monarch, who now began to raiſe ſupplies by his own authority, under the name of loans and ſhip-money. This rendered him more unpopular; and when Buckingham failed in his attempts to relieve Rochelle, in 1627, the exhauſted ſtate of the treaſury rendered the calling of a new parliament neceſſary. Charles obtained, with difficulty indeed, ſome ſupplies; but, in return, he was attacked with grievances, and aſſented to the petition of right, which explained the rights of the ſubject. The concluſion of the war with France and Spain rendered Charles leſs dependent on his parliament, which he diſſolved, with the reſolution of never calling another. After Buckingham's death, the king placed his confidence on no miniſter with equal ſatisfaction; but whilſt more mild meaſures were expected, diſſatisfaction was kindled by the raiſing of ſhip-money. The meaſure was ſupported by the practice of former reigns, and the opinion of the judges; but the arbitrary proceedings of former reigns were ill calculated to inſure obedience, when the neceſſity of parliamentary controul was loudly proclaimed. Hampden oppoſed the tax; and though condemned by the exchequer, he rejoiced in the ſtruggle which his ſingle arm had waged againſt the government. The attempt to enforce the reading of the liturgy in Scotland excited the ſame ferment in the north which prevailed in the ſouth; and when the Scotch had bound themſelves by the ſolemn league and covenant, and had aſſembled an army to ſupport their claims, Charles had the weakneſs to propoſe a negociation, inſtead of giving battle; and while he withdrew his forces, he obſerved that his enemies, inſtead of diſbanding, were encreaſing their means of offence. In 1640 another parliament was called, but ſoon diſſolved; yet he had recourſe again to a popular election. This parliament, called the long parliament, met in November 1640; and they did not ſeparate till they had effected the ruin of the king. Inſtead of liſtening to the monarch, they exclaimed againſt his arbitrary meaſures; and to ſtrip the monarchy of all the wiſdom of faithful adviſers, impeachment and perſecution were denounced againſt the miniſters. Straſford was tried, and condemned, though Charles oppoſed the unavailing ſhield of royalty to ſave him, and Laud ſoon after was dragged to the ſcaffold. To ſerve the king ſeemed now to be a crime; and Charles, unable to ſtem againſt the torrent of popular fury, agreed to the abolition of the court of the ſtar chamber, the high commiſſion, and other offices, the bulwark of the monarchy. In Ireland, in the mean time, the moſt horrid maſſacres were perpetrated, while the monarch was publicly branded as the author of miſeries, which he could neither foreſee nor prevent. Epiſcopacy was next declared to be unneceſſary; and the biſhops who repreſented againſt their perſecutors were ſent in diſgrace to the Tower, as guilty of treaſon. Inſtead of conciliating popularity, Charles encreaſed the virulence of the commons, by appearing in the houſe, and impeaching five of the members. This ſtep ought to have been ſupported or never adopted; but Charles, retiring to Windſor, wrote a letter to the parliament to excuſe his conduct, and thus rendered himſelf ridiculous. The parliament in the meantime had called upon the militia of the city for their defence, and the king, who found that nothing but force could reſtore him to his conſequence in the nation, retired to Nottingham, where, Auguſt 25, 1642, he erected the royal ſtandard. This was a declaration of war, which the parliament were not backward to acknowledge. Various battles were fought at Edgehill, &c. with various ſucceſs, but all the advantages which the monarch had gained were unhappily loſt in the fight of Naſeby, 4th June, 1645, where, after diſplaying the intrepidity of the ableſt general, Charles was obliged to fly. Thus without reſources, and ſhut up at Oxford, ignorant whom to truſt, Charles formed the fatal reſolution of throwing himſelf upon the mercy of the Scotch army. He left Oxford in diſguiſe, and in nine days appeared in the Scotch army at Newark, but inſtead of being received as a monarch, he ſaw himſelf a priſoner, and ſoon learnt that he was ſold to the Engliſh parliament for the ſum of 200,000l. Charles, conveyed a priſoner to Holmby-caſtle, and to Hampton court, had the art to effect his eſcape to the iſle of Wight. But here he was made a priſoner in Cariſbrooke-caſtle, and when removed to Hurſt-caſtle and to Windſor, he diſcovered that the rudeneſs with which he was treated was the prelude to a melancholy tragedy. The republicans were ſenſible that their power could never be conſolidated till the king was no more, and therefore clamor was raiſed to paſs ſentence upon him. Brought before this ſelf-created court of juſtice, over which Bradſhaw, a worthleſs lawyer, preſided, Charles diſplayed the uſual independence of his character. Refuſing to acknowledge the authority of his judges, he betrayed no violent emotions of indignation; he was the meek, the patient, the reſigned chriſtian, who yielded with all the dignity of conſcious innocence to the power which uſurpation had erected for his deſtruction. He heard the ſentence of death pronounced againſt him with compoſure, and the three days allowed to prepare for another world, were paſſed in the affectionate duties of recommending forgiveneſs of injuries, and the practice of every virtue to his children, and in the becoming offices of a penitent chriſtian. On the ſcaffold, which to inſult him, was erected in the front of his palace of Whitehall, he preſerved his uſual compoſure, and after converſing with Juxon biſhop of London, who attended him, he gave the ſignal to the maſked executioner, who cut off his head at one blow, 30th January, 1648. The remains of the martyred monarch were removed to Windſor, and rudely interred by order of the parliament without the burial ſervice being read over them. Though miſrepreſented by political opponents, Charles muſt be conſidered as a great man; and whoever wiſhes to form a judgment of his character, muſt view him as the ſucceſſor to an almoſt arbitrary power, as the monarch of a turbulent nation, as the bulwark of what he conſidered as the conſtitution and the happineſs of his country, and as the ſteady oppoſer of bold unprincipled innovators, whoſe conduct was ſeldom guided by any but perſonal views. As a domeſtic character, he was amiable and exemplary, and as a man of letters, his abilities were reſpectable. In his intercourſe with the parliament, he often alone was oppoſed to the inſinuating language and ſophiſtical arguments of numerous delegates, but none ever left him without admiring his firmneſs, the acuteneſs of his remarks, the propriety of his anſwers, and the general intelligence and powerful elocution with which he ſupported his converſation. Though his enemies have attempted to rob him of the merit of writing the Icon Baſilike, a pathetic compoſition which operated in his favor like the teſtament of Cæſar at Rome, and which required the abilities of Milton to vilify it, yet he is now generally imagined to be the author of it, and not Gauden.

CHARLES II. king of England, after his father the firſt Charles, was born 1630. He heard at the Hague of the tragical death of his father, and ſoon after, at the invitation of the Scotch, who wiſhed to wipe away their former treachery to his predeceſſor, he came privately to Scotland, and was crowned at Scone in 1651. Charles here felt himſelf ſurrounded by all the jealouſy of the republicans, and the fanaticiſm of the preſbyterians, and rejoiced in the defeat of his followers at Dunbar, as it ſet him free from ſuſpicious adviſers. From Scotland Charles proceeded to Worceſter, where he was totally defeated by Cromwell, and he eſcaped with great difficulty. After concealing himſelf in the branches of an oak in Boſcobel wood, where he ſaw his enemies in purſuit of him, and after diſguiſing himſelf as a wood cutter, a peaſant, a ſervant, &c.

&c. he at last reached Brighton, and embarked for France. Monk at last had the loyalty to declare in his favor, and on his birth-day 1660, he was restored to the throne of his ancestors. But unhappily, while the fanaticism of the republicans was exposed to ridicule, neither virtue nor temperance accompanied the return of the monarch. Charles did not possess the amiable qualities of his father; though affable and good-natured, he was licentious and immoral. Those who had suffered in the cause of his father were disregarded, while infidelity was countenanced, and patronage extended to the worthless and the profligate. Though Charles had married in 1662 the princess of Portugal, he kept several mistresses by whom he had children, on whom he lavished the honors due only to the sons of virtue and merit. As a monarch he was little attached to the glory of England. Dunkirk, so long the pride of the English, was sold to France to supply his extravagance, and war was undertaken in 1663 against the Dutch, the Danes, and the French. Long accustomed to victory, the English were terrified at the sight of a Dutch fleet in the Medway; and while they reflected on the weakness of the government, a dreadful plague came to destroy thousands of the inhabitants of London, in 1665, and the next year a conflagration laid the fairest part of the city in ruins. Peace with the Dutch, in 1667, was followed by the disgrace of Clarendon, and the elevation of those unprincipled favorites called the cabal to power. Charles scrupled not to receive a pension from the French king; and, in virtue of that alliance, he undertook a new war against the Dutch. Whilst the peace of Nimeguen, in 1678, restored tranquillity, the English were alarmed by rumors of plots, and the arts of Oates, Bedloe, and others, were called forth to give popularity to the monarch, by sacrificing Russel and Sydney to the cries of faction. The whole of the reign of this licentious monarch contains little to recommend him to the respect of posterity; though the habeas corpus act, and the bill to exclude the duke of York from the throne, because he was a papist, were passed into law. Charles died suddenly of an apoplexy, 1685, leaving no issue by his queen. It is said, that he received the sacrament from a popish priest, and thus convinced the world, that in supporting the church of England he had acted the part of an hypocritical friend.

Charles Gustavus X. son of John Casimir, ascended the Swedish throne, 1654. He attacked the Poles, and, by his famous victory at Warsaw, he became master of the whole country, from Dantzic to Cracow. Fortune, however, proved inconstant, and Casimir king of Poland, assisted by Leopold, recovered all his lost provinces, and drove his enemy back to Sweden. Charles turned his arms against the Danes, and marched to the gates of Copenhagen; but soon after found his victories checked by the misfortunes which befel his flag. He died at Gottenburg, 1660, aged only 37.

Charles XI. was son and successor of the preceding. The war with Denmark was renewed by Christiern V. in 1674; but though Charles proved victorious, and obtained possession of Helmstadt, Lunden, &c. he lost Pomerania; which, however, the peace of Nimeguen restored to him in 1676. He died 1697, aged 42, at a time when his wisdom had marked him as the mediator and umpire of the peace of Ryswick.

Charles XII. of Sweden, was born 1682. From his earliest years he glowed to imitate the heroic character of Alexander; and, in his eagerness to reign, he caused himself to be declared king at the age of 15, and at his coronation seized the crown from the archbishop of Upsal, and set it on his own head. His youth seemed to invite the attacks of Poland, Denmark, and Russia; but Charles, though scarce 18, wisely determined to assail his enemies one after the other. He besieged Copenhagen, and so terrified the Danish monarch, that, in less than six weeks, he obliged him to sue for peace. From Denmark Charles marched against the Russians; and though only with 8000 men, he attacked the enemy, who were besieging Narva with 100,000 men. The conflict was dreadful, 30,000 were slain, 20,000 asked for quarter, and the rest were taken or destroyed; while the Swedes had only 1200 killed, and 800 wounded. From Narva, Charles advanced into Poland, defeated the Saxons, and obliged the Polish king to renounce his crown, and to acknowledge Stanislaus for his successor. Had Charles been now reconciled to the Russians, he might have become a great monarch, but determined to dethrone the czar, he advanced into Ukraine, whilst his enemies fled on every side before him. The battle of Pultowa proved unfortunate, July 1709, Charles wounded, fled from the field, and sought protection at Bender from the Turks. His affairs were now desperate, Augustus was restored to the Polish throne, and the grand seignor, tired of his guest, wished him to be removed from his dominions. Charles, with only 40 domestics, opposed for some days a Turkish army, and when obliged to submit, he feigned sickness, and during 10 months he lay in bed. At last he left his confinement, and travelling post reached in 11 days Stralsund, from which he crossed to Sweden. Untamed by misfortunes, he invaded Norway, with an army of 20,000 men, but at the siege of Frederickshall, while visiting the works, he was struck by a canon ball, and expired on the spot, 12th December, 1718. Charles, in his imitation of Alexander, converted his firmness into obstinacy, and severity into cruelty. He possessed nothing of the great qualities or the amiable virtues of the hero, though he was bold even to madneſs, and perſevering even to his ruin. At the battle of Narva, when five of his horſes were ſhot, he exclaimed as he mounted a freſh charger, "theſe people find me exerciſe." When one day dictating to his ſecretary at Stralſund, a bomb fell on the roof of the houſe, and cruſhed the room next where they were ſitting. But while the ſecretary dropped his pen, all terrified, the monarch aſked calmly what was the matter: "The bomb!" replies the ſecretary. "The bomb! cries the monarch, what has the bomb to do with what I am dictating; write on."

CHARLES I. king of Naples, was brother to St. Lewis of France, whom he accompanied in his Egyptian expedition, where he ſhared his captivity. On his return to Europe, he as the huſband of Beatrix the heireſs of Provence, aſſumed the rights of a ſovereign, and conquered Arles, Marſeilles, &c. and afterwards marched againſt Manfroi the Sicilian uſurper. Manfroi was defeated, 1265, and the year after put to death, and the conqueror aſſumed the title of king of Naples and Sicily. The widow of Manfroi and his ſon ſhared alſo his untimely fate. Though ſucceſs followed the monarch in his expeditions againſt Tunis and the Ghibelines, yet his cruel maſſacres excited the hatred of his ſubjects. An inſurrection was formed, and the Sicilians on Eaſter monday 1282 ſacrificed 8000 Frenchman to their fury, on the ringing of the bells for evening ſervice, which cataſtrophe is ſtill handed down to execration, under the name of Sicilian Veſpers. Charles died 1285, tortured by the reflection, that his cruelty had occaſioned ſo much bloodſhed. Charles, though an arbitrary, was a politic prince, and to his dominions in Italy and in France he added the ſounding title of king of Jeruſalem.

CHARLES II. king of Naples ſurnamed the lame, was a priſoner in the hands of the Sicilians, who wiſhed in his death to avenge the cruelties of his father. The execution was ſtopped by Conſtance of Arragon, whoſe huſband laid claim to the Sicilian crown, and Charles, ſaved from death, directed all his powers to the recovery of his father's dominions. He prevailed, and was crowned king at Rome, and then zealouſly promoted the arts of peace and of commerce, and religion among his ſubjects. He died at Naples 1309, aged 61.

CHARLES III. king of Naples, was grandſon of the preceding, and by his marriage with Margaret the niece of Joan of Naples, he obtained the kingdom, 1380, on the excommunication of that princeſs. He cruelly put the depoſed queen to death. He was killed in his attempts to obtain the crown of Hungary 1386, aged 41.

CHARLES II. king of Navarre, was ſurnamed the bad. Cruelty and artifice marked his conduct, he cauſed to be aſſaſſinated Charles of Spain, and when arreſted by the order of king John, his father-in-law, he not only contrived to regain his liberty, but cauſed ſlow poiſon to be adminiſtered to the dauphin, his brother-in-law. Unable to place himſelf on the throne of France, he favored the Engliſh who invaded the kingdom, and where he could not ſucceed by force, he effected his purpoſes by poiſon or aſſaſſination. His death in 1387, in his 55th year, was extraordinary. His phyſicians had ordered him to be wrapped up in clothes dipped in brandy and fulphur, to revive a conſtitution weakened by debauchery, and while the operation was performing, his ſervant dropped a taper on the inflammable linen, which caught fire, and conſumed the unhappy man before he could be extricated.

CHARLES MARTEL, ſon of Pepin Heriſtal, obtained great power as duke of Auſtraſia, and by defeating Chilperic II. he made himſelf maſter of France. Inſtead of aſcending the throne, he was ſatisfied with the title of mayor of the palace. He waged war againſt the Saxons; and in a battle againſt the Saracens, in which he ſlew Abderam the chief, it is ſaid, that not leſs than 375,000 of the enemy were deſtroyed. So much valor rendered him popular, and at the death of Thierri 737, Charles retained in his hands the reins of government, under the title of the duke of the Franks. He died 741, reſpected as a father, and a benevolent prince. His ſons Carloman and Pepin inherited his dominions, and Pepin became the firſt king of the Carlovingian race.

CHARLES, duke of Burgundy, ſurnamed the warrior, and the raſh, was ſon of Philip the good. He conquered the people of Liege and Ghent, and carried his arms againſt Lewis XI. of France whom he took priſoner. He met a ſevere check in Switzerland, and another defeat ruined his army, and drove him away in diſgrace. He was ſlain 1477, as he was endeavouring to eſcape from the ſiege of Nanci.

CHARLES I. duke of Lorraine, laid claim to the crown of France on the death of his nephew Lewis; but was defeated and taken priſoner. He died 994, aged 41.

CHARLES II. duke of Lorraine, ſon of duke John, died 1430.

CHARLES IV. duke of Lorraine, was fond of military glory, and was engaged in frequent diſputes with Lewis XIII. Though twice ſtripped of his dominions by the French, his ambition refuſed to enjoy tranquillity, and embracing the cauſe of the Spaniards, he expoſed himſelf to new troubles. He was ſeized by Condé, and impriſoned at Antwerp and Toledo, and not reſtored to liberty till the ſigning of the Pyrenean treaty. In 1662, he reſigned his dominions to Lewis XIV. provided he was acknowledged in France as a prince of the blood royal; afterwards, he joined the emperor, and though defeated by Turenne 1674, he repaired his military reputation, and after routing the French, he took Crequi at Treves. He died soon after at Birkenfield 1675, aged 72.

Charles V. of Lorraine, nephew of the preceding, early entered into the service of Leopold and acquired military glory in his campaigns in Hungary. In 1674, he was candidate for the crown of Poland, but could not secure his election. He took Philipsburg in 1676, and the following year married the queen dowager of Poland, sister to the emperor. Afterwards he was engaged against the Turks, and with the powerful assistance of John Sobieski, he drove them from the walls of Vienna. Buda would have fallen had not his progress been arrested by a violent fever, but he recovered to defeat the Turks at Mohatz in 1687. He was afterwards employed against the French in Flanders, but died after taking Mentz 1690, in his 49th year. Lewis XIV. said of him, that he was the wisest and the most generous of his enemies.

Charles Alexander, of Lorraine, grandson of the preceding, was governor of the Low Coutries. He was opposed to the king of Prussia, and in his campaigns in Bohemia and in Germany, he acquired great glory. Though defeated by the king of Prussia he routed his generals in two engagements. He died 1780, aged 68.

Charles, Emanuel, duke of Savoy, surnamed the great, signalized himself in the battles of Vigo, Chatillon, &c. and seized Provence and Dauphiné, and laid claims to the throne of France, on the death of Henry III. He next aspired to the kingdom of Cyprus, and at last attempted to seize, in 1602, the town of Geneva, in the midst of a profound peace. This was resented by the Genevese, who hanged as public robbers a few of his followers. He next claimed the dominions of Mantua, and by the insidious advice of the French, he attacked Genoa. On the death of the emperor Matthias, he became a candidate for the imperial crown. He died at Savillon 1630, aged 78.

Charles, Emanuel, II. son of Victor Amadeus I. succeeded to the dukedom of Savoy 1638, though only four years old. His minority induced the Spaniards to attack him, but the interference of France, and the peace of the Pyrenees, restored him to all his possessions. He was a benevolent prince, who regarded the happiness of his people of greater value than foreign conquests. In cultivating peace, and in improving the commerce of his subjects, he made a commodious road through an arch of 500 paces long in a rock, between Dauphiné and Savoy, and embellished Turin and other places in his dominions. The last part of his life was imbittered by the revolt of his subjects in the Vaudois, who complained of the oppression of his governors. He died 1675.

Charles, Emanuel, III. son of Victor Amadeus II. succeeded on the abdication of his father 1730. He embraced the projects of France and Spain to humble the Austrians, and after the victory of Guastalla, he obtained some territories in the Milanese. He afterwards in 1742, joined the queen of Hungary against his two former allies, and though often unsuccessful, he defended himself even against superior numbers. He was mild and economical in his administration, abuses were corrected, salutary forms were introduced, vice and luxury checked, and a new code of laws more humane was established. He died 1773, aged 72.

Charles, Edward, grandson of James II. of England, is known by the name of the pretender. In 1745, at the age of 25, when the Scotch inclined to resist the Hanoverian family, he landed in Scotland, and proclaimed his father king, and fixed his residence at Edinburgh, with all the parade of royalty. By a masterly attack, he defeated at Prestonpans, the forces opposed to him under sir John Cope, but by delaying to take advantage of the terrors of his enemies, he contributed to his own ruin, and though he afterwards advanced as far as Manchester and Derby, he soon found the people recovered from their panic, unanimous against him. On his rapid return to Scotland, he routed Hawley at Falkirk, but on the approach of the duke of Cumberland, he retreated till the hostile troops met at Culloden, to decide the fate of the kingdom. The Scotch fought with accustomed bravery, but the English prevailed, and Charles escaped from the battle leaving dead 3600 of his adherents. Though a large reward was offered for his head, the peasants of Scotland pitied his misfortunes, and even those of his enemies, who were acquainted with his retreat, kept inviolate the fatal secret, and condemning his ambition, commiserated his distresses. He escaped to St. Maloes and never again revisited the British dominions. He died at Florence 1788. His brother, Henry Benedict, cardinal York, when plundered by the French revolution, was honorably relieved by the English monarch, and received a liberal pension to soothe the misfortunes of his old age.

Charleton, Walter, a physician born at Shepton Mallet, and educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford. He became eminent in his profession, published several works, and was physician to both the Charles'. He was one of the first members of the royal society, and in 1689, was president of the college of physicians. He retired to Jersey, where he died 1707, aged 87. His best work is Stonehenge restored to the Danes, 4to.

Charleval, Charles Faucon de Rey lord of, a French writer of genius. Though of a weak constitution, by adhering to proper regimen he attained the age of 80, and died 1693. His works appeared 1759 in 12mo. His epigrams and other poems are much admired.

Charlevoix, Peter Fr. Xavier de, a Jesuit of St. Quentin, famous for his travels, and his authentic historical compositions. He died 1761, aged 78. He wrote the history of Japan, 2 vols 4to. and 6 vols. 12mo.—History of St Domingo, 2 vols 4to.—History of New France, 3 vols. 4to.—and of Paraguay, 6 vols. 12mo.

CHARNOCK, Stephen, of London, studied at Emanuel, Cambridge, and removed to Oxford He was an eloquent presbyterian preacher in Ireland, and chaplain to Henry Cromwell, but on the restoration, unwilling to conform, he preached in private meetings. He died 1680, aged 52. His works are in 2 vols. folio. His discourse on providence is admired.

CHARPENTIER, Francis, of Paris, was for his learning recommended to Colbert, for whom he wrote a discourse to prepare the establishment of an East India company. He was member of the new founded academy of medals and inscriptions, and contributed to the noble series of medals struck in the reign of Lewis XIV. He died 1702, aged 82. Besides harangues and discourses delivered, he wrote poems, sonnets, and odes.

CHARRON, Peter, a learned Frenchman. He was educated at Orleans and Bourges, but after applying to the law, he became an ecclesiastic, and as an eloquent preacher soon acquired popularity. At Bourdeaux he became acquainted with Montaigne, who treated him with great kindness. His publication of the three truths in 1594, recommended him to the bishop of Cahors, who made him his vicar general. He was afterwards presented to the chantership of the church of the bishop of Condom, and in 1601 he printed his books "of wisdom," which spread his fame through the kingdom. He died at Paris 1603, of an apoplexy. Of his works the best known is "of wisdom," two translations of which have appeared in England.

CHARTIER, Alan, of Bayeux, secretary to Charles VI. and VII. of France, was employed in some embassies, but acquired greater celebrity as a writer. He died 1449. His works consist of poetry and prose. His brother John was author of the great chronicles of France from Pharamond to the death of Charles VII. in three vols. fol. &c.

CHASSENEUX, Bartholomew de, a French lawyer, who boldly opposed the prosecution of the Vaudois, a religious sect who refused to acknowledge the authority of the pope, for which he was poisoned 1541. He was author of a work on the customs of France, and other things.

CHASTEL, John, son of a woolen-draper at Paris attempted the life of Henry IV. of France 1594. He was then only 19. The blow was so sudden that he nearly escaped, but it is said that the wildness of his looks betrayed him. He confessed that from the wickedness of his past life, he was doomed to eternal torments in another life, and that to make them more tolerable, he wished to do some great action. He was condemned to have the flesh of his arms and thighs torn off with red hot pincers, his right hand cut off, and afterwards his body drawn and quartered by four horses pulling different ways. This was executed 1594, and at the same time the jesuits, at whose instigation the crime had been committed, were banished from the kingdom.

CHASTELLUX, Francis John, marquis de, field marshal of France, is well known by his writings. He was member of the French academy, and died at Paris 1788. His chief works are on public happiness, 8vo. translated into English,—travels in North America, 8vo. also translated into English. This last work is far from popular in America, where the author had served during the American war.

CHAT DE RASTIGNAC, Raymond de, opposed the league, and behaved with great bravery in various battles. He was killed at la Fere, 1696.

CHAT DE RASTIGNAC, Lewis James de, of the same family as the preceding, was bishop of Tours, and died respected 1750, aged 63. He wrote some discourses, harangues, &c. His benevolence was conspicuous during an inundation of the Loire, when he was the common father of the poor who had been driven from their habitations.

CHATEAU BRUN, John Baptist Vivien de, of Angouleme, died 1775, aged 89. Besides Philoctetes, Astyanax, and Mahomet II., tragedies, he wrote les Troyennes, which is evidently his best play, and which he kept by him 40 years before he produced it before the public.

CHATEL, Tanneguy de, a French general, born in Britany. He defeated Ladislaus who had usurped the crown of Naples, and distinguished himself at the battle of Agincourt, and supported the Dauphin against the Burgundians. He afterwards effected a reconciliation, but brutally advised the dauphin to assassinate the unsuspecting duke of Burgundy 1419. On the dauphin's elevation to the throne, Chatel was made grand master of the household. He died 1449. His nephew of the same name, is known for his attachment to Charles VII. whom he attended in his last moments and buried at his own expence.

CHATEL, Peter du, or CASTELLANUS, a native of Arc, educated at Dijon. He assisted Erasmus in his translations, and was press corrector to Frobenius at Basil, after which he travelled to Egypt and Syria. On his return to Europe he became private reader to Francis I. who made him bishop of Tulle and afterwards of Macon, from which he was translated by Henry II. to Orleans where he died 1552. He wrote two funeral orations on Francis I. and a Latin letter against Charles V. &c.

CHATELARD, N. du, a gentleman of Dauphiné, who became passionately fond of Mary queen of Scots, and concealed himself in her chamber, when she was returning to Scotland, Scotland, after the death of her husband Francis. For this imprudent conduct which it is said the queen had countenanced, he was condemned to death.

CHATELET, Gabrielle Emilie marchioness &c, a learned French lady, born 1706. She aspired to high distinction in science and philosophy, and by her valuable works rivalled Leibnitz and Newton. Her institutes of physic addressed to her son is a work of merit. Her intense application shortened her life. She died 1749, aged 43. She translated the institutes of Leibnitz and the principia of Newton.

CHATTERTON, Thomas, an extraordinary youth of Bristol born 1752. He was taught reading, writing, and arithmetic, at a charity school on St. Augustin's Back, and at the age of 14 he was articled to an attorney at Bristol. This employment, however, was not congenial to his turn of mind, he devoted himself more to poetry, antiquities, and heraldry, than to law; and early in 1769, some of his compositions appeared in the periodical publications of the time. In 1770 he left Bristol and came to London, but though he flattered the great, and espoused in political pieces the cause both of the ministry and of opposition, and though courteously treated by Beckford in the height of his popularity, his income was inferior to his wants. Though a liberal contributor to the Gospel Magazine, the Town and country, the Court and City, the London, the Political register, &c. he found himself indignantly dependent upon the booksellers, and a prey to the severest indigence, so that in a fit of dispair he destroyed himself by poison August 1770 Though possessed of great genius, Chatterton was irascible and impetuous, and it has been said by his biographer that he had all the irregularities of youth. His name is known in controversial history. He published a number of poems, which he described as written about 300 years before by Rowley, a Bristowyan monk, and when pressed for the originals, he refused them, declaring that he had received them from his father whose family had for nearly 150 years been sextons of Redcliff church in Bristol, and that till then they had remained buried in dust in an old chest over the chapel. This story, which Chatterton always supported as true, called forth the attention of the learned, and whilst some beheld in the poems all the marks of genuine antiquity, others considered them as a literary forgery, by the artifice of an ingenious, though ill educated youth, of 17. To Mr. Catcot of Bristol, the public are indebted for the best part of the poems, who procured them from Chatterton. They were published in 1777. in one volume 8vo. by Tyrwhitt, and republished in 1778; and while Bryant, Milles and others considered Rowley as the real author, T. Warton, Walpole, and others represented them as the authentic production of Chatterton, who thus wished to disguise the first efforts of his muse by assuming the name of antiquity.

CHAUCER, Geoffrey, a poet denominated by Dryden the father of English poetry. He was born in London 1328, and studied at Cambridge, and afterwards at Oxford, and then travelled upon the continent. He entered at the Inner Temple, and was made page to the king, and rewarded with a pension of 20 marks. He was afterwards gentleman of the chamber to the king, and after being employed to negociate with the republic of Genoa, for ships for a naval armanent, Edward repaid his services by granting him a pitcher of wine daily to be delivered by the butler of England. He was afterwards comptroller of the customs of London for wool, &c. and was employed as commissioner to the French court on the violation of the truce. These high favors which made his income not less than 1000l. a year, were confirmed by Richard, Edward's successor, but Chaucer by embracing Wickliffe's tenets gave offence to the clergy, and though he escaped by flight, he was imprisoned. He soon after removed from the intrigues of public life, and at Woodstock, and afterwards at Donnington, he devoted himself to the cultivation of his muse. He died 1400. He left two sons, Thomas who was speaker of the commons in Henry IV.'s reign, and Lewis. His wife's name was Philippa Rouet, of Hainault, and as her sister Catharine, widow of sir Hugh Swinford, was married to John of Ghaunt duke of Lancaster, after the death of Blanche, Chaucer shared the favors of royalty, and was indebted for some of his honors to the influence of his brother-in-law. The poetry of Chaucer, though in the idiom of the 14th century, is not devoid of smoothness and delicacy, the sentiments are bold, the characters well supported, and the genius of the poet is every where brilliant, sprightly, and sublime. Of all his poems the Canterbury tales possess the greatest merit. They have been learnedly edited by Mr. Tyrwhitt, 5 vols. 8vo. The life of the poet has been published by Godwin, in two ponderous vols 4to.

CHAULIEU, William, a native of Normandy, educated at Paris. He was for the liveliness of his genius courted by the duke of Rochefoucault, by Marsillac, by the duchess of Bouillon, and by the duke of Vendome, who gave him a priorate in the isle of Oleron, with an income of 28000 livres, and afterwards the abbies of Pouliers, &c. In the midst of affluence and conviviality, he gave vent to the sallies of his muse, and alleviated the pains of an obstinate gout, by composing epigrams and sonnets for the amusement of his friends, and the derision of his enemies. Though a perfect master of all the graces of poetry, and deservedly stiled the Anacreon of France, he had no wish of presenting his poems before the public, and they remained scattered in the hands of his friends till collected by Camusac and St. Mark. Beſides letters in proſe, and epiſtles in verſe, they contain elegies, ballads, madrigals, airs, and all the charming trifles of a careleſs, wanton, and ſportive muſe. Chaulieu died 1726, at the great age of 81.

CHAUMETTE, Peter Gaſpard, ſon of a cobler, was born at Nevers 1763. He appeared as one of the boldeſt at the taking of the Baſtille, and diſplayed all the violence and zeal of a demagogue. United with Hebert he for a while guided the ſanguinary multitude, and propoſed, with the feaſts of the goddeſs of reaſon, thoſe walking guillotines which were to purge France of all her royaliſts, and her ſuſpected citizens. After being guilty of the moſt atrocious cruelties, he was ſent before the revolutionary tribunal by Robeſpierre, and when on the ſcaffold propheſied that his fall would ſoon be followed by that of his enemies. He was guillotined 1794. A " precis hiſtorique," on life is attributed to him.

CHAUNCEY, Charles, a nonconformiſt divine, who migrated from Ware, Hertfordſhire, to America, where he became preſident of Harward college, and died 1671. His ſon Iſaac afterwards came to England, and ſettled at Andover as a diſſenting miniſter, but ſoon after practiſed phyſic in London, where he died about 1700. He wrote an eſſay on Daniel's prophecy, &c.

CHAUNCY, Henry, was educated at Biſhop Stortford ſchool, and Gonvil college, Cambridge, and entered at the Middle Temple. He was knighted by Charles II. 1681, and ſeven years after made a ſerjeant at law, and a Welſh judge. He died 1700. He is author of the hiſtorical antiquities of Hertfordſhire in one vol. fol.

CHAUVEAU, Francis a painter and engraver of Paris, who died there 1676, aged 63. Not leſs than 4000 pieces are mentioned as engraved by him, and 400 executed from his deſigns. His ſon Rene poſſeſſed his genius.

CHAZELLES, John Matthew, a French mathematician, born at Lyons 1657. He aſſiſted Caſſini in the meaſurement of the meridian line. In 1684, he inſtructed the duke of Mortemar in mathematics, and was appointed hydrography profeſſor for the gallies of Marſeilles, where he made valuable obſervations, and drew a new map of the coaſt of Provence, beſides plans of harbours and forts. He viſited Greece and Egypt, and firſt obſerved in his meaſurement of the great pyramid, that its four corners exactly correſpond to the four cardinal points of the world. He died 1710. Beſides his voyage to the Levant, he contributed greatly to the improvement of the Neptune François.

CHEKE, John, a learned Engliſhman, born at Cambridge, 1514, and educated at St. John's college. He was profeſſor of Greek in the univerſity, and in 1544, he was tutor with ſir Anthony Cooke, to prince Edward. On the acceſſion of his pupil to the throne, he was rewarded with an annuity of 100 marks, and a grant of land, and appointed provoſt of king's college. In 1551 he was knighted, and afterwards made ſecretary of ſtate. On the acceſſion of Mary he travelled abroad, but after ſupporting himſelf at Straſburg by teaching Greek, he was ſeized on his return between Bruſſels and Antwerp, by Philip of Spain, and ſent like a traitor to London. Perſecuted for his religion, he, when offered to chuſe between the faggot and popery, abjured his faith and was received by cardinal Pole into the catholic church. A confeſſion ſo violently extorted and ſo raſhly given preyed now upon his ſpirits, and ſhortened his days. He died of ſhame and remorſe 1557, aged 43. His works were numerous and valuable. Thoſe beſt known are the hurt of ſedition, againſt the inſurgents, 1549,—epiſtles on the death of Bucer,—de pronunciatione Græcæ potiſſimum linguæ diſputationes, &c. He was conſidered as one of the moſt learned men of his age, but his attempts to improve the pronunciation of Greek was regarded by biſhop Gardiner as hereſy, and therefore forbidden.

CHEMIN, Catherine du, a French lady, eminent for painting flowers. She died at Paris, 1698.

CHEMNITZ, Martin, a Lutheran divine, born at Britzen in Branbenburg. He ſtudied at Magdeburg and Frankfort on the Oder, and afterwards taught a ſchool in Pruſſia, and became librarian to the prince. He returned to Wittemberg, where his friend Melanchthon lived, and then removed to Brunſwick, where he died after 30 years' reſidence 1586, aged 64. His works are Harmonia evangeliorum —a treatiſe againſt the Jeſuits—& examen concilii Tridentini, a valuable performance.

CHEMNITZ, Boreſlaus Philip, grandſon of the above, was born at Stettin, and died 1678, aged 73. He ſerved in the armies of Holland and Sweden, and became counſellor of ſtate and hiſtoriographer to Chriſtina. His hiſtory of the Swediſh wars in Germany, appeared in 2 vols. fol.

CHERON, Elizabeth Sophia, daughter of a painter at Meaux, was born at Paris. She devoted herſelf to poetry, painting, the learned languages, and muſic, and obtained celebrity by her pencil, eſpecially in hiſtory, oil colors, and in miniature. She died at Paris 1711, aged 63.

CHERON, Lewis, brother to the preceding, was born at Paris, and came to London, where he executed ſome hiſtorical pieces, eſpecially the judgment of Paris, &c. for the duke of Montague. He was a proteſtant, and died in London 1713, aged 53.

CHESELDEN, William, an Engliſh ſurgeon of eminence, born at Somerby, Leiceſterſhire. He began to read lectures at the age of 22, which he continued for upwards of 20 years. He was ſucceſsful in cutting for the ſtone, and he immortalized himſelf by giving light to a youth of 14, who had never ſeen, of which which he publiſhed an intereſting account. Now at the head of his profeſſion, he was appointed principal ſurgeon to queen Caroline, and bleſſed with well-earned fame and independence. He obtained alſo what he wiſhed, the office of head ſurgeon to Chelſea-hoſpital, which he retained till his death. He died of an apoplexy 1752, aged 64. He was intimate with Pope, by whom he was greatly eſteemed. His anatomy of the human body, publiſhed 1713, has paſſed through ſeveral editions. He wrote, beſides, oſteography in fol. and other anatomical eſſays.

CHESNE, Joſeph du, phyſician to the French king, was born at Armagnac. After reſiding in Germany, he ſettled at Paris, and acquired celebrity by his practice, and by his knowledge of chemiſtry, though he was ridiculed by other phyſicians. He died at an advanced age at Paris, 1609. He wrote in verſe the folly of the world, 4to.—and the great mirror of the world, &c.

CHESNE, Andre du, called the father of French hiſtory, was born at Turenne, and cruſhed to death by a cart, returning from Paris to his country houſe in 1640, in his 55th year. He wrote the hiſtory of the popes, 2 vols. fol.—hiſtory of England, 4 vols. fol.—hiſtory of French cardinals—collection of French hiſtorians, &c.

CHEVERT, Francis de, a French general, born of obſcure parents at Verdun. He roſe from the ranks, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a great knowledge of tactics. After Belliſle's retreat from Prague, he defended the place with obſtinate bravery, and yielded only through famine 1742. His valor contributed to the victory of Haſtenback in 1757, and that of Lauterberg. He died 1769, aged 74.

CHEVREAU, Urban, of Loudun in Poitou, became ſecretary to Chriſtina of Sweden, whom he reconciled to the catholic faith. After his return to Paris he was preceptor to the duke of Maine, and then retired to his native place where he built an elegant manſion, and died after ſpending there 20 years of literary ſecluſion, 1701, aged nearly 88. He wrote an hiſtory of the world—the effects of fortune, a romance—and other things.

CHEYNE, George, a Scotch phyſician. When 30 years of age he came to London, and from an abſtemious mode of life became a jovial and free living companion. He grew ſo much in unwieldy corpulence, that the ſmalleſt exertions were painful to him, and all the powers of medicine were unavailing to relieve him, till the uſe of a milk diet reduced him from the enormous weight of 32 ſtone to nearly one third, and enabled him to live to the age of 72. He died at Bath 1743. He wrote an eſſay on long life and health—tractatus de infirmorum ſanitate, &c.—on nervous diſeaſes, &c.

CHEYNEL, Francis, was born and educated at Oxford, and made fellow of Merton in 1622. During the civil wars he favored the puritans, and was ſent to convert the univerſity and made viſitor, and in 1648, appointed Margaret profeſſor there, and preſident of St. John's college. Incapable of filling thoſe places he retired to his living of Petworth in Suſſex, from which he was ejected at the reſtoration. He is much leſs known for his political tracts, than for his acquaintance with Chillingworth. He attended him in his laſt moments, and when he was buried at Chicheſter, he contemptuouſly threw the book which that great author had written againſt papiſts, into his grave, with every mark of inſolent zeal and fanatical madneſs. He died at Preſton in Suſſex 1665.

CHIABRERA, Gabriello, an Italian poet of Savone, where he died 1638, aged 86. He ſtudied at Rome, and wrote heroic, dramatic, paſtoral and lyric poems.

Childeric I. king of France after his father Merovæus 456, was banished the next year and retired to Thuringia, from which he was recalled in 463. He afterwards enlarged his kingdom by conquest, and died 481, aged 45.

Childeric II. son of Clovis, succeeded his brother Clotaire III. 670, and for a while, when governed by the counsel of Leger, was a popular monarch. He afterwards gave himself up to every species of licentiousness and cruelty, and was assassinated by Bodilon 673.

Childeric III. surnamed the ideot and the idle, was raised to the throne by Pepin 742. Some time after he was, by the same powerful minister, confined in a monastery, where he died 755.

Chillingworth, William, a celebrated divine, born at Oxford, 1602. At Trinity college he studied divinity, mathematics, and poetry, but Fisher, the Jesuit, overturned his faith, and he embraced the tenets of the catholics. He then retired to Douai, but by the correspondence of Laud, he soon became sensible that the pope of Rome is not that infallible person he had implicitly believed. Restored to the protestants, Chillingworth returned to Oxford, where he proposed to complete his free enquiry into religion. The change of his principles however drew upon him the virulence of the catholics, but he defended his conduct and supported the protestant tenets with such firmness and candor, that even his enemies applauded him. In 1637, his religion of protestants a safe way to salvation, appeared, and with a modest and elegant dedication it was presented to Charles I. It passed through several editions, and will remain a lasting monument of the author's superior abilities, and of sound reason, and pure religion. Though respected as a divine, Chillingworth started objections against the 39 articles, and refused to assent to the damnatory clauses of the Athanasian creed. His scruples however gradually removed, and he subscribed the articles, considering it as a subscription of peace and union, not of belief or assent. He was promoted to the chancellorship of Salisbury, with the prebend of Brixworth, and the mastership of Wigston's hospital. The troubles of the times prevented higher elevation, Chillingworth attached to the king's cause, took up arms against the republicans, and acted as engineer at the siege of Gloucester. At the siege of Arundel he was taken prisoner with the garrison by sir William Waller, and as he was then indisposed he was removed to Chichester, where after a short illness he expired in the bishop's palace. His last moments were attended by Cheynell, who at his funeral insulted his remains by throwing with religious phrensy into his grave his celebrated book mentioned above. He died about 1644, and was buried in Chichester cathedral. The fame of Chillingworth is firmly established as a noble disputant, a perspicuous reasoner, and a candid and inquisitive philosopher. He wrote besides several things in the defence of religion and loyalty.

Chilmead, Edmund, of Gloucestershire, was educated at Christ church, Oxford. On being ejected from his livings 1648, he subsisted in London by teaching music. He died 1654. He wrote a treatise on the use of the globes, and published translations of some Greek authors.

Childeric I. youngest son of Clotaire I. succeeded as king of Soissons 561. His wife Galasuinta was assassinated by his mistress Fredegonde; and he married the suspected murderer, and committed every kind of cruelty to satisfy her vengeance. He lost part of his dominions by the invasion of Sigebert of Austrasia, who wished to punish the death of the murdered dered queen, and after sacrificing his sons Merovæus and Clovis to the jealousy of the infamous Fredegonde, he at last saw the wickedness of his conduct, and became a devotee. He was murdered returning from hunting in 584, and Fredegonde was suspected as the assassin.

CHILPERIC II. son of Childeric II. succeeded Dagobert III. in 715. He was reduced to privacy by Charles Martel, and died 720.

CHINE NOUNG, emperor of China, about 2837 years B. C. is said to have instructed his subjects in agriculture and in extracting wine from rice.

CHING or XI-HOAM-TI, emperor of China, about 240 B.C. is said to have built the great wall after the expulsion of the Tartars.

CHIRAC, Peter, physician to the French king, was professor of medicine at Montpellier, and physician to the army of Roussillon, in which capacity his treatment of the sick soldiers under a violent dysentery was particularly successful. He was also very successful during an epidemic distemper at Rochfort, &c. He died 1732, aged 82. He wrote dissertations on wounds—on fevers—on the use of the rust of iron in the incubus, &c.

CHISHULL, Edmund, of Eyworth, Bedfordshire, was educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford. As a travelling fellow he visited Turkey and the Levant, and was chaplain to the English factory at Smyrna. He was presented to the living of Walthamstow, in Essex, where he died 1733. He wrote against Dodwell on the mortality of the soul, besides his travels in Turkey.

CHOIN, Mary Emily Joly de, a lady descended from a Savoy family. She was about the person of the duchess of Conti, where she was seen by the dauphin; but no solicitations could prevail upon her to deviate from her chastity. It is said that the prince married her privately, and, in her company, reformed his conduct, and regained the affection of the king. After his death, in 1711, she retired to obscurity, and died 1744.

CHOISEUL, Stephen Francis duc de, a French politician. After enjoying the confidence of Lewis XV. and serving him as ambassador and minister at home, he was disgraced; and, on his retirement, still retained universal respect. He was a liberal patron of arts and of literature, and for his political intrigues, was called by the king of Prussia, the coachman of Europe. He died 1785, aged 66.

CHOISI, Francis Timoleon de, prior of St. Lo, went ambassador to the king of Siam, who wished, it was said, to become a convert to christianity. Though he had spent the earlier part of his life in debauchery, yet he reformed his conduct, and applied himself to literature. He died at Paris 1724, aged 81. He wrote an account of his journey to Siam—the history of France, during five reigns, 5 vols.—an ecclesiastical history, 11 vols 4to. &c.

CHOUET, John Robert, a native of Geneva, at the age of 22, appointed professor of philosophy at Saumur, where he replaced the tenets of Aristotle with the philosophy of Descartes. In 1669 he returned to Geneva as professor, and was repeatedly syndic, and died 1731, aged 89, respected as a good citizen and an upright magistrate. He wrote introduction to logic—theses physicæ de variâ astrorum luce—and other works.

CHRISTIE, William, educated at Aberdeen was master of the grammar school at Montrose, where he died 1774, aged 44. His grammar and his introduction to the making of Latin are both well spoken of.

CHRISTIERN I. king of Denmark, succeeded 1448. He founded the order of the elephant, and died 1481.

CHRISTIERN II. surnamed the cruel, or the northern Nero, succeeded on the Danish throne 1513. He was elected king of Sweden 1520; but instead of being the father of his people, he became their tyrant, and massacred 94 of the Swedish nobles to whom he owed his elevation. Driven from Sweden by Gustavus, he in Copenhagen pursued the same conduct, in consequence of which he was expelled from his throne by his indignant subjects. Ever ambitious, he gained the Dutch to espouse his cause; but he was defeated and died in prison 1559.

CHRISTIERN III. successor of Frederic I. 1534. embraced the opinions of Luther, and made that the established religion of his kingdom. He died 1559, aged 56.

CHRISTIERN IV. succeeded as king of Denmark 1588. He made war against the Swedes, and died 1648, aged 71.

CHRSTIERN V. succeeded in 1670. He formed a league with the German princes, and made war against Sweden; but was defeated. He died 1699, aged 54.

CHRISTINA, queen of Sweden, daughter of Gustavus Adolphus the great, succeeded her father 1653. After reigning with splendor, she resigned the crown in 1654, in favor of her cousin, Charles Gustavus. She had before embraced the catholic religion at the instigation of the Jesuits; and she retired to Rome, where she resided till the death of her cousin, in 1660; when she attempted to resume the crown, which as a catholic she could not effect. She died at Rome 1689, aged 63. She was a woman of great abilities, well acquainted with several languages, and frequently corresponded with Grotius, Salmasius, Descartes, Vossius, Bochart, Huet, and other men of letters, and she liberally patronised literature. Some circumstances, however, are mentioned, which reflect disgrace upon her character and manners.

CHRISTOPHERSON, John, an English prelate, born in Lancashire, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He became master of Trinity college, and dean of Norwich, and in Mary's reign bishop of Chichester. He died the year after. He was a firm Romanist. He translated Philo Judæus into Latin, and also also the ecclesiastical histories of Eusebius, Sozomen, Socrates, Theodoret, &c. but as a translator he is neither faithful nor elegant.

CHRYSOLORAS, Emanuel, a learned Greek, of Constantinople. He came into England in the reign of Richard II. as ambassador from John Palæologus. After his return to Constantinople, he came to Florence, where he taught Greek, and afterwards he became Greek professor at Ticinum, at the request of the duke of Milan. He afterwards visited Venice and Rome; and, in 1413, he was sent by Martin V. ambassador to Sigismund of Germany, to settle the meeting of a general council. He afterwards returned to Constantinople, and was sent as ambassador to Constance. He died at Constance, a few days after the opening of the council, 1415; and a handsome monument was erected to his memory by his scholar Poggius. He wrote, besides a Greek grammar, a parallel between ancient and modern Rome.

CHUBB, Thomas, was born at East Harnham, near Salisbury, 1679. He was apprenticed to a glover; and next was engaged with a tallow chandler, but devoted his hours of relaxation to the study of English books. A strong memory rendered him well versed with mathematics, geography, and other sciences, but particularly divinity; and to improve himself, he established a club at Salisbury, where the members disputed on theological subjects. The controversy about the Trinity between Clarke and Waterland then engaged the public attention; and Chubb prevailed on by his friends to commit his sentiments to paper, wrote his book called "the supremacy of the fathers asserted, &c." which was universally admired. Courted by the great, he lived in the house of sir Joseph Jekyll, and often waited at table as a servant out of livery, but refused the prospects of preferment for his obscurity at Salisbury, where he retired, and died 1747, aged 68. Chubb was always attached to the business of a tallow chandler, and after the death of his partner he frequently assisted the nephew, on whom the concern devolved. After his death, two volumes of posthumous works were published, which displayed the author as a violent opposer of the Mosaical and Christian dispensations, extravagant and licentious in his opinions, and shameless enough to deny a future judgment, and almost a future existence. This publication greatly astonished the world, especially as nothing immoral, profligate, or licentious, had ever been observed in his conduct. His principal works are, the true gospel of Jesus Christ asserted—an enquiry into the ground and foundation of religion—four dissertations, &c.

CHUDLEIGH, Mary, wife of sir George Chudleigh bart. possessed respectable poetical talents, and published some poems, which passed through a third edition in 1732. She wrote besides some tragedies, operas, masques, and some essays on philosophical and moral subjects, with great neatness, and purity of language. She died 1710.

CHURCHILL, sir Winston, born at Wooton Glanville, Dorsetshire, 1620, was father to the great duke of Marlborough. He was of St. John's college, Oxford, and engaged warmly on the side of the king, in consequence of which his estates were forfeited. He married a daughter of sir John Drake of Ashe in Devonshire, at whose house he took shelter, and at the restoration he recovered his property, and obtained a seat in parliament. He was knighted in 1663, and published in 1675 a political essay on the history of England, in folio, which possessed little merit. He died 1688.

CHURCHILL, John, duke of Marlborough and prince of the holy Roman empire, was son of the preceding, and was born at Ashe, 1650. His education was little attended to by his father, who introduced him when 12 years of age to the court, and in 1666, he was made an ensign in the guards, and soon after went to Tangier against the Moors. He became on his return a favorite with Monmouth, in whose regiment he was made captain, and with whom he served at the siege of Nimeguen. He so distinguished himself by his valor, that Turenne praised the conduct of the handsome Englishman, as he called young Churchill. At the reduction of Maestricht the French monarch, whose auxiliaries the English then were, saw and commended his bravery. On his return to London he was made lieutenant colonel by the king, and gentleman of the bedchamber, and master of the robes to the duke of York, with whom he went to the Low Countries, and into Scotland. About this time Churchill married Sarah Jennings, the attendant on the princess Anne, afterwards queen of England. On his return from Scotland with the duke, he was shipwrecked near the Humber, but though more than 120 persons lost their lives, he escaped. He was created a Scotch peer in 1682, by the title of baron Eymouth, and on the death of Charles went as ambassador to France, and in 1685 he was made baron Churchill. On the invasion of Monmouth he was sent against him, and in a little time repressed his rebellion, and took him prisoner. These services recommended him to James, yet though entrusted with the command of 5000 men on the landing of William of Orange, he was suspected of favoring the cause of the invader, and accordingly he abandoned him, and fled to the prince, yet without betraying his secrets, or taking any of his soldiers with him. This rendered him a favorite with the prince, and on the abdication of James, he was made a privy counsellor, and created earl of Marlborough. In 1689 he was at the battle of Walcourt, and laid the foundation of that military fame, which was soon to astonish the continent. In Ireland he reduced Cork for William; but in the midst of his popularity his offices were taken from him, and his person confined in the tower; a violent measure, which is attributed to his partial attachment to the intereſts of the princeſs Anne. The king, who knew his merits, ſoon reſtored him to favor, and when, after queen Mary's death, he entruſted him with the care of the duke of Glouceſter, he paid him this handſome compliment, "My lord, make him what you are, and my nephew will be all I wiſh to ſee him." He was next declared commander in chief of the troops ſent over to Holland, and ambaſſador extraordinary to the ſtates, and William recommended him to Anne, as the fitteſt perſon to protect the liberties of Europe. Marlborough confirmed in his appointments, was made by the United States captain general of all their forces, with a ſtipend of 100,000 florins per annum. Prevailing on the Engliſh miniſtry to declare war againſt France and Spain 1702, he repaired to his head quarters, and opened the campaign, by reducing the garriſons on the frontiers, and among them Venlo, Ruremond, and Liege, which was taken ſword in hand. After theſe ſucceſſes he returned to London, where he was received as a conquering hero. The queen created him a duke, and granted him during her life a penſion of 5000l. In the next campaign Marlborough defeated the allies at Schellenburg, and afterwards at Hochſtet, where Tallard the French general was taken priſoner, and he returned to England, bringing with him as trophies of his conqueſts 121 ſtandards and 179 colors, together with the captive general, and 26 officers of high diſtinction. On this occaſion he received, as before, the thanks of parliament, and the queen ſettled on him the manor of Woodſtock. The campaign of 1705 was equally ſucceſsful; but Marlborough diſtinguiſhed himſelf particularly as a negociator at Vienna, Berlin, and Hanover, and for theſe ſervices received again on his return, the thanks of the parliament, though attempts were made to baffle him in the proſecution of the war. In 1706 he won the battle of Ramilies, after expoſing himſelf to great perſonal danger, and the conſequence of this victory was the fall of Louvain, Bruſſels, Ghent, Antwerp, Oſtend, Dendermonde, &c. For theſe ſucceſſes he was not only thanked by both houſes, but the queen made his titles hereditary in the male and female lines of his daughters. Blenheim houſe was built to commemorate his victories, and the 5000l. from the poſt office were annexed to his title. The year 1707 was barren in military incidents, but Marlborough, the next year puſhed his conqueſts ſo rapidly that the French in 1709 made propoſals for a general peace. This was a manœuvre to diſconcert the plans of the Engliſh and Dutch, but Marlborough, great alſo as a negociator, defeated the plans of the enemy, and the French again appeared in the field, headed by Villars, an officer of whom Lewis XIV. boaſtingly ſpoke, ſaying, he had never been beat. Villars however was defeated at Malplaquet, and Tournay taken, and the duke returned to London to receive new congratulations. Marlborough however now felt the ſecret machinations of his enemies, and though empowered to negociate at Gertruydenburg, the queen was alienated from him, and yielding to the influence of a new favorite, Mrs. Maſham, ſhe withdrew her confidence from the ducheſs. But though his family were removed, and his friends diſcarded, he remained ſtill at the head of the army, and diſplayed againſt Villars his ſuperior manœuvres of generalſhip. On his return to England, though apparently well received by the queen, he was diſmiſſed from his employments, and in parliament he was charged with ambitiouſly protracting the war, and of employing the public money to private purpoſes. The duke yielding to the acrimonious language of faction retired in voluntary baniſhment 1712, to Oſtend, and remained for nearly two years on the continent. He returned after the queen's death, and became a great favorite with George I. who conſulted him with confidence, and by his advice took thoſe meaſures which cruſhed the rebellion of 1715. This great man died loaded with infirmities 16th June 1722, aged 73, at Windſor-lodge, and his remains were buried in Weſtminſter abbey, with the greateſt ſolemnity Auguſt 9th. Beſides lord Blandford, who died at Cambridge in his 18th year, the duke had four daughters. Some of his letters have been publiſhed, and ſhow him to have been a man of conſummate abilities. His ducheſs who ſurvived him ſome years, was a woman of ſtrong maſculine powers of mind, of boundleſs ambition, and as arbitrary in the cabinet of the queen, as her huſband was formidable in the field.

CHURCHILL, Charles, the poet, was born 1731. He was educated at Weſtminſter, but ſo neglected the improvement of his abilities, that he was refuſed admiſſion at Oxford for incapacity, though it is ſaid this aroſe from the contempt with which he treated the frivolous queſtions propoſed by his intended tutor. He continued, in conſequence of this, at Weſtminſter, and at 17 married, and when ordained retired into Wales upon a curacy of 30l. a year. In this retired ſituation, he became a merchant, but his proſpects of independence ended in a bankruptcy, and he came back to London, and on the death of his father ſucceeded to his curacy of St John's Weſtminſter. He here taught young ladies to read and write, but as his living was expenſive, he was with difficulty ſaved from gaol by the humanity of Mr. Lloyd ſecond maſter of Weſtminſter ſchool, who liberally ſatisfied his creditors. The ſucceſs of the "actor", by young Lloyd, encouraged Churchill to cultivate the muſes, and he publiſhed his Roſciad, which was ſo univerſally admired, that Colman, Thornton, and the wits of the age, were conſidered as the authors. The popularity of this and other poems, and the emoluments ariſing from the ſale, now altered the manners of the poet. He quitted the habit and the ſobriety of a clergyman, became a fashionable man of the town, abandoned his wife, and hunched into all the extravagance of dissipated life. As the associate of Wilkes he crossed to Boulogne 1764, where a fever carried him off, the 5th of November 1764. Besides his Roscíad, he wrote the prophecy of famine, an admired poem,—an apology to the critical reviewers,—night and the ghost, in which he ridicules Johnson in the character of Pompoſo, —Gotham and independence,—epistle to Hogarth, &c.

Churchyard, Thomas, of Shrewsbury, author of the Worthies of Wales. He died about the 11th of queen Elizabeth, 1570.

Ciampelli, Augustine, of Florence, was eminent as an historical painter. He died 1640, aged 62.

Ciampini, John Justin, an Italian, who established at Rome the academies of ecclesiastical history, of mathematics and natural history. He died 1698, aged 65. He wrote different works—on the remains of ancient Rome—on the sacred edifices built by Constantine, &c.

Cibber, Colley, poet laureat to George II. was son of Caius Gabriel Cibber, of Holstein, by the daughter of William Colley, Esq. He was born in London 1671. and educated at Grantham school, Lincolnshire. Failing in his application for Winchester college, and prevented from entering at Oxford by the revolution, he became a soldier, and soon after exchanged the military life for the stage, and appeared in inferior characters, at the salary of 10s. a-week. His first successful character was the chaplain in the Orphan, and the next Fondlewife in the Old bachelor. To add to his income, he had recourse to his pen, and wrote Love's last shift, in which he himself bore a part His best plays were The Careless husband, in 1704, and The nonjuror, in 1717. This last was a party piece, and was dedicated to the king, who gave to the poet 200l. and the appointment of laureat. Attacked by periodical writers, he was exposed to the satire of Pope, who, with more virulence than honor, made him the hero of his Dunciad. In 1730 he quitted the stage, though he occasionally appeared before the public, and died 1757. His plays, which, like his children, as he jocosely observed, were numerous, were collected in 2 vols 4to Though he never succeeded either as a writer or actor of tragedy, nor as a lyric poet, his comedies in spite of the malice of Pope, are sprightly and elegant, and his character as a man and as an actor respectable. His apology for his life is curious.

Cibber, Theophilus, son of the preceding, was educated for a little time at Winchester school, from which he passed upon the stage. He soon rose to popularity and eminence as a favorite actor; and might have insured respectability had he possessed economy, and paid attention to decorum and manners. Exposed, by his extravagance, to distresses, he embarked for Dublin, in October 1757, to assist Sheridan against the opposition of a new theatre; but the ship was wrecked on the coast of Scotland, and Cibber and the whole numerous crew perished. As a writer, he produced Pattie and Peggy, a ballad opera, and he altered The lover, a comedy, and Shakespeare's Romeo and Henry VI. He wrote also some appeals to the public.

Cibber, Susannah Maria, sister to Dr. Arne, married Theophilus Cibber, 1734. Though this union displeased old Cibber, yet he was reconciled to his daughter-in-law, and soon saw her shine on the stage as a popular actress. Her first attempt was in 1736, as Zara, and her powers soon appeared so great, that her salary was raised from 30s. a week to 3l. The conduct of her husband, however, did not conduce much to her felicity. His dissipated manners revolted her, and she soon found that, to supply his necessities, he bartered her reputation The guilty addresses of a suitor, recommended by a worthless husband, triumphed over the scruples of a dishonored wife; but when Cibber in a court of justice, claimed 5000l. for the violation of his domestic piece, the jury returned a verdict of 10l only. Mrs. Cibber lived with her seducer till her death, 1766. She translated the oracle of St Foix; but her great merit arises from her powers of acting.

Cid, The, a Spanish hero, whose real name was don Roderigo Dias de Bivar. He was knighted for his valor, and, in 1063, marched with Sancho of Castile against Ramiro king of Arragon, who fell in battle; after which he went to the siege of Zamora. On the death of Sancho, Alphonso ascended the throne of Castile; but Roderigo, instead of continuing the obedient subject, declared himself independent, and fixed his habitation at Pena de el Cid, the rock of the Cid, near Saragossa. He afterwards took Valentia, and maintained his independence till his death, 1099. The history of this hero has been immortalized in the romances of the Spaniards, and in the popular tragedy of Corneille.

Cigala, John Michael, an impostor, who, in 1670, pretended to be an Ottoman prince and king of Jerusalem. He visited Poland, England, and other countries, and imposed on the public credulity, till some one who knew his obscurity exposed him to the contempt of the world.

Cignani, Carlo, a painter of Bologna. His paintings are greatly admired for correctness, gracefulness, and a fertility of genius, successfully displayed in expressing the passions of the soul. He died 1719, aged 91.

Cimabue, Giovanni, the reviver of painting in Italy, was born at Florence 1240. Under the direction of Grecian painters, he acquired that eminence which inventive genius and indefatigable application deserve. He painted for several of the cities of Italy, but particularly larly for his native city. He was also an eminent architect. His paintings were chiefly in fresco and in distemper, as painting in oil was not yet discovered. He died at the age of 60.

CINO DU PISTOIA, or DE SICIBULDI, a poet of Pistoia, professor in various universities. He died 1336. He wrote a commentary on the digest, and he is commended by Dante for his excellent poetry.

CIOPANI, Hercules, an Italian critic of Sulmo. As a native of the same city which gave Ovid birth, he undertook a commentary on the works of his countryman, to which he prefixed a life, with an account of the country of Sulmo, published 1578.

CIRANI, Elizabeth, a native of Bologna, distinguished as a painter. Though happy in tender and delicate subjects, she particularly excelled in the great and terrible.

CIRILLO, Dominic, a botanist, born near Naples. He obtained a professorship in botany at Naples, 1760, where the next year he published his introductio ad botanicam. He visited England, and he derived much benefit from the lectures of Dr. W. Hunter. On his return to Italy, he again devoted himself to his favorite pursuits; but embracing the tenets of the revolutionary philosophy, he, when the French entered Naples, boldly espoused their cause; for which he was condemned, and executed as a traitor, 1795, aged 65. He wrote besides, nosologia methodicæ rudimenta—Neapolitana Flora, 1793—Cyperus Papyrus, Parmæ, &c.

CIROFERRI, a painter and architect of Rome. He was happy and correct in his subjects; but his characters wanted animation and variety. He died 1689, aged 55.

CIVOLI, Lewis, or Cardi, of Cigoli in Tuscany, excelled in music and poetry; but devoted himself assiduously to painting. His best pieces are preserved at Florence.

CLAGETT, William, an English divine, born at Bury, Suffolk, where he was educated, and at Emanuel college, Cambridge. He was seven years the minister of his native town, and afterwards was elected preacher to the society of Gray's-inn. He was rector of Farnham-royal, Bucks, and lecturer of St. Michael Bassishaw. He was one of those divines who opposed James II., and he deserved, for his learning, piety, and virtues, the high character which Burnet and Sharp have given of him. He died of the small-pox 1688, aged 42. Four volumes of his sermons have been published. He wrote also controversial pieces.

CLAGETT, Nicholas, brother to the preceding, was also born at Bury, and educated at Christ-church, Cambridge. He succeeded his brother at Bury, and continued there 46 years, and was also rector of Thurlow magna, and of Hitcham, and archdeacon of Sudbury. He published some sermons and pamphlets. He died 1727, aged 73.

CLAIRAULT, Alexis, a learned French mathematician, who was one of those who visited the north, to discover the true form of the earth. He died 1765, aged about 52. He published elements of geometry and algebra—tables of the moon—treatise on the figure of the earth, &c. His abilities were prematurely displayed, as he could read and write at the age of 4, understood algebra at 9, and at 11 wrote a memoir on curves, honorably applauded in the miscellanea Berolinensia.

CLAIRFAIT, N. count de, an Austrian general against the French at the beginning of the revolution. His manœuvres in the Netherlands were rapid and masterly; but after taking Longwy and Stenay, he lost the famous battle of Jemappe, and he yet made a most heroic retreat across the Rhine. Afterwards he distinguished himself at Altenhoven, &c. and decided the victory of Nerwinde, and then bravely opposed the progress of Pichegru. He defeated in 1795, the French near Mayence; soon after which, he was recalled, and received with becoming respect by the emperor at Vienna, where he died 1798. As a soldier he was brave and intrepid; as a general, a severe disciplinarian; cool in the midst of danger, and precise in the execution of his plans.

CLAIRON, Clara Joseph Hippolyta, Lewis Delatude, of Paris, from an obscure origin, rose to high celebrity on the French stage. At the age of 12 she appeared in the play of the Isle of slaves, and at Rouen, and then at Paris, she became a favorite actress. She chiefly excelled in tragedy, and at the age of 80 she delighted Kemble, who paid her a complimentary visit, with a most energetic recitation of one of the scenes of Phædra. She died at Paris 1803, aged 80.

CLANCY, Michael, M. D. was educated at Trinity college, Dublin, but unfortunately lost his sight before he could practise as physician. He was recommended by his friend Montesquieu, to lord Chesterfield, viceroy of Ireland, from whom he obtained a pension. He obtained also the Latin school of Kilkenny. He wrote besides poems, the comedy of the Sharper, and of Hermon prince of Chorda, and he appeared with applause as the blind Tiresias, when Œdipus was performed for his benefit at Drury-lane. He wrote also memoirs of his own life, 2 vols. 1746.

CLARKE, Samuel, an orientalist, born at Brackley, and made student of Merton college, Oxford, in his 15th year. In the civil wars he was beadle of civil law at Oxford. In 1650 he was master of a boarding-school at Islington, where he assisted Walton in the publication of his polyglott bible. He died 1669, aged 46 He wrote some learned treatises on oriental literature, and on the Hebrew text, &c.

CLARKE, Samuel, a nonconformist, born at Woolston, Warwickshire, and educated at Cirencester and Emanuel college, Cambridge. He was one of the commissioners at the Savoy, Savoy, and died esteemed for his private and public character 1682. He wrote lives of puritan divines——martyrology——ecclesiastical history, &c.

Clarke, Dr. Samuel, a famous English divine, born 1675, at Norwich, of which his father, an alderman of the place, was some years representative. He was educated at the grammar school in his native town, and Caius college, Cambridge. He republished Newton's philosophy, in a new translation, with learned notes, when only 22. He was chaplain to Moore bishop of Norwich, in whose household he lived as chaplain for 12 years, with all the familiarity of a friend and equal, by whom he was presented to the living of Drayton, Norfolk. In 1704 he preached Boyle's lectures, on the being and attributes of a God, and being again appointed the next year, he chose for his subject the evidences of natural and revealed religion. These two courses of lectures excited some controversy, and tended to spread the celebrity of the author. About this time he is suspected by Whiston to have inclined to Arianism, as he declared to him, that he never read the Athanasian creed, except once, by mistake. His letter to Dodwell, published in 1706, on the immortality of the soul, gave rise to a long controversial dispute, and afforded him the opportunity of displaying his great metaphysical knowledge. He next published a translation of Newton's optics, with which the great philosopher was so pleased, that he gave him 500l. for his five daughters. He was at this time made rector of St. Bennet's, Paul's wharf, by Moore, and queen Anne appointed him one of her chaplains, and gave him St. James's rectory, Westminster. He now took his degree of D. D. at Cambridge, and displayed such purity of expression in his academical exercises as drew forth the astonishment of a respectable audience. He published, in 1712, an edition of Cæsar's commentaries, and his book on the doctrine of the Trinity, in three parts, which, though commended by bishop Hoadly, roused the attacks of many severe critics, and was even censured in the lower house of convocation. The obnoxious book passed through two large editions, and since has been published with great additions. In 1715, and 1716, he was engaged in a dispute with Leibnitz, with respect to natural philosophy and religion, in which, as Whiston says, "his letters are among the most useful of his performances in natural philosophy." In 1718, Clarke's alteration in the doxology of the singing psalms gave great offence; and Robinson bishop of London, wrote a circular letter to his clergy, not to use any new forms of doxology. He was next made master of Wigston's hospital in Leicester, and in 1724, he published 17 sermons. On the death of Newton, in 1727, Clarke was offered his place of master of the mint, worth near 1500l. a-year, which he refused as incompatible with his spiritual engagements. In 1729, he published the 12 first books of the Iliad, dedicated to the duke of Cumberland, with a new Latin version, and learned notes, and in 1732, the 12 other books were published by his son. He was attacked on the 11th May 1729, as he was going to preach before the judges at Serjeant's-inn, with a pain in his side, and he was removed home, where the symptoms became more alarming, and at last attacking his head, robbed him of his senses, and he expired on the 17th of the same month, aged 54. The same year were printed his exposition of the church-catechism, and 10 vols. of sermons, in 8vo. Clarke, though attacked by various authors, has found learned champions in Hare bishop of Chichester, and Hoadly bishop of Winchester. They not only extol his extensive knowledge in every branch of classical and philosophical science, but they enlarge on the goodness of his heart, and the exemplary piety of his life.

Clarke, William, an English divine, born at Haghmon abbey, Shropshire, 1696, educated at Shrewsbury school, and St. John's college, Cambridge. He was presented to the rectory of Buxted, Sussex, and in 1738 was made prebendary of Chichester, and in 1770 chancellor of that diocese, and vicar of Amport, where he died 1771. His great work is the connexion of the Roman, Saxon, and English Coins, 4to.

Clarke, Edward, son of the preceding, was fellow of St. John's college, and succeeded on the resignation of his father in 1738, to the rectory of Buxted, Sussex, besides which he held Uckfield and Wilmington. He was chaplain to lord Bristol at Madrid, and on his return he published a 4to. volume of letters on the Spanish nation. He had meditated the plan of an enlarged Latin dictionary, but the work was laid aside for want of encouragement. He also proposed to publish a commentary on the new testament. He died 1786.

Clarkson, David, of Bradford, Yorkshire, was educated at Clarehall, Cambridge. He was ejected in 1662, from his living of Mortlake in Surrey, for nonconformity, and died 1686, aged 64. He wrote no evidence for diocesan episcopacy in primitive times, 4to. 1681, ably refuted by Maurice——sermons, &c.

Claude of Lorraine, a celebrated landscape painter, born in 1600. He was of so dull a disposition when at school, that he was placed early with a pastry cook, with whom he served his time, and afterwards travelling to Rome, he was accidentally hired by Augustino Trasso, as a common servant to pound his colors, and wait upon him. The kindness of his master soon made him acquainted with painting, and now genius began to expand, and Claude retired to the banks of the Tiber and the striking scenes of nature, where, in solitude, he copied the beauties displayed to his view, with effect. Thus the humble Claude, by degrees, almoſt ſelf taught, produced thoſe noble pieces which for their fine diſtribution of light and ſhade, for harmony and for the exquiſite delicacy of the tints, have procured him immortal fame. He was ſcrupulouſly attentive to the finiſhing of his pieces, and he often did and undid the ſame piece, ſeven or eight times, till it pleaſed him. He died 1682.

CLAUDE, John, a French proteſtant, born in Angenois 1619, and ordained miniſter at Montauban. His oppoſition to the catholics produced the ſuſpenſion of his eccleſiaſtical office, and in 1685 he left the kingdom, and retired to Holland, where he was kindly received by the prince of Orange. He was greatly admired as an eloquent orator, and his laſt ſermon which was on Chriſtmas day 1686, pleaſed and ſenſibly affected the princeſs of Orange. He died 1687.

CLAVIUS, Chriſtopher, a Jeſuit and mathematician, of Bamberg, 1537. He was conſidered as the Euclid of his age, and was engaged by Gregory XIII. in the reformation of the calendar, which he ably defended againſt Scaliger. His works were printed, 5 vols. fol. He died at Rome 1612.

CLAYTON, Dr. Robert, a learned prelate. He was made biſhop of Killala 1729, tranſlated to Cork 1735, and to Clogher 1745, where he died 1758. He was averſe to the Nicene and Athanaſian creeds, and unſucceſsfully moved for their rejection in the Iriſh houſe of lords. He publiſhed an eſſay on ſpirit, 8vo —chronology of the Hebrew bible vindicated, 4to.—inquiry on the time of the coming of the Meſſiah, 8vo.—vindication of the hiſtories of the old and new teſtaments, 8vo. and other works.

CLEEVE, Joſeph, a Flemiſh painter, who died 1536. His pieces were chiefly miſers counting their hoarded treaſures.

CLEGHORN, George, a Scotch phyſician, born near Edinburgh 1716. He ſtudied phyſic and ſurgery, under Dr. Munro, and, in 1736, went as ſurgeon to Minorca, where he reſided 13 years. On his return to London, in 1750, he publiſhed his valuable work on the diſeaſes of Minorca. The year after he ſettled at Dublin, where he read courſes of anatomy. He died 1789.

CLELAND, John, ſon of colonel Cleland, the Will Honeycombe of the Spectator, was conſul at Smyrna; and on his return to England he went to the Eaſt Indies. His quarrel with the preſidency of Bombay prevented his advancement, and on his arrival in London, he endeavoured to extricate himſelf from debt and the horrors of a priſon, by writing that infamous publication, the woman of pleaſure, which, though it procured him not more than 20 guineas, brought into the hands of the licentious bookſeller not leſs than 10,000l. The evil tendency of his publication cauſed his appearance before the privy council; but lord Granville, the preſident, admitted his plea of poverty, and, to engage him no longer to exerciſe his abilities in ſuch immoral compoſitions, he procured him a penſion of 100l. a year. His memoirs of a coxcomb, and his man of honor, in ſome degree atoned for the depravity of his former work. He died 1789, aged 82.

CLEMENCET, Charles, a French Benedictine, born at Painblanc in Autun, taught rhetoric at Paris, where he died 1778, aged 74. He wrote that valuable book, l'art de verifier les dates, 4to. and fol.—a general hiſtory of Port Royal, 10 vols. 12mo. &c.

CLEMENS, Romanus, a father of the church, the companion of St. Paul, and biſhop of Rome. He died 100.

CLEMENT II. was elected pope 1046, and died 1047. He was a Saxon by birth.

CLEMENT III. ſucceeded Gregory VIII. as pope 1187, and died 1191.

CLEMENT IV. Guy de Foulques, a Frenchman, pope after Urban IV. 1265. Before his election he had been a ſoldier, and then a civilian, and on the death of his wife he took orders, and became archbiſhop of Narbonne, and a cardinal. He died 1628.

CLEMENT V. or Bertrand de Goth, after the death of Benedict XI. was elected pope 1305. He removed the ſee of Rome to Avignon 1309. He died 1314, near Avignon.

CLEMENT VI. Peter Roger, ſucceeded Benedict XII. on the papal throne 1342. He is repreſented by Petrarch as a worthy and learned prelate; but other hiſtorians paint him as debauched and ambitious. He died 1352, at Avignon.

CLEMENT VII. Julius de Medicis, natural ſon of Julian de Medicis, was declared legitimate by Leo X., and was elected pope 1523, on the death of Adrian VI. Great as a pope, he was weak as a politician, and by the holy league which he formed between Henry VIII. of England, and Francis I. of France, he drew upon himſelf the reſentment of Charles V. who plundered Rome, and beſieged him in the caſtle of St. Angelo. Though he eſcaped, he was obliged to ſubmit to ignominious terms. When Henry married Anna Boleyn, Clement iſſued a bull of excommunication againſt him, and thus produced the ſeparation of England from the Roman church. He died 1534.

CLEMENT VIII. Hippolitus Aldobrandin, a native of Florence, elected pope after the death of Innocent IX. 1592. He at firſt oppoſed the election of Henry IV. of France, but was reconciled to him. He died 1605, aged 69.

CLEMENT IX. Julius Roſpigliſi, of Piſtoia, was elected 1667, after the death of Alexander VII. His reign was diſturbed by the ſchiſms of the Janſeniſts; but he heard of the loſs of Candia with ſuch ſorrow that he died of grief, 1669, aged 71.

CLEMENT X. John Baptiſt Emilius Altieri, a Roman, who ſucceeded Clement IX. 1670

He was mild and amiable in character; and died 1676, aged 86.

CLEMENT XI. John Francis Albani, ſon of a Roman ſenator, was pope 1700, after Innocent XII. He was three days in determining whether to accept of the popedom or not. He was an able politician; but his reign was diſturbed by the ſchiſm of the Janſeniſts. In 1713 he iſſued his bull called unigenitus againſt 101 propoſitions of the new teſtament by Queſnel; a book which he had originally approved. He gave a friendly reception to the pretender; and died at Rome 1721, aged 72.

CLEMENT XII. Laurence Corſini, a native of Rome, pope 1730, after Benedict XIII. He labored in the reform of abuſes, and when the cardinals wiſhed to recommend to him particular miniſters, he nobly replied, it is for the cardinals to elect popes, but for the pope to elect his miniſters. He died 1740, aged near 88.

CLEMENT XIII. Charles Rezzonico, a native of Venice, made pope on the death of Benedict XIV. 1758. During his reign the Jeſuits were expelled from France, Spain, and Naples. He died 1769, aged 76.

CLEMENT XIV. John Vincent Anthony Ganganelli, ſon of a phyſician near Rimini, was employed under Benedict XIV. in the council of the holy office. On the death of Clement XIII. he was elected in a tumultuous aſſembly of the conclave, and proclaimed pope by cardinal de Bernis. He negociated with Portugal, Spain, and France, who ſeemed inclined to diminiſh the papal power, and at their ſolicitations he, in 1773, formally ſuppreſſed the Jeſuits. The violent ſpirit of the times produced ſuch debility as proved fatal 1774, though ſome have been accuſed of haſtening his death by poiſon.

CLEMENT, Francis, of Beze in Burgundy, continued Rivet's literary hiſtory of France, of which he wrote the 11th and 12th vols. He afterwards compoſed the 12th and 13th vols. of Bouquet's collection of French hiſtorians, and improved Dantine's art de verifier les dates, &c. 1783.

CLEMENT, Peter, of Geneva, was travelling tutor to lord Waldegrave, and afterwards ſettled at Paris, where he conducted the Nouvelles literaires de France, from 1749 to 1754. He wrote ſome poems, Merope a tragedy, and George Barnwell tranſlated from the Engliſh, &c. He died 1767, aged 60.

CLERC, John le, a celebrated ſcholar born at Geneva, 1657. As his father was a phyſician and Greek profeſſor at Geneva, the greateſt attention was paid to his education. He took orders, and embraced Arminianiſm, and after reſiding at Saumur, he viſited England. As he differed from his friends at Geneva in religious opinions, he ſettled at Amſterdam 1683, where he became popular as a preacher, and profeſſor of philoſophy, Hebrew, and polite literature. His ars critica, 3 vols. 12mo. was publiſhed in 1696, and in 1709 his Sulpicius Severus, his Grotius, and alſo the remains of Menander and Philemon, a collection cenſured by Bentley and Burman. Le Clerc died 1736, in his 79th year, afflicted for the laſt ſix years with great weakneſs of intellects. Many of his works were dedicated to Engliſh prelates and other leading men in the nation; yet his name was particularly unpopular in England, and his writings were ſeverely cenſured by the clergy for his Arminian principles, and his acrimonious language againſt epiſcopacy. Whatever might be the prejudice of his enemies, he deſerved well of literature, for his many valuable writings in criticiſm, religion, and philoſophy. His other works are ſyſtems of logic, entology, and pneumatology, beſides a tranſlation of the bible into French, &c. He alſo conducted the bibliotheque choiſie from 1703 to 1713, 128 vols. 12mo.—bibliotheque ancienne & moderne, 29 vols. 1729—and bibliotheque univerſelle & hiſtorique to 1693, 25 vols. 12mo.

CLERC, Sebaſtian le, originally a helper in the kitchen of the abbey of St. Arnould at Metz, diſplayed early proofs of genius as a painter. The ſcraps of paper on which he had made ſome rude delineations were ſeen accidentally by the prior of the houſe, who encouraged him. He was made engraver to Lewis XIV. and knighted by Clement XI. He died at Paris 1714, aged 77. He was admirable in his landſcapes, architecture, and ornaments, and he has gained credit as the author of a treatiſe on architecture, 2 vols. 4to.—a treatiſe on geometry, &c. 8vo.—and another on perſpective. Not leſs than 3000 pieces are mentioned as the work of his graver.

CLERC, Daniel le, of Geneva, ſtudied medicine at Paris and Montpellier, and practiſed with great reputation at Geneva. He was made member of the council of ſtate 1704, and died 1728. He was a learned antiquary, and wrote bibliotheca anatomica, &c. 2 vols. fol.—hiſtoire de la medicine, 8vo. 1696, tranſlated into Engliſh, &c.

CLERKE, Gilbert, of Uppington, Rutlandſhire, was educated at Sidney college, Cambridge. He was an able Grecian and mathematician, but favored the Socinians, and left the univerſity for a ſmall eſtate in Northamptonſhire, where he died 1695, aged 69. He wrote an anſwer to biſhop Bull's work on the divine faith, &c.

CLERMONT TONNERRE, Staniſlaus count of, a French nobleman. He ſhowed himſelf an able orator in the French revolution, the friend of limited monarchy, and an enemy to popular tumults. His oppoſition to the Jacobin club ſent him to priſon, where he was maſſacred Sept. 1793. His opinions have been publiſhed in 4 vols. 8vo.—and his examen de la conſtitution, 8vo. 1791,

CLEVELAND or CLEIVELAND, John, a poet in the reign of Charles I. born at Loughborough borough 1613, and educated at Chriſt college, Cambridge, from which he removed to St. John's. Though unſucceſsfully, he oppoſed the election of Oliver Cromwell for the town of Cambridge, and when perſecuted for his loyalty, he retired to Oxford. His ſatirical pieces, eſpecially the "the rebel Scot," were greatly admired; he was appointed judge advocate of the garriſon of Newark; but when this was taken by the republicans, he eſcaped deſtitute and poor. He was ſeized at Norwich, and detained as averſe to the government, and he obtained his liberty by writing to Cromwell a letter, in which, while in ſupplicating his enlargement, he boldly avows his principles, and defends his conduct. He retired to London, where he became the companion of the wits and loyaliſts of the times, eſpecially of the author of Hudibras. He died of an intermittent fever 1659. Though admired as a poet, and preferred before Milton by his cotemporaries, he is now ſunk into oblivion. The ſubjects of his muſe were the party politics of the day.

Clifford, George, third earl of Cumberland, was eminent as a navigator. He was educated at Peter-houſe, Cambridge; and in 1586 he ſat as one of the peers on the unfortunate Mary queen of Scots. He was of a genius bold and enterpriſing, and not leſs than 11 expeditions by ſea were undertaken by him, and at his own expence, either for purpoſes of diſcovery, or for the annoyance of the enemies of his country. Elizabeth created him knight of the garter 1591. He died in the Savoy, London, 1605.

Clifford, Martin, an Engliſh writer, educated at Weſtminſter ſchool and Trinity college, Cambridge, and made maſter of the Charter-houſe after the reſtoration. He was author of a treatiſe on human reaſon, in which he makes every man's fancy the guide of his religion. Of this book Lancy biſhop of Ely declared, at a public dinner at the Charter-houſe, that all the copies and the author himſelf ought to be burned. He died 1677.

Clinton, Henry, general in the American war, evacuated Philadelphia in 1778, and took Charleſtown in 1780, for which he was thanked by the houſe of commons. He returned to England in 1782, and ſoon after publiſhed an account of the campaign, which lord Cornwallis anſwered. He was governor of Gibraltar 1795, and died ſoon after.

Clisson, Oliver de, of Britany, fought at the battle of Aurai in 1364, and afterwards followed the fortunes of Gueſclin, and ſucceeded him as conſtable of France, 1380. The mental diſorders of Charles VI. proved fatal to his fortune, he was deprived of his honors, and retired to his ſeat in Britany, where he died 1407, reſpected for valor and integrity.

Clive, Robert, a celebrated general, born at Styche, Moreton Say, the family ſeat of his anceſtors, near Market-drayton, 1725. He was educated at Loſtock in Cheſhire, and afterwards at Market-drayton, then at merchant taylors', and laſtly at Hemel-Hempſtead. In 1743 he was appointed writer to the Eaſt India company, but his inflexible diſpoſition often expoſed him to the cenſure of his ſuperiors. In one inſtance his conduct to the ſecretary was ſo reprehenſible, that the governor inſiſted on his making an apology. Clive made the apology with contempt, and in ſuch ambiguous terms, that the ſecretary miſtaking it for a compliment, invited him to dinner, "No ſir," replied Clive, "the governor did not command me to dine with you." In 1747, he, as enſign, diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the ſiege of Pondicherry, where he received a ſhot in his hat, and another in his coat. At the ſiege of Devi Cotah, he volunteered to ſtorm the town, and he and three others only out of 34 returned. On the ceſſation of hoſtilities, he returned to his civil office, and became commiſſary to the troops. In 1753, he returned to England, and his ſervices were acknowledged by the preſent of a ſword ſet with diamonds, by the court of directors. He reviſited India as governor of fort St. David, and with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and he ably aſſiſted admiral Watſon in the conqueſt of the pirate Angria, and took fort William in Bengal. At the battle of Plaſſey he routed Surajah Dowla, and ſettled Jaffier Alli Cawn on the throne of Muxadabad. He was made an Iriſh peer on his coming to England in 1760, and four years after he went back as preſident, when the vigor of his counſels reſtored tranquillity to the eaſt, and ſecurity to the inhabitants. In 1767 he reached home, and in 1769 was made knight of the Bath. Though his ſervices were ſo meritorious, he did not eſcape the malevolence of enemies. As his fortune was immenſe, this drew upon him the cenſures of ſome of the members of the houſe of commons, who in 1773 made a motion that, in the acquiſition of his wealth, he had abuſed the powers with which he was entruſted. Againſt this charge he made a ſhort defence, and the houſe voted that lord Clive had rendered great ſervices to his country. His abilities as a general were ſuch, that Mr. Pitt called him a heaven-born general, who, without experience and regular ſtudy, ſurpaſſed all the military men of his age. On the breaking out of the American war, Clive was offered the place of commander in chief, which he declined. He was from 1760 to the day of his death repreſentative for Shrewſbury. His health now gradually declined, and his depreſſion of ſpirits at laſt became ſo great, that in one fatal moment he loſt his reaſon, and deſtroyed himſelf 1774.

Clive, Catherine, an eminent actreſs born in 1711. She firſt appeared at Drury-lane in boy's clothes in the character of Iſmenes, and afterwards her delineation of Nell in the Devil to pay, exhibited her in the poſſeſſion of ſuch ſuperior talents that for 30 years ſhe remained unrivalled on the ſtage. In 1732 ſhe married George Clive, brother to lord Clive, but ſoon after they ſeparated, and never again lived together. In 1769, Mrs. Clive retired from the ſtage, and lived at Strawberry-hill, Twickenham. She died 1785, highly reſpected, in private as well as in public life.

CLOOTS, Anacharſis, of Pruſſia, in the madneſs of the French revolution, called himſelf the orator of the human race, and in the national convention voted for the king's death. He was a man of letters, and publiſhed the "republique univerſelle," but he was as profane in his religious as he was licentious in his political tenets. He was guillotined 1794.

CLOVIS I. the proper founder of the French monarchy, was born 467, and ſucceeded his father Childeric 481. He was victorious againſt the Romans, but in a battle with the Germans, when he ſaw his troops ready to give way, he made a vow that he would worſhip the God of the chriſtians, and after obtaining the victory, he was baptized with 3000 of his ſubjects, on Chriſtmas-day. He was victorious againſt the Goths, and fixed his reſidence at Paris, which he made the capital of his dominions. He died 511, aged 45, in the 30th year of his reign.

CLOVIS II. ſucceeded his father Dagobert 638, and died 655, aged 23.

CLOVIS III. ſucceeded Thierri III. 691, and died at the age of 14.

CLOWES, William, originally a ſurgeon in the navy, was afterwards ſurgeon to Bartholomew and Chriſt hoſpitals, London, and to queen Elizabeth. His laſt publication on the venereal diſeaſe was in 1596.

CLUVERIUS, Philip, a celebrated geographer, born at Dantzic 1580. He travelled to improve himſelf through Germany, England, France, and Italy, and it is ſaid he could talk with fluency ten different languages. He died at Leyden 1623, 43 years old. He publiſhed de tribus Rheni alveis—Italia—Germania antiqua,—Sicilia & Sardinia,—introductio ad geograph. univerſalem, &c.

COBB, Samuel, an ingenious poet, educated at Chriſt's hoſpital, and Trinity college ambridge. He died at London 1713. He wrote obſervations on Virgil, and a collection of poems 8vo. 1700. He alſo aſſiſted Rowe in his Callipædia, &c.

COBDEN, Edward, D. D. chaplain to Gibſon biſhop of London, and afterwards for 22 years to George II. was archdeacon of London, prebendary of Lincoln, and St. Paul's, and rector of Acton, &c. Though ſuch a pluraliſt, yet his income did not exceed 350l. per annum, a ſum which, by moderation, he converted into honorable independence and dignified enjoyment. He publiſhed "diſcourſes and eſſays," 1757, of which only 250 copies were printed, and alſo poems for the benefit of his curate's widow. He died 1764, aged above 80.

COCCEIUS, Henry, of Bremen, was profeſſor of the law of nature and nations at Heidelberg, from which he removed to Utrecht, and afterwards to Frankfort on Oder. He died 1719. He is author of juris publici prudentia compendioſe exhibita—deductiones conſilia, &c.—theſes, four vols. 4to. &c.

COCCEIUS, Samuel, ſon of the preceding, was in the ſervice of Frederic the great of Pruſſia, and preſided with dignity over the adminiſtration of juſtice. Beſides the Frederican code in three vols. 8vo. he edited Grotius de jure bellipacis, five vols. 4to. He died 1755.

COCCEIUS, or COCK, John, a native of Bremen, Hebrew profeſſor there. He removed to Franeker, and then to Leyden, where he obtained the theological chair. He conſidered the whole of the old teſtament as a myſtical repreſentation of Chriſt and his church, and gave to every word a metaphorical interpretation. He was an advocate for the millennium, and deeply ſtudied the apocalypſe. He died at Lyons 1669, aged 61. His works filled 10 vols. fol.

COCCHI, Anthony, profeſſor of phyſic at Florence and Piſa, died 1758, aged 62. He came to England with lord Huntingdon to ſee Mead, Newton, and other learned men. He wrote a treatiſe on the advantages of the Pythagorean mode of life, and other medical treatiſes, &c.

COCHIN, Charles Nicholas, a French engraver, was born 1668, and died 1754. His principal pieces are after Watteau and le Moine, and from the paintings of the invalids, in which he was engaged 10 years.

COCHLÆUS, John, a catholic of Nuremberg, who warmly attacked Luther, Melancthon, Calvin, and other reformers. He was attacked by Morriſon, an Engliſhman, for his tract on the marriage of Henry VIII. He died 1552, aged 72. His Hiſtoria Huſſitarum, in folio, is curious.

COCHRAN, Robert, a Scotchman, educated at at Padua, and employed by James III. of Scotland as an architect. His elevation to the earldom of Mar so offended the old nobility, that they hanged him over the bridge at Lauder 1484.

COCHRAN, William, a Scotch painter, born 1738, at Strathaven, Clydesdale. After studying at Glasgow, he went to Italy, in 1761, and on his return acquired great celebrity, and some opulence. He died 1785. His pieces are much admired, especially his Dædalus and Icarus, and his Diana and Endymion.

COCKAIN, sir Aston, of Ashbourne, in Derbyshire, studied at Oxford, and was fellow of Trinity college, Cambridge. He was a catholic. His poetry, occasionally licentious, was yet respectable. He died 1684, aged 78. He wrote four plays, and Dianea, a romance.

COCKBURN, Catharine, daughter of captain Trotter, of the navy, from a protestant became a catholic, and again was reconciled to the protestants. In 1708 she married Mr. Cockburn, who, though a nonjuror, took the oaths, and obtained the living of Long Horsley, Cumberland. Though possessed with a genius for poetry, she defended Locke against Burnet and Holdsworth. She died 1749, aged 70. Her works were collected by Birch, in 2 vols. 8vo.

COCKER, Edward, an ingenious penman, who died 1677. He published 14 copy books, engraved by his own hand, besides a treatise on arithmetic, &c.

CODRINGTON, Christopher, a gentleman, born at Barbadoes, and educated at Christ church, Oxford. He was then fellow of All-souls, and distinguished himself by his knowledge of physic, literature, and divinity. He recommended himself to the notice of William, in repelling the French in their attack on St. Christopher, and at the siege of Namur. He was at the successful attack on Guadaloupe in 1703; after which he resigned his employment. He died at Barbadoes 1710, and his remains were brought and interred in All-souls chapel. He left his library, valued at 6000l. to his college, besides 10,000l. to build a library, and two plantations to the society for propagating the gospel in foreign parts.

COEN, John Paterson, a native of Hoorn, governor of the Dutch East Indies. He laid the foundation of the city of Batavia, where he removed the factory from Bantam 1619. He bravely defended his new colony against the emperor of Java. The bodies of the thousands, however, of the enemy who fell in the siege, produced a pestilence, of which unfortunately Coen died 1629, aged 42.

COEUR, James, a French merchant, the richest subject in Europe. He had 300 factors in Italy and the Levant, and his resources were so great, that he lent Charles 7,200,000 crowns of gold, with which the monarch conquered Normandy. These services were ill repaid. Though once the friend of the king, he was imprisoned, and, under the false pretence that he had poisoned Agnes Sorel, the king's mistress, he was fined 100,000 crowns. His clerks showed their gratitude to him in relieving his distresses. He fled to Rome, where Calixtus III. gave him the command of his fleet against the Turks. He soon after died, at Chio, 1456.

COGAN, Thomas, a native of Somersetshire, educated at Oriel college. In 1575 he was elected master of Manchester school, and also practised as a physician. He was author of the haven of health, for the comfort of students, 4to.—a preservative from the pestilence, &c.

COGGESHALLE, Ralph, an English monk, who was at the siege of Jerusalem by Saladin, of which he wrote the history, in a "chronicle of the holy land," published in 1729. He wrote other things, and died about 1228.

COHAUSEN, John Henry, a German physician, author of a curious work, called Hermippus redivivus, &c. translated into English by Dr. John Campbell, and called Sage's triumph over old age and the grave. In this he pretended that life might be extended to 115 years, by taking in the breath of young women. He died 1750, aged 85.

COHORN, Memnon, a famous Dutch engineer. He skilfully fortified the principal towns of Holland, and supported the siege of Namur against Vauban. He died at the Hague 1704, aged 72. He called Bergen-op-Zoom the master-piece of all his fortifications. He wrote a treatise on fortification, in the Flemish language.

COINTE, Charles le, a French historian, born at Troyes 1611. He was patronised by Colbert, who obtained for him a pension. He wrote annales ecclesiastici Francorum, 8 vols. fol. from 235 to 835, a work curious, and containing great variety of matter. He died at Paris 1681, aged 70.

COITER, Volcherius, celebrated as a surgeon, physician, and anatomist, was born at Groningen, and died 1600, aged about 66.

COKE, Edward, a celebrated lawyer, born at Mileham, Norfolk, in 1549. He was educated at the free school, Norwich, and Trinity college, Cambridge, from which he removed to Clifford's inn, and then to the Inner-Temple. When called to the bar, he pleaded his first cause in the king's bench 1578. He was about this time appointed reader of Lyon's-inn, where his lectures for three years, were numerously attended. He now rose to consequence by his abilities, and was elected recorder of Nottingham and Coventry, member for Norfolk, and speaker of the house of commons, in the 35th of Elizabeth. He was solicitor and afterwards attorney-general, and in that quality he was employed in the prosecution of Essex and Southampton. He was knighted by James, but he disgraced himself by the violence of his conduct, in managing the impeachment of the unfortunate Raleigh;

a circumſtance to which Shakeſpeare is ſuppoſed to have alluded in his Twelfth night. At the trial of the gunpowder conſpirators, and of the Jeſuit Garnet, he was greatly diſtinguiſhed by his eloqence, and his two ſpeeches are conſidered as maſter-pieces in conſummate argumentation. In 1606 he was made lord chief juſtice of the common pleas, and ſeven years after of the king's bench. In the trials, in conſequence of Overbury's murder, Coke behaved with great ſpirit and impartiality; but by the intrigues of his enemies, he fell into diſgrace. Some attribute his fall to the riſing favorite Villiers, but whatever might be the cauſe, ſir Edward did not behave in his adverſity with the fortitude of conſcious virtue. When informed of his diſgrace, he on his knees acknowledged the royal mercy extended to him beyond his merits. He received alſo a letter from Bacon, which cruelly upbraided his conduct, and reflected upon his ſituation. He afterwards was reſtored to ſome favor probably by marrying his daughter to the brother of Buckingham. This union, negociated againſt the conſent of lady Coke, was productive of ſerious conſequences, in the ſeparation of ſir Edward from his wife, which nothing at laſt but the king's interference could repair. He was member in the parliament of 1621; but though reſtored to the privy council, his conduct in the houſe of commons was too independent to pleaſe the court, and upon the adjournment of the houſe, he was committed to the Tower, on pretence of ill conduct during Overbury's trial. Though releaſed, he was again driven from the privy council, and emphatically called by James "the fitteſt inſtrument for a tyrant that ever was in England." Under the next reign he was made ſheriff of Bucks, not to be elected into parliament, and he attended on the judges where he often had preſided as chief juſtice. In 1628, he was elected for Bucks, and in the houſe became a violent advocate for the redreſs of grievances, and declared Buckingham the cauſe of all the miſeries of the kingdom, though before he had pronounced him the ſaviour of the nation. He died at Stoke Pogeys, Bucks, 1634, in his 86th year. While on his death-bed, his papers were ſeized by ſir Francis Windebank, together with his will; and they were not recovered till ſeven years after, when his ſon moved in the commons for them. Coke was in his character a man of great preſence of mind and reſolution, full of reſources; and though in his calamity dejected, yet never deſponding; ſo that James compared him to a cat, which always falls upon her legs. Celebrated as an able lawyer, he is ſtill reſpected as a clear and luminous writer on the conſtitution of his country.

COLARDEAU, Charles Pierre, a French poet, born at Janville, died 1776, aged 41. He tranſlated Pope's Eloiſa to Abelard, with great ſpirit, beſides two of Young's night thoughts. He wrote two tragedies, Aſtarbe and Caliſto, not favorably received.

COLBERT, John Baptiſt, marquis of Segnelai, an illuſtrious ſtateſman. As clerk to a notary, Colbert diſplayed great diligence and ability, and was recommended to Mazarin, whom he faithfully ſerved. In an embaſſy at Rome he ſhowed ſuch dexterity and diſpatch, that Mazarin at his death, in 1661, ſtrongly recommended him to the king as a man of integrity, and of ſuperior talents. Colbert was firſt intendant of finances, and in this appointment, he ſettled, on the firmeſt baſis, the trade of France with the Eaſt and Weſt Indies. As ſuperintendant of the buildings in 1664 he embelliſhed the capital, and erected the palaces of the Thuilleries, Verſailles, the Louvre, Fontainbleau, &c. His influence with the monarch procured alſo the foundation of the academy for painting and ſculpture, the academy of ſciences, and the obſervatory firſt inhabited by Caſſini. He likewiſe promoted the canal by which the two ſeas were united, and which was completed in 1680, after 14 years' labor, and he introduced a ſevere reform in the courts of juſtice. In 1669 he was made ſecretary of ſtate, and three years after miniſter of ſtate. He died 1683, of the ſtone, leaving ſix ſons and three daughters, whom he ſettled by alliances with the moſt powerful families of France, wiſely conſidering that high connections are a more permanent profit to a family than momentary popularity. He is deſervedly reſpected as a miniſter who ably reſtored the navy, the commerce, and the finnances of France, patronized learning and ſcience, and invigorated genius by his active generoſity.

COLBERT, John Baptiſt, ſon of the preceding, was early engaged in politics, and as ambaſſador in Portugal, Denmark, and England, evinced great judgment, and ability. He was ſecretary of ſtate 1686, director general of the poſts 1699, and counſellor to the regency in Lewis XV's. minority. He died at Paris 1746, aged 81. His memoirs of the negociations from the treaty of Ryſwick to the peace of Utrecht, have appeared in four parts, 3 vols. 12mo. written with great purity and impartiality.

COLE, William, of Adderbury, Oxfordſhire, was educated at Merton college. He retired to Putney, where he devoted himſelf to botany. At the reſtoration he became ſecretary to Duppa biſhop of Winchester, in whoſe ſervice he died 1662. He publiſhed the art of ſimpling, or introduction to the knowledge of gathering plants, and the next year Adam in Eden, or Nature's paradiſe, &c.

COLE, Thomas, a diſſenting miniſter, educated at Weſtminſter ſchool, and Chriſt church Oxford. In 1656 he was made principal of St. Mary-hall, and had Locke among his pupils, pupils, but at the reſtoration he was ejected for nonconformity, and after keeping a ſchool at Nettlebed, he was lecturer at Pinner's hall. He wrote a diſcourſe on regeneration, faith, and repentance, 8vo.—a diſcourſe on the chriſtian religion on ſundry points, &c. and died 1697.

Cole, Thomas, of Glouceſterſhire, made a curious collection of herbs, &c. which according to Dr. Pulteney, he afterwards deſtroyed in a fit of religious phrenzy.

Coles, Eliſha, author of a Latin dictionary, was born in Northamptonſhire about 1640, and entered at Magdalen college, Oxford in 1658. He maintained himſelf in London by teaching Latin and Engliſh. He was afterwards uſher at Merchant Taylors', but left the place for ſome miſdemeanor, at preſent unknown, and retired to Ireland, where he died about 1680. Beſides his dictionary in 8vo, he wrote the Engliſh ſchoolmaſter,—an Engliſh dictionary, &c. The work on predeſtination was written by another Eliſha Coles, his uncle, who died 1688.

Colet, John, was born in St. Antholin's pariſh, London, 1466, ſon of the lord mayor, and brother to 21 other children. He was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. His knowledge did not extend to Greek, as that language was then conſidered unneceſſary, and the learning of it was oppoſed by a ſet of men who called themſelves Trojans. From Oxford he travelled on the continent, and became acquainted with the learned of the times. He was made dean of St. Paul's in 1505, and began by preaching himſelf, and by procuring able divines, to encourage enquiries into the holy ſcriptures. To promote learning, he founded St. Paul's ſchool in 1512, of which Lilly was the firſt maſter, with an ample proviſion to inſtruct 153 boys gratis, under the patronage of the mercers' company. Whilſt he thought of retirement, he was attacked by the ſweating ſickneſs, which, after a third relapſe carried him off, 1519, in his 53d year. He wrote various things, all of which are mentioned in his life by Knight. Though he did not live to ſee the reformation, he yet was an able promoter of it.

Coley, Henry, of Oxford, from a taylor became an eminent aſtrological writer, as the aſſiſtant of Lilly, and the continuator of his ephemeris. His pretended knowledge of futurity rendered him popular, ſo that his houſe in Gray's-inn-lane was frequented by people of all deſcriptions, and his opinion obtained by the examination of urine, &c. He wrote a key to aſtrology, and died 1690.

Coligni, Gaſpard de, admiral of France, was born 1516. By his conduct at the battle of Ceriſoles, and of Renti, he was made admiral of France. At the death of Henry II. he eſpouſed the cauſe of the Calviniſts againſt the Guiſes, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf at Dreux, St. Denys, Jarnac, and Montcontour. At the peace he appeared at court, and was loaded with the careſſes of Charles IX. who ſoon after perfidiouſly planned his murder. Coligni was the firſt who fell on the fatal day of Bartholomew 1572. The duke of Guiſe headed the aſſaſſins to the houſe of the aged hero, who was ſtabbed in ſeveral places by Beſme, and thrown out of the window. After the body had been expoſed three days to the inſults of the populace, the head was cut off, and ſent by the bloody Catharine de Medicis as a preſent to the Roman pontiff. The character of this great and virtuous man has been ably drawn up by the abbé de Mabli, who draws a parallel between him and Francis duke of Guiſe.

Coligni, Henrietta, daughter of Gaſpard de Coligni, firſt married Hamilton, a Scotch lord, and afterwards count de la Suze. This laſt union proved unfortunate, the jealouſy of her huſband compelled her to embrace the Catholic religion, and at laſt her marriage was annulled by the parliament. She obtained celebrity by her wit and the effuſions of her elegiac muſe, ſo that the flatterers of her time aſcribed to her the majeſty of Juno, the wit of Minerva, and the beauty of Venus. She died at Paris 1673.

Colle, Charles, ſecretary to the duke of Orleans, died at Paris 1783, aged 75. He was diſtinguiſhed as a comic writer; yet known for the vigor and elegance of genuine wit, and correct deſcription, he wants delicacy, and a cautious regard for morals. He was of that ſociety of jovial companions known under the name of Caveau. His ſong on the capture of Port-mahon procured him a penſion of 600 livres. His beſt plays are, truth in wine—and partie de chaſſe de Henri IV., from which our miller of Mansfield is borrowed.

College, Stephen, the proteſtant joiner, was condemned at Oxford for a conſpiracy againſt Charles II. upon the teſtimony of a worthleſs informer, and he ſuffered death, ſtrongly aſſerting his innocence, 1681. He was in his character a reſpectable man.

Colleone, Bartholomew, of Bergamo, followed the fortunes of de Montone, and of Joan queen of Naples. He was in the ſervice of Viſconti, and then of Francis Sforza, for whom he defeated the French army at the battle of Freſcati. After ſerving ſo many maſters, and every where carrying victory in his train, he again entered into the ſervice of the Venetians. He died 1475.

Colletet, William, a French academician, who died at Paris 1659, aged 61. He was one of the five authors whom Richelieu ſelected to write for the theatres; but he refuſed to alter his verſes according to his ſuggeſtions.

Collier, Jeremy, an Engliſh divine, born in Cambridgeſhire 1650. He was educated under his father at Ipſwich ſchool, and Caius college, Cambridge. He reſided for ſix years on his rectory of Ampton near Bury, Suffolk, and then became lecturer of Gray's-inn. His attack on a pamphlet by Burnet, drew upon him the reſentment of the court, and he was ſent to Newgate. He, as a writer, abuſed the revolution, for which he was again ſent to priſon, but releaſed by the interceſſion of his friends. In 1696, he attended Friend and Perkins, who were executed for their concern in the aſſaſſination plot, and by abſolving them, and by impoſing his hand upon them, he was accuſed of inſulting the civil and eccleſiaſtical government. Inſtead of putting in bail, Collier abſconded, and was outlawed till the day of his death. In his retirement he defended his conduct, and wrote his eſſays on moral ſubjects, and afterwards his view of the immorality of the Engliſh ſtage, a work which engaged him in perpetual contention with the wits of the age. The ſeverity of his attack, and the force of his arguments were ſuch, that a reformation actually took place, in the language of pieces repreſented on the ſtage, and though Vanbrugh and Congreve ridiculed his aſſaults, yet Dryden had the good ſenſe of acknowledging the propriety of his remarks, and his ſorrow for the licentiouſneſs of his muſe. His hiſtorical dictionary, chiefly compiled from Moreri appeared in 1701, and the fourth volume of it in 1721. He afterwards publiſhed in 2 vols. fol. an eccleſiaſtical hiſtory of Great Britain, valuable for various documents. In 1713 Collier was conſecrated a biſhop by Hickes, who had himſelf been conſecrated ſuffragan of Thetford, by the deprived biſhops of Norwich, Ely, and Peterborough. He was greatly afflicted with the ſtone, of which he died, 1726, aged 76. He wrote beſides, ſeveral treatiſes on controverſial ſubjects, and aſſiſted ſome of his friends. He was admired as a man of independent ſpirit, as a writer of great learning and genius, and as a divine of genuine piety.

Collings, John, commiſſioner at the Savoy conference, died 1690, aged 67. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a critic and divine. He was ejected as a nonconformiſt from St. Stephen's, Norwich, where he had been miniſter 44 years.

Collins, John, an eminent mathematician, born at Woodeaton near Oxford, 1624. He was engaged with a bookſeller, and afterwards with Mar, clerk of the kitchen to Charles prince of Wales. After being ſeven years in the ſea ſervice, he became an accomptant, and publiſhed ſome valuable works on mathematical and geometrical ſubjects. He was member of the royal ſociety, and was made accomptant to the royal fiſhery company, and ſo highly reſpected for his knowledge of figures, that the lord chancellor Shafteſbury often conſulted him, and referred to his final deciſion, the ſettlement of difficult and intricate accounts. He died of a conſumption, in conſequence of drinking, after a hot day's journey, too large a quantity of cider, 1683. He was of a ſtrong and inventive genius, he firſt projected the manner of dividing the meridian line on the nautical chart, a problem of the firſt importance to navigation; and he began to ſhorten the method of computation by logarithms, completed by Halley.

Collins, Anthony, of Helſton near Hounſlow, was educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge. He entered at the Temple, but left the law for literature. He gained the confidence of Locke, who correſponded with him, and at his death left a letter for him, full of the warmeſt affection. He was the beſt part of his life engaged in controverſies, which proved him to be more inclined to ſcepticiſm and infidelity, than to ſupport the chriſtian religion. His chief works were, prieſtcraft in perfection,—an eſſay on the 39 articles of the church of England,—vindication of the divine attributes,—ſcheme of literal prophecy,—a diſcourſe on the grounds and reaſons of the chriſtian religion, in two parts, a work which excited general attention, and whoſe tenets were in a ſhort ſpace of time combated by not leſs than 35 antagoniſts, among whom were Whiſton, Chandler, Clarke, Aſhley, Sykes, and Sherlock. He was long afflicted with the ſtone, of which he died 1729. He acknowledged in his laſt moments that the true catholic religion is to love God and to love man, and he earneſtly adviſed thoſe that ſtood around him to obſerve that, as the awful warning of a dying man.

Collins, Arthur, a learned antiquary, whoſe knowledge of genealogy is proved in his peerage of England, in 8 vols. which has been further improved by Longmate.

Collins, Samuel, an Engliſh phyſician who ſtudied at Padua, He wrote the preſent ſtate of Ruſſia 1671, 8vo. beſides a book of anatomy, in fol.

Collins, William, a poet of great eminence, ſon of a hatter, born at Chicheſter, 1720. He was educated at Winchester ſchool, but being ſuperannuated, and thus prevented from entering at New college, he became a member of Queen's college, and was afterwards demy of Magdalen 1741. At Oxford, he publiſhed his oriental eclogues, admired for ſimplicity, richneſs of deſcription, and unaffected tenderneſs. In 1744, he came to London, panting after fame, with few reſources, and too wavering in his plans to execute any regular work. At this time he publiſhed propoſals for an hiſtory of the revival of learning. He was now known to Dr. Johnſon, who with his friendſhip ſhared his poverty, and was privy to his diſtreſſes. The death of his uncle Martin, and a legacy of 2000l. ſoon enabled him to live more reſpectable; but the acquiſition of independence did not advance the literary labors of the poet, who ſoon was aſſailed by greater calamities than poverty, the calamities of diſeaſe and inſanity. That ſo able a writer, and ſo ſublime a poet, ſhould be incapacitated to give flow to the pure ſtreams of genius and elegant conception is a melancholy loſs to mankind.

mankind. For a time he endeavoured to disperse the clouds which threatened his reason by travelling into France, but after being some time in a house of lunatics, he fell a victim to his intellectual malady, at Chichester, in 1756. When visited at Islington by Johnson, he was found with a book in his hand, which his friend out of curiosity examined to see what companion a man of letters had chosen. I have but one book, said Collins, but that is the best. It was a common English testament, such as children carry to school. In his last illness, Collins expressed to his friend Dr. Warton, his disapprobation of his oriental eclogues. His odes, though very sublime, especially that on the passions, are often obscure, his lines are clogged with clusters of consonants, and he too much affected the obsolete.

Collinson, Peter, an eminent botanist, of Stavely near Kendal. In 1728 he became fellow of the royal society, whose memoirs he enriched by his own enquiries, and his correspondence with foreigners, especially Benjamin Franklin, Colden, and the famous Linnæus. To his improvements we are indebted for many shrubs transplanted from the western hemisphere and other countries. In private life he was of amiable manners, very communicative, and of a very benevolent heart. He was attacked with a retention of urine, which medical assistance could not remove, and which proved fatal 1768, in his 75th year.

Collot d'Herbois, J. M. a French player. The hisses which attended his appearance at Lyons, made him vow vengeance on that city. Invested in the revolution with absolute power against the Lyonese, he seemed determined to destroy every vestige of their city, the walls were battered down with cannon shot, and the inhabitants were slaughtered with insulting cruelty, and not less than 209 perished in one evening. Collot, stained with blood, and deservedly called the tiger, returned to Paris to become the associate of Robespierre. He voted for the death of Lewis, because the monarch had refused to appoint him his minister; but when Robespierre was accused, he changed sides, and as president of the convention, he exerted his influence to procure his condemnation. This minister of iniquity was afterwards himself condemned 1795 to be deported to Cayenne. He died in confinement 1796. As an orator he had some powers of eloquence, which were exerted in the convention and among the Jacobins; but as a dramatic writer he acquired little celebrity.

Colman, George, an English writer, born about 1733, at Florence, where his father was resident. He was educated at Westminster and Christ-church, Oxford, and early displayed those talents which promised future reputation, and ensured him the friendship of the wits of the time, of Lloyd, Thornton, Churchill, and others. At Oxford he published with Thornton the Connoisseur, in weekly numbers. He entered at Lincoln's-inn, but though called to the bar, the law was less congenial to his taste than the pursuit of the muses. From writing fugitive pieces, he applied himself to dramatic composition. His Polly Honeycomb was acted at Drury-lane in 1760 with success, and the next year his jealous wife divided the general applause with Murphy's way to keep him, and Macklin's married libertine. The death of lord Bath, who was his uncle, in 1764, left him in the independent enjoyment of a comfortable annuity, and his income was encreased upon the decease of general Pulteney in 1767. He purchased of Beard in 1768 the property of Covent-garden theatre, but parted with his share in consequence of some dispute with his fellow patentees, Harris, &c. Soon after, he purchased of Foote, the Hay-market theatre, and continued the management of that house till the time of his death. In 1790 he was attacked by a stroke of the palsy. He was removed to Paddington, and died 1794. Besides the comedies already mentioned, the best of Colman's plays are the clandestine marriage, the English merchant, the Oxonian in town, the man of business, Epicene, the Spanish barber, suicide, the separate maintenance, the manager in distress, &c. He also translated Terence's comedies, and Horace's art of poetry.

Colombiere, Claude de la, a Jesuit, born near Lyons. He was an eloquent preacher in the service of James II. of England, but on suspicion of a conspiracy he was banished, and died at Parai, 1682, aged 41. He is known as the inventor of the solemnity of the heart of Jesus, which had been before introduced by Thomas Goodwin, president of Magdalen college, Oxford. The novelty of this act of devotion engaged the attention of the pious, and under the influence of pretended visions and miracles it soon gained a great number of partisans and zealous apostles. The sermons of Colombiere were published 6 vols. 12mo.

Colomies, or Colomesius, Paul, a French protestant, of Rochelle. He travelled through Europe, and at the solicitation of Isaac Vossius, he visited England, where he was made Lambeth librarian. He died in London in 1692. He wrote Gallia orientalis —Hispania & Italia orientalis—theol. presbyt. —critical works, &c.

Colonna, Fabio, a botanist, born at Naples 1567. He wrote plantarum & piscium historia, 4to.—stirpium rariorum descriptio, 4to.—dissertation on the glossopetræ, 4to.—on American plants, fol. &c. He was the first who gave distinct names to the petals and the leaves of flowers, a judicious arrangement afterwards adopted by Tournefort. The musical instrument called pentachordon is of his invention. He lived to his 80th year.

Colonna, Prospero, son of the prince of Salerno, assisted Charles VIII. of France in the conqueſt of Naples; but afterwards he exerted his military powers to reconquer it for the houſe of Arragon. He was made priſoner at the battle of Villa Franca 1515; but when reſtored to liberty by the French, he renewed the war, and after gaining the battle of la Biccque, he relieved Milan, in 1522. He died 1523, aged 71.

COLONNA, Pompeo, nephew of Proſpero, was brought up to the church. Ever reſtleſs, he raiſed an inſurrection at Rome on the reported death of Julius II. 1512, and ſeized the capitol; but, though pardoned, he again, in 1526, engaged in another conſpiracy to ſeize the chief power, and to put the pope to death. This conduct, which brought miſery on the Romans, by the ſacking of the city by Bourbon, was not puniſhed as it deſerved, but Colonna, whoſe intrigues aſſiſted the pope's eſcape from St. Angelo, was again pardoned, raiſed to new honors, and made viceroy of Naples. He died 1532, author of a poem de virtutibus mulierum.

COLONNA, Mark Antonio, diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo much in the defeat of the Turks at the battle of Lepanto, 1571, that the pope permitted him to enter Rome in a triumphal proceſſion. He was afterwards conſtable of Naples, and viceroy of Sicily; and died 1584.

COLRANE, Henry Hare, lord, born at Blechingley, in Surrey, 1693, was educated at Enfield, and Corpus Chriſti, Oxford. He diſplayed his poetical talents by his muſarum oblatio ad reginam, a poem inſerted in the Muſæ Anglicanæ. He travelled three times through Europe; and in his ſecond tour was attended by Conyers Middleton. He made a noble collection of prints and drawings of antiquities abroad, munificently preſented after his deceaſe to his college. He died at Bath 1749. His books and prints on Engliſh antiquities were bought for the antiquarian ſociety.

COLSTON, Edward, an Engliſh philanthropiſt, born at Briſtol 1636. He encreaſed his property by his commercial connections with Spain; and benevolently diſpoſed his riches to charitable purpoſes. He built almshouſes in Briſtol, which he endowed with an income of 282l.: and beſides the erection of a ſchool for 40 boys, he founded, at the expence of 11,000l. the hoſpital of St. Auguſtin, for a maſter, uſher, and 100 boys, for whoſe maintenance he appropriated an annual income of above 138l. Beſides this, he gave many other munificent donations, eſpecially 6000l. for the improvement of ſixty ſmall livings. He alſo poſſeſſed great meekneſs of temper, joined to exemplary temperance and ſincere piety. He died at Mortlake, in Surrey, 1721, aged 85.

COLUMBUS, Chriſtopher, celebrated as the diſcoverer of a new continent, was born, 1442, at Genoa, ſon of a woolcomber. In his great fondneſs for navigation, he made himſelf perfect in geometry, aſtronomy, and coſmography. After trading in the Mediterranean, he ſettled at Liſbon, where his brother Bartholomew was eſtabliſhed; and here he married the daughter of a maſter of a veſſel who had been engaged in diſcoveries, whoſe charts he peruſed; and he encreaſed his knowledge of maritime affairs by ſeveral voyages to the Canaries and the coaſt of Africa. Guided by experience, and encouraged by the correſpondence of Paul Foſcanelli, a learned Florentine, he became perſuaded that a continent muſt exiſt in the weſtern ocean. He preſented his plans to the Genoeſe, and afterwards to the king of Portugal; but inſtead of patronage, he met in both applications with coldneſs. In Spain, Ferdinand and Iſabella ſhowed him greater attention; and after many delays, which his zeal ſucceſsfully removed, he was permitted to ſail in queſt of unknown regions. On the 6th of September 1492, he left Gomera, with three ſmall ſhips, and on the 12th of October, after ſailing in a weſterly direction, he diſcovered ſome iſlands, and landed at Guana bay, in the Lucca iſlands. After viſiting and taking poſſeſſion of the iſlands of Cuba and Hiſpaniola, he returned to Spain, which, after a paſſage of fifty days, he reached in May 1493. Theſe diſcoveries aſtoniſhed the Spaniſh monarch. Columbus was declared admiral of the Indies, ennobled, and permitted to return to the new world with a large fleet. In his ſecond voyage he diſcovered Jamaica and other iſlands; and on his return to Europe, 8th June 1496, he ſilenced the malicious inſinuations which envy had ſpread concerning his views, and the importance of the new world. In May 1498, he made a third voyage, and diſcovered Paria, on the continent; but ſo violent were his enemies, that, in ſpite of his ſervices, he was ſent to Spain in irons in October 1500: but the monarch liberated him from captivity. He again viſited the new world, and died ſoon after his return, at Valladolid, 20th May, 1506. His remains, by the king's command, were magnificently buried at Seville, where this ſhort epitaph records his merits: "Columbus gave Caſtile and Leon a new world." Important as his ſervices are to the world, it is melancholy to record the ingratitude of poſterity, and to behold an extenſive continent, the diſcovery of which ought to have been immortalized in the appellation of Columbia, bear the inſignificant name of Americus Veſpucius, one of thoſe obſcure individuals who followed, in fearful imitation, the tract of the firſt diſcoverer. The life of Columbus was written by Ferdinand, one of his ſons.

COLUMBUS, Bartholomew, brother to Chriſtopher, was ingenious in his drawing of ſpheres and ſea-charts. It is ſaid that he was deputed by his brother to come to ſolicit the king of England, but that his voyage was delayed by falling into the hands of pirates; and when at laſt the Engliſh monarch promiſed encouragement to his brother, he found that the plan had already been adopted by Ferdinand of Caſtile.

Caſtile. Bartholomew ſhared the honors and the dangers of his brother's diſcoveries; and he was the founder of the town of St. Domingo. He died 1514.

COLUMBUS, Realdus, an Italian anatomical writer. He died at Romo 1577. It is ſaid that his works are compoſed from the works of Veſalius, his maſter, of Padua, whoſe diſcoveries he appropriated to himſelf. His opinions on the blood nearly approached Harvey's diſcovery of the circulation.

COLVIUS, Andrew, a native of Dort, who went in the ſuite of the Dutch ambaſſador to Venice, where he tranſlated into Latin, father Paul's treatiſe on the inquiſition. He wrote alſo ſome elegant poetry.

COLWILL, Alexander, was born near St. Andrew's, and educated at Edinburgh, of which he became principal, in 1662. Beſides ſome tracts, he wrote the Scotch Hudibras, after the manner of Butler, a ludicrous poem, to ridicule the preſbyterians, which is ſtill admired in Scotland. He died 1676, aged 58.

COMBER, Thomas, an Engliſh divine, born at Weſterham, Kent, 1645. He was educated at Sidney Suſſex college, Cambridge. He was dean of Durham 1661, and was chaplain to the princeſs Anne of Denmark and to William and Mary. He died 1699. He wrote ſome divinity tracts, diſcourſes on baptiſm, catechiſm, and confirmation, and on the liturgy of the church of England, &c.

COMBER, Thomas, a fellow of Trinity college, Cambridge, born at Shermanbury, Suſſex, and educated at Horſham ſchool. He was dean of Carliſle 1630, and maſter of his college the following year. He was in 1642 deprived of all his preferments, and impriſoned. He died at Cambridge 1653. He wrote a vindication of the divine right of tithes, againſt Selden.

COMENIUS, John Amos, a proteſtant born in Moravia in 1592. After being paſtor at Fulnec, and alſo preſiding over a ſchool, he fled on the invaſion of the Spaniards, and came to Leſna in Poland, where he taught grammar, and where he publiſhed his janua linguarum, a ſmall book, which acquired ſo much celebrity, that it was tranſlated into 12 European languages. He was invited by the Engliſh parliament, to reform the public ſchools of the kingdom, and viſited England in 1641, but the civil wars thwarted his expectations. The next year he accepted the invitations of the Swedes, by whom he was reſpectfully treated. For four years he was engaged at Elbing in laying down plans for the promotion of general inſtruction. He afterwards viſited Tranſylvania, and gave rules for the better regulation of the ſchools of his country, and on his return to Leſna, he ſaw the city reduced to aſhes by the Poles, and his books and manuſcripts deſtroyed. From Leſna he fled to Sileſia, thence to Brandenburg, afterwards to Hamburgh, and laſtly to Amſterdam, where he ended his days 1671, aged 80. He wrote beſides, Panſophia prodomus—a new method of teaching—unius neceſſarii, &c. The laſt years of his life were diſgraced by viſionary ſchemes, and attempts at phrophecy. He pretended to foretell the beginning of the millennium, which he placed in 1672 or 1673, a groſs abſurdity, which his death prevented him from witneſſing.

COMES NATALIS or NATAL CONTI, a native of Milan, who wrote Greek and Latin poems, and mythologia ſive explcationes fabularum, a very uſeful mythological work. He died about 1590.

COMINES, Philip de, an excellent hiſtorian of Flanders. His birth and acquirements recommended him to Charles of Burgundy, and afterwards to Lewis XI. of France, and as ambaſſador he ſerved the court with fidelity. The next ſucceſſor Charles VIII. viewed him with the prejudice of a foreigner, and he was impriſoned at Loches; but though no advocate would plead his cauſe, he defended himſelf with the energy of innocence, and after addreſſing his judges for two hours, he was, after three years' confinement, diſcharged. He died at Argenton 1509, aged 64. Comines, though well acquainted with modern languages, was no deep ſcholar. The memoirs of his own times are very valuable for the hiſtorical details which they give, during 34 years, of the affairs of the houſe of Burgundy, and of Lewis XI. and Charles VIII. of France, with anecdotes of the various tranſactions in England and on the continent. His impartiality is univerſally acknowledged. Dryden ranks him with Thucydides and Tacitus, for the acuteneſs of his judgment, and the great knowledge of men, manners, and politics, which he has diſplayed. His works, 4 vols. 4to. have been tranſlated by Uvedale into Engliſh, 2 vols. 8vo.

COMMANDINUS, Frederic, an Italian mathematician, who tranſlated Archimedes, Apollonius Pergæus, Ptolemy, Euclid, Ariſtarchus, &c. beſides ſome original compoſitions on the centre of gravity, on clocks, &c. He was patroniſed by the duke of Urbino, and died 1575.

COMMELIN, Jerome, a French printer, born at Douay. He ſettled at Geneva, and afterwards at Heidelberg, where he died 1598. He printed the works of Chryſoſtom, 4 vols. fol. an excellent edition, &c. The mark preſixed to his editions was truth ſitting in a chair.

COMMERSON, Philibert, botaniſt to the French king, was born near Bourg in Breſſe, 1727. When phyſician at Montpellier, he ſhowed his fondneſs for botany to ſo improper a degree, that he plundered the king's garden to enrich his collections. He was recommended by Linnæus to the queen of Sweden to complete her collection of rareſt fiſhes, and wrote his ichthyology in 2 vols. 4to. He wrote beſides a dictionary and bibliography on writers of natural hiſtory, and the martyrology ology of botany, containing the lives of those who had lost their life in pursuit of natural curiosities, to which his own was to be added. He accompanied Bougainville round the world. He died at the isle of France in 1773, leaving to the king's cabinet all his collection, amounting to 200 volumes in folio, besides the contents of 32 cases, containing great treasures, selected during his voyage. He mentions discovering a nation of dwarfs of $3\frac{1}{2}$ feet high in the interior of Madagascar.

COMMIRE, John, a Jesuit of Amboise. He wrote Latin so elegantly that his fables are esteemed equal to those of Phædrus. He died at Paris 1702, aged 77.

COMMODI, Andrea, a Florentine painter who died 1638 aged 73. His Lucifer and associates fallen from heaven, was much admired.

COMPTON, Spencer, son of the first earl of Northampton, was master of the robes to the prince of Wales, afterwards Charles I. and accompanied him to Spain. When Charles succeeded to the throne, he supported his measures, attended him against the Scots, and when the royal standard was set up at Nottingham, was amongst the truest of his friends. At the battle of Hopton-heath near Stafford, 1643, he was encompassed by the enemy, and when offered quarter, he boldly declared he would not receive it from the hands of rebels and rogues, upon which he was slain with a blow of an halbert on the head.

COMPTON, Henry, youngest son of Spencer, was born in 1632, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. At the restoration he obtained a cornetcy in a regiment of horse, but he afterwards studied divinity at Cambridge. He obtained the rectory of Cottenham, Cambridgeshire, a canonry at Christ-church, and the mastership of St. Cross near Winchester. In 1674, he was made bishop of Oxford, and the next year succeeded to the see of London. He was entrusted with the education of Mary and Anne, and the strong attachment which they shewed to the protestant religion, is attributed to the wholesome instructions of the prelate. He labored to reconcile the dissenters to the church, and resisted the claims and the doctrines of the catholics. His zeal displeased James II. who removed him from the privy council, and on his refusing to suspend Dr. Sharp, rector of St. Giles, from his ecclesiastical office, he was summoned before Jeffries and arbitrarily deprived of all his functions. This was noticed by Mary and by William prince of Orange, and at last James, afraid of the consequences of his conduct, restored the bishop to his offices. Compton however received with fullenness the reparation offered to his dignity, and when the kingdom was invaded by William, he conducted the princess Anne to Nottingham, to prevent her being conveyed to France. He congratulated William on his landing, and supported his claims to the throne in the house of lords, and at last consecrated him. Every step however which he pursued was tinctured with moderation, but because he wished the reconciliation of the dissenters, he has been branded with the epithets of a bigoted partizan. He died at the age of 81, 1713. He was an eminent divine as well as an able statesman, strongly attached to the constitution, and displaying the sincerity of his profession by a pious and exemplary life. He wrote some theological tracts, &c.

CONANT, John D D. an English divine, was born at Yeaterton, Devon, 1608, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford. In 1649 he was elected rector of his college; he was also divinity professor, and in 1657 vice chancellor. At the restoration he appeared in London, at the head of the university, to congratulate the king; but though he assisted at the Savoy, he refused to comply with the act of uniformity, and was consequently deprived of his preferments in 1602. He was afterwards re-admitted into the church 1670, being ordained by Reynolds bishop of Norwich, whose daughter he had married. He was made minister of St. Mary, Aldermanbury, which he exchanged for Allsaints in Northampton, to which he was strongly attached. He became archdeacon of Norwich 1676, and in 1681 had a prebend in the church of Worcester. In 1686 he lost his eyesight, and died seven years after. He was a man of great piety, of extensive learning, and of singular modesty. Six volumes of his sermons have been published.

CONCANEN, Matthew, a native of Ireland, bred to the law. He came to London as a literary adventurer, and wrote in support of the measures of the ministry. His attack upon Pope procured him a place in the Dunciad; but the duke of Newcastle advanced him to the office of attorney-general for Jamaica. Here for 17 years, he conducted himself with all the integrity of a man of virtue, and after acquiring an independent fortune, he returned to England, with the flattering intention of spending the rest of life in Ireland. He fell however into a rapid consumption, and died at London 1749. He wrote Wexford wells a play, besides some songs, in the musical miscellany, and a well known letter addressed to Warburton.

CONCINI, better known by the name of marshal d'Ancre, was a Florentine, and came to France in the suite of Mary de Medicis wife of Henry the great. By his intrigues and those of his wife Eleonora Galigay, he became a marquis, and a marshal of France. Lewis XIII. was prevailed upon to get rid of this dangerous favorite, and Concini was shot by Vitry and his accomplices on the Louvre bridge, 1617, and his body was ignominiously insulted by the populace. His wife also lost her head, and his son was declared incapable to hold any office in the kingdom. When his wife was accused of witchcraft, in influencing the mind of the queen, she said, her magic was only the influence of a great mind over a weak one.

CONDAMINE, Charles Marie de la, of Paris travelled to the eastern parts af the world, and in 1736 was chosen with Godin to go to Peru, to determine the figure of the earth at the equator. On his return he visited Rome, and was, by the pope permitted at the age of 55 to marry his niece. He died 1774, in consequence of an operation for the removal of a hernia. He was a man of great eminence as a mathematician. His works are, distance of the tropics—relation of a voyage to America—observations, &c. on the inoculation of the small-pox—on education—measure of the three first degrees of the meridian &c.

CONDE', Lewis, first duke of, son of Charles of Bourbon, was distinguished at the battle of St. Quintin, and afterwards for his intrigues, as the leader of the Hugonots. He was wounded at the battle of Dreux, and seven years after fell at that of Jarnac 1569. aged 39. His memoirs of his own time possess merit.

CONDE', Henry prince of, was known in the court of Henry IV. of France, by whose influence he became a catholic. On the death of Lewis XIII. he became minister to the regent, and displayed his abilities in the service of his country, and died at Paris 1646, aged 58.

CONDE', Lewis prince of, son of the preceding, deserved the name of the great. He was born at Paris 1621, and Richelieu observing his promising abilities, foretold his future greatness. Though but 22 he defeated the Spaniards at the battle of Rocroi, and after taking Thionville and other towns, he entered Germany as a conqueror. His attempts upon Lerida in Catalonia proved abortive, but in Flanders he acquired fresh honors, by the defeat of the imperialists. In the civil wars of France, he espoused the cause of the court, though afterwards he opposed the views of Mazarin, and of the monarchy, and, in the spirit of unyielding pride, he entered into the service of the Spaniards against his country. The peace of the Pyrenees, 1659, reconciled him to France, and enabled him to atone for the injuries which his desertion had inflicted on his honor. He was afterwards employed against the prince of Orange; but though wounded at the passage of the Rhine, he completed the conquest of Franche-compté, and spread terror into Germany. He died of the gout at Fontainbleau 1686, aged 65.

CONDER, John, D.D. was born in Cambridgeshire 1714. He was minister of a dissenting congregation at Cambridge, and afterwards kept a school at Mile-end, and in 1761 succeeded to the meeting on the Pavement, Moorfields. He died 1781, aged 67. He printed several sermons—an essay on the importance of the clerical character, &c.

CONDILLAC, Stephen Bonnot de, of the French academy, was preceptor to the infant son of the duke of Parma. He died at Flux near Baugenci, 1780, of a putrid fever. He was a man of great erudition, strong sense, and austere manners. He wrote in 3 vols. 12mo. essay on the origin of human sciences—on animals—on the sensations, &c.—besides a course of study for the instruction of his pupils in 16 vols. 12mo, &c.

CONDORCET, John Anthony Nicholas Caritat, marquis of, one of the founders of the French republic, was born 1743, ot Kibemont in Picardy, of a noble family. He preferred literature to the military profession, and studied mathematics and belles letters at the college of Navarre, and at the age of 21 he wrote his ingenious memoir on the calcul differentiel, received by the academy of Paris with marked approbation. He became the friend of d'Alembert, and of Voltaire, and corresponded with the king of Prussia, and when secretary of the academy of sciences, he distinguished himself by his spirited eloges on his departed brethren. In the constituent assembly he was made governor to the dauphin; but his zeal in favor of republican principles overpowered the respect which he owed to majesty, and he recommended the abolition of monarchy. But when he showed compassion for the king, and opposed his trial, his measures were viewed with jealousy by Robespierre, and he was regarded as a hypocrite, who, under the mask of moderation and philosophy, aspired at the sovereign power. He was therefore condemned 1793, as one of the Girondists, and for a while concealed himself in Paris, and afterwards in the country. Obliged to hide himself for several nights in some quarries, hunger forced him at last to seek relief in a neighbouring tavern. His long beard, and the voracious appetite with which he devoured the bread placed before him, rendered him suspected, he was arrested, and might have escaped under the character of a distressed servant, but a Horace found in his pocket, proved him to be a man of education. On the morrow the gaoler found him dead, a sacrifice either to excessive fatigue, or to poison, 1794. In his character, Condorcet was weak but ambitious, fond of novelty, and. in pursuit of imaginary happiness, little attentive to the feelings of humanity, and the precepts of christianity. He was, according to d'Alembert, a volcano covered with snow. His writings were respectable. Besides a sketch of the progress of the human mind—a treatise on arithmetic—a tract on calculation, —and on the problem of the three bodies—analytical affairs, &c. he wrote eulogies on Bernouilli, d'Alembert, &c. possessing great merit, though that on Voltaire is considered as turgid and insignificant.

CONFUCIUS or CONG-FU-TZE, a celebrated Chinese philosopher, born at Chanping, about 550 B.C. He possessed such wisdom and abilities that he became prime minister of the kingdom of Lu. His labors were directed to the reformation of manners, but the dissipation of the king who attached himself to several concubines, displeased him, and he indignantly resigned reſigned and retired to privacy. Such was his reputation, that he was frequented by above 3000 diſciples, whom his example and precepts formed to virtue and morality. He taught his diſciples that the firſt duties were to ſerve, obey, and fear God, to love their neighbour as themſelves, and to curb their paſſions. Thus deſervedly reſpected, Confucius ſelected ten of his pupils, to whom he communicated the reſources of his mind. He returned afterwards to the kingdom of Lu, where he died aged 73. The king no ſooner heard of his death, than he exclaimed, "that the gods had removed him from the earth, becauſe they wiſhed to puniſh her inhabitants." His memory was honored in the moſt ſolemn manner, he was regarded as a departed ſaint, and edifices were raiſed to celebrate his ſervices to mankind. His books on morals have been tranſlated into French, and they poſſeſs excellent rules for virtue and morality. His deſcendants are ſtill revered in China, as mandarins of the firſt order.

Congreve, William, an Engliſh dramatic writer, born in Staffordſhire, 1672. He was educated at Kilkenny ſchool, and Dublin college. After the revolution he came to London, and entered at the middle temple, but relinquiſhed the profeſſion for the muſes. His firſt production was "Incognita, or love and duty reconciled," a novel of ſome merit, though the compoſition of a youth of 17. His firſt play was the old bachelor in 1693, which was reviſed and applauded by Dryden, and recommended the author to lord Halifax, by whoſe influence he became commiſſioner for licenſing hackney coaches, and held other offices worth 600l. a year. The next year appeared his double dealer, and on the death of queen Mary, he wrote a much admired paſtoral, called the mourning muſe of Alexis, and in 1695 he produced his popular comedy of love for love, and an ode on the taking of Namur. The next production was the mourning bride, a tragedy, firſt acted in Lincoln's-inn fields' theatre, and univerſally applauded. The reputation of Congreve, but particularly the licentiouſneſs of his plays, drew upon him the cenſures of Jeremy Collier, and truth muſt own the charge of immorality too well eſtabliſhed to be refuted. He produced another comedy, The way of the world, which, though condemned by the critics of the times, poſſeſſes great merit. Though he now withdrew from public life as an author, his friends were occaſionally complimented with his aſſiſtance, in epilogues, and he aſſiſted Dryden in his Virgil, and contributed the whole of Juvenal's 11th ſatire. The laſt 20 years of his life, Congreve ſpent in eaſe and retirement. He was at laſt afflicted with the gout, which together with a bruiſe received in being overturned in his chariot, haſtened his death. He died in Surry-ſtreet, Strand, 1729, and was buried with great ſolemnity in Weſtminſter-abbey. Congreve enjoyed in his time much of what can render life agreeable, eaſy, and happy. His appointments yielded him not leſs than 1200l. a year, and with an eaſy fortune he was flattered with the friendſhip of the great, and had Dryden, Steele, and Pope, among his admirers. He died very rich, the fruit of his great but not unbecoming economy. His comedies, ſays Johnſon, are the works of a mind replete with imagery and quick in combination, though of his miſcellaneous poetry little can be ſaid that is favorable. Voltaire, who knew and admired him, ſays, that he raiſed the glory of Engliſh comedy to a greater height than any writer before or after him.

Connor, Bernard, a phyſician, born in the county of Kerry, 1666. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in France for his aſſiduity, and his knowledge of anatomy and chemiſtry, and he afterwards travelled through Germany as the tutor of the two ſons of the chancellor of Poland, and on his arrival at Warſaw, became phyſician to the king, John Sobieſky. He left Warſaw in 1674, as phyſician in the ſuite of the king's daughter, who was going to eſpouſe the duke of Bavaria at Bruſſels, and from Holland he came to England in 1695. He read lectures on anatomy, chemiſtry, and phyſic at Oxford, and alſo in London and Cambridge. His evangelium medici divided into 6 ſections, publiſhed in 1697, drew upon him the imputation of irreligion and even atheiſm. On the death of Sobieſki, and the tumults of a Poliſh election, he gratified the public curioſity by the publication of his hiſtory of Poland in two vols. which, though finiſhed with more rapidity than correctneſs, contains many intereſting particulars. Connor was attacked with a fever, which quickly carried him off, 1698, in his 32d year. Though born and educated a catholic, he embraced the doctrines of the church of England, and died in her communion.

Conrad I. count of Franconia, and king of Germany 912, oppoſed the Huns who had invaded Germany, and purchaſed their retreat, and died 918.

Conrad II. king of Germany 1024, was crowned emperor at Rome three years after. He added to his dominions the kingdom of Burgundy, and died 1039.

Conrad III. duke of Fraconia, was elected emperor of Germany. He went to the cruſades againſt the Saracens, and as the Greeks had poiſoned the fountains in the holy land, he nearly loſt his whole army, and with difficulty returned to Europe. He died 1152.

Conrad IV. duke of Suabia, ſucceeded as emperor 1250. His elevation was oppoſed by Innocent IV. who claimed the right of diſpoſing of the crown, upon which he invaded Italy, and took Capua, Naples, and other places. He died ſuddenly, as it is ſuſpected, of poiſon, 1254.

Conradin or Conrad, ſon of the fourth Conrad, was three years old when his father died.

died. His uncle Mainfroi became his regent at Naples, but Urban IV. beſtowed the crown on Charles of Anjou, who defeated his rival 1268, and beheaded him at Naples, when only ſixteen years old.

CONRART, Valentin, ſecretary to the French king's council, was born at Paris 1603, and died 1675. To his taſte and his love for literature, the French aſcribe their French academy, of which he is deſervedly ſtiled the father, as her learned men held their firſt meetings in his houſe from 1629 to 1634. He owes his celebrity to the affability of his manners, and the hoſpitable aſylum which he gave to men of learning.

CONRI, Florence, a Franciſcan friar, born in Connaught. Philip III. ſent him to his native country to reconcile the Iriſh to a Spaniſh invaſion. His ſchemes were however defeated, and he returned to Madrid, where he died 1629. He was author of the mirror of the chriſtian life, &c.

CONSTANT, David, profeſſor of philoſophy Greek, and divinity at Lauſanne, wrote an abridgement of politics,—on the paſſage of the Iſraelites through the red ſea,—on Lot's wife, —the buſh of Moſes, &c. and died 1733, aged 95.

CONSTANTIN, Robert, profeſſor of phyſic, and belles lettres at Caen, died of a pleuriſy in 1605, aged 103, after enjoying to the laſt all the faculties of his mind and body. His knowledge of Greek was very extenſive, as his works fully evince, eſpecially his valuable Lexicon Greek and Latin. He wrote beſides three books on Greek and Latin antiquities,—a dictionary of abſtruſe Latin words,—a theſaurus rerum, &c.

CONSTANTINE, a native of Syria, raiſed to the papal chair 708. He travelled into the eaſt, and died 715.

CONSTANTINE, of Carthage in Africa, was a phyſician of the 11th century. He is ſuppoſed to be the firſt who brought the Arabian and Greek phyſic into Italy.

CONTI, Guiſlo di, an Italian poet who died at Rimini about the middle of the 16th century. His poems are greatly eſteemed.

CONTI, abbé Anthony, a Venetian, who died 1749, aged 71. He is author of tragedies, and of poems which abound more with metaphyſics than poetical elegance. During his viſit to England, Conti became acquainted with Newton, and long venerated the abilities and friendſhip of that great man.

CONTI, Armand de Bourbon prince of, quitted the church for a military life, and warmly eſpouſed the party of the inſurgents againſt his brother the great Condé. Theſe two brothers were both together ſent priſoners to Vincennes by Mazarin. Conti was made in 1654 governor of Guienne, &c. He wrote, in French, treatiſes on the duties of the great, —on comedies and plays, &c.

CONTI, Francis Lewis de Bourbon, ſon of the preceding, diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the ſiege of Luxemburgh, &c. He was elected king of Poland 1697, but ſoon ſupplanted by the elector of Saxony. He died at Paris, 1709, aged 45.

CONTO-PERTANA, Don Joſeph, a Portugueſe poet, of great merit, inferior only to Camoens. His Quitterie la Sainte, is a valuable epic poem. He died at Liſbon 1735.

CONYBEARE, John, a prelate, born at Pinhoe, near Exeter, 1692. He was educated at Exeter grammar college, and Exeter college. In 1730 he was rector of his college, and that year he publiſhed an anſwer to Tindal's chriſtianity as old as the creation, which proved him to be a great champion of revelation, and an acute ſcholar, and ſound divine. In 1732 he was appointed dean of Chriſt church, and in 1750 he ſucceeded Butler in the ſee of Briſtol. He died of the gout 1755. Two volumes of his ſermons were publiſhed after his death.

COOK, James, a celebrated navigator, born at Marton in Cleveland, Yorkſhire, 1728. His father was a poor cottager, afterwards employed as upper ſervant on the farms of Mr. Skottowe, where his ſon was engaged at the plough till the age of 13. At the age of 17 young Cook was bound apprentice to a grocer, but his fondneſs for the ſea overturned his father's plans, and after one year and a half's ſervice the indentures were cancelled, and in 1746 he was bound for three years to a ſhip owner at Whitby. He was thus engaged in the coaſting and coal trade, till 1752, when he was made mate of a veſſel, and the next year he quitted his maſter's ſervice, and entered on board the Eagle, a king's frigate. Between 1753 and 1760, when he received a lieutenant's commiſſion, he was ſucceſsfully employed in ſtoring his mind with that knowledge of navigation and mathematics, which he afterwards diſplayed in ſo remarkable a degree. The ſkill and ability which he ſhowed in America and on the Jamaica ſtation, recommended him to the notice of ſir William Burnaby the commander, and to the admiralty, and when in 1767 the royal ſociety wiſhed to obſerve the tranſit of Venus over the ſun's diſc, from ſome of the iſlands of the pacific ocean, Cook was appointed to command the ſhip Endeavour in that diſtant expedition. He was in conſequence raiſed to the rank of captain, and ſailed down the river, accompanied by ſir Joſeph Banks, Dr. Solander, and Mr. Green. On the 13th April 1769, he reached Otaheite, where the obſervations were to be made, and after remaining there till 13th July, he ſet ſail for New Zealand, and after diſcovering ſeveral iſlands he reached Batavia 10th October 1770. After loſing many of his men in this climate, where he remained till the 27th December to repair his ſhip, he proceeded to the Cape, and anchored in the Downs on the 12th June, after an abſence of nearly three years. The abilities diſplayed in this expedition recommended him to the command of the two ſhips intended to explore the coaſts of the ſuppoſed ſouthern hemihemisphere. On the 9th of April 1772 he sailed on board the Resolution with captain Furneaux, who had the command of the other ship, the Adventure. They reached the Cape 30th October, and leaving it on the 22d November they proceeded towards the south. The vast fields of ice which presented themselves in those southern latitudes, and the imminent dangers to which they hourly exposed the ships, convinced the captain that no land was to be found, and that further attempts were useless and perilous, and on the 17th January 1773, he sailed towards the south sea, and on the 21st March 1774 returned to the Cape, and reached England on the 14th of July. During this dangerous voyage of three years and 18 days, the captain lost only one man in his crew of 118. The discovery of islands in the southern seas had now engaged the attention of the nation, and another project was formed to find out a northwest passage, and thus unite the great pacific ocean with the north of the atlantic. On this occasion Cook, again eager to serve his country, bid adieu to his domestic comforts, and a third time embarked to surround the world. He set sail in the Discovery in July 1776, and penetrated towards the northwest of America, and turned back only when his further progress was impeded by vast fields of floating ice. Unable, in consequence of the advanced season, to go further, he visited the Sandwich islands, and stopped at Owyhee, where he unfortunately lost his life. During the night the Indians carried away the Discovery's cutter, and Cook, determined to recover it, seized the king of the island, to confine him on board his ship till the restoration of the vessel. In the struggle which took place, the captain and his men were assailed by the Indians, who viewed with resentment the captivity of their monarch, and before he could reach the boat Cook received a severe blow on the head which brought him to the ground, and unable alone to resist a multitude of savage foes, while his men in the boat and on the shore seemed intent in defending themselves, he was overpowered by his assailants. His body was treated with savage barbarity, and a few bones were recovered which his disconsolate companions committed to the deep. This melancholy event happened 14th February 1779. The account of the death of this worthy navigator was received with general sorrow. His services, the humanity which he had always shown in his intercourse with the Indians, and the benevolence with which he watched over the health of his men, entitled him to universal respect. The king bestowed on his widow a pension of 200l. and on each of his children 25l, a reward scarce adequate to the many services of his father. Cook, though cradled in poverty, improved himself by diligence and assiduous labor. He possessed great natural abilities, and they were not abused; but reading, meditation, and severe application rendered them not only respectable but shining. Of his first voyage the account was compiled by Dr. Hawkesworth. Foster was the narrator of the second voyage, and as he had shared the adventures of the naval hero, his relation must be considered as accurate and interesting. Among the compilers of the last voyage men of ability and reputation are mentioned, especially Dr. Douglas bishop of Salisbury, captain King, and Mr. Anderson.

Cooke, sir Anthony, was born at Giddinghall, Essex, about 1506. He presided over the education of Edward VI. In Mary's reign he lived in exile; but he returned under Elizabeth, and died 1576.

Cooke, Robert, was born at Beeston, Yorkshire, and educated at Brazen-nose college, Oxford. He was an able divine and a good scholar, and retired upon the vicarage of Leeds in Yorkshire, and died in 1614.

Cooke, Thomas, a poet, born at Braintree, Essex, about 1707, and educated at Felsted school. In his 19th year he edited Andrew Marvel's works, and, by an elegant dedication, introduced himself to lord Pembroke, who assisted him with valuable notes in his translation of Hesiod, published in 1728. Cooke translated besides, Terence, and Cicero de naturâ deorum, and the Amphitryon of Plautus. He wrote also five or six pieces for the stage, which gained him neither fame nor money. He was concerned with Mottley in writing Penelope, a farce, which being considered as throwing ridicule on Pope's Odyssey, just then published, greatly irritated the poet, who in consequence gave Cooke a place in the Dunciad. Cooke died very poor, about 1750. Some memoirs of him were published, by the late sir Joseph Mawbey, in the Gentleman's magazine.

Cooper, Anthony Ashley, earl of Shaftesbury, was born 1621, at Winborne St. Giles's, Dorsetshire. He studied at Exeter college, Oxford, and then removed to Lincoln's-inn, where he applied to the law. He was member for Tewkesbury in the parliament of 1640; and at first seemed inclined to favor the side of the king. He however retired from Oxford, and took a commission in the parliamentary army. In 1645 he was sheriff for Norfolk, and the next year for Wilts; and as member of the house of commons, he had the boldness to charge Cromwell with arbitrary government. The opposition which he had manifested against the usurpation rendered him a fit person to solicit the king's return, and he was therefore one of the twelve to carry the invitation of the commons. On the restoration, his services were rewarded with a peerage, he was made chancellor of the exchequer, and one of the lords of the treasury. In 1672 he was made lord chancellor; but resigned the following year through the intrigues of the duke of York. From a partizan of the court, he became a violent opponent, so that at last the king sent him, together with Buckingham and others, to the Tower, where he he remained thirteen months. When fet at liberty his oppofition did not ceafe; and at laft a change of miniftry placed him at the head of the council board. This triumph was fhort, as the duke of York not only procured his difmiffal from office, but obtained his being committed for high treafon to the Tower. After four months' confinement he was tried, and acquitted; and then fled in 1682 to Holland where he propofed to end his days in peace. He died of the gout January 1683, aged 62. Shaftefbury was a man of no ftead principles, of great ambition, and little political fidelity. Charles II. who not only faid but bore with great good humor, fallies of raillery, once talking to him of his amours, told him, "I believe Shaftefbury, thou art the wickedeft fellow in my dominions." "May it pleafe your majefty," replied Shaftefbury, with a grave face, "of a fubject, I believe I am."

COOPER, Anthony Afhley, earl of Shaftefbury, author of the Characteriftics, was born 1671, at Exeter-houfe, London. He was educated under his grandfather, who placed about him a perfon wel verfed in the learned languages, fo that at the age of 11 he could read Latin and Greek with great eafe. In 1686 he began his travels, and on his return was member for Poole; but he declined fitting at the election, on account of his health. He then paffed into Holland, where, under an affumed name, in the company of le Clerc, Bayle, and other ingenious men, he fpent a year, in the moft perfect friendfhip and all the eafe of literary intercourfe. On his return he fucceeded to the earldom of Shaftefbury; but he valued little a feat in the houfe of lords, where he feldom appeared. When the enthufiaftic extravagance of the French prophets about this time engaged the attention of the nation; Shaftefbury publifhed his letter concerning enthufiafm, addreffed to lord Somers. The precarious ftate of his health induced him to remove to a warmer climate; and after being about a year in Italy, he died at Naples 1713 The three volumes of his Characteriftics were the only works which he wifhed to prefent to the public. His name, however, in literature was fo refpectable, that his letters to a young man in the univerfity were, in 1716, prefented to the public; and in 1721 Toland alfo publifhed letters from him to Molefworth. As a philofopher lord Shaftefbury gained high reputation; but his principles were warmly combated by indefatigable opponents. Leaving the purer principles of chriftian doctrine, he, in his admiration for the learning of the antients, regarded the character and the precepts of Socrates and Democritus as more than human, and while he confidered man as a political being, under the guidance of a providence, whofe government excludes general evil and diforder, he difregarded the important doctrines of revelation and atonement.

COOPER Maurice Afhley, brother to the author of the Characteriftics, tranflated the Cyropædia, addreffed to his fifter, the mother of Mr Harris of Salifbury. This work appeared in 2 vols. 8vo. 1728, foon after his death, and was highly efteemed.

COOPER, Thomas, a prelate, born at Oxford 1517, and educated at Magdalen college fchool. In 1546 he quitted his fellowfhip at Magdalen, and ftudied phyfic, but on Mary's death he returned to divinity. He was dean of Chrift church and next dean of Gloucefter, and 1570, bifhop of Lincoln. In 1584, he was tranflated to Winchefter. He was active againft thofe public exercifes called prophefyings, which tended fo much to introduce puritanifm, and was equally zealous againft the catholics. He died at Winchefter 1694. His writings are, chronicles from the 17th year after Chrift to 1560—thefaurus linguæ Romanæ et Britannicæ—& dictionarium hiftoricum poeticum, &c.

COOPER, Samuel, an Engliſh painter, born in London 1609. He gained fo much from the works of Vandyck, that he was called Vandyck in little. His chief excellence was in the repreſentation of the features of the head. His works were highly eſteemed on the continent. The king of France paid great attention to him when at Paris; but he could not obtain his Oliver Cromwell, though he offered 150l. for it. His beſt pieces were, O. Cromwell and one Swingfield. He died in London 1672, aged 63.

COOPER, John Gilbert, eſq. born at Thurganton, Nottinghamſhire, was educated at Weſtminſter ſchool, and Trinity college, Cambridge. He reſided on his family ſeat, where he died 1769, from the ſtone. His chief work is his life of Socrates, in which he was aſſiſted by his friend Jackſon of Leiceſter. He wrote beſides remarks on Warburton's edition of Pope's works, and tranſlated the Ver Vert of Greſſet. His other works are, letters on taſte —a father's advice to his ſon, &c.

COOPER, Miles, Dr. miniſter of the epiſcopal chapel, Edinburgh, was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and became preſident of the college of New York. He died at Edinburgh 1785. He publiſhed a volume of poems, beſides a ſermon, &c.

COOTE, ſir Eyre, an Engliſh general, born in 1726. He ſerved in the rebellion of 1745, and in 1754 left Ireland for India, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the reduction of Hughley and Chandenagore, at the battle of Plaſſey, and the ſiege of Pondicherry. His ſervices were acknowledged by the Eaſt India company, who voted him a diamond-hilted ſword, value 700l. In 1770 he was appointed commander in chief, but reſigned in conſequence of a diſpute with the governor at Madras. On his return to England he was made governor of fort St. George in Scotland; and afterwards went again to the eaſt as commander in chief. In July 1781, he, with only 10,000 men, defeated Hyder's army, conſiſting of 150,000 men. The weak ſtate of his health did not prevent his taking the field again, in 1783; but he ſunk under his complaints, and two days after his arrival at Madras, he died 1783. The Eaſt India company have erected a monument to his memory in Weſtminſter abbey.

COOTWICH, John, of Utrecht, is known for his travels into the Eaſt, and for the account of it which he publiſhed, in Latin, 4to. 1619, containing many curious particulars.

COPERNICUS, Nicholas, a celebrated aſtronomer, born at Thorn, in Pruſſia, 1472. He ſtudied the learned languages at home, and applied to philoſophy and phyſic at Cracovia. In his 23d year he ſet out for Italy, in ſearch of knowledge; and on his arrival at Rome he was appointed profeſſor of mathematics. After ſome years' abſence he returned home, and began to apply his vaſt knowledge to the examination of the Ptolemaic ſyſtem, then univerſally followed. The opinions of preceding philoſophers were weighed with judgment; but of all the ſyſtems of ancient times none pleaſed him ſo much as that of Pythagoras, for its beauty and ſimplicity. After twenty years' laborious ſtudy, the cycles and epicycles of former aſtronomers were removed from the machine of the univerſe, and the ſun was independently placed in the center, to illumine and govern the whole. But though convinced of the truth of his hypotheſis, the philoſopher yet dreaded the bigotry of the times. His work lay long concealed, till his friends prevailed upon him to publiſh; but a few hours after the firſt copy was brought to him, he was ſeized with a violent effuſion of blood, which terminated his life 1543, in his 70th year. This truly great man, who to a comprehenſive mind united the mild virtues and the innocence of private life, was canon of Worms. He was not only a mathematician, but a painter, and it is ſaid that by the help of a looking-glaſs he drew an excellent picture of himſelf.

COQ, Peter le, a French eccleſiaſtic, born at Iſs, near Caen, 1728. He became ſuperior of the Eudiſtes, and remarkable for his piety and learning. He wrote letters on eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, 12mo.—treatiſe on funds—on different kinds of property—on the uſury of commercial loans, &c. and died of a paralytic ſtroke.

COQUES, Gonzalo, a Flemiſh painter, who died 1684, aged 66. He imitated Vandyck, and particularly excelled in hiſtorical converſations. His pieces in his life-time were eagerly ſought by the princes of Germany, and by Charles I. A remarkable clearneſs of color appeared in the heads and hands of his pictures.

CORAM, captain Thomas, was born about 1668, and bred to the ſea. From ſeeing many children expoſed, his humanity prompted him to relieve them: and to him we owe the Foundling hoſpital, for which, after 17 years' benevolent attention, he obtained a charter. His charitable views were extended to America: he eſtabliſhed a place for the education of Indian girls, and paved the way for a reconciliation between the natives and the ſettlers. His diſregard for private economy, whilſt engaged in public good, reduced his circumſtances ſo much, that he lived on the benevolence of his friends, at the head of whom was the prince of Wales. He died in London 1751, aged 84, and was, according to his deſire, buried in the Foundling chapel.

CORAS, John de, a native of Realmont, public profeſſor of law at Toulouſe, at the age of 18. He was afterwards profeſſor at Angers, Orleans, Paris, Padua, and Ferrara, and then returned to Toulouſe, and became chancellor to the queen of Navarre. He was impriſoned for his adherence to the proteſtant religion, and orders were ſent from the king to put him to death; but while the parliament reſiſted the arbitrary mandate, ſome aſſaſſins broke into the priſon, and murdered him, with above 200 other priſoners, 1572. He wrote various works on civil law.

CORBET, John, a native of Glouceſter, educated at Magdalen-hall, Oxford. He obtained the living of Bramſhot, in Hampſhire, from which he was ejected for nonconformity. He died 1680. He is author of an hiſtorical relation of the military government of Glouceſter during the rebellion, 4to. beſides ſelf-employment in ſecret, 12mo. 1681, a work of merit.

CORBET, Richard, an Engliſh poet and divine, born at Ewell, in Surrey, and educated at Weſtminſter ſchool and Chriſt-church, Oxford, of which he became dean, in 1620. In 1629 he was made biſhop of Oxford, and in 1632 tranſlated to Norwich. He died 1635. After his death, his poems were publiſhed, called Poetica ſtromata.

CORDAY D'ARMANS, Mary Anne Charlotte, a native of St. Saturnin, in Normandy. She was brought up at Caen, where her accompliſhments were ſeen and admired by Belſunce, the major of a regiment quartered in the town. The murder of this favorite, by aſſaſſins, excited the vengeance of the youthful heroine, and when ſhe heard that he was branded with the name of conſpirator, by Marat, ſhe haſtened to Paris, determined to ſacrifice to her reſentment the man who had ſo ſhamefully abuſed the object of her affections, and had defended the condemnation of the deputies of merit and virtue in the convention. She was refuſed admittance at the houſe of Marat; but ſhe obtained it by writing a letter, in which ſhe informed him that ſhe wiſhed to diſcloſed ſecrets of importance; and while the tyrant was engaged in converſation with her, ſhe ſtabbed him to the heart, and he fell at her feet. Glorying in the deed, ſhe refuſed to fly, and was dragged to the revolutionary tribunal, where ſhe heard the ſentence ſentence of condemnation with compoſure. The ſerenity and dignity of her features were ſo commanding, as ſhe walked to the ſcaffold, that Adam Lux, a deputy from Mayence, captivated by her beauty, requeſted of the bloody tribunal to follow her to death; and he had the ſingular ſatisfaction of expiring by the ſame guillotine. Charlotte ſuffered July 1793. She was 24 years and 9 months old; and was, it is ſaid, deſcended by the female line from Peter Corneille.

CORDEMOI, Geraud le, a French academician, a great partiſan of Deſcartes' ſyſtem. He died 1684, at an advanced age. He wrote a general hiſtory of France, during the two firſt races of kings, beſides metaphyſical and other tracts, 4to.

CORDUS, Euricius, a German phyſician and poet, who died at Bremen 1535. He was intimate with Eraſmus and other learned men. Beſides Latin poems, he wrote botanologia, and medical treatiſes.

CORDUS, Valerius, ſon of the preceding, was born at Heſſe Caſſel 1515. He ſtudied botany, and traverſed the mountains in Germany, and viſited Padua, Piſa, and Florence; but receiving a dreadful kick from a horſe, he died in conſequence of it, at Rome, 1554, aged 29. He publiſhed remarks on Dioſcorides, 1561, fol.—hiſtoria ſtirpium, 2 vols. fol. &c.

CORELLI, Arcanſelo, a famous muſician, born at Fuſignano, near Bologna, in 1653. He preferred ſecular to eccleſiaſtical muſic, and was ſo fond of the violin, that he was conſidered as the firſt performer on it in the world. He died at Rome 1713, aged nearly 60. He left his property, amounting to about 6000l. and his large collection of pictures, to his great patron cardinal Ottoboni, who, with becoming benevolence, beſtowed all the money on the relations of the deceaſed. Corelli is conſidered as the author of new and original harmonies, in a ſtyle elegant and pathetic.

CORIO, Bernardine, an hiſtorian of Milan, employed by Sforza to write the hiſtory of his country; but when the Milaneſe was over-run by the French, and himſelf taken priſoner, he died of grief, in 1500, aged 40. His hiſtory is much eſteemed.

CORNARIUS, or HAGUENBOT, John, a German phyſician. He rejected the preſcriptions of the Arabian phyſicians, and reſtored the mode practiſed by the Greeks. He was fifteen years engaged in tranſlating the works of Hippocrates, Ætius, &c. He practiſed with ſucceſs at Frankfort, Marpurg, Jena, &c. and died of an apoplexy 1558, aged 58. He wrote ſome medical tracts, &c.

CORNARO, Lewis, a Venetian, who died at Padua 1565, more than 100 years old. He wrote a treatiſe on the advantages of a temperate life, in his 81ſt year; and in this little book he ingenuouſly confeſſes the irregularities of his younger years, and recommends to his youthful readers the practice of regularity and temperance, by which he enjoyed all the comforts of lively ſpirits and uninterrupted health. In his reformed mode of living, he never took more than 12 ounces of food and 14 of wine. He wrote beſides a treatiſe on waters, &c.

CORNARO, Helena Lucretia, a Venetian lady, educated at the univerſity of Padua, where ſhe took her degrees, and was made a doctor, and received the title of unalterable. She made a vow of perpetual celibacy, that ſhe might devote herſelf to literary purſuits; and ſo great was her reputation, that thoſe who travelled through Venice were more anxious to ſee her than all the curioſities of the city. Her application haſtened her death, which happened in 1685, in her 38th year. Her death was recorded by poetical effuſions from the learned of Europe, and an eloquent oration was alſo pronounced, in which ſhe was celebrated as triumphing over three monſters, pride, luxury, and ignorance. She wrote nothing, though capable to inſtruct mankind by her pen.

CORNEILLE, Peter, a celebrated French poet, born at Rouen 1606. He was brought up to the bar; which he abandoned as not congenial to his genius. His firſt play was Melite, a comedy, which originated in an affair of gallantry; but ſo great was its popularity, that Corneille was encouraged to contribute more liberally to the public amuſement. His next piece was Medea, a tragedy; and, after many others, appeared the Cid, in 1637, his chef d'œuvre, a tragedy, which drew againſt him the obloquy of rival wits and unſucceſsful poets, among whom was even Richelieu himſelf, though he had granted a penſion to the author. Corneille died 1684, aged 79. He was a man of great merit in private life, liberal, humane, and devout, and rather of a melancholy turn of mind. His poetical works are among the ſublimeſt effuſions of the French muſe.

CORNEILLE, Thomas, a French poet, brother to the preceding. Though inferior to his brother, yet his plays poſſeſſed merit. They were publiſhed with thoſe of his brother 1738, in 11 vols. 12mo. He tranſlated alſo Ovid's metamorphoſes, and ſome of the epiſtles—and wrote remarks on Vaugelas—a dictionary of arts, 2 vols. fol. &c. He died 1709, aged 84.

CORNEILLE, Michael, a painter, born at Paris 1642, travelled to Rome to improve himſelf. He ſtudied the antique, in which he equalled the Caracci. He was, however, deficient in coloring. On his return to Paris, his pencil was employed in adorning the noble edifices of Verſailles and Trianon. He died at Paris 1708.

CORNELISZ, Lucas, a painter of Leyden, chief painter to Henry VIII. of England. His portraits of the conſtables of Queenborough-caſtle, from Edward III. to his time, are preſerved at Penſhurſt, in Kent.

CORNELISZ, James, a Dutch painter, of the 16th century. His picture on the deſcent from the croſs, preſerved at Amſterdam, is much admired.

Cornelisz, Cornelius, of Haerlem, was eminent as a painter. His deluge is celebrated. .

Corneto, Adrian, an Italian, ſent as legate to Henry VII. who beſtowed on him the biſhoprics of Hereford and Bath and Wells. He was next legate in France, and was made a cardinal by Alexander VI. The pope, who knew and dreaded his abilities, determined to poiſon him at a ſupper; but fell himſelf a victim to his own diabolical purpoſes. Corneto left Rome on the ſucceſſion of Julius II. but though recalled by Leo X. he again went into exile, where he died. He was author of a learned treatiſe de ſermone latino—& de verâ philoſophiâ, &c. and was one of the zealous reſtorers of the purity of the Latin language.

Cornwallis, ſir Charles, employed by James I. as his ambaſſador in Spain, wrote the life of Henry prince of Wales, to whom he had been ſecretary; and died about 1630.

Cornwallis, Charles marquis, an Engliſh general, born 1738. He, in 1758, obtained a captain's commiſſion in the light infantry, and in 1761 was aid-de-camp to the marquis of Granby, and went to Germany till the concluſion of the campaign. He ſucceeded in 1762 as earl Cornwallis, and three years after was made aid-de-camp to the king, and one of the lords of the bed chamber. He obtained the 33d regiment of foot in 1766, and two years after married miſs Jones, a lady of large fortune, who died of a broken heart, when unable to diſſuade him from his attendance in the campaigns againſt the Americans. In the new world he diſplayed great ſpirit. The ſeizure of Philadelphia was followed by the reduction of South Carolina, and by the defeat of Gates, with an inferior force; but theſe advantages were tarniſhed by the ſurrender of the whole army at York-town, 1781, to the Americans. Though this proved ſo diſaſtrous to the Britiſh intereſt, lord Cornwallis was never blamed for want of courage, or ſagacity. In 1790, he went out as governor of Britiſh India, where he defeated Tippoo, who made peace by yielding part of his dominions. Lord Cornwallis, after a mild and vigorous adminiſtration in India, returned to Europe, and was created a marquis. His next employment was the government of Ireland, where he deſtroyed rebellion, and captured an invading enemy in the very boſom of the country, and, by the moſt temperate meaſures, reſtored confidence and harmony, where diſtruſt and mutual hatred had long reigned with impunity. After completing the union between the two kingdoms, lord Cornwallis returned to England, ſoon to negociate the ſhort-lived peace of Amiens. In 1805 he accepted again the government of India, where the pacific meaſures of his former adminiſtration were ſo much admired. He was no ſooner arrived at Calcutta, than he ſet out on a viſit to the northern provinces. Confinement in a boat, without regular exerciſe, and the heat of the weather, produced ſuch debility, that he was at laſt obliged to ſtop at Ghazepore, above 1000 miles above Calcutta, where he expired 5th of October, 1805. His remains were interred at Ghazepore, and every mark of reſpect paid to his memory.

Coronelli, Vincent, a Venetian geographer, coſmographer to the French king. He founded an academy of coſmography at Venice, where he died 1718. He publiſhed above 400 geographical charts, &c. much valued.

Corregio, Antonio da, a celebrated painter, born at Corregio, near Modena. Vid. Allegri.

Corsini, Edward, a monk, who died of an apoplexy at Piſa in 1765, where he was profeſſor of philoſophy. He was a man of great erudition, and publiſhed ſome valuable works in criticiſm, philology, and literature; the chief are, philoſophical and mathematical inſtitutions, 6 vols. 8vo—a courſe of geometrical elements, 2 vols 8vo —the faſti of the archons of Athens, 4 vols. 4to. &c.

Cort, Cornelius, an engraver, born at Hoorn, in Holland. He travelled into Italy, and ſettled at Rome, where he died 1578, aged 42. His engravings are excellent, the very beſt ever produced in Holland, amounting to 151.

Cortesi, William, a French painter, who ſtudied at Rome, and was employed by Alexander VIII. He died 1679, aged 51.

Cortesi, Giovanna, a paintreſs of Florence, who died 1736, aged 66. Her miniatures are admired.

Cortez, Ferdinand, the conqueror of Mexico, was born at Medellin in Eſtramadura 1485. He quitted the ſtudy of belles lettres, and of the law, for arms, and he, in 1504, went to Hiſpaniola, where one of his relations was governor. In an expedition to Cuba in 1511, he diſplayed ſuch bravery, that Velaſquez, the governor, entruſted him with the command of the fleet deſtined to make new diſcoveries on the continent. In 1518 he ſailed from San-Jago, in Cuba, with 11 ſmall veſſels, on board of which were embarked 617 men, ſoldiers and ſailors, with 18 horſes and 10 field pieces, but only 13 firelocks. With this ſmall force he landed at Tabaſco, which he took after dreadful ſlaughter, and advancing to St. Juan de Ulva, he was met by the ambaſſadors of Montezuma, the king of Mexico, who by entreaties and preſents ſolicited him to ceaſe from his enterprize, and not penetrate into the country.. Cortez knew the terror which his arms inſpired; the fire of his artillery was compared to the thunder of the heavens, the horſes on which the Spaniards ruſhed to the battle were unknown and irreſiſtible monſters, and the huge veſſels which, floating on the ocean, had brought theſe ſtrangers, were all ſuch extraordinary objects in the eyes of the the ſuperſtitious Indians, that the Spaniards were regarded as more than human beings. After building a ſmall fort at Vera-Cruz, and burning his ſhips to inſpire his followers with confidence, Cortez advanced through the provinces to the capital of Mexico, ſupported by the co-operation of ſome tribes which were diſſatisfied with Montezuma. With only 500 men badly armed, and 15 horſes, he defeated the Tlaſcalans, who diſputed his progreſs, and after rewarding the hoſpitality of the inhabitants of Cholula with rapine and ſlaughter, he preſented himſelf at the gates of Mexico. He was received with great pomp by Montezuma, but though treated with confidence, Cortez acted with duplicity, and ſeizing the perſon of the monarch, he compelled him to acknowledge himſelf the vaſſal of Spain. Thus abſolute in Mexico, Cortez ſoon heard that Velaſquez had ſent an expedition under Narvaez, to bring him back in chains to Cuba; but no ways diſmayed, he left one of his officers Alvarado, governor of the capital, and haſtened to Vera Cruz. He ſurpriſed and defeated Narvaez, and by his conciliating conduct he converted his enemies into friends, and returned to Mexico ſupported by thoſe who came to deſtroy his hopes. In his abſence Alvarado had been guilty of exceſſes towards the natives, and inſtead of ſubmiſſion, Cortez found hoſtility. Unable to quell the tumult, he cauſed Montezuma, arrayed in his royal robes, to appear before his ſubjects, but the Mexicans diſregarded their captive monarch, who during the battle received a mortal wound. The Spaniards retired from Mexico, and tho' half of their little army was deſtroyed, they determined on revenge. On his way to Tlaſcala, Cortez was met by an army of the natives, whom he defeated with dreadful ſlaughter; and after recruiting his forces with 550 infantry and 40 horſes, and a number of allies from Tlaſcala, and other towns, he marched back to Mexico, December 1520. The conqueſt of Texcuco, the ſecond city of the empire, was followed by the ſiege of Mexico, which the new ſovereign Guatimozin, the nephew of Montezuma, ably defended. The artillery of the Spaniards however prevailed over the feeble weapons of the Indians, and after three months' reſiſtance, Guatimozin was ſeized in a canoe attempting to eſcape on the lake, and his captivity was followed by the fall of the capital, and of the Mexican empire. Above 200,000 Indians made their immediate ſubmiſſion to thoſe few bold adventurers; but they were not ſatisfied with the immenſe treaſures of the city, and the unfortunate monarch was expoſed to tortures, to confeſs where the riches of Montezuma were depoſited. It was at this dreadful moment when the monarch lay expoſed with one of his miniſters to the fury of burning coals, that he heard the cry which the poignancy of his ſufferings, and not the wiſh of making a diſcovery, extorted from his favorite, and looking at him with an air of upbraiding indignation, he exclaimed, "what! am I on a bed of roſes." Guatimozin was ſaved from the flames to be ſhot by his perſecutors, with ſome of his miniſters, on a charge of conſpiracy. Maſter of a populous empire, Cortez, though avaricious, diſplayed the character of a beneficent governor. Mexico, which had been deſtroyed during the ſiege, roſe from ruins, and in 1529 aſſumed the form of the nobleſt of European cities. In the mean time the conqueror was an object of envy at home, and he was recalled to give an account of his conduct. As he had the good fortune to procure the favor of his ſovereign, and a grant of enlarged powers. When he preſſed to Charles V. for an audience, and was aſked who he was, the bold adventurer replied, "I am the man who has given you more provinces than your father left you towns." Beſides the dignity of marquis, the conqueror of Mexico received the grant of large domains in New Spain, and after viſiting his conqueſts in 1530, and continuing there ſome years, he returned to Europe, and died in his native country 1554, aged 63. He left ſeveral legitimate children, and ſome beſides by his two Indian miſtreſſes, one of whom was a daughter of Montezuma. Great and heroic as Cortez appears, he deſerves the execration of poſterity for the cruelties which he exerciſed on the inoffenſive natives. It was not only on pretence of extorting their riches that theſe wretched men were expoſed to perſecution and death, but the moſt cruel methods were purſued to convert them to chriſtianity by men who in every action of life violated the precepts of the goſpel. On one occaſion ſixty caciques and above 400 leading men were committed to the flames, and ſo horrid were the practices of theſe fierce conquerors, that as they expired, the Indians indignantly rejected the promiſes of another and a happier life, when they heard that the regions of paradiſe were to contain their unfeeling murderers.

CORTI, Matthew, of Pavia, profeſſor of phyſic there and at Piſa and Padua. Clement VII. appointed him his phyſician, and after his death he ſettled at Piſa, where he died 1544, aged 69. He wrote treatiſes, de curandis febribus—de venæ ſectione, &c.

CORYATE, Thomas, ſon of a clergyman, born at Odcombe, Somerſetſhire, 1577. He ſtudied for three years at Glouceſter-hall, Oxford, and then was in the family of Henry prince of Wales, where he was the whetſtone of the wits of thoſe times. In 1608, he travelled through France, Italy, and Germany, &c. and publiſhed an account of his adventures, called Crudities, in 4to. The work was recommended by the verſes of Ben Jonſon, Inigo Jones, Donne, Drayton, and others. and ſo pleaſed was the author with his ſucceſs, that he ſet out in 1612 to viſit Conſtantinople, the coaſts of Aſia Minor, Egypt, and all the Levant, Perſia, and the dominions of the mogul. He was attacked at Surat, in the East Indies, by a flux, which carried him off 1617. Coryate was not devoid of understanding; but his affectation exposed him to the ridicule of the wits of the age, and turned the best intentions into levity and contempt.

COSIERS, John, a painter, of Antwerp, 1603, patronised by many crowned heads. His historical pieces deserved universal commendation.

COSIMO, Andrew and Peter, Italian painters, of whom the first excelled in the claro-obscuro, and the other in ludicrous pieces. Peter died 1521, aged 80, of a paralytic stroke.

COSIN, John, a prelate, born in Norwich 1594, and educated at the free school there, and at Caius college, Cambridge. He was patronised by Overall, bishop of Lichfield, and by Neal, bishop of Durham, who gave him a prebend, and the rich rectory of Bransperh. His collection of private devotions, drawn up at the request of Charles I. and his intimacy with Laud, drew upon him the censures of the puritans. In 1634 he was elected master of Peterhouse, and in 1640 was made dean of Peterborough. He was deprived by a vote of the house, of all his preferments, and two years after expelled from the mastership of Peterhouse, on an accusation of ecclesiastical severity. Upon this he left the kingdom, and resided at Paris, where he was assisted by a small pension from queen Henrietta. At the restoration he was raised to the see of Durham, and employed himself in repairing and beautifying the cathedral and the palace, and in erecting schools and hospitals. During the 11 years in which he was at Durham, he spent not less than 2000l. a year in charitable uses. He died of a pectoral dropsy, 1672, aged 78. He left many legacies for charitable purposes by his will. The various books which he wrote display much learning, solid judgment, and extensive information.

COSME, John Baseillac, an eminent lithotomist. His instrument for dividing the neck of the bladder, though once approved by the faculty, is now neglected. His forceps for breaking stones in the bladder was once in general use; and such was his celebrity, that the surgeons, through jealousy, prevailed upon the French king to banish him. He died at Paris 1786, aged 79.

COSMO I. son of John de Medici, was born in 1519. When his cousin Alexander was murdered, he procured his election to the supreme authority of the state; and he behaved with such sagacity, that all the conspiracies formed against his person proved abortive. He assisted the emperor in 1553, in the reduction of Sienna, which was annexed to his own territories by Philip II. and, in 1569, he was raised by Pius V. to the title of grand duke of Tuscany. Cosmo, the judicious patron of literature, re-established the university of Pisa, and promoted the arts, but found himself unhappy in his family. His son John, who was a cardinal, was secretly stabbed by his brother Garcia, who pretended ignorance of the foul deed. The father suspected the inhuman son; and when he confessed it, he, in a fit of passion, stabbed him with the same dagger which had robbed him of his other son. This tragic scene so affected the mother, that she died a few days after, a victim to silent grief. Cosmo died 1574.

COSMO II. grandson of the first Cosmo, succeeded 1609, and displayed the virtues of a benevolent prince, eager to advance the happiness of his people, and to cultivate literature. He died 1621.

COSMO III. succeeded 1670. He married the daughter of the duke of Orleans, from whom he was afterwards divorced; and he annexed to his other dignities the title of royal highness. He is represented as so superstitious that he took orders for the privilege of saluting the handkerchief which, according to monkish traditions, our Saviour gave to Veronica, impressed with his own image. Cosmo was a liberal patron of letters, and particularly attached to the study of chemistry. He was one of the richest sovereigns of Europe, and died 1723, after a reign of 54 years. His son, John Gaston, died 1737, without issue; and the sovereignty of Florence descended to the queen of Spain, as sprung from the second Cosmo; and she exchanged it with France for the kingdom of the two Sicilies, bestowed on her son don Carlos.

COSSE', Charles de, marshal de Brissac, a French general, born at Anjou. He was distinguished in the wars of Italy and Piedmont, and at the siege of Perpignan 1541. The French king sent him as ambassador to Charles V. and afterwards made him, in 1550, marshal of the kingdom, &c. His sagacity as a general was so conspicuous, that several princes placed themselves under him as in a school of honor, where the tactics of war could best be learned. He died at Paris 1563, aged 57. He was of such integrity, that when the government refused to pay the debts contracted by the army, he sold part of his estates to satisfy the just demand.

COSTANZO, Angelo di, born at Naples 1507, after 53 years of labor, published an history of his native city in Italian, folio. He was also a poet, and his sonnets and other pieces were collected in 12mo. He died at a very advanced age, about 1590.

COSTARD, George, an English scholar, born about 1710. He was fellow and tutor of Wadham college, and in 1764 obtained the vicarage of Twickenham. He died 1782. He wrote 15 different treatises chiefly on astronomical subjects, and on the book of Job.

COSTER, Lawrence, an inhabitant of Haerlem, supposed by the Dutch to be the inventor of printing, about 1430. The best authorities however support that the art of printing was first invented at Mayence, though Meerman of Rotterdam, with great erudition, maintains the claims of his countryman. Coster died 1440.

COSTHA, Ben Luca, a chriſtian philoſopher of Balbec, in the 250th year of the hegira. He tranſlated ſeveral Greek books into Arabic, and wrote ſome original works on phyſic, aſtronomy, and mathematics.

COTELERIUS, John Baptiſt, a learned Frenchman, who, at the age of 12, was able to conſtrue the new teſtament in Greek and the old in Hebrew, at the firſt opening of the book. He was profeſſor of Greek, and publiſhed the works of all the fathers of the apoſtolic age, with a new tranſlation and notes, 2 vols. fol. 1672. He publiſhed beſides, monumenta eccleſiæ Græcæ, &c. He died of an inflammatory diſorder in his breaſt, in his 59th year, 1686.

COTES, Roger, an Engliſh mathematician and aſtrologer, born at Burbach, Leiceſterſhire. He was educated at Leiceſter ſchool and St. Paul's, London, and at Trinity college, Cambridge. In 1706 he was made Plumian profeſſor of aſtronomy, and in 1713 took orders, and publiſhed Newton's mathematica principia, with the improvements of the author, with an excellent preface. He alſo wrote a deſcription of the great fiery meteor ſeen March 16, 1716. This riſing genius died at the age of 33, 1716, to the regret of the univerſity, and of every lover of ſcience and goodneſs His harmonia menſurarum was publiſhed in 1722, 4to.

COTES, Francis, an Engliſh painter in oil and crayons. He died 1770, aged 45.

COTIN, Charles, a French writer, who died at Paris 1682. He was an eloquent preacher, and a reſpectable proſe writer and poet. He is known more for the ſeverity of Boileau and Moliere's ſatires againſt him, than his own excellence.

COTTA, John, a Latin poet, born near Verona. He was made priſoner by the French at Ghiara d'Adda, in 1509, and died 1511, at Viterbo, of a peſtilential fever, aged 28. He wrote epigrams and orations.

COTTE, Robert de, an architect, of Paris. His genius was diſplayed in adorning the public buildings of Paris, the palaces of Verſailles and St. Denys, and the colonade of the Trianon. The chief beauties of his works were lightneſs, elegance, and delicacy. He died at Paris 1735.

COTTEREL, ſir Charles, groom-porter to James I. and maſter of the requeſts to Charles II.: was well ſkilled in modern languages. During the exile of his maſter, he tranſlated Caſſandra, the famed romance, and was concerned in the tranſlation of Davila's civil wars of France.

COTTINGTON, Francis lord, an able miniſter of Charles I. employed for ſome time as an ambaſſador in Spain. On the breaking out of the civil wars he left this country for Spain, where he died, at Valladolid, about 1651, aged 77.

COTTON, or COTON, Peter, a Jeſuit, born at Neronde, near the Loire, diſtinguiſhed for his zeal in converting heretics. He was confeſſor to Henry IV. of France, and poſſeſſed ſo much of his confidence, that it was ſaid the king was good, but that he had cotton in his ears. Cotton refuſed an archbiſhopric and a cardinal's hat, and died 1626, aged 63. He wrote ſermons, beſides controverſial and divinity tracts.

COTTON, ſir Robert Bruce, an eminent Engliſh antiquary, born at Denton, Huntingdonſhire, 1570. He was of Trinity college, Cambridge, and was knighted by James I. who reſpected his abilities, and alſo employed his pen on ſeveral occaſions. At James's requeſt he vindicated the character of Mary queen of Scots, and defended the eccleſiaſtical inſtitution againſt the innovations of the puritans. On the creation of baronets in 1611, ſir Robert Cotton appeared as the thirty-ſixth in the new dignity. In the ſucceeding reign, he joined the commons in the cry for the redreſs of grievances, and in 1629, he became an object of perſecution to the court. A manuſcript, "which," it is ſaid, "laid down a plan how the kings of England might oppreſs the liberties of their ſubjects," &c. was lent out of his library, and being laid before the privy council, produced his arreſt, and the ſeizure of his valuable property. Sir Robert with difficulty extricated himſelf, but the treatment he received in ſome degree undermined his conſtitution, and broke his heart. He died of a fever, at Weſtminſter, 1631, aged upwards of 60 years. Sir Robert was an able antiquarian, and the friend and patron of men of learning. He is particularly entitled to the admiration of poſterity for the valuable library which now remains for the information of the public, an immortal proof of his munificence, and indefatigable zeal in the cauſe of ſcience and of mankind. That his purſuits were directed to ſuch objects was a happy circumſtance. In his time many records and important manuſcripts plundered from the diſſolved monaſteries were ſcattered with profane indifference, and ſome friendly hand was wanted to collect them for the information of the learned. This valuable collection was depoſited in the Britiſh muſeum in 1753.

COTTON, Charles, born in Staffordſhire, is known for his burleſque verſes and ludicrous poetry, in the reign of Charles and James II. He tranſlated with great ſpirit Montaigne's eſſays, inſcribed to lord Halifax. He alſo publiſhed the wonders of the peak in Derbyſhire—Virgil traveſtied—Lucian burleſqued, &c. He died about the time of the revolution.

COUDRETTE, Chriſtopher, a French eccleſiaſtic, ſtrongly attached to the partiſans of the Port Royal againſt the Jeſuits. He oppoſed the papal bull unigenitus, for which he was ſent to the Baſtile for twelve months, in 1738. He died at Paris, 1774. He wrote memoires, 2 vols. 12mo.—hiſtoire & analyſe du livre de l'action de Dieu, &c. His chief work is the hiſtory of the Jeſuits, in 4 vols. 12mo. 1761, &c.

COVEL, John, an Engliſh divine, born at Honingſhearth, Suffolk, 1638, and educated at St. Edmundſbury, and Chriſt college, Cambridge. He was chaplain to the embaſſy at Conſtantinople, where he continued for ſeven years. On his return he was preſented to the living of Littlebury, in Eſſex, and in 1687 made chancellor of York, and the next year maſter of Chriſt college, Cambridge. He died in 1722, aged 85. During his reſidence at the Porte, he devoted himſelf to the examination of the ancient and preſent ſtate of the Greek church; and he gave a curious and uſeful publication on the ſubject, in folio.

COVERDALE, Miles, a native of Yorkſhire, educated at Cambridge. From a friar he became a proteſtant, and was made biſhop of Exeter by Edward VI. Under Mary, he was ejected from his ſee, but at Elizabeth's acceſſion, he declined to re-aſſume his biſhopric, as his principles were now puritanical. He died poor, but reſpected, 1567, aged 81. He aſſiſted William Tindal in the Engliſh verſion of the bible in 1537, and corrected it afterwards in the edition of 1540, with notes.

COULON, Lewis, a French prieſt, who died 1664. His geographical works are greatly eſteemed, eſpecially his hiſtorical treatiſe of all the rivers in France, 2 vols. 8vo.

COUPLET, Philip, a Jeſuit, of Malines, who went as miſſionary to China in 1659, and returned in 1680. He died on his ſecond voyage to the ſame place, 1693. His Confucius Sinarum philoſophus, 1687, folio, is a valuable and curious work.

COURAYER, Peter Francis, a French divine, born at Vernon, Normandy, 1681. He publiſhed his "defence of Engliſh ordinations," printed in Holland, 1727, a book which expoſed him to the perſecution of the catholics; ſo that he took refuge in England, where the univerſity of Oxford granted him a doctor's degree, and the crown a penſion. He died in 1776, after two days' illneſs, at the age of 95. He died in the faith of the catholic church, though at Ealing, where he reſided, he attended the Engliſh ſervice regularly, declaring he received great ſatisfaction in the prayers of the church. He wrote Paul's hiſtory of the council of Trent, 2 vols. fol. dedicated to queen Caroline, who raiſed his penſion from 100l. to 200l.—Sleidan's hiſtory of the reformation.

COURT DE GEBELIN, Anthony, a native of Niſmes, proteſtant miniſter at Lauſanne. He wrote monde primitif, compared with the monde moderne, in 9 vols. 4to. a work of merit and great erudition. He wrote beſides, the hiſtory of the war des Cevennes, 3 vols. 12mo. &c. He died at Paris, 1784, aged 59.

COURTEN, William, ſon of a taylor at Meninx, in the Netherlands, eſcaped with difficulty from the tyranny of Alva, and in 1568 reached London, where he ſettled. His buſineſs was the making of French hoods, in thoſe days in great reputation, and by induſtry, the Courten family ſo increaſed their property, that at the death of the father and mother they were opulent merchants in the trade of ſilk and fine linen. In 1631, their returns are averaged at 150,000l. a year; and ſo highly reſpected, that William and Peter received the honor of knighthood. Under the management of ſir William, the concerns of the company were ſo encreaſed, that by their loans to James I. and to Charles I. the firm of Courten had a claim upon the crown of not leſs than 200,000l. The concerns of this extraordinary family were, however, leſſened by the intrigues of lord Carliſle, who ſeized the iſland of Barbadoes, where ſir William had ſettled a factory, as on a place which had been diſcovered by his own ſhips, and been protected at his own expence. His property likewiſe ſuffered by the murder of his factors at Amboyna, by the Dutch. He now engaged with new ardor in the Chineſe trade; but the loſs of two ſhips richly laden completed his diſaſters, and reduced him to poverty. He ſurvived not long this heavy loſs. He died 1636, aged 64.

COURTEN, William, the laſt male deſcendant of the family juſt mentioned, was born in Fenchurch pariſh, London, 1642. Though his father, in conſequence of his inſolvency, left the kingdom in 1643, and never again ſaw his ſon, yet he was, it is imagined, educated under the eye of thoſe many rich relatives which remained to him in England. He early began to travel, and at Montpellier, ſo congenial to his ſtudies, he cultivated the acquaintance of learned men, particularly of Tournefort, and of ſir Hans Sloane. During his minority, a perſon of the name of George Carew had obtained letters of adminiſtration, and when he ſued for the reſtitution of his property, the arts of the uſurper, who was a lawyer and a courtier, prevailed over the ſimplicity of the petitioner. Carew prevailed in his intrigues, and Courten not only gave up all claims to his paternal eſtates, but exchanged his family name, and, under the appellation of William Charleton, he retired to his favorite Montpellier. Afterwards returning to England, he lived in chambers at the Temple, and died at Kenſington Gravel-pits, 1702, aged 63. Mr. Courten began early to make a collection of whatever was curious, important, and remarkable, in medallic and antiquarian hiſtory; and not leſs than 38 vols. in fol. and 8 in 4to. remain as proofs of his great induſtry. His curious collection was purchaſed in 1763, and depoſited in the Britiſh muſeum. The ſum paid by the public was 20,000l. which equals ſcarce the value of the coins and precious ſtones.

COURTIVRON, Gaſpard marquis de, a native of Dijon, who died 1785, aged 70. He was wounded in the campaigns of Bavaria, while exerting himſelf to ſave the life of marſhal shal Saxe. He wrote a treatise on optics, 4to. and other works.

COURTNEY, William, archbishop of Canterbury, was educated at Oxford, and owed his elevation to the consequence of his family. When 28, he was made bishop of Hereford, and afterwards translated to London, where he summoned before him the great Wickliffe, 1377. The reformer was on this occasion attended by his friends John of Gaunt and lord Percy, who treated the prelate with such asperity, that a tumult was excited among the citizens of London. Courtney was made chancellor 1381, and afterwards raised to the see of Canterbury. He was a violent persecutor of the Wickliffites, and died at Maidstone 1396, aged 55.

COURTOIS, James, a native of Franche Compté, eminent as a painter, and called le Bourgnignon. He was in the French campaigns of Italy, and delineated the battles in which he had been present. The sudden death of his wife, of whom he was known to be very jealous, threw upon him the false accusation of having murdered her; in consequence of which calumny he entered into the order of the Jesuits. He died 1676, aged 55.

COURTOIS, William, brother of the preceding, was patronized by Alexander VII. His pieces were much admired, especially his battle of Joshua. He died 1673, aged 45.

COUSIN, John, a French painter, born at Succy, near Sens, well skilled in mathematics. He wrote on geometry and perspective, and chiefly excelled in painting on glass. Many specimens of his skill in painting exist in the churches of Sens and Paris, and especially in St. Gervase's church. He was living in 1689; but the time of his death is uncertain.

COUSTON, Nicholas, sculptor to the French king, was born at Lyons, and died at Paris 1733, aged 75. His pieces adorn the palaces of Paris, Versailles, and Marly. His Commodus in the character of Hercules is particularly admired.

COUTHON, Georges, a native of Orsay, brought up to the bar. At the revolution, he displayed the most ferocious and vindictive conduct. He assisted in the destruction of the monarchy, and the death of the king; and afterwards, as the friend of Robespierre, he recommended the adoption of the most atrocious measures. In his zeal, he proclaimed death to tyrants, and peace to the cottage, and wished that kings might no longer have an earth to support, nor a sun to enlighten them. When sent to Lyons, he struck with a hammer the columns of the noblest edifices, exclaiming, "Down, ye monuments of pride, I condemn you to destruction." His savage conduct was so well known, that once complaining of thirst, during a long debate in the convention, one of the members observed, he ought to have a cup full of blood. The fall of Robespierre was his own. He was guillotined 1794. Though of so ferocious a heart, the features of his countenance were pleasing; but his body was deformed, and the convention permitted him to sit while speaking.

COUVREUR, Adrianne le, a French actress. Her best character was Phædra. She died 1730. She was for some time mistress to marshal Saxe, whom, when reduced to distress in the acquisition of his dukedom of Courland, she assisted with money raised upon her jewels.

COWARD, William, a medical writer, born at Winchester, and educated there at the college, and at Harthall, Oxford, and Wadham. In 1680 he was chosen fellow of Merton, and two years after he translated Dryden's Absolom and Achitophel into Latin, which was surpassed by the rival translation of Atterbury. He settled at Northampton for some time, and then removed to London in 1694. He published second thoughts concerning the human soul, in which, with great learning and metaphysical knowledge, he united sentiments, which were repugnant to the opinions of the best divines. Though a sincere believer in the gospel, yet his ideas about the immateriality and immortality of the soul, drew upon him the censure of the public, and he was ranked with Toland, Tindal, and Gildon, as an enemy of the christian religion. This and his other book, called the grand essay in defence of it, drew upon him the animadversions of the house of commons, who, in 1704, voted the books to be burned by the hands of the common hangman, as containing doctrines contrary to the church, and subversive of the christian religion. Afterwards, he published his tract, called Ophthalmiatria, and then removed from London. His heroic poem on Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, whether sceptical or censorious, published at this time, was little attended to, and is now unknown. His licentia poetica discussed, appeared in 1709, but though introduced with the poetical flattery of Aaron Hill, &c. it possessed little merit. In 1718 Dr. Coward is mentioned as residing at Ipswich, where it is supposed he died about 1725. Though his writings no longer engage attention, it must be acknowledged, that he was not devoid of learning, judgment, and abilities.

COWELL, John, an eminent civilian, born at Ernsborough, Devon, 1554, and educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge. He became master of Trinity-hall. His Interpreter, published in 1607, in 4to. was undertaken at the request of Bancroft the archbishop. This book, for some time remained uncensured, but at last, it was observed that the author had spoken with great freedom of the common law, and had "disputed too nicely on the mysteries of the monarchy," and asserted that the monarch might make laws without the consent of parliament, and in consequence of this the house of commons proceeded with great violence against him; but James interposed his influence, and saved him from persecution. After this Cowell retired to Cambridge, where he underwent an operation for the ſtone, whtch proved fatal 1611. He wrote beſides, Inſtitutes of the laws of England, &c.

Cowley, Abraham, an Engliſh poet, born in London 1618. He was educated at Weſtminſter ſchool, and the accidental peruſal of Spencer ſo much rouſed his genius, that he publiſhed his "poetical bloſſoms," before he removed to the univerſity. He entered at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he wrote ſome poems, and planned the deſign of thoſe maſculine pieces, which have immortalized his name. The noble independence of his conduct, however, diſpleaſed the republicans of his college, and he was ejected from the univerſity, and came to St. John's college, Oxford, where he publiſhed his ſatire of the Puritan and the Papiſt. He was intimate with Falkland, and engaged in the king's ſervice, and during the civil wars, he was ſettled in the duke of St. Alban's family, and was abſent from England about 10 or 12 years, and performed ſome very dangerous journies to Jerſey, Scotland, Flanders, Holland, and other places, while he managed the correſpondence between the king and the loyaliſts. In 1656 he came to England with great ſecrecy, but he was arreſted, and reſtored to liberty by giving bail for 1000l. After Cromwell's death he returned to France, and at the reſtoration he determined to retire to ſolitude and learned eaſe. He lived ſome time at Barn-Elms, then removed to Chertſey, where, in conſequence of expoſing himſelf too long to the cold air, he was attacked by a violent defluxion and ſtoppage in his breaſt and throat, which by being diſregarded, in a fortnight proved fatal. He died 1667, aged 49, and was buried in Weſtminſter Abbey, near Chaucer and Spencer, and a monument was erected to him by George duke of Buckingham, 1675. His books of plants were publiſhed in 1662, and as he had ſtudied not only anatomical diſſection, but ſimples, and the deep reſearches of botany, his works are the thoughts of a maſter. He publiſhed beſides miſcellanies,—the miſtreſs—Pindaric odes—Davideis—the cutler of Coleman ſtreet, a comedy, &c. Cowley is very reſpectable as a poet, and his verſe though ſometimes uncouth and inelegant, does not want fire and majeſty. He abounded above all others in genuine wit. Doctor Johnſon places him at the head of metaphyſical poets.

Cowper, William, of Perth, was profeſſor of philoſophy at Edinburgh. Though a ſtrict preſbyterian, he embraced the doctrines of the church, and was made biſhop of Galloway, 1614. He died three weeks after, aged 53. His works were printed in one vol. folio.

Cowper, William, D. D. youngeſt ſon of earl Cowper, was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge. He was made dean of Durham, which he held till his death 1772, in his 59th year. He wrote an able treatiſe on geometry, beſides eight ſermons, and an advice to a lady, much eſteemed.

Cowper, William, M.D, a phyſician at Cheſter, who died 1767. He publiſhed ſome antiquarian treatiſes, and was preparing at his death, an hiſtory of Cheſter.

Cowper, William, a celebrated Engliſh poet. He was the ſon of Dr. Cowper, chaplain to George II. and rector of Berkhamſtead, Herts, where he was born 1731. From the ſchool of Market-ſtreet Hertfordſhire, he removed to Weſtminſter where he continued till his 18th year. As the great nephew of chancellor Cowper, he was marked for eminence in the law, and he entered at the Innertemple, and at the age of 31 was appointed clerk in the houſe of lords. This his great timidity prevented him from accepting, and when afterwards made clerk of the journals, which ſeemed to require no perſonal attendance, his agitation of mind became exceſſive when called upon, on an unſual occaſion, to perform the duties of his place, and he reſigned under the greateſt depreſſion of ſpirits. Weakneſs of nerves, produced debility of body and of mind, but by the attention of Dr. Cotton, his melancholy gradually ſubſided, and he roſe to the purer uſe of his mental faculties and to the enjoyment of rational converſation. In 1765 he ſettled at Huntingdon, and became the inmate of Mr. Unwin, a neighbouring clergyman, after whoſe death he retired to Olney, Bucks, with his widow, whom he regarded with all the affection of a mother. His time in retirement was ſpent in devotion and literature, and he contributed ſixty-eight hymns to the collection which his friend Mr. Newton the curate of Olney gave to the world. In 1782 he publiſhed a volume of poems, and in 1785 the general voice of approbation was raiſed towards him on the appearance of his ſecond volume. He afterwards engaged in a tranſlation of Homer's Iliad and Odyſſey in blank verſe, and the work, though inferior to the verſification of Pope, poſſeſſes great merit. In 1786 he removed with Mrs. Unwin to Weſton, Northamptonſhire, and afterwards turned his thoughts to a life of Milton, and to a complete edition of his poems, and at that time was introduced to Mr. Hayley, who had been engaged on the ſame ſubject, and thus aroſe an intercourſe of friendſhip which continued to the end of life. The poet had communicated ſo much pleaſure to the world by the ſweetneſs of his lines, and the morality and benevolence which every where captivate the reader, that the king beſtowed upon him a penſion of 300l. per annum in 1794. The wretched poet now again ſunk into dejection and religious melancholy, and few intervals of reaſon beamed upon his afflicted mind. For a while he amuſed himſelf in the reviſion of his Homer, but again relapſed into that depreſſion of ſpirits which robbed him of all the comforts and the ſerenity of a reflecting mind. He died 25th April 1800 at Dereham Norfolk, where a handſome monument in the church marks the ſpot ſpot where his remains were depoſited. In exhibiting a ſtory in poetical numbers Cowper poſſeſſed a peculiarly happy genius; his John Gilpin, which was related to him by his friend lady Auſtin, to amuſe him in a tedious hour, when converted into verſe by his pen proved a moſt popular ballad. In his manners though reſerved he was pleaſing, his converſation was cheerful, and Mrs. Unwin, lady Auſtin, lady Heſketh, and Mrs. Throgmorton and others, were not only honored with his friendſhip, but immortalized by the happy effuſions of his delicate muſe. The ſingular ſubjects of one of his beſt pieces was undertaken at the requeſt of lady Auſtin, who bade him write on a ſofa. The ſofa muſt be regarded as a moſt valuable compoſition, and though in that and in the taſk, there is perhaps no well digeſted plan, the whole muſt be conſidered as the efforts of a great genius, aſſiſted by the feelings of a truly humane and benevolent heart. A pleaſing account of his life and writings has been publiſhed by Mr. Hayley.

Cox, Richard, an Engliſh prelate born at Whaddon, Bucks, about 1500. He was educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge. He was invited by Wolſey, to be on his new foundation at Oxford; but his open avowal of Luther's principles was cenſured by the univerſity, and he was ſtripped of his offices and impriſoned. Afterwards he was made maſter of Eton ſchool, and by the favor of Cranmer, he was made dean of Chriſt church. As tutor to Edward VI. he became a favorite at court, was made privy counſellor, chancellor of Oxford, and dean of Weſtminſter. During the reign of Mary he left England. On Elizabeth's acceſſion, he returned, and gained ſuch popularity by his zeal againſt popery, that he was raiſed to the ſee of Ely, over which he preſided 21 years. His oppoſition to the catholics, drew upon him the reſentment of his enemies. Expoſed to the perſecution of chancellor Hatton, he at laſt offered to reſign, provided that 200l. per annum were allowed him, to ſupport him in his retirement. None, however, could be found to ſucceed, and he held the biſhopric till his death, 1581, in his 83d year. He was a great advocate for the marriage of the clergy, and he was the firſt who brought a wife to live in a college. He wrote ſeveral theological tracts, but he is chiefly known for the active part he took in the compilation of the liturgy. The four goſpels—the acts of the apoſtles—and the epiſtle to the Romans, were alſo tranſlated by him, in the Biſhops' bible.

Cox, ſir Richard, chancellor of Ireland, was born at Bandon, county of Cork, 1650. For three years he practiſed as an attorney, but coming to Gray's inn in 1671, he ſtudied for the bar. In conſequence of an early marriage, he had a large family, and the cares which they brought upon him roufed him from the obſcurity, where for ſeven years he had been loſt as a farmer, and he was elected recorder of Kinſale. Removing from the convulſion which agitated the proteſtants he came to Briſtol, where he devoted himſelf to the completion of his hiſtory of Ireland. At the revolution he was made under ſecretary of ſtate, afterwards recorder of Waterford, in 1690 ſecond juſtice of the common pleas, and the next year governor of the county and city of Cork. In this character, uniting the office of judge with military duties, he behaved with great ſpirit, he was knighted in 1692, and the next year made chancellor of Ireland, and in 1706 created a baronet. On the acceſſion of George I. he was removed from office, but while he hoped to ſpend the reſt of life in literary retirement, he found himſelf cenſured by the Iriſh parliament. In April 1733, he was ſeized with a fit of apoplexy, which ending in a palſy, carried him off, the following 3d May, in his 84th year. Beſides his Hibernia-Anglicana in folio, he wrote an enquiry into religion, &c.

Cox, Leonard, a grammarian born at Monmouth and educated at Cambridge. He was for ſome time maſter of Reading ſchool, after which he travelled through France, Germany, &c. where, as a teacher of the learned languages, he acquired much fame. He died at Caerlton, Monmouthſhire, 1549. He wrote ſome Greek and Latin treatiſes—a commentary on Lily's grammar, &c.

Coxeter, Thomas, born at Lechlade, Glouceſterſhire, 1689, entered at Trinity college, Oxford, and he removed to London, to ſtudy the law, but the death of his patron ſir John Cook, overturned his hopes of diſtinction. He now became the friend and companion of authors and bookſellers, and made a curious collection of old plays. He propoſed to write the biography of the old Engliſh poets, but did not proceed in the work. He gave in 1739 a new edition of Baily's life of biſhop Fiſher, and circulated propoſals for publiſhing antient plays, a plan afterwards adopted by Dodſley. He was in 1737 ſecretary to a ſociety for the encouragement of Engliſh hiſtory, under whoſe auſpices Carte's hiſtory of England, firſt volume, appeared. He died 1749, aged 59.

Coxis, Michael, a painter of Mechlin, who died 1592, aged 95.

Coypel, Charles Anthony, a painter, who died at Paris, his native city, 1752, aged 58. He was alſo author of ſome theatrical pieces, performed in private theatres, and he alſo compoſed ſeveral diſſertations on painting, &c.

Cozza, Franceſco, a painter born at Palermo in Sicily. He was eminent in freſco and oil painting, and employed in ſeveral of the great works which adorn Rome, where he died 1664.

Craasbeck, Joſeph van, a painter, born at Bruſſels 1608. He died 1668. He chiefly excelled in vulgar ſcenes, where he repreſented drunkenneſs and ale-houſe quarrels, with great ſpirit.

Crab, Roger, an Engliſh hermit, born in Buck-

Buckinghamſhire in the 16th century. He left his occupation of hatter, and with a mind influenced by fanaticiſm, he diſpoſed of his property, and diſtributed it to the poor, and building a ſmall hut at Ickman, near Uxbridge, he lived there in great auſterity. His reputation for ſanctity was ſuch that he was viſited by many who conſulted him as a ſeer and prophet. He is ſaid to have foretold the reſtoration, and the elevation of the houſe of Orange to the Britiſh throne.

CRABB, Habakkuk, a diſſenter, born at Wattisfield, Suffolk, and educated at Daventry. He officiated at Stowmarket, and afterwards at Cirenceſter, and then joined his brother-in-law Fenner in the care of a ſchool at the Devizes. On the death of his friend Hanmer, he was invited by his congregation, but being accuſed of departing from the faith of the diſſenters, he retired to Royſton, where the loſs of his wife, and diſappointment brought on a nervous fever which hurried him to his grave, 1795. He left ſeveral manuſcript ſermons, ſome of which have been publiſhed. He was a reſpectable man, and for 45 years an exemplary character, who, while he diſſented from the church, reſpected the opinions of his neighbours, and preached religion without diſſeminating faction.

CRADDOCK, Samuel, rector of North Cadbury, Somerſetſhire, was ejected for nonconformity in 1662. He publiſhed the hiſtory of the Old and New teſtament—the apoſtolical hiſtory—the harmony of the four goſpels, &c. and died 1706, aged 86.

CRADDOCK, Luke, a painter. His birds were greatly admired, and roſe in value to three or four times their original price, after his death. He worked generally for dealers, and refuſed to employ his pencil for the great. He died 1717.

CRAIG, Nicholas, a learned Dane, born at Ripen. He died 1602, aged 61. He was engaged by the king of Denmark in ſome important negociations, and he wrote a learned book on the republic of the Lacedæmonians,—the annals of Denmark in ſix books, &c.

CRAIG, ſir Thomas, a Scotch lawyer, born at Edinburgh, 1548, where he died 1608. He is well known for his "jus feudale," a learned work univerſally admired. He wrote alſo a treatiſe on the ſovereignty of Scotland, &c.

CRAIG, James, a Scotch divine, educated at Edinburgh. He died at Edinburgh 1744, aged 62. He publiſhed 3 vols. of ſermons, on the heads of chriſtianity, and 2 vols. of divine poems much eſteemed.

CRAIG, John, a Scotch mathematician, known by his "theologiæ chriſtianæ principia mathematica," in this ſmall work he entertains curious reveries, and attempts to prove, by mathematical calculation, that the chriſtian religion will laſt only 1454 years from the date of his book. He had a diſpute with J. Bernouilli on the quadrature of curved lines, and curvilinear figures, and alſo on an algebraic queſtion.

CRAIG, William, a Scotch divine born at Glaſgow, 1709, and educated at the univerſity there. After being diſtinguiſhed as a popular preacher in the country he removed to Glaſgow, where, in the midſt of an applauding audience at St. Andrew's church, he purſued his miniſterial career with earneſtneſs and ſucceſs. Though ſome of his cotemporaries preferred to hear the abſtruſe tenets of ſpeculative theology, he applied himſelf to bring home to his hearers their duties, and the knowledge of their character, according to the example of the great Saviour. He died 1783, aged 75.

CRAKANTHORP, Richard, was born at Strickland, Weſtmorland, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford. He was an eloquent preacher, and much admired by the puritans. He went as chaplain to an embaſſy to the emperor, and obtained the rectory of Braintree in Eſſex. He died in 1624. His works are Juſtinian defended againſt Baronius—a defence of Conſtantine—a treatiſe on the 5th general council, &c.—logic, &c.

CRAMER, John Frederic, a profeſſor at Duiſburg, reſident for the king of Pruſſia at Amſterdam, died at the Hague, 1715. He was well ſkilled in civil law, and medallic hiſtory. He tranſlated Puffendorf's introduction to hiſtory, and wrote vindiciæ nominis Germanici contra Gallos, &c.

CRAMER, Gabriel, a mathematician, born at Geneva 1694. He deſtroyed his health by exceſſive application, and died at the baths of Languedoc in 1752. He publiſhed ſome works, beſides an edition of the Bernouilli's works.

CRAMER, Nicholas, a Flemiſh painter, who died in 1710, aged 40. His pieces are admired for taſte and correctneſs.

CRAMER, John James, of Elgg, was profeſſor of the oriental languages at Zurich, and afterwards at Herborn. He wrote exercitationes de aræ exteriori ſecundi templi, 4to.—theologia Iſraelis, 4to.—and died 1702, aged 29. His brother John Rodolphus, Hebrew and divinity profeſſor at Zurich, was author of valuable works on Hebrew antiquities, &c. and died 1737, aged 59.

CRAMER, John Andrew, a native of Quedlinburg, who firſt reduced the art of aſſaying in metallurgy into a ſyſtem, and wrote on it elementa artis decimaſticæ, 8vo. 1739. He wrote beſides, elements on metallurgy, 2 vols. folio, &c. and died near Dreſden, 1717, aged 67.

CRAMER, John Andrew, a German writer, who ſtudied at Leipſic, and was profeſſor of divinity at Copenhagen 1765. The diſgrace of Struenſee was fatal to his fortunes, though diſmiſſed, he was again recalled from Lubec, where he had taken refuge, and he died divinity profeſſor at Kiel 1788, aged 65. He was alſo a poet of conſiderable merit. Beſides a ſpirited verſion of the pſalms, odes, and other poems, poems, he wrote the life of Gellert, ſermons, miſcellanies, &c.

CRANE, Thomas, a nonconformiſt, born at Plymouth, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford. Cromwell gave him Rumpeſham in Dorſetſhire, from which he was ejected in 1662. He died 1714. He publiſhed a treatiſe on divine providence.

CRANMER, Thomas, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was born at Aſlacton, Nottinghamſhire, 1489. He was educated at Jeſus college, Cambridge, but by his marriage he loſt his fellowſhip, which he recovered in conſequence of the early death of his wife in childbed. The ability with which he canvaſſed the king's marriage, recommended him to the notice of the court, and Henry ſoon employed him in defence of his views. Cranmer went to Rome with the book he had written in ſupport of the invalidity of the king's marriage, and offered in vain to diſpute with any eccleſiaſtic whom the Roman pontiff might appoint. He continued in Germany as ambaſſador from the king, and there he married a niece of Oſiander at Nuremburg. On the death of Warham he was raiſed to the ſee of Canterbury, and two months after, May 1533, he pronounced the divorce between Henry and Catharine of Arragon, and married the king to Anne Boleyn. Thus at war with the pope, he earneſtly labored for the advancement of the reformation, by the tranſlation of the bible, and by inveighing againſt the vices of Rome. In 1536 he divorced Henry from Anne Boleyn, but though the favorite of the king, he oppoſed his meaſures for the confiſcation of the monaſteries, while he wiſhed to convert thoſe immenſe ſpoil for the advancement of literature by the appointment of readers of divinity and of Greek and Hebrew in every cathedral in the kingdom. After the death of Cromwell, he retired from public affairs, but his influence was ſuch, that he procured the paſſing of laws for promoting religion, and modifying the ſix articles, which proved ſo obnoxious to the clergy. The commons, however, ſeverely reprobated his conduct, till Henry interpoſed. At the king's death, he was one of the regents of the kingdom, and he crowned Edward VI. whoſe godfather he was. He now labored aſſiduouſly in the reformation. The homilies were compoſed, the ſix offenſive articles were repealed, the communion was given in both kinds, the offices of the church were reviſed, the viſitations of the clergy regularly enforced, and the book of common prayer was eſtabliſhed by law. The acceſſion of Mary now threatened Cranmer with perſecution. Though he originally oppoſed lady Jane Gray, he eſpouſed her cauſe, and the ſucceſsful queen, irritated at his conduct, ſummoned him before the council, and ſoon after he was ſent to the tower. He was attainted for high treaſon 1553, and found guilty, but he was pardoned for the treaſon, and arraigned for hereſy. He was removed in April 1554, with Ridley and Latimer, to Oxford, to make his defence before popiſh commiſſioners; but on the refuſal of himſelf, and his friends to ſubſcribe to popery, they were condemned as heretics. In Sept. 1555 he was again arraigned in St. Mary's, Oxford, of blaſphemy, perjury, incontinency, and hereſy. Cranmer, though firm to his faith, yielded before the terrors of death, and in a moment of weakneſs was prevailed to ſign his recantation, and to re-imbrace popery. Notwithſtanding this, his enemies reſolved to commit him to the flames, and when brought to St. Mary's church in order to make a profeſſion of his faith, he ſurpriſed his perſecutors, by an awful appeal to heaven and their conſciences, and by a ſolemn renunciation of the tenets he had in a moment of error, embraced, emphatically exclaimed, "that, that one thing alone wrung his heart, and the hand which had falſely ſigned the diſhonorable deed, ſhould firſt periſh in the flames." This conduct enraged his enemies, he was immediately dragged over againſt Baliol college, where ſtanding in his ſhirt, and without ſhoes, he was faſtened to the ſtake. The fire was ſoon kindled, and the venerable martyr ſtretching his right hand into the flames, exclaimed, "this hand hath offended, this unworthy hand." His miſeries were ſoon over, and his laſt words were, "Lord Jeſus receive my ſpirit." This happened 21ſt March 1556, in his 67th year. Cranmer, as the great promoter of the reformation, is deſervedly reſpected; but his learning, his perſeverance, and zeal, are not more remarkable than the integrity of his heart, the gentleneſs of his diſpoſition, and the humane virtues of his character. He patroniſed learned men; under his protection, Bucer and Fagius ſettled at Cambridge, and Peter Martyr at Oxford, and John a Laſco, Tremellius, and others, were enabled to advance the intereſts of ſcience and of religion. His works were chiefly on the religion and the controverſies of the time, beſides 26 other publications.

CRAPONE, Adam, a native of Salon, who formed the canal between Arles and the Durance. He had projected the canal of Languedoc, afterwards finiſhed by Lewis XIV. He was poiſoned through envy at Nantes, in his 40th year, 1598.

CRASHAW, Richard, an Engliſh poet, educated at the Charter-houſe, and Pembroke-hall, Cambridge. He was fellow of Peter-houſe, and ejected during the rebellion, for denying the covenant, and ſoon after was converted, or as Pope ſays out-witted, to the catholic faith. He went to Paris in queſt of preferment, but in his diſtreſſes Cowley not only relieved him, but recommended him to queen Henrietta. By her influence he went to Italy, and was ſecretary to an Italian cardinal, and obtained a canonry at Loretto, where he died 1650. He was an excellent ſcholar, well acquainted with Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Italian, and Spaniſh. He wrote ſteps to the temple—the delights of the muſes, &c.

He

He is known by the encomiums of Pope, who not only admired his poetry, but borrowed ſome paſſages from it.

CRASSO, Lawrence, wrote an hiſtory of the Greek poets 1678, commended by the Italians, but cenſured by the French.

CRATO, or DE CRAFTHEIM, John, of Breſlaw, phyſician to Ferdinand I., wrote beſides medical tracts, ſome poems. As he was intimate with Luther, the little work called Luther's table-talk, has been extracted from his writings. He died 1585, aged 66.

CRAWFORD, Daniel, a Scotch lawyer. He was hiſtoriographer of Scotland, and publiſhed memoirs of Scotland, during the times of the four regents—a peerage, in folio—the hiſtory of the royal family of Stuart—and a deſcription of the county of Renfrew. He wrote beſides the life of Guthery biſhop of Dunkeld, and began the hiſtory of Scottiſh affairs. He died 1726, aged 61.

CRAWFORD, William, a divine, born at Kelſo, and educated at Edinburgh. He died 1742, aged 66. He wrote "dying thoughts," beſides ſermons.

CRAYER, Gaſpar de, a painter of Antwerp. His portrait of cardinal Ferdinand, brother to the king of Spain, was ſo exquiſitely finiſhed a performance, that the monarch ſent the artiſt a golden chain, and ſettled a handſome penſion upon him. He lived to a great age, ſupported by conſtant temperance and regularity. His hiſtorical pieces are much admired. His centurion alighting from his horſe to proſtrate himſelf at the feet of Chriſt, was ſeen with undiſguiſed approbation by Rubens, and is admired as a maſterly performance. He died 1669.

CREBILLON, Proſper Joliot de, a French tragedian ranked next after Corneille and Racine, was born at Dijon 1674. He ſtudied the law, but the impetuoſity of his paſſions thwarted the views of his friends, and he produced a tragedy which met with applauſe, and encouraged him to write. He married, but in conſequence was diſinherited by his father, who revoked the cruel will on his death-bed. In 1711 Crebillon loſt his wife, whoſe death he feelingly deplored, and he long continued expoſed to poverty, till a place in the French academy and the office of police cenſor rendered his circumſtances affluent. He lived to a great age, highly reſpected for his virtues and literary abilities. He died 1762, aged 88. Being aſked one day which of his productions he thought beſt; "I do not know," ſays he, "which is the beſt; but this (pointing to his ſon) is certainly my worſt." His beſt plays are his Atreus, Electra, and Rhadamiſtus.

CREBILLON, Claude Proſper Joliot de, ſon of the preceding, was born at Paris 1707, and died there 1777. He is known as a writer of novels, ſome of which are licentious. His works were collected in 11 vols. 12mo. 1779. Crebillon might be called the Petronius of France, as his father was the Æſchylus. The father, ſays d'Alembert, "paints in the blackeſt colors the crimes and wickedneſs of man, whilſt the ſon draws with a delicate and juſt pencil the refinement, the ſhades, and even the graces of our vices." Though he lived in friendly terms with his father, yet he highly diſpleaſed him for a little time by his marriage with an Engliſh woman.

CREECH, Thomas, an Engliſh poetical tranſlator, born near Sherborne, Dorſet, and educated at Sherborne, and Wadham college, Oxford. His tranſlation of Lucretius was ſo reſpectable that he was elected fellow of Allſouls. In 1701 he was preſented by his college to Welwyn rectory, Herts, but before he went to reſide on his living, he put a period to his exiſtence at Oxford. The cauſes of this unfortunate event are not known. Some ſay that the contemptuous treatment which he received from a woman, with whom he was in love, ſo ſtung him that he hanged himſelf in his ſtudy, where three days after he was found; but Jacob aſcribes his death to the moroſeneſs of his temper. Beſides Lucretius, he tranſlated Horace in 1684, and turned the ſatires to our own times, obſerving that Rome was now rivalled in her vices, and that parallels for hypocriſy, profaneneſs, and the like, were eaſy to be found. His inferior works are tranſlations of Theocritus, ſome of Ovid's epiſtles, the 13th ſatire of Juvenal, the lives of Solon, Pelopidas, &c. from Plutarch, &c.

CRELLIUS, John, a Socinian, born near Nuremburg. He ſettled in Poland 1612, where he was profeſſor to the unitarians. He died at Racovia of an epidemic fever in his 43d year. He was a man of very extenſive learning. He wrote ſeveral tracts upon the new teſtament, and an anſwer to Grotius' book de ſatisfactione Chriſti, againſt Socinus, which Grotius treated with reſpect, and acknowledged to be drawn up with moderation.

CREQUI, Charles de, marſhal and peer of France, was diſtinguiſhed by his duel with don Philippin, baſtard of Savoy, to whom in the firſt encounter he granted his life, but ſlew in the ſecond. He was killed by a canon ball at the ſiege of Bremen 1638, in his 60th year.

CREQUI, Francis de, great grandſon of the foregoing, was marſhal of France, and a man of heroic courage. He defeated the duke of Lorraine, took Friburg, reduced Luxemburg in 1684, and died three years after 1687, aged 63.

CRESCEMBENI, John Maria, an Italian, of Maurata in Ancona, founder of the celebrated Arcadian academy for the reformation of learning, taſte, and criticiſm. He was its firſt director till his death 1728. He was eminent both as a poet and a proſe writer. His chief works are a valuable hiſtory of Italian poetry, reprinted 6 vols. 4to.—and an hiſtory of the academy of Arcadia, with anecdotes of its members, 7 vols. 4to. &c.

CRESCENTIUS, Peter de, a native of Boulogne in the 14th century. He travelled for 36 years as a law practitioner, and on his return published his valuable work on agriculture, called opus ruralium commodorum, which has been translated into various languages.

CRESPI, Guiseppe Maria, a painter of Bologna, who died 1747, aged 82. He painted in a darkened room, with a few rays from the sun or from the light of a flambeau, by which he gave greater vivacity to his subjects, and a more judicious distribution of light and shade.

CRESSY, Hugh Paulin, an English divine, born at Wakefield, Yorkshire, and educated there and at Oxford, where he was fellow of Merton college. He was chaplain to lord Wentworth, and to lord Falkland in Ireland, from whom he obtained the deanery of Laughlin, and a canonry of Windsor, which he never enjoyed. After the death of Falkland, he travelled with Bertie, afterwards lord Falmouth; but in Italy he became a convert, and made a public profession of his faith at Rome 1646. From Rome he came to Paris, under the protection of queen Henrietta, and afterwards retired to Douay, where he changed his name, and published several valuable works. At the restoration he came to England, and was chaplain to queen Catharine, and resided in Somerset-house, Strand. He was respected universally, as he never interfered with the politics of the times. His pen indeed was frequently engaged in the defence of his faith, but whilst his friends considered him as their ablest champion, the protestants respected him as a judicious and candid writer. His attack on one of Stillingfleet's works raised against him the censures of his friend Clarendon, whom he answered with spirit, but moderation. He retired to East Grinstead in Sussex, where he died 1674, aged 70. The most valuable of his works is his ecclesiastical history, of which only one volume was published.

CRETIN, William du Bois, surnamed, a French poet, whose chief merit was puns, low wit, and equivoques. He was historian royal, and died in 1525. Marot admired him, but posterity is not so favorable.

CREVIER, John Baptiste Lewis, professor of rhetoric at Paris, is known as the pupil of Rollin, and the finisher of his Roman history. He published an edition of Livy, 6 vols. 12mo. —the history of the Roman emperors to Constantine, 12 vols. 12mo.—the history of the university of Paris, 7 vols. 12mo. &c. He died 1765, in an advanced age.

CREW, Nathaniel, bishop of Durham, was educated at Lincoln college, was proctor of the university 1663, afterwards clerk of the closet to Charles II., dean of Chichester, bishop of Oxford 1671, and three years after translated to Durham. On the accession of James II. he showed himself friendly to all the measures of the court, in religion and in politics. He paid respect to the pope's nuncio, and refused to introduce dean Patrick to the king, because he was too zealous against popery. The landing of the prince of Orange, however, made great alterations in the bishop's conduct. He withdrew from the king's councils, and expressed a wish to resign, with an allowance of 1000l. for life. He afterwards appeared in parliament; but his name was excepted from the act of indemnity of 1690. His pardon, however, at last was procured. He died 1721, aged 88. Notwithstanding his adherence to the arbitrary measures of a corrupted court, he was a liberal patron.

CRICHTON, James, a Scotchman of the 16th century, whose adventures and personal endowments, have procured him the name of "the admirable Crichton." He was born in 1551. His father was lord advocate of Scotland, and by his mother he was descended from Robert II. He was educated at Perth, and at St. Andrew's, where he made such progress, that at the age of 20 he had run through the whole circle of science, and could write and speak 10 different languages. Thus gifted with mental endowments, and a graceful person, elegant manners, and polite accomplishments, he travelled to Paris, where he challenged the most renowned scholars, to dispute with him in any art or science which they pleased; and in 12 languages. He appeared at the college of Navarre, and from nine in the morning till six in the evening, he so defeated his opponents, and astonished his auditors, that the president, with four eminent professors of the university, presented him with a diamond ring, and a purse of gold, as a token of their approbation. The next day he appeared at the Louvre, and exhibited such feats in tilting, that, in the presence of the court, he carried away the ring 15 times successively, and broke as many lances. At Rome he challenged the learned of that city, to propose any question to him, to which he would give an immediate answer, and in the presence of the pope, he obtained in his defence as much eclat as at Paris. From Rome he passed to Venice, where he introduced himself, by an elaborate poem, to the notice of Aldus Manutius. He gained also the friendship of Laurentius Mussa, and other learned persons, and after he had been honored with an audience from the doge and the senate, in which he astonished them by the rapidity of his eloquence, he visited Padua. At Padua he pronounced an extempore poem, on the beauties of the university, and after disputing for six hours, with the most celebrated professors, he concluded by delivering an oration in praise of ignorance, with universal applause. He exposed the errors of Aristotle, in the presence of the university, and for three days obtained the praises and the acclamations of the most crowded audiences. At Mantua he displayed his bodily agility by killing a gladiator, who had foiled the most skilful fencers in Europe, and had lately slain three antagonists; and he bestowed the reward obtained for this exploit, upon the widows of the three persons who lately had lost their lives. The duke of Mantua appointed him tutor to his ſon Gonzaga, a youth of diſſolute manners. Crichton, to ſupport his fame, wrote in conſequence of this, a comedy, in which he acted in 15 different characters, with inimitable ſucceſs. In the midſt of his popularity, while walking and playing upon his guitar in the ſtreets of Mantua, he was attacked by ſix men in maſks. Their number proved no defence againſt the ſuperior dexterity of Crichton, they were all diſarmed, and the leader falling on his knees, begged for life. It was Crichton's pupil, to whom the aſtoniſhed maſter immediately preſented his ſword, with every apology. Inſtead of accepting the generoſity, the perfidious prince buried the ſword into his defenceleſs boſom. The cauſe of this brutal action is aſcribed to jealouſy; but others attribute it to a drunken frolick. This happened 1583. His death was univerſally lamented, the people of Mantua mourned for him three fourths of a year, and his picture appeared in the chambers and houſes of every Italian.

CRILLON, Lewis de Berthon de, a French general. He was noticed by Henry II. for his valor at the ſiege of Calais, and he diſtinguiſhed himſelf afterwards at the battles of Dreux, Jarnac, and Moncontour. At the battle of Lepanto, and in other encounters, his courage was ſuch, that he was called by Henry IV. the brave Crillon. At the peace of Vervins he retired to his eſtates at Avignon, where he died 1615, aged 74.

CRILLON MAHON, N. duke de, diſtinguiſhed in the ſeven years' war, afterwards quitted the ſervice of France for that of Spain. In the war between England and Spain he took Minorca, and aſſumed the name of Mahon. In his attempts to reduce Gibraltar, he was more unfortunate, and ſaw all his meaſures baffled by the ſuperior valor of the Engliſh, and of general Elliot. He died at Madrid 1796, aged 80.

CRINITUS, Petrus, a native of Florence, profeſſor of belles lettres. He was a man of great learning, but addicted to the baſeſt ſenſualities. He died 1505, aged 40. He wrote lives of the Latin poets, beſides poems of no great merit, &c.

CRISP, Tobias, the champion of Antinomianiſm, was educated at Eton, and Cambridge, and afterwards removed to Baliol, Oxford. He was rector of Brinkworth, Wilts, in 1627, and came to London in 1642, where his tenets reſpecting grace oppoſed him in a controverſy with 52 divines. He died 1642. He aſſerted in his diſcourſe "Chriſt alone exalted," that ſalvation was completed on the croſs, and that belief was all that was required of the elect.

CROESE, Gerard, a proteſtant divine of Amſterdam, author of the hiſtory of the quakers, tranſlated into Engliſh, and of Homerus Hebræus. He died 1710, aged 68.

CROFT, Herbert, a prelate, born at Great Milton, Oxfordſhire, 1603. At 13 he was ſent to Oxford, but on the converſion of his father to popery, he removed from the univerſity to Douay, and afterwards to St. Omer's. Morton biſhop of Durham, prevailed upon him to return to the proteſtant faith, and he entered at Chriſt-church, Oxford. He was preferred to a living in Glouceſterſhire, and to another in Oxfordſhire, and in 1639, he was made prebendary of Saliſbury. He was afterwards prebendary of Worceſter, canon of Windſor, and in 1644 dean of Hereford, and in 1659, by the death of his two elder brothers, he ſucceeded to the eſtates of his family. At the reſtoration he was raiſed to the ſee of Hereford 1661. His ſmall treatiſe "the naked truth," was publiſhed in 1675, when the papiſts hoped to take advantage of the quarrels of the nonconformiſts with the church, and it became a popular work, and drew the attention of parliament to the ſubject. He publiſhed alſo occaſional ſermons,—religious tracts,—a legacy to his dioceſe, and in 1685, animadverſion on Burnet's theory of the earth. He died at Hereford 1691.

CROFT, William, a muſician, born in Warwickſhire. He ſucceeded Dr. Blow as maſter of the children, and compoſer to the chapel royal, and organiſt, at Weſtminſter-abbey. In 1712, he publiſhed his divine harmony, and in 1715 he became D. Muſ. and in 1724 he publiſhed by ſubſcription his "muſica ſacra," 2 vols. He died 1727, aged 50.

CROFTON, Zachary, an Iriſh nonconformiſt, educated at Dublin. During the Iriſh troubles he came to England, and obtained the living of Wrenbury in Cheſhire, from which he was ejected in 1648. At the reſtoration he engaged in a controverſy with biſhop Gauden, and laſtly opened a ſchool near Aldgate, where he died 1672. He was author of ſome controverſial pamphlets.

CROIX DU MAINE, Francis Grude de la, a learned French writer. He publiſhed in 1584, his French library, or a general account of all authors, who wrote in that language.

CROIX, Francis Petit de la, interpreter to the French king, in the Turkiſh and Arabic, died 1695, aged 73. He refuſed to be bribed by the Algerines, to make a treaty favorable to their intereſts. He digeſted Thevenot's voyages, made an accurate catalogue of all the Turkiſh and Perſian books in the French king's library, and compoſed beſides two dictionaries for the French and Turkiſh languages, and alſo a hiſtory of Genghis Khan, &c.

CROMPTON, William, M. A. was born at Barnſtaple, of which, after an Oxford education, he became miniſter. He was ejected after the reſtoration for nonconformity, and died 1696. He publiſhed a remedy againſt ſuperſtition, and other ſmall tracts.

CROMWELL, Thomas, earl of Eſſex, an eminent ſtateſman under Henry VIII. was ſon of a blackſmith at Putney, Surrey. His education like his origin was low, but he poſſeſſed ſtrong natural parts. He was at Antwerp for ſome ſome time, as clerk to the Engliſh factory, and he afterwards travelled on the continent, as the private agent of the king, and he was engaged as a ſoldier with Bourbon in the ſacking of Rome. Admitted into Wolſey's family, he gained his confidence, which he repaid with the ſtrongeſt attachment, and by a moſt eloquent defence of him in the houſe of commons, when he was impeached. After Wolſey's fall, he ſerved the king with equal fidelity, and gradually roſe to be a privy counſellor, chancellor of the exchequer, ſecretary of ſtate, keeper of the privy ſeal, and high chamberlain of England. His zeal in the reformation pleaſed the king, and he largely ſhared in the ſpoils of the plundered church. In deſtroying the relics of popery, he introduced good regulations, and provided that the bible ſhould be read in Engliſh, in the ſeveral churches, and alſo that a regiſter of births, &c. ſhould be kept. The active part which he took in the marriage of his maſter with Anne of Cleves, proved his ruin. Henry, diſſatisfied with his new queen, wreaked his vengeance on him. Forſaken by all his former friends, except Cranmer, and unable to find one defender, for fear of the royal reſentment, Cromwell pleaded for mercy in a letter to the king, in ſuch moving terms, that Henry read it three times, and probably would have pardoned him, had not his paſſion for Catharine Howard kindled his fury. Cromwell ſuffered on Tower-hill, after ſix weeks' impriſonment, 1540. Though abuſed by the papiſts as ambitious, and crafty, he is repreſented as preferring men of learning and abilities.

Cromwell, Oliver, protector of England, was born of a very reſpectable family at Huntingdon, 25th April 1599. He received his education in the grammar-ſchool of his native town, and at Sidney college, Cambridge. Here foot-ball, cricket, and other exerciſes, were more congenial to his purſuits than literature, and therefore his mother, now a widow, ſent him in 1618 to Lincoln's-inn. Irregularities here prevailed, and licentious pleaſures engaged his attention more than the law, till at laſt when 21 he married Elizabeth daughter of ſir James Bouchier of Eſſex, and retired to Huntingdon. Some time after he removed into the iſle of Ely, where his uncle had left him an eſtate of 400l. a year, and then he left the church of England, and became a puritan. He was elected into parliament in 1628, and was violent againſt the biſhops; but the warmth with which he ſupported miniſters of his own perſuaſion reduced his fortunes, and obliged him to take a farm at St. Ives. Here he nearly ruined himſelf, and in 1637 he formed the plan of paſſing over to New England, which he was prevented from doing by a proclamation from the king, againſt migration. Diſtinguiſhed among the puritans for his gift of preaching, praying, and expounding, he had the intereſt to recommend himſelf to the corporation of Cambridge, and to be choſen into parliament 1640. In the houſe he was a frequent ſpeaker, and exclaimed againſt grievances in church and ſtate. Courted by the leading men, by Hampden, by Pym, and others who knew his firmneſs and his devotion, he became well acquainted with the intrigues of the times, and when the parliament reſolved in 1642 to levy war, he went to Cambridge, where he raiſed a troop of horſe. His ſeverity to the loyal members of the univerſity, who contributed their plate to the ſervice of the king, was very culpable; but he ſhowed ſuch activity that in a few months he acquired the character of a good officer, and his ſoldiers were the beſt diſciplined troops in the kingdom. Now become a lieutenant-general, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the battle of Marſton-moor, 1644, where his cavalry, called Ironſides, enſured victory wherever they appeared. At the ſecond battle of Newbury, his valor and ſervices were regarded as ſo extraordinary, that he was called the ſaviour of the nation, and in the ſelf-denying ordinance for the excluſion of officers from ſeats in the commons, Cromwell alone was exempted. The fatal battle of Naſeby, 14th June 1646, eſtabliſhed his triumph as the ableſt general of the times, and for this he was thanked by the parliament, and rewarded with a penſion. When the king had thrown himſelf into the hands of the Scotch, and then been ſold to the Engliſh, the parliament regarding the army as dangerous, ordered part of it to be diſbanded, but Cromwell prevented the execution of their plans, and ſtepping forth as the advocate of their rights againſt the parliament, be ſecured to his perſon the attachment of the ſoldiers. No ſooner was the king lodged in Holmby caſtle than he made himſelf maſter of his perſon, and thus declared himſelf the arbiter of his fate. Cromwell at laſt took the bold meaſure of excluding from the houſe of commons thoſe whom he knew to be averſe to his ambition, and the trial of the devoted monarch ſoon after followed. Cromwell acted openly as one of his judges, and he ſigned the warrant for his execution, and by this bloody deed thus paved the way to his own greatneſs. But while he conſidered himſelf as ſecure, his power was threatened by rebellion in the army, even in his own favorite regiment. With his uſual preſence of mind he appeared among the rioters, and calling four men by name out of the ranks, he made them caſt dice for their life, and obliged the two that eſcaped to ſhoot the others. Having thus reſtored tranquillity he was received every where with marks of reſpect, and next embarked with an army for Ireland 1649, and quickly reduced the country. In 1650 he was publicly thanked by the ſubmiſſive commons, who inveſted him with the chief command in Scotland, where Charles II. had been acknowledged king. He marched to the north with his uſual rapidity, and on the 3d September 1650, he defeated the Scotch army in a dreadful battle, at Dunbar, and the next year, on the ſame auſpicious day, he compleated the ruin of Charles' fortunes by the crowning victory, as he ſaid, at Worceſter. His ſucceſs was ſo important, that a general thankſgiving was appointed, and the 3d of September declared an anniverſary ſtate holiday. But though commander in chief of the whole iſland, and lord lieutenant of Ireland, Cromwell found that his power depended on the will of the parliament, and therefore he diſmiſſed them. Whilſt the commons and the council of the officers were diſtracted by oppoſite opinions, he forwarded ſecretly his own views, and all at once riſing up in his ſeat in the houſe, he bade the ſpeaker leave the chair, and the whole body give place to honeſter men; and filling the room with armed ſoldiers he turned the whole aſſembly out, and locking up the doors, he retired to Whitehall. Though he permitted a mock aſſembly, under the name of council of ſtate, he was ſoon diſpleaſed with their conduct, and by the voice of his officers, he aſſumed the title of protector of the commonwealth of England, and was inveſted with the new office, 16th Dec. 1653, in Weſtminſter-hall. Thus abſolute in the government, he appointed a council of ſtate, conſiſting of men of ſuperior ſagacity, and adopted ſuch meaſures as could give ſtability to his power, and add to the independence of the kingdom. Peace was made with Sweden, Holland, Portugal, and France, the moſt upright judges filled the courts of Weſtminſter-hall, and liberty of conſcience was tolerated. Notwithſtanding the popularity of his meaſures, he met with oppoſition from the people, and his parliament preſumed to diſpute the legality of his office, and were diſmiſſed with a ſevere reprimand. In 1655, though threatened with conſpiracies, he ſupported with vigorous hand the honor of the nation. Blake conquered Jamaica, and humbled the native powers on the Mediterranean ſhores, and a treaty of offenſive alliance was formed with France a gainſt the Spaniards in the Netherlands, and Dunkirk was taken poſſeſſion of by the Engliſh. The protector called another parliament, 1656, but to enſure their obedience, he obliged them at the door of the houſe to ſwear allegiance to his perſon. The members awed into deference, not only voted him ſupplies, but decreed new ſtatutes for the ſecurity of his authority, and beſtowed upon him the title of king, which by the advice of his friends, and much againſt his inclination, he declined. He however aſſumed the power of creating peers, and again, to give greater dignity to his authority, he was in 1657 a ſecond time inaugurated protector in Weſtminſter-hall, with all the pomp of a coronation. His fears were now alarmed by the publication of "killing no murder," a pamphlet by colonel Titus, which directed againſt him the dagger of every bold aſſaſſin, and in 1658 he felt not a little diſappointment at the conduct of his parliament, which he addreſſed as compoſed of lords and commons; in the uſual language of the kings of England, though none of the ancient nobility condeſcended to appear among them. Theſe open inſults, together with the ſecret machinations of his enemies, were encreaſed by the death of his favorite daughter Mrs. Claypole, who, on her death-bed bitterly reproached him with his conduct. The ſevere agitations of his mind at laſt undermined his conſtitution, he grew reſerved and ſuſpicious, and the attacks of a ſlow fever were ſucceeded by a tertian ague. Though the diſorder ſeemed at firſt not alarming, his phyſicians perceived his danger, but regardleſs of their intimations, he depended upon the prayers of the godly for recovery, and hoped that heaven would preſerve his life. His diſorder proved fatal, 3d September 1658. He was carried with great pomp from Somerſet-houſe, and buried in the chapel of Henry VII. in Weſtminſter-abbey, but after the reſtoration his body was taken up and hung on the gallows. Though an uſurper and a tyrant, Cromwell poſſeſſed great powers of mind, and contributed much to the glory of the nation. Not only Milton defended his government, but Waller, Sprat, Dryden, and Cowley, celebrated his virtues. How blameworthy ſoever he might have been in the acquiſition of his power, obſerves one of his biographers, he certainly rivalled the greateſt of the Engliſh monarchs in glory, and made himſelf dreaded by the nations around him. In his religious opinions he was a wavering fanatic, and though grave and demure he had the hypocriſy to adopt ſuch tenets only as tended beſt to ſecure his uſurpation. Of all his children only ſix lived to maturity: Richard his ſucceſſor, who held the protectorate with feeble hands, and reſigned it for a life of obſcurity, was born 1626, and died at Cheſhunt, 1712: Henry was lieutenant of Ireland, and died 1674: Bridget, who married Ireton, and afterwards general Fleetwood: Elizabeth, his favorite daughter, who married Mr. Claypole, of Northamptonſhire: Mary, who married lord Fauconberg, and is ſuppoſed to have intereſted herſelf warmly for the reſtoration of Charles II. and died 1712: And Frances, the youngeſt, who married Mr. Rich, grandſon to lord Warwick, and afterwards ſir John Ruſſel of Chippenham, Cambridgeſhire. His mother lived with him at Whitehall, but in the midſt of ſplendor ſhe enjoyed it not, and was filled with terror for the fate of her ſon, whom ſhe never conſidered ſafe, except ſhe ſaw him twice a day. His wife was a woman of maſculine powers of mind, and ſhe gloried in the elevation to which her huſband's guilty ambition, ſpurred on by her conſtant exhortations, had raiſed her family. She ſurvived till 1672.

CRONECK, John Frederic baron de, of Anſpach, died of the ſmall-pox 1758, aged 27. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf as an ingenious poet.

CROOK, ſir George, was born at Chilton, Bucks, and educated at Oxford, and the Inner-temple.

temple. He rose to the offices of king's serjeant, justice of the common pleas, and chief justice of England. He died at Waterstock, Oxfordshire, 1641, aged 82.

Crosby, Brass, lord mayor of London, was born at Stockton-upon-Tees in 1725, and early came to London, where he practised as an attorney. He, in 1764, was elected sheriff, the next year alderman, and in 1770 lord mayor In this high office he opposed the court, in the prosecution of Wheble and other printers; and he supported Wilkes and Oliver, for which he was sent to the Tower. During his confinement, his conduct was applauded by the city, and various addresses came to him from some counties. He was released by the prorogation of parliament, and conducted to the mansion-house in great pomp by the populace, and honored by the thanks of the corporation, and the vote of a cup of 100l. value. He died 1793.

Cross, Michael, an English artist, employed by Charles I. to copy the best pictures of Italy. It is said, that being permitted by the doge of Venice to copy the Madonna of Raphael, he left his copy behind, and brought away the original, which, in the civil wars, was sold to the Spanish ambassador, and now adorns the Escurial.

Cross, Lewis, a painter, who died 1724. He retouched a picture of Mary of Scots, and with such effect, that several copies have been taken from it.

Crousaz, John Peter de, a mathematician, born at Lausanne, 1663. He was intended for the army, but his inclinations were bent to literature; and the perusal of des Cartes's works directed his attention to mathematics and philosophy. He was in 1706 made rector of the academy of Lausanne, and, in 1724, mathematical professor at Groningen. He was afterwards preceptor to Frederic of Hesse Cassel, nephew to the king of Sweden, and died at Lausanne, 1748, aged 85. He wrote an essay on logic, afterwards enlarged to 6 vols 8vo.—a treatise on beauty, 2 vols. 12mo. —on the liberty of thinking, &c.

Crowne, John, a native of Nova Scotia, who came to England, eager after fame. His distresses at first were so great that he became upper servant in an old lady's family, and then was a favorite with the court, and employed by Charles II. to write the masque of Calypso. Upon the discovery of the popish plot, he embraced the part of the tories, and wrote his "city politics," to satirise the whigs, a comedy. He next petitioned the king for a place for life; to which Charles assented, provided he wrote another comedy. Even the king himself assisted him, by recommending him to borrow from the Spanish comedy of "non pued esser;" from which was produced the play of Sir Courtly Nice; but, on the last day of rehearsal, the king died, and the hopes of the poet were dashed to the ground. He died about 1703, author of 17 plays, besides the "church scuffle," a heroic poem, and two other poems, Pandion and Amphigenia, and the Dæneids.

Croxall, Dr. Samuel, was born at Walton-upon-Thames, Surrey, and educated at Eton, and St. John's college, Cambridge. At the university he wrote the fair Circassian, but as the poem was a licentious imitation of Solomon's song, he avoided disclosing himself to be the author, before he applied for ordination. He obtained the living of Hampton, Middlesex, the parishes of St. Mary Somerset, and Mountshaw, London, and became chancellor, prebendary, and canon of Hereford, and afterwards archdeacon of Salop, with other preferments. In Anne's reign he wrote, in support of the whigs, two cantos in imitation of Spenser, to satirise Harley's administrations. He wrote besides "the Vision," a poem, addressed to lord Halifax,—the fables of Æsop,—scripture politics,—the royal manual,—and all the dedications prefixed to "Select Novels." He died at a great age, 1752.

Croze, Mathurin Veyssiere la, a Benedictine monk, distinguished himself by his learning. He abandoned his order and his religion in 1696, and made his recantation at Basil, and employed himself in Berlin as an instructor of youth, and professor of philosophy. He died 1739, aged 78. He wrote some valuable works, dissertations historiques, &c.—an Armenian dictionary, 4to. twelve years' labor—histoire du Christianisme des Indes, 12mo—du Christianisme d'Ethiopie, &c.

Cruden, Alexander, M. A. was born at Aberdeen, and educated at the Marischal college there. He settled in London in 1728, as bookseller under the royal exchange, and maintained himself chiefly by superintending publications for the press. In 1737 his valuable Concordance was published, and again in 1761, Cruden was occasionally deranged. About 1738 he went on a romantic view to reform the English universities, and was soon after confined at Chelsea. He was a second time in a mad-house, and was at last found dead, in a praying posture, at Islington, 1774, aged 70. He was a worthy, pious, and inoffensive man.

Crusius, or Krans, Martin, of Bamberg, was professor of belles lettres at Tubingen, and the first who taught Greek in Germany, &c. He died at Etringen 1607, aged 81. He is the learned compiler of Turco-Græciæ, libri octo 1584—annales Suevici ad ann. 1549, &c.

Cruz, Juana Inez de la, an ingenious lady, born at Mexico. She was naturally endowed with great powers of mind. Her poems possessed great merit. The best part of her life was spent in the seclusion of the monastery of St. Geronimo, where she died, after 27 years' residence, aged 44. in 1695.

Cudworth, Ralph, a celebrated divine, born 1617, at Aller, Somersetshire, where his father was rector. He was of Emanuel college, and in 1641 was presented to the rectory of North Cadbury, Somersetshire, and the following year he publiſhed his "diſcourſe concerning the true notion of the Lord's ſupper," and afterwards his treatiſe, "the union of Chriſt and the church, a ſhadow." In 1644 he was appointed maſter of Clare-hall, and the year after regius profeſſor of Hebrew. In 1647, he preached before the houſe of commons, for which he received the thanks of the houſe. In 1654, he was elected maſter of Chriſt's college, at which time he alſo married. He was, in 1657, one of thoſe conſulted by parliament about the Engliſh tranſlation of the bible, and he gained the friendſhip of Whitelocke, and of Thurloe, the able ſecretary of the two protectorates. At the reſtoration, he wrote a copy of verſes to the ſovereign, and, in 1662, he was preſented by biſhop Sheldon to Aſhwell, Hertfordſhire. In 1678, he was inſtalled prebendary of Glouceſter, and he then publiſhed in folio his famous work, "the true intellectual ſyſtem of the univerſe, wherein the reaſon and philoſophy of atheiſm are confuted, and its impoſſibility demonſtrated." This work, from its nature and importance, had many aſſailants; but it is acknowledged by Dryden, Bayle, and Shafteſbury, that he was ſo moderate in his principles that he almoſt betrayed the cauſe which he meant to defend. A warm diſpute was raiſed in conſequence between him and le Clerc. The work was tranſlated into Latin, in 1733, by Moſheim, and the original was republiſhed in 1743, in 2 vols. 4to. by Dr. Birch, with great additions. Cudworth died at Cambridge, 1688. Of his poſthumous works, which were a continuation of his intellectual ſyſtem, one was publiſhed by Chandler biſhop of Durham 1731, called "a treatiſe concerning eternal and immutable morality," intended chiefly againſt Hobbes and others. His other MSS. were on moral good and evil, &c. Cudworth was a man of extenſive erudition, well ſkilled in the languages, an able philoſopher, an acute mathematician, and a profound metaphyſician. Though he embraced the corpuſcular philoſophy, and conſidered Plato as a guide with reſpect to the Deity, he was eſteemed for his virtues, his piety, his moderation, and humanity.

CUERENHERT, Theodore van, a ſingular character, born at Amſterdam 1522. He was a man of ſcience, and had a turn for poetry; but maintained himſelf at firſt by engraving, in which he diſplayed ſkill and genius, though too haſty and volatile in his execution. He ſettled at Haerlem, and was ambaſſador to the prince of Orange. Such, at laſt, were his ideas about religion, that he aſſerted no one could officiate as a miniſter without a ſupernatural miſſion, and that it was unworthy a Chriſtian to enter a place of public worſhip. Theſe wild ideas procured his baniſhment from the country. He died at Tergont 1590, aged 68. His works were publiſhed, 3 vols. folio.

CUEVA, Alfonſus de la, ambaſſador from Philip III. to the Venetian republic, plotted the ſeizing of the city. When the conſpiracy was diſcovered, and the accomplices put to death by drowning, the author of the horrible ſcheme, out of reſpect to the Spaniſh king, was ſecretly diſmiſſed by the ſenate, to avoid the fury of the populace. Cueva fled to Flanders; but in conſequence of the ſeverity of his government he retired to Rome, where he died 1665. He was a man of aſtoniſhing powers of mind, great political ſagacity, an acute judge of the manners and prejudices of mankind, compoſed in the moſt violent agitations, and ſuch a maſter of the knowledge of the human paſſions, that his conjectures ſeem almoſt prophetical.

CUFF, Henry, a celebrated wit, born at Hinton St. George, Somerſetſhire, 1560. He was educated at Trinity college, Oxford; but a joke upon the well-known humorous diſhoneſty of his founder drew upon him the reſentment of his ſociety and expulſion. He was admitted at Merton, and two years after, 1588, elected fellow. He was afterwards Greek profeſſor, and proctor of the univerſity. He next became the ſecretary and confidant of Eſſex, a moſt fatal engagement. When Eſſex was condemned, he accuſed Cuff as the author of his misfortunes; in conſequence of which the wretched ſecretary, perhaps no otherwiſe guilty than as the tool of this ambitious favorite, was arraigned, condemned, and executed at Tyburn, 1601. He was a man of great learning and genius. He wrote a curious philoſophical piece, called the differences of the ages of man's life, together with the original cauſes, &c.

CUJACIUS, James, an eminent lawyer, born at Toulouſe, 1520. He was of mean origin; but by his genius and induſtry, without the aſſiſtance of a maſter, he made himſelf perfect in the knowledge of Greek and Latin, and of civil law. Refuſed the profeſſor's chair in his native town, his abilities attracted pupils from every country; and to his ſuperior talents, France owed the ableſt and the moſt expert of her lawyers and magiſtrates. He ſettled at Cahors, and then at Bourges, which he would not quit, though invited by the king of France, and by Gregory XIII. He was ſo kind to his pupils that he was called the father of his ſcholars. He died at Bourges 1590. His works were 10 vols. fol.

CULLEN, William, the celebrated phyſician, was born in Lanerkſhire, and ſerved his time with an apothecary at Glaſgow, and then went as ſurgeon in a veſſel to the Weſt Indies. On his return, he ſettled at Shotts, and afterwards at Hamilton. By the advice of the duke of Hamilton, he removed to Glaſgow, and obtained an appointment in the univerſity. About this time he formed a partnerſhip with William Hunter. In 1746, he was appointed lecturer in chemiſtry at Glaſgow, and in 1751 was nominated king's profeſſor of medicine. In 1756 he was invited to the vacant ſeat of chemiſtry at Edinburgh, and he diſplayed ſuch know-knowledge, that an opposition was raised against him by those who envied his fame, and could not rival his abilities. He published the lectures which he delivered, in consequence of the appearance of a surreptitious copy. He at last resigned his office to Dr. Black, in consequence of growing infirmities, though he afterwards joined Dr. Gregory, to give lectures on the practice of physic. He died 1790. His other works were, lines of physic, 4 vols. 8vo.—synopsis nosologiæ methodicæ, 2 vols. 8vo—a treatise on the recovery of drowned persons, &c. 8vo.

CULLUM, sir John, was born 1733, and educated at Bury school, and Catharine-hall, Cambridge. He died at Hardwicke-house, 1785, rector of Great Thurlow, Suffolk. He published the history and antiquities of Hawsted, Suffolk.

CULMER, Richard, a violent fanatic, educated at Magdalen college, Cambridge. He was expelled from the living of Goodneston, in Kent, for refusing to read the book of sports, and then became lecturer at Canterbury, and was employed by the parliament in breaking down and defacing images, pictures, &c. from places of worship. In his zeal, he demolished the beautiful painted window of Canterbury cathedral, of which he gave an account; and for his services to the republicans, he was promoted to the living of Minster in Kent, from which he was ejected at the restoration. He was a most abusive character, and from his fondness for fighting he was called the blue-skin Dick.

CULPEPER, Nicholas, after a few years spent at Cambridge, was bound to an apothecary. He engaged deeply in the study of astrology, of which he became professor. He died in Spitalfields 1654. He wrote several books, the best known of which is his "herbal," in which he describes the qualities of plants, as if by casting their nativities.

CUMBERLAND, Richard, a prelate, son of a citizen of London, where he was born 1632. He was educated at St. Paul's school and Magdalen college, Cambridge, and in 1658, he was presented to Brampton rectory, Northamptonshire. He was drawn from his solitude by the elevation of his friend Orlando Bridgman to the seals, 1667, from whom he received the living of Allhallows, Stamford. He published, in 1672, his work de legibus naturæ disquisitio philosophica, &c. This performance greatly raised his reputation, and he was further distinguished for the exercises which he performed for his degree of D. D. in 1680. In 1686 he published his essay on Jewish measures and weights, a work of merit. In 1691 he was raised to the see of Peterborough without solicitation or interest, merely from the eminence of his learning. In his duties he was vigilant, observing to his friends, who dissuaded him from exertions which might injure his health, "that he would fulfil his duties as long as he could, and that a man had better wear out than rust out." In his pursuits to discover the true causes of idolatry, he paid attention to the shattered Phœnician history of Sanchoniathon; but though great labor was bestowed on the subject, and a book prepared for the press, his bookseller objected to the publication, which was deferred till after his death, when his son-in-law, Mr. Payne, published in 1720, his Sanchoniathon's Phœnician history, from Eusebius' præpar. evangel. &c. and, in 1724, his second work, his origines gentium antiquissimæ. The bishop to the last retained the great powers of his mind, and died 1718, in his 87th year, in consequence of an attack of the palsy.

CUMBERLAND, William duke of, second son of George II. was born 1721. He was at the battle of Dettingen, and distinguished himself so much at the battle of Fontenoy, that he might have ensured a glorious victory, had he been ably supported by the Dutch. His next services were the defeat of the pretender at the battle of Culloden, 1746. In 1747 he lost the battle of Val, by the hesitating assistance of the Dutch. He died 1765.

CUMING, William, a physician, born at Edinburgh 1714, and educated at the high school and university there. After residing at Paris and Leyden, he came to London, and removed to Dorchester. Here he gained universal reputation, and recommended himself to his patients by the gentleness of his manners, and his skilful management of diseases. He assisted Mr. Hutchins, the historian of Dorsetshire, who has paid deserved compliments to his abilities and kind assiduity. He died of a dropsy, 1788, aged 74.

CUNÆUS, Peter, a lawyer, professor at Leyden, born at Flushing 1586. He was a man of great learning, commended by Vossius, Scaliger, and others. He died 1638. He wrote, among other valuable works, de republicâ Hebræorum—satira Menippæa—remarks on Nonius' Diony—a translation of Julian's Cæsars, &c.

CUNEGONDE, married the emperor Henry II by whom she had no children. Some historians accuse her of incontinence, while others regard her as ill treated by her husband, after whose death, in 1024, she retired to a monastery.

CUNINGHAM, William, a physician, who resided in Coleman-street, London. He lived at Norwich about 1559; but, in 1563, was a public lecturer in Surgeons' hall, London. He was a man of great learning as an astronomer and physician.

CUNITIA, Maria, a learned lady in the 17th century, born in Silesia. She had a perfect knowledge of ancient and modern languages, and excelled in mathematics and astronomy, on which she wrote some ingenious treatises, especially Urania propitia, in 1650, in Latin and German, dedicated to the emperor Ferdinand III. She married a physician, and died 1664.

CUNNINGHAM, Alexander, a Scotch hiſtorian, born near Selkirk, in 1654. He was educated in Holland, where he imbibed the principles of government then faſhionable. He came over with William at the revolution, and maintained an intimacy with the moſt popular members of government. He was tutor to lord Hyndford and his brother William, and afterwards to lord Lorne, and viſcount Louſdale; and during his viſits on the continent, he made important obſervations on the politics of various countries, which he communicated in confidence to the king and his miniſters. To this may be attributed the vaſt information manifeſted in his writings, and the great military knowledge which he diſplays. At the acceſſion of George I. Cunningham was ſent as envoy to the Venetian republic, where he reſided five years. He afterwards lived in retirement, reſpected as a politician and as a man of letters. From an inſcription in St. Martin's church over an Alexander Cunningham, ſuppoſed to be his, he died 1737, in the 83d year of his age. His hiſtory of Great Britain, from the revolution to the acceſſion of George I. appeared in 2 vols. 4to. 1787, tranſlated from the Latin MS. The work had paſſed into the hands of Dr. Hollingberry, and was recommended for publication by lord Hardwicke and Dr. Douglas biſhop of Saliſbury. It is a work of merit, and it relates the particulars of an important period with accuracy, ſpirit, and impartiality. To our author ſome have attributed the celebrated criticiſms on Horace, 2 vols. 8vo. 1721, and thoſe poſthumous remarks on Virgil publiſhed 1742; but the matter is doubtful. It appears, indeed, that the hiſtorian and the critic were both of the ſame name, both Scotch, both lived in the ſame times, both educated in Holland, both eminent for their ſkill in the game of cheſs, both employed as travelling tutors, and both attained to an advanced age.

CUNNINGHAM, John, ſon of a wine-merchant in Dublin. At 17 he wrote his "love in a miſt, or the laſs of ſpirit;" from which Garrick drew the prominent features of his "lying varlet." He was for ſeveral years engaged as a ſtrolling player, in the north of England and in Scotland. He ſettled at Newcaſtle-upon-Tyne, where he died 1773, aged 42.

CURCELLÆUS, Stephen, a divine, born at Geneva, died at Amſterdam 1658, aged 72. After reſiding in France, he ſettled at Amſterdam, where he was followed by the Armenians, and where he ſucceeded Epiſcopius as divinity profeſſor. He publiſhed a new edition of the Greek teſtament, with various readings, and he properly obſerves, that none of the readings affect the articles of faith.

CURIO, Cælius Secundus, was born at San Chirico, in Piedmont. For his abjuration of the Romiſh religion for the tenets of Luther, he was ſeized and confined at Turin. He eſcaped and fled to Salo and Pavia; but perſecuted in Italy, he took refuge at Lauſanne, where he became principal of the college. He removed to Baſil, where for twenty-two years, till his death, 1569, at the age of 67, he continued to fill the chair of eloquence and belles lettres. His work, "de amplitudine beati regni Dei," 1550, in 8vo. is a curious compoſition.

CURL, Edmund, a bookſeller, whoſe name has obtained immortality in Pope's Dunciad. He was born in the weſt of England, and kept a ſhop in the neighbourhood of Covent Garden, where his books were generally enlarged by wretched notes and forged letters. He loſt his ears for publiſhing "the man in her ſmock." He died 1748.

CUROPALATE, John, of the houſehold of the Greek emperor of that name, wrote a Greek hiſtory from 813 to 1081. This work has been moſt ſhamefully pirated by Cedrenus.

CURRIE, James, a phyſician, born 1756, at Kirkpatrick Fleming, Dumfrieſhire. After receiving his education at Dumfries, he went to Virginia in a commercial capacity, but returned to ſtudy medicine at Edinburgh. He ſettled at Liverpool, and acquired celebrity from his practice, the benevolence of his heart, his claſſical taſte, and his general information. He afterwards removed to Bath on account of ill health, and died at Sidmouth, Devonſhire, 1805. Dr. Currie was well known as the author of a letter to Mr. Pitt, under the name of Jaſper Wilſon, 1793, which paſſed through ſeveral editions. Beſides his medical reports on the effects of water, as a remedy in febrile diſeaſes, 8vo. 1797, with another volume 1804, he wrote valuable papers in the Mancheſter tranſactions, &c. and alſo edited Burns' poems in 1800.

CURSON, or CORCEONE, Robert, an Engliſhman, who ſtudied at Oxford and Paris. He became chancellor of Paris univerſity, and was made a cardinal by Innocent III. in 1212. He preached the cruſades, and died at Damietta 1218. He wrote on the queſtion, whether Origen be ſaved or not.

CUSA, Nicholas de, a cardinal, born at Cuſa. His extenſive knowledge of law and of divinity recommended him to Nicholas V. who made him a cardinal 1448, and biſhop of Brixia. He was ſent to Germany as legate, in 1451, to preach the cruſades againſt the Turks, and died at Todi, in Umbria, 1464, aged 63. His works, which were numerous and valuable, were collected and printed in 3 vols.

CUSSAY, N. governor of Angers, is known for his reply to the duke of Guiſe, who had ordered the proteſtants of Anjou to be maſſacred on the fatal day of St. Bartholomew — "Tell the king," anſwered he, "that my fellow citizens are brave and loyal, but not aſſaſſins."

CUSTINES, Adam Philippe count de, was born at Metz, 1740. In the American war he aſſiſted the revolted colonies, and in the national aſſembly he eſpouſed the popular party party. When commander of the army of the Rhine, he took Spires, Mentz, Frankfort, &c. but a reverse of fortune obliged him to fall back. Want of success was considered as treason, and Custines perished on the scaffold, 1793. He was weak in his conduct, proud in prosperity, but a coward in adversity.

CUTHBERT, an English saint, born in the north, and educated by the Scottish monks in the abbey of Icolmkill. He settled in the island of Lindisferna, four miles from Berwick, now called Holyisland; from whence he came to the court of Egfred king of Northumberland, whom he converted to Christianity, and baptised. He died 686.

CUTTS, John lord, was born at Matching, in Essex. He was early in the service of Monmouth, and was under the duke of Lorraine, in Hungary, and at the taking of Buda by the imperialists At the revolution, he was created baron in Ireland 1690, governor of the isle of Wight 1693. On Anne's accession he was made lieutenant-general of the forces in Holland, commander in Ireland in 1705, and afterwards one of the lords justices of that kingdom; an appointment which broke his heart, because it removed him out of the sphere of active enterprize. He died at Dublin 1707. He wrote a poem on queen Mary's death, and published, 1687, poetical exercises, written on several occasions—a poem on wisdom—another on Waller.

CYPRIANI, or CIPRIANI, an Italian painter, settled in England. He died in London 1785. His pieces, spread over Europe by the graver of Bartolozzi, are well known and admired for grace, beauty, and expression.

CYRANO, Bergerac, a French author, born in Gascony 1620. He entered the army, where his valor distinguished him in the field as well as in duelling, and procured him the appellation of the intrepid. He was shot through the body at the siege of Mouzon, and run through the neck at that of Arras in 1640; but at last he abandoned the army to wield the pen of wit and poetry. He died in 1655, aged 35, in consequence of a blow on the head by the fall of a piece of timber. His works consist of a tragedy on the death of Agrippina, mother of Germanicus—the pedant, a comedy—besides a comic history of the states and empires of the sun and of the moon—letters—dialogues—and fragments of physics, &c.

CYRILL, Lucar, of Candia, was educated at Padua and in Germany. He was bishop of Alexandria, and afterwards, 1621, patriarch of Constantinople. He was deposed for his attempts to reform his clergy, and was strangled by order of the grand signior, in 1638.

DAC, John, painter, born at Cologne 1556, and employed by the emperor Rodolph, who rewarded him with honors and opulence. His pictures are all in a grand stile.

DACIER, Andrew, a French philosopher and critic, born in Upper Languedoc, 1651. He was educated chiefly at Saumur, under Tanaquil Faber, whose daughter he married. At Paris he was in the number of those who published the classics for the use of the dauphin. His first work was Pompeius Festus, 4to. 1681, greatly improved in 1699. His Horace, with a French translation, appeared in 1681, in 10 vols. 12mo. and has frequently been reprinted. He next published St. Anastasius' contemplations, with notes, &c. in 1682. The next year he married Faber's daughter; and, in 1685, he with her abjured the protestant religion. In 1691, his moral reflections of Marcus Antoninus, 2 vols. 12mo. appeared; and in 1692, Aristotle's poetics, with a translation, &c. in 4to. considered as his best performance. In 1693 he published a translation of the Œdipus and Electra of Sophocles; in 1694, the first volume of Plutarch's lives; in 1697, the translation of the works of Hippocrates, 2 vols. 12mo; in 1699, that of Plato's works, 2 vols.; in 1706, the life of Pythagoras, his symbols, golden verses, &c. 2 vols.; in 1715, Epictetus, 2 vols.; and in 1723, the lives of Plutarch were completed, in 8 vols. 4to. Dacier published besides, notes on Longinus, a dissertation on the origin of satire, answers to some critics who had censured his person and manners, &c. a commentary on Theocritus, &c. As he had been concerned in the compilation of the medallic history of Lewis XIV. the monarch settled on him a pension of 2000 livres. In 1713 he was perpetual secretary to the French academy, and in 1717 he obtained a grant of 10,000 crowns. Dacier, greatly afflicted for the loss of his wife, 1720, would have married a second time had not death prevented it. He was carried off by an ulcer in his throat, which he had disregarded as not dangerous, 1722, in his 71st year. He was a man of great and extenfive learning, who applied the powers of his mind, and the moſt indefatigable induſtry, to infuſe into his native language all the graces of ſome of the beſt writers of ancient times.

DACIER, Anne, wife of Andrew Dacier, daughter of Tanaquil Faber, or le Fevre, was born at Saumur 1651. Her father diſcovering the powers of her mind, gave her a learned education. In 1674, ſhe publiſhed an edition of Callimachus in 4to. and ſhe was engaged in the editing of the claſſics for the uſe of the dauphin. Her Florus appeared in 1674, in 4to. and her Aurelius Victor 1681. Chriſtina of Sweden invited her to embrace the Romiſh religion, and to ſettle at Stockholm, where every mark of reſpect and patronage would be ſhown to her. Theſe offers ſhe declined, and continued her labors in the ſervice of the dauphin. In 1681, her tranſlation of Anacreon and Sappho appeared, ſo much commended by Boileau, and in 1683 were publiſhed Eutropius, 4to. and a French tranſlation of the Amphitryo, Epidicus, and Rudens of Plautus, 3 vols. and the next year the Plutus and Clouds of Ariſtophanes, 12mo. with Dictys Cretenſis, and Dares Phrygius. In 1683 ſhe married Dacier, a ſcholar with whom ſhe had ſhared the inſtruction of her father, and two years after ſhe made a recantation of the proteſtant tenets. It has been inſinuated that ſhe had previouſly married Leſnier, a bookſeller, and that ſhe ran away from him for the ſociety of Dacier, to whom ſhe never was regularly married, an imputation too groſs to be credited. After her converſion, a penſion of 1500 livres was ſettled on her huſband, and 500 on herſelf. In 1688, ſhe publiſhed her tranſlation of Terence's plays with notes, 3 vols. 12mo. She aſſiſted her huſband in his Marcus Antoninus and his Plutarch, and in 1711 ſhe publiſhed her tranſlation of Homer's Iliad with notes, 3 vols. 12mo. In 1714 ſhe wrote a defence of Homer againſt de la Motte, and two years after againſt Hardouin, in which ſhe diſplayed much erudition, great taſte, and not a little acrimony. She was afterwards reconciled to de la Motte. Her laſt work, the Odyſſey of Homer from the Greek, appeared in 1716, 3 vols. 12mo. Sinking into diſeaſe and debility, ſhe died 1720, aged 69. Beſides learning, madame Dacier was graced with the nobleſt ornaments of human nature.

DAGAR, Jacob, a native of Paris, eminent as an hiſtorical and portrait painter. He was patronized by Chriſtian V. of Denmark, and died at Copenhagen 1716, aged 76.

DAGOBERT I. ſucceeded Clotaire II. as king of France 628. He made war againſt Saxony, Britany, and Gaſcony, but ſtained by cruelty the laurels which he obtained in the field of battle. He died at Epernay 638, aged 36.

DAGOBERT II. ſon of Sigebert II. was prevented from aſcending his father's throne by the mayor of the palace; but afterwards was king of Auſtraſia, and was aſſaſſinated 679.

DAGOBERT III. ſucceeded as king of Neuſtria, and died four years after 715.

DAHLBERG, Eric, a Swediſh engineer. He prepared for the defence of Thorn, and accompanied Guſtavus Adolphus in his Poliſh expedition, and adviſed him to march acroſs the Great Belt when frozen, and thus beſiege the capital. His ſervices were rewarded in 1660 with the rank of nobility. He died at Stockholm 1703, aged 78. He wrote Suecia antiqua and hodierna, 3 vols. fol. 1700, and was called the Vauban of Sweden.

DAILLE, John, a proteſtant divine, born at Chatelleraut 1594. He was educated at Poitiers and Saumur, and at the age of 18 was admitted into the family of du Pleſſis Mornay, as tutor to his two grandſons. He travelled in 1619 with his two pupils, and paſſed through Geneva, Piedmont, Lombardy, and Venice, where he was introduced to father Paul. While at Mantua one of his pupils was taken ill, and ſoon after died, ſo that Daille with great danger conveyed the body concealed as a bale of goods, under the care of two ſervants, to the burial place of his father, from the unſuſpicious eye of the inquiſitors who viewed with jealouſy the proteſtants. With the other pupil he continued his travels, and after viſiting Switzerland, Germany, Flanders, Holland, and England, they returned to France in 1621. In 1623, Daille was ordained and officiated in the family of the venerable Mornay, who died ſoon after in his arms. In 1628 he wrote his celebrated book "on the uſe of the fathers," which lord Falkland and Chillingworth greatly valued, and began to tranſlate, but left unfiniſhed; but it appeared in 1651, in an Engliſh dreſs, by Thomas Smith of Cambridge, and in Latin by Mettayer of St. Quintin. In 1633 he publiſhed his apology for the reformed churches. Theſe books, from their importance, and the maſterly manner in which the ſubject was treated, excited a great outcry among the catholics. Daille was at the ſynod of Alencon in 1637, where he exerted himſelf to reconcile the proteſtants about univerſal grace. Theſe principles he warmly embraced, and publiſhed in 1655 a Latin work againſt Spanheim, the Leyden profeſſor, as "an apology for the ſynods of Alençon and Charenton." He died at Paris 1670, after enjoying through life, except from a ſmall attack of apoplexy for 10 days, the moſt uninterrupted good health, and all the faculties of his mind. He wrote beſides ſeveral works, chiefly of a controverſial nature, and which equally evinced his learning, erudition, and dexterity of argumentation.

DALE, Samuel, an apothecary of Braintree, Eſſex, who became, in 1730, a licenciate of the college of phyſicians. He wrote Pharmacologia, ſeu manuductio ad materiam medicam, often printed—the antiquities of Harwich and Dover-court, in 4to. &c. He died at Bocking, where he was phyſician, 1739, aged 80.

DALECHAMPS, James, a learned phyſician, born born at Caen 1513. He died at the age of 75, at Lyons, where he had practiſed from 1552 to 1588. He wrote a general hiſtory of plants, three books de peſte, beſides a tranſlation of Athenæus' Pliny's natural hiſtory, with notes, &c.

D'ALIBRAI, Charles Von, a Pariſian, of a diſſipated turn of mind, and fond of merry ſociety. He declared that he would die by the mouth of the bottle rather than by the mouth of the cannon. In the latter part of life he lived much in the country, and died at an advanced age 1655. His works appeared in 1653, in 8vo. divided into ſix parts, containing bacchanalian, ſatirical, heroical, moral, and chriſtian poems, of no great merit indeed, but frequently happy in delineation of character and in flaſhes of wit.

DALIN, Olaus de, a learned Swede, born at Winſberg in 1708. He is called the father of Swediſh poetry, by his two poems on the liberty of Sweden, and the tragedy of Brunhilda. He was appointed preceptor to prince Guſtavus, and became chancellor of the court. He wrote the hiſtory of Sweden to the death of Charles IX. He wrote beſides, epiſtles, fables, ſatires, panegyrics, &c. and tranſlated Monteſquieu's declenſion of the Romans.

DALLINGTON, ſir Robert, author of the aphoriſms of Tacitus, was born at Geddington, Northamptonſhire, and educated at Pembroke-hall, Cambridge. He was knighted by queen Elizabeth, and made maſter of the Charter-houſe. He died 1637. He wrote a ſurvey of the great duke's eſtate in Tuſcany, 4to. &c.

DALRYMPLE, David, was born in Edinburgh 1726. He was educated at Eton, from whence he removed to Utrecht, where he continued till 1746. In 1748 he was called to the bar, and his name as a lawyer was ſo eminent that he was made in 1766 one of the judges of the court of ſeſſion, when he aſſumed the appellation of lord Hailes. He was not leſs conſpicuous by his learning and his writings, than by his integrity, candor, and firmneſs, as a judge. In 1773 he publiſhed remarks on the hiſtory of Scotland—and in 1776 and 1779, annals of Scotland, 2 vols. 4to. containing the hiſtory of 14 Scottiſh kings: which valuable work, however, the author did not complete. He publiſhed beſides memorials, and letters relating to the hiſtory of Britain, in the reign of James I. and Charles I. 2 vols. 1762 and 1766—biographia Scotica—remains of chriſtian antiquity, 3 vols. and other numerous tracts on antiquities, hiſtory, divinity, &c. He died 1792, in his 66th year.

DALTON, Michael, an Engliſh lawyer, born in Cambridgeſhire, and bred at Lincoln's-inn He wrote on the office of a juſtice of peace, and on the duty of ſheriffs. He was queen's counſel in 1599.

DALTON, John, D. D. was born at Deane in Cumberland 1709. He was educated at Lowther, and at Queen's college, Oxford. He adapted Milton's maſque at Ludlow caſtle to the ſtage, with a judicious ſelection of ſongs from other works of the author, and ſome of his own, a very popular piece, ſtill admired under the title of "Comus." During the celebrity of this performance, he ſought out Milton's grand-daughter, who was overwhelmed with old age and poverty, and procured her a benefit, which produced 120l. After being elected fellow of his college, he took orders, and was preſented to the living of St. Mary at Hill, and a prebend at Worceſter, where he died 1763. He publiſhed a volume of ſermons, 1757—two epiſtles, 4to.—a deſcriptive poem on the coal mines near Whitehaven—remarks on 12 hiſtorical deſigns of Raphael.

DALZELL, Andrew, a Greek ſcholar, born near Edinburgh, about 1750. From his village ſchool he came to Edinburgh, and he became profeſſor of the Greek language in the univerſity, keeper of the univerſity library, and one of the ſecretaries of the royal ſociety, &c. He ſuperintended the education of the preſent lord Lauderdale, whom he accompanied on the continent. As a profeſſor, Mr. Dalzell poſſeſſed great abilities, and his lectures were ſo popular, that Greek became a favorite purſuit with the ſtudents of the univerſity. To facilitate the labors of his pupils, he compoſed valuable notes on the Greek claſſics, publiſhed under the name of Analecta minora & majora, &c. He wrote beſides, ſome papers on biography, and on literary ſubjects, a tranſlation of Chevalier's deſcription of the plain of Troy, &c. He died 1806.

DALZIEL, Thomas, a Scotch officer, taken priſoner at the defeat at Worceſter. He eſcaped to Ruſſia, where the czar made him a general. At the reſtoration Charles II. made him, for his many ſervices, commander in chief of all his forces in Scotland. He had been brought up hardy, and after the death of Charles I. he never ſhaved his beard, which grew white and buſhy, and deſcended to his middle. He generally came to London once or twice a year, to kiſs the king's hand, who had great regard for him, but whenever he appeared in the capital, the ſingularity of his dreſs and appearance drew crouds around him.

DAMASUS I. a Spaniard, pope 366. He was an enemy to the Arians, and died 384, aged 80.

DAMASUS II. elected pope on the reſignation of Benedict IX. died at Paleſtrina, 23 days after, 1048.

DAMBOURNEY, N. of Rouen, died there 1795, aged 73. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a merchant, and a man of ſcience, well acquainted with philoſophy and chemiſtry. He made ſome curious experiments on plants, &c. and publiſhed valuable tracts.

DAMIEN, Peter, cardinal and biſhop of Oſtia, publicly condemned the wars which the popes carried on againſt the emperors, and aſſerted, from the example of our Saviour, that the eccleſiaſtics were to oppoſe their enemies, not by the arms of the flesh, but by the sword of the spirit. He was equally severe against the licentious manners of his age, which he attempted to correct and reform. He died about 1073.

DAMIENS, Robert Francis, a Frenchman, known for his attempt to assassinate Lewis XV. He was executed 1757, in a manner most horrible and wantonly barbarous.

DAMPIER, John, a native of Blois, director of a nunnery at Orleans, where he died before 1550. His Latin poems, after the manner of Catullus, are elegant and valuable.

DAMPIER, Captain William, a famous navigator, born at East Coker in Somersetshire. 1652. He joined captain Cook to cruize against the Spaniards, and with him proceeded to the South-seas through the streights of Magellan, where Cook died, 1684, and was succeeded by Davis. After burning Plata, they advanced to Panama, where they took a Spanish ship sent with dispatches to Lima, and from the intelligence received on board, they made an attack on the plate ships, which ended unsuccessfully. They next destroyed Leon, on the Mexican coast, and also Rio Leja, and there Dampier left Davis, and sailed to examine more fully the northern parts of the Mexican shore; but being disappointed in his wishes to seize the Manilla ship, they sailed across the Pacific ocean for the East Indies. Dampier arrived at the English factory at Achan, where he afterwards engaged in trading voyages, and then entered as gunner at a factory at Bencoolen. In 1691 he made his escape, and brought all his papers and journals with him, and reached the Downs, Sept. 16th. As he was in want of money he sold his share in an Indian prince, whom his companions carried about for exhibition. He afterwards engaged for three years, till 1711, in a voyage to the South-seas, of which he has recorded several interesting particulars. His voyage round the world, frequently published, is an accurate and valuable performance.

DAMPIERRE, N. a French general, distinguished under Dumouriez at the battle of Jemappe. As he was examining the works of the enemy his thigh was carried off by a cannon ball from an English battery, before the camp at Famars, and he died two days after, 1793.

DAN, the fifth son of Jacob by Bilhah the maid of Rachel, was the head of a tribe, whose territories were between Joppa and Ascalon.

DANCER, Daniel, a miser, born near Harrow, Middlesex. The love of money was the ruling principle in his family. His intercourse with the world was merely in the selling of his hay, and the other produce of his farm, and the winter comforts of his fire-side arose from the scanty supplies laboriously collected from the hedges, or the neighbouring common. On the death of his sister, he exchanged the hay bands which hitherto had protected his legs, for a second-hand pair of black worsted stockings, which were the only tokens of his mourning. He died 1794, aged 80, and left the whole of his property to lady Tempest, who it seems behaved towards him with charity, in alleviating his apparent poverty.

DANCHET, Anthony, a French poet, born at Riorn 1671. He was professor of rhetoric at Chartres, and came to Paris, where he wrote for the theatre. He died 1748. His works, consisting of tragedies, songs, operas, &c. were in 4 vols 12mo.

DANDINI, Jerome, a Jesuit, of Cesena, in Italy. 1554. He was rector of the colleges of Ferrara, Forli, Bologna, Parma, and Milan, and taught philosophy at Perugia 1596, when he was appointed by Clement VIII. legate to the Maronites of mount Libanus. He wrote an account of his journey in Italian. Dandini died at Forli 1634, aged 80.

DANDINI, Pietro, an eminent painter, born at Florence 1646. He was employed by the grand duke in adorning his palaces from sacred and fabulous history, as well as in fancy and caricature pieces. He died 1712.

DANDINI, Cæsare, an historical painter of Florence, very correct in his drawings, which were finished in a superior stile. His altar pieces at Florence are greatly admired.

DANDINI, Hercule Francois, professor of law at Padua, died 1747, aged 56, author of several learned works.

DANDOLO, Henry, a Venetian, raised to the rank of doge 1192. Though then 84 years old, vigor, wisdom, and activity, marked his government. He conquered Zara, engaged in the crusades, and displayed astonishing valor at the siege of Constantinople. He died 1205.

DANDOLO, Andrew, doge of Venice, made an alliance with Egypt, which produced a rupture with the Genoese. He died 1354, aged 44. He wrote an history of Venice, &c.

DANDRE, BARDON, Michael Francois, a painter and a writer, born at Aix in Provence, 1700. He died 1783. He was professor of the academy of painting, and admired for his historical pieces. He wrote some poetry of inferior merit—the life of Carlo Vanloo, 12mo. 1765—treatise on painting, &c.

DANES, Peter, of arts, was Greek professor at the college royal. He was tutor to the dauphin afterwards Francis II. and was present at the council of Trent, where he delivered a celebrated speech in 1546. He died at Paris 1577, aged 80. He wrote several things, but never set his name to them. The 6th book of Paulus Æmilius' history of France is attributed to him.

DANET, Peter, a French abbé, among the learned who published the classics for the dauphin. He published Phædrus with notes, besides a dictionary, and other works, and died at Paris 1709.

DANGEAU, Lewis Courcillon de, abbot of Clermont, was born at Paris 1643, and died there 1723. He studied belles lettres, history and and geography, for which he invented several new and ingenious games. He published a new method to learn historical geography, 2 vols. folio—the principles of heraldry in 14 plates, 4to.—historical games of the kings of France, &c. His principal work is the dialogues on the immortality of the soul, attributed by some to de Choisi. He was master of a great variety of languages, and his benevolence was equal to his learning.

DANGEAU, Philip de Courcillon, marquis de, brother of the preceding, was born in 1638. He was a great favorite with Lewis XIV. for his many accomplishments. He died at Paris 1720, at the age of 82, grand master of the military orders of N. dame du mont Carmel, and Lazarus of Jerusalem. He left some memoirs in MS. from which Voltaire drew curious particulars.

DANICAN, Andrew, a native of Drieux near Paris, nicknamed Philidor. Vid. PHILIDOR.

DANIEL, the last of the four great prophets, was carried away a captive to Babylon 606 B.C. He was there educated for the service of Nebuchadnezzar, and his name was changed to Belteshazzar. The king entrusted him with the government of Babylon, and made him chief of the magi, upon his true explanation of the dream of the mystic statue, which prefigured the four great empires of Assyria, Persia, Alexander, and his successors. He acquired celebrity by explaining the writing upon the wall under Belshazzar, and under Darius he became prime minister. He was by the intrigues of the courtiers thrown into the den of lions, and his preservation in this dreadful situation restored him to the royal favor. The book of Daniel is written partly in Hebrew, and partly in Chaldee.

DANIEL, Peter, advocate of Orleans, died at Paris 1603. He published the aulularia of Plautus and commentaries of Servius on Virgil. His valuable library was conveyed partly to Stockholm, and partly to the Vatican.

DANIEL, Samuel, an English poet and historian, born at Taunton 1562. He entered at Magdalen college, Oxford, but left the university without a degree, and became groom of the privy chamber to Anne queen of James I. He succeeded Spenser as poet laureat, and gained the friendship of the most eminent men of the times, such as Camden, Harrington, Spelman, &c. He lived, while near the court, in Old street, where he composed many of his pieces, but in his old age he resided at a farm at Beckington, Somersetshire, where he ended his days 1619. His poetical works, consisting of dramatic and other lighter pieces, besides a poem in 8 books on the wars of York and Lancaster, were published in 2 vols. 12mo. 1718. His history of England to the end of Edward III. in 2 vols. 4to. continued afterward by Trussel, was written, it is said, "with great brevity and politeness."

DANIEL, Gabriel, a learned Frenchman, born at Rouen 1649. At the age of 18 he was admitted among the Jesuits, and delivered lectures on literature, philosophy, and theology. One of his first performances was a voyage to the world of Descartes, a romance, most ingenious and excellent, which ridiculed the Cartesian system, and which became so celebrated as to be translated into several languages. His great work is his history of France to the death of Henry IV. 3 vols. fol. afterwards enlarged in 7 vols. 4to. 1722. This work was afterwards continued to the death of Lewis XIV. in an inferior style. Father Daniel wrote besides several theological and other tracts, one of which, "dialogues between Cleander and Eudoxus," passed through 12 editions in less than two years. He died at Paris 1728.

DANTE, Alighieri, a celebrated Italian poet, born at Florence 1625. The ambition of being elevated among the ruling men of his native city, engaged him in all the troubles and miseries of faction. His friends were defeated in the tumult, and he sought safety in banishment. In his exile at Ravenna, he vented the shafts of his resentment against his enemies, and because the pope and Philip of Valois had been instrumental in his downfal, he severely ridiculed them, and also incited the prince of Verona to make war against the Florentines. In his exile, at the court of Ravenna, he was sent to negociate with the Venetians, but the magistrates of Venice treated him with contempt, and refused to admit him within their walls. This had such an effect upon the irritable heart of Dante, that, at his return to Ravenna, unable to survive the affront, he died 1321, aged 57. To his misfortunes perhaps we are indebted for his poems, for unable to revenge himself by force, he drew the pen of satire in his own defence. His triple poem, of paradise, purgatory and hell, displays astonishing powers of genius, and at once exhibits the sweetness and graces of poetry with the bitterness of insatiable enmity The reputation and the usurped power of Boniface VIII., the pedigree of the French king, and the prostituted venality of Florence, that den of thieves, are the subjects which engage the virulence of the poet. He every where displays spirit, fire, and sublimity, and from his compositions, succeeding poets have learned not only how to point the shaft of satire, but to write with elegance, dignity, and grace.

DANTE, Peter Vincent, of Perouse, died 1512. He so successfully imitated the verse of the famous Dante, that he was called by his name. He was eminent for his skill in mathematics and architecture, and invented several useful machines.

DANTE, Vincent, grandson to the preceding, was known as a painter and mathematician. He died at Perouse 1576, aged 46.

DANTE, Ignatius, a descendant of the great poet, was born at Perugia. He read lectures on geography at Bologna, and was engaged by Gregory XIII. to draw geographical maps and plans, in which he evinced such dexterity that the pope raised him to the bishopric of Alatri. He died 1586. He published a treatise on the astrolabe, besides notes on the universal planisphere. He made a sphere of the world in five tables.

DANTE, John Baptiste, of the same family, was born at Perugia, and distinguished by his mechanical powers in making a pair of wings with which he flew across the lake Thrasymenus. He was afterwards professor of mathematics at Venice, and died about the end of the 15th century.

DANTON, George James, a native of Arcis-sur-Aube, born 1759. He was a lawyer, and at the revolution became associate to Robespierre and Marat. To an unprincipled hatred against Lewis XVI. he added the most ferocious spirit. Undismayed amidst the general terror of the Prussians, he opposed the project of removing the convention beyond the Loire. For awhile Robespierre was his friend, but when he saw his superior influence among the Jacobins, he marked him for destruction. Dragged before the revolutionary tribunal, which he had himself established, Danton showed firmness and indifference. He was guillotined 1794. Ambitious and vulgar, this bloody tyrant possessed with a stentorian voice, the imposing powers of persuasion, and while devoted to wine and low pleasures, he gained the heart of his associates by gross ribaldry and licentious wit.

DANTZ, John Andrew, a learned Lutheran divine, settled at Jena, as professor of the oriental tongues, and of theology. He died of an apoplexy, 1727, aged 73. He wrote Hebrew and Chaldee grammars.

DARAN, James, a native of Gascony, surgeon general in the imperial army at Turin and Milan. He refused the offers of Amadeus to settle in Italy, and returned to France, where he died 1784, aged 83. He wrote a treatise on the virulent gonorrhœa —observations on the diseases of the urethra, &c.

DARCET, N. an able chymist and physician of France, who died at Paris 1801, aged 75. He made some curious experiments, and published valuable memoirs on potteries, and on the various kinds of earth used in those manufactories.

DARCI, Patric count, a philosopher and engineer, born in Ireland 1725. As attached to the Stuarts, he removed to Paris in 1739, and at the age of 17 he distinguished himself by a new solution of the problem of the curve of equal pressure, in a resisting medium. In 1760 he published his essay on artillery, with curious experiments on the charges of powder, &c. and in 1765 appeared his memoir on the duration of the sensation of sight. This is the most ingenious of his works. His works, on experimental philosophy, evince a great genius, with strong and quick discrimination and solidity of judgment. He died at Paris, of the chorela morbus in 1779.

DARQUIER, Augustine, an astronomer, born at Toulouse, 1718. Blessed with a comfortable independence, he provided the best instruments, and built an observatory in his own house. More generally to diffuse knowledge, he took pupils whom he ably instructed in astronomy. He paid the expence of calculations to give greater accuracy to his observations, and received no pecuniary assistance whatever from the government. He died in his native town 1802, after escaping the storms of the revolution. He wrote 2 vols. of observations, —Lambert's cosmological letters, translated and printed at Utrecht—elements of geometry, &c.

DARWIN, Erasmus, an English poet and physician, born at Newark 1732. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and then went to Edinburgh, where he studied physic, and took his medical degrees. He settled at Lichfield, where he acquired celebrity in his profession. After the death of his wife 1770, he married the widow of col. Pole, with a handsome fortune, by whose persuasion, in 1781, he retired to Derby. He died at Derby very suddenly, 1802. In private life Dr. Darwin was amiable and benevolent, in his conversation easy and entertaining, and in his manners affable. The best known of his works are his botanic garden with philosophical notes, in two parts—the economy of vegetation—the loves of the plants, 2 vols. 8vo—zoonomia, or the laws of organic life, 8 vols. 8vo.—phytologia, or the philosophy of agriculture and gardening, 4to. He wrote besides, treatise on female education, 4to. &c. As a poet and a botanist, the name of Darwin is respectable, his verses display elegance, grace, and beauty, but they seldom rise to sublimity, and they please more by the easy flow of number, than by the fire of description. His graces are the tinsel of ornament, not the animated the fiery language of the muse. In his system he branches too much into the fields of fancy, and he seems delighted in informing his readers that his notions of religion were unprincipled. Ovid changed men into trees and plants; but Darwin transforms his flowers into human beings, and with all the feeling of carnal passion he describes the inhabitants of his parterre and of his green house, as conveying their amorous sighs, with all the art and coquetry of modern times.

DARWIN, Charles, son of Dr. Darwin, was born at Lichfield 1758, and educated at Christ's church, Oxford, and at Edinburgh, where he obtained the first prize medal from the Esculapian society, on the means of distinguishing pus from mucus. He wrote in Latin, an account of the retrograde motions of the absorbent vessels of animal bodies in some diseases, and he died 1778, at a time when his father promised himself much happiness from the exertions of his great abilities in the medical world.

DASSIER, John, medalliſt to the republic of Geneva, ſtruck a ſeries of the Engliſh kings, with a hope of procuring an eſtabliſhment in the Engliſh mint. His nephew, James Anthony, in 1740 was appointed ſecond engraver to the mint in London, but returned to Geneva five years after.

DASSOUCI, a French muſician and poet of the 17th century. He obtained celebrity by his buffoonery. He left Parisin 1655, and travelled through Lyons, where he was noticed by Moliere, and afterwards viſited Turin, and other places, where, by his wit, drollery, and artifices, he procured the patronage of the great. He died at the latter end of the 17th century. In 1674 he publiſhed two ſmall volumes, compoſed in the Chatelet priſon.

DATI, Carlo, a native of Florence, profeſſor of literature there. His works conſiſted of Italian poems on Lewis XIV. and other things. He proved in one of his tracts, that Maſſennus is not the inventor of the cycloid, but Galileo, and he alſo aſcribes great merit to Toricelli, for the explanation of the ſuſpenſion of quickſilver in a glaſs tube. His chief work, according to Boyle, is the life of four of the illuſtrious painters of ancient times, Zeuxis, Parrhaſius, Apelles, and Protogenes. Dati died 1675.

DAVAL, Peter, a barriſter of the Middle-temple. He tranſlated de Retz's memoirs, 1723, and died 1763, being then accomptant general to the court of chancery. His opinion on elliptical arches, at the time of building Black-friars-bridge, is recorded in the London-magazine, March 1760.

DAUBENTON, John Lewis Marie, an eminent anatomiſt, born at Montbard in Burgundy, 1716. He became the aſſociate of Buffon, in the preparation and the completion of his valuable natural hiſtory, and publiſhed beſides inſtruction for ſhepherds—a treatiſe on trees and ſhrubs—and many curious and intereſting memoirs on ſubjects of mineralogy—on the improvement of wool, &c. He died, 1799.

DAUBENTON, William, a Jeſuit of Auxerre, confeſſor to Philip V. of Spain. He enjoyed ſo much the royal confidence, that Philip entruſted him with his intention of abdicating the throne, a ſecret which the favorite diſcloſed to Orleans regent of France. He died of an apoplexy 1723, aged 75. He wrote ſome funeral orations, &c.

DAVENANT, John, biſhop of Saliſbury, was born in Watling-ſtreet, 1576. He was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, and in 1609 was elected lady Margaret's divinity profeſſor, and in 1614 was choſen maſter of his college. James I. ſent him to the ſynod of Dort 1618, and he was in 1621 raiſed to the ſee of Saliſbury. He incurred the king's diſpleaſure by treating in a diſcourſe on predeſtination. He died of a conſumption, 1641. He was very exemplary in his manners, but a ſtrong Calviniſt. He publiſhed an expoſition of the epiſtle to the Coloſſians—animadverſions on Hoard's treatiſes, &c.

DAVENANT, William, an Engliſh poet, born at Oxford 1605. As his father kept an inn there, and his mother was a great beauty, malevolence wantonly inſinuated that to Shakeſpeare, who generally ſtopped there on his road, our author was indebted for his life and his poetical talents. Young Davenant received his learning at Oxford, and entered at Lincoln college; but leaving the univerſity, he became page to the ducheſs of Richmond, and afterwards to lord Brooke. In 1628 he began to write plays. In conſequence of a criminal intercourſe with a black female in Axe-yard, Weſtminſter, he about this time loſt his noſe; but though diſfigured, and ridiculed for the adventure, he did not part with his merriment, or the cauſe of his diſgrace. In 1637 he ſucceeded Ben Jonſon as poet laureat, and for his attachment to the king's perſon he was charged with an attempt to ſeduce the army. He was bailed and immediately withdrew to France, and afterwards was knighted by the king, near Glouceſter, 1643. In the civil war he retired to France, where, probably to pleaſe the court, he changed his religion, and in conſequence of this he was ſent confidentially by the queen to perſuade Charles to give up the church, an intimation which highly diſpleaſed the king, who forbad Davenant ever to appear before him again. The queen afterwards employed him to tranſport ſome artificers to Virginia, but the ſhip was ſeized by the Engliſh cruizers, and Davenant threatened with death, from which the interference of Milton ſaved him. After two years' confinement in the tower he was liberated, and now began, as tragedies were conſidered as profane, to exhibit moral virtues in verſe, and to perform in recitative muſic. At the reſtoration he obtained a patent for acting plays in Lincoln's Inn fields. He died 1668, aged 63, and was interred in Weſtminſter-abbey, where theſe words record his name, "O rare ſir William Davenant." His works conſiſt of plays and poems, in which is the famous Gondibert, in which his favorite black is introduced.

DAVENANT, Charles, eldeſt ſon of the preceding, was born in 1656, and educated at Cheam, and Baliol college, Oxford. At the age of 19, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the acting of the only tragedy he wrote, Circe, at the duke of York's theatre. From the theatre he turned his thoughts to civil law. He ſerved for St. Ives in the parliament of 1685, afterwards for Great Bedwin. He was appointed by James II. to inſpect all plays, and preſerve the decorum of the ſtage, and he afterwards held the office of commiſſioner of exciſe, and laſtly that of inſpector general of exports and imports, till his death 1713. His knowledge of the conſtitution, and his great ſkill in figures, rendered him an able political and financial writer. His firſt political work was an eſſay upon upon the ways and means of ſupplying the war 1625, and he treated the ſubject in ſo maſterly a manner that whatever he afterwards wrote was ſought with avidity, and read with deference. His other works are all upon political and financial ſubjects.

Davenant, William, fourth ſon of ſir William, was educated at Magdalen-hall, Oxford. He tranſlated into Engliſh, la Mothe le Vayer's animadverſions on Greek and Latin hiſtorians. He was preſented to a living in Surrey. He viſited Paris, and was unfortunately drowned there as he was ſwimming for his diverſion in the ſummer of 1681.

Davenport, Chriſtopher, a learned Engliſhman, born 1598 at Coventry, where he received his education, and at Merton college, Oxford. Two years after he went to Douai and Ypres, where he changed his religion. He travelled into England under the name of Sancta Clara, and was chaplain to queen Henrietta. He was ſo active in making converts, that one of the articles of impeachment againſt Laud was his holding conferences with this dangerous franciſcan. During the civil wars he reſided ſometime abroad, and ſometime in London and Oxford, but after the reſtoration he was chaplain to Catharine of Portugal, Charles's queen, in England. He died 1680. He wrote paraphraſtica expoſitio articulorum confeſſionis Anglicæ, &c.

Davenport, John, elder brother to the preceding, was born at Coventry 1597, and entered at Merton college 1613. He was a moſt zealous puritan. He paſſed over to Amſterdam, where the miniſter of the Engliſh church, prevented his aſſociating with his congregation, a meaſure which produced a controverſy between the two divines. At the breaking out of the rebellion he returned to England, but ſoon after embarked for America, where he became miniſter of New-Haven. He died at Boſton 1669. He wrote ſermons —a catechiſm, &c.

David, king of Iſrael, was born at Bethlehem 1085 B.C. and anointed by Samuel, whilſt keeping the flocks of his father Jeſſe. His courage in killing Goliah, rendered him conſpicuous in Iſrael, but Saul grew jealous of his popularity, and purſued him to put him to death. Expelled from his country David wandered among the neighbouring nations, always reſpected for valor, and at the death of Saul, he was acknowledged king of Judah. After ſome time on the death of the ſon of Saul, who had been placed on his father's throne, David was received as ſole monarch by all the tribes of Iſrael, and his reign for 30 years was marked by proſperity, glory, and fame. He took Jeruſalem the city of the Jebuſites, which he called the city of David; but his reputation was ſtained by his adulterous intercourſe with Bathſheba, and his foul murder of Uriah her huſband. In a moment of arrogance too he cauſed the people to be numbered which was ſeverely puniſhed by the viſitation of a plague. His tranſgreſſions were alſo viſited by diſſentions in his own family, and by the revolt of his favorite ſon Abſalom. The death of this prince, ſlain by Joab, greatly affected him, and in his old age he reſigned the government to Solomon his ſon. David died aged 70 B.C. 1015, reſpected for benevolence, courage, and piety. The pſalms which he compoſed, in a ſtrain of great ſublimity and commanding eloquence, are proofs of his devotion as well as of his truſt in the Divine Providence.

David, Saint, the patron of Wales was a native of the province, and educated at Bangor in the 5th century. He founded ſeveral monaſteries in Wales. He governed the ſee of St. David's 65 years. The ſymbol of the leek attributed to him originates in the cuſtom of Cymhortha, ſtill obſerved among the farmers of the country, where in aſſiſting one another in ploughing their land, they bring each their leeks to the common repaſt.

David, George, a fanatic of Ghent, began in 1535 to preach as the true Meſſiah, the third David, the nephew of God. This ſtrange doctrine created followers and perſecution, and he fled to Frieſland, and afterwards to Baſil, where he died 1556. He propheſied that after three days he would riſe again, and at that time the magiſtrates of Baſil dug up his body, which together with his writings was burnt by the executioner.

David el David, a Perſian Jew, in the 12th century, who pretended to be the Meſſiah, and prevailed upon his countrymen to ſupport his impoſture. He was at laſt beheaded in the king's preſence.

David ab Gwilum, a celebrated Welſh bard. His poetry which poſſeſſed beauty, fire, and ſublimity was chiefly on ſubjects of love, and 147 of his poems were inſcribed to the fair Morvid his miſtreſs, who however proved unkind to his merits.

David I. king of Scotland, after Alexander the Fierce 1124, was brought up in England, and married Maud the grand niece of William the conqueror. After the death of the firſt Henry, he maintained with ſpirit the claims of the empreſs Maud to the Engliſh throne againſt Stephen, and entering England, he ſeized Carliſle which he retained. He died at Carliſle 1153.

David II. king of Scotland, was ſon of Robert Bruce. During the invaſion of his country by Baliol he was conveyed to France, but returned 1342. He was in 1346 taken priſoner by an Engliſh army, and ſent to the tower, from which, after 10 years, he was liberated on paying a heavy ranſom. He died 1371, aged 47.

Davidis, Francis, a Hungarian, who at various times embraced the tenets of the Roman catholics, the Lutherans, the Calviniſts, the Unitarians, &c. As he declared that no worſhip was due to Chriſt, he was accuſed of favoring favoring Judaism, and was thrown into prison, where he died 1579. He wrote some tracts on the millennium, &c.

Davies, sir John, a lawyer and poet, born at Chisgrove, Wilts 1570. He was of Queen's college Oxford, and then removed to the Middle temple. He was member of parliament in 1601, and on the queen's death went to congratulate James, who knowing his character received him with great cordiality. He was solicitor and attorney general to the king in Ireland, and also speaker of the Irish house, and on returning to England in 1612, he was made an English serjeant at law, afterwards one of the judges, and in 1626 lord chief justice of the king's bench. He died suddenly of an apoplexy before his installation. He was a man of great spirit, of extensive erudition, but more distinguished for wit and learning, than as an able lawyer. His nosce teipsum, on the nature and immortallity of the soul, a poem dedicated to queen Elizabeth, has gone through several editions. He wrote, besides, smaller poems, &c. His wife pretended to be a prophetess, and the sunday before her husband's death she suddenly burst into tears, which she declared to be his funeral tears. She died in London 1552. An account of her strange prophecies was published in 1649.

Davies, John, of Llanveres in Denbighshire, was educated at Ruthin school, and Jesus and Lincoln colleges Oxford. He became rector of Mallwyd and canon of St. Asaph. He was an excellent scholar, and well acquainted with the history and antiquities of his country. His works are—Antiquæ linguæ Britannicæ, nunc dictæ Cambro-Britannicæ, &c. rudimenta, 1621 8vo.—Dictionarium Latino-Britannicum folio, 1632.—Adagia Britannica, &c. He died 1644.

Davies, John, an eminent critic, born in London 1679. He was educated at the charter-house and Queen's college Cambridge. In 1711 he was made rector of Fen-ditton, near Cambridge, and prebendary of Ely, and 1717 chosen master of his college. He died 1732, aged 53. He was the learned editor of the works of Maximus Tyrius, Cæsar, Minucius Felix, Cicero's philosophical pieces, &c. Lactantius, &c.

Davies, John, a poet and writing master, educated at Oxford. He resided in Fleet-street. He wrote also the scourge of folly, in epigrams, and the anatomy of fair writing, a copy-book, &c. He died about 1618.

Davies, Samuel, an American dissenting clergyman, born at Newcastle, Delaware, 1724. He succeeded in 1759, as president of the college of New Jersey, and died 1761. He wrote sermons, 3 vols. 8vo. &c.

Davies, Thomas, a bookseller. He was at the university of Edinburgh, and in 1736 appeared as an actor at the Haymarket. He then commenced bookseller in Duke's court, and after strolling over the country he appeared in 1752 at Drury-lane. In 1762 he again commenced bookseller in Russel-street, and in 1778 became a bankrupt, but the friendship of Dr. Johnson, and a benefit at Drury-lane restored him to independence. In 1780 he published his life of Garrick, which improved his income. He also wrote memoirs of Henderson, of Massinger, of Dr. John Eachard, Lillo, sir John Davies, and dramatic miscellanies, 3 vols. besides some fugitive pieces, &c. He died 1785.

Davila, Henry Catherine, a celebrated historian, born at Cyprus, from which he fled when the island was subdued by the Turks 1571. He came to Avila in Spain, and then passed to France, where he became a favorite at the court of Henry III. On the death of the monarch he went to Venice, where he was honorably received. On his way to Verona, on the affairs of the Venetian republic, he was grossly insulted by a person who at last discharged a pistol at him, and wounded him mortally. The son of Davila, a youth of 18, revenged his death by cutting the assassin to pieces. During his residence at Venice, Davila wrote in Italian his history of the civil wars in France in 15 books, from 1559 to 1598. This history, considered by Bolingbroke as equal to Livy's annals, is highly esteemed for its authenticity, correctness, and the elegance of the composition.

Davila, Peter Francis, a famous Spanish naturalist. He died at Madrid, 1785.

Davis, Henry Edwards, a native of Windsor, educated at Ealing, Middlesex, and at Baliol college Oxford. In 1778 he wrote his examination of Gibbon's decline and fall of the Roman empire, a work which though the production of a young man was considered as so respectable, that of many attacks it was the only one which the historian deigned to answer. He died 1784, of a lingering illness, and left behind him a most respectable character for erudition, and goodness of heart.

Davis, John, a native of Sanbridge, Devonshire. He obtained in 1585, the command of some vessels to discover a north-west passage to the East Indies, and he gave his name to the streights which he visited, and the next year proceeded to the coast of Greenland, and as high as the 73d degree of north latitude. He was with Cavendish in 1591, in the South seas, and afterwards made five voyages to the East Indies. He was unfortunately killed on the shores of Malacca in a quarrel with some Japanese 1605.

Daun, Leopold count, a general born in 1705, and distinguished in the wars of Maria Theresa, and afterwards in the relief of Prague, &c. against the king of Prussia, whom he defeated in 1757, to commemorate which great victory the empress instituted the military order which bears her name. He again displayed his valor at Hochkirchen in 1758, and at the siege of Dresden, but he was totally defeated near Torgau, in 1760. He died at Vienna 1766 at the age of 61.

Daurat, John, a French poet, born near the head of the Vienne 1507. He became Greek Greek profeſſor at Paris, and evinced the ſuperiority of his powers of education, by the number of his ſcholars. He was careleſs of his affairs, and conſequently poor. Charles IX. made him his poet laureat. Daurat reſtored the cuſtom of writing anagrams, and ſo prolific was his muſe, that it is ſaid he wrote, in Greek and Latin not leſs than 50,000 verſes, beſides poems in French. He was a good critic; but fooliſhly employed the laſt years of his life in finding out the bible in Homer's verſes. He died at Paris 1588, aged 81.

Dawes, ſir William, an Engliſh prelate, born at Lyons near Braintree, Eſſex, 1671. From Merchant-taylors' ſchool he went to St. John's college, Oxford; and removed 2 years after to Cambridge, as nobleman of Catharine-hall. He was elected maſter of his college about 1696. King William gave him a prebend of Worceſter, and he was afterwards rector and dean of Bocking, Eſſex. On the acceſſion of queen Anne, he was made her chaplain; but a ſermon which he preached offended ſome of the miniſters, and the ſee of Lincoln, intended for him, was conferred on Wake, 1705. Two years after, the queen gave him Cheſter, and in 1714 he was tranſlated to York. He died of a diarrhœa, and an inflammation of the bowels, 1724. He publiſhed an anatomy of Atheiſm, a ſhort poem, 1663—the duties of the cloſet—ſermons preached on ſeveral occaſions, &c.

Dawes, Richard, the author of Miſcellanea Critica, was born in 1708, and educated under Anthony Blackwall, and then at Emanuel college, Cambridge. In 1736 he publiſhed a ſpecimen of a Greek tranſlation of paradiſe loſt. His attack upon Bentley is cenſured by Toup. He was elected maſter of Newcaſtle-upon-Tyne ſchool 1738, which he reſigned 11 years after, and died in 1766 at Heworth near Newcaſtle. His miſcellanea critica has been very learnedly edited by Burgeſs, Oxford, 1781.

Day, John, a printer, who had a ſhop in Alderſgate-ſtreet, and another at the weſt door at St. Paul's. He died 1584. His name deſerves to be commemorated as the printer of a bible dedicated to Edward VI. of Latimer's ſermons, of Tyndall's works, &c. and as a man whoſe great diligence in his profeſſion, widely diſſeminated knowledge, and advanced the progreſs of the reformation.

Day, Thomas, an eminent writer, born in London, 1748. His father's death left him an unprotected infant, but with an income of 1,200l. a year. From the Charter houſe, he entered at Corpus Chriſti, Oxford. He afterwards wiſhed to apply himſelf to the ſtudy of medicine, from which he was diſſuaded by Dr. Small of Birmingham, and he entered at the Middle temple, and was called to the bar, but never practiſed. In his opinions he was romantic, he had ſuch a deteſtation of female ſeduction, that he challenged, to no effect, a nobleman whom report deſcribed as a licentious violator of virgin innocence. In his ſchemes of viſionary perfection, he ſelected two girls from the poor houſe at Shrewſbury, with the intention of educating them after the principles of Rouſſeau, and of ſelecting one of them for his wife; but the conduct of the two young women did not anſwer his expectations, though he honorably performed his engagements, and preſented them with 500l. each, when married. In the American war, he embraced the part of the colonies, and publiſhed ſome political tracts, and two poems called, the devoted legions, and the deſolation of America. He married miſs Eſther Milnes, and retired to the enjoyment of domeſtic life, and of agricultural purſuits in Eſſex and Surrey. In 1786 he publiſhed a pamphlet againſt the encreaſe of taxes, and another concerning the bill for the exportation of wool. The work which has gained him celebrity, is his Sandford and Merton, in three vols. publiſhed ſeparately, for the information of youth, a compoſition of ſingular merit, which, to ſimplicity of diction, and intereſting anecdotes, unites reſpect for virtue, morality, and religion. In Sep. 1789, Mr. Day attempted, with more boldneſs than prudence, to ride a favorite untamed horſe, which by a ſudden plunge, threw off his rider, and by a violent kick on the head put an immediate end to his exiſtence. Mrs. Day heard the afflicting intelligence with horror, ſhe cloſed the curtains of her bed, and never again ſuffered the light of the ſun to viſit them, and two years after ſhe followed her huſband to the grave.

Deageant de St. Marcellin, Guichard, a French writer, employed as an able negociator by the court. When he became a widower, Lewis XIII. wiſhed to make him biſhop of Evreux, but he preferred a ſecond wife and politics. He was at laſt ſent in exile to Dauphiny, where he died 1639, in a good old age. He wrote ſome memoirs of ſtate, from the time of Henry IV. to the year 1624, containing curious particulars.

Deborah, a prophetess of Iſrael, who prevailed on Baruch to attack Siſera the general of Jabin. When her countryman obtained the victory, ſhe compoſed a beautiful ode, B.C. 1285.

Dechales, Claudius Francis Milliet, a mathematician and aſtronomer, born at Chamberry. He read public lectures at Paris, and afterwards taught navigation at Marſeilles, and died profeſſor of mathematics at Turin, 1678, aged 67. His works containing an edition of Euclid's elements—diſcourſes on fortification and navigation—architecture—optics, &c. were collected in three vols. folio.

Decker, or Deckher, John, a Jeſuit, born at Hazebruck, in Flanders, was profeſſor of theology at Douai and Louvain. He was ſent on an embaſſy into Nitria, and was made chancellor of Gratz univerſity, where he died 1619, aged 69. He wrote Velificatio ſeu theoremata de anno ortus ac mortis domini, 4to.—tabula chronographica, &c.

DECKER, Thomas, a poet, in the reign of James I. Ben Jonſon ridiculed him, in his Poetaſter, under the name of Criſpinus. Decker reſented the affront in his play of Satyromaſtix, where Jonſon, under the name of young Horace, is the hero; and ſo ſucceſsful was the poetic invective, that the play was univerſally followed. Decker wrote three of his plays in conjunction with Webſter, and one with Rowley and Ford; and though his abilities were not of a ſuperior degree, yet he was admired. The time of his death is unknown; he lived after 1638.

DEE, John, a mathematician, born in London 1527. He was educated at Chelmsford, and St. John's college, Cambridge, where, for three years, he ſays, he devoted each day 4 hours to ſleep, 2 to meals and exerciſe, and 18 to ſtudy. He went to the low countries in 1547, and on his return he was made fellow of Trinity college, juſt founded by Henry VIII. His attention to mathematical ſtudies, ſo cloſely connected with aſtronomy and aſtrology, brought upon him the ſuſpicion of magician; and he retired to Louvain, in 1548. In 1551 he viſited Paris, and read lectures on Euclid's elements; and that year returned to England, and was made rector of Upton-upon-Severn. In Mary's reign, he was arreſted on ſuſpicion of treaſon, and with difficulty ſet at liberty. Elizabeth flattered him with compliments; but the general belief of his being a conjurer was in the way of his promotion, and the books which he publiſhed countenanced the imputation, from their myſterious language. In 1564 he went to preſent a work to Maximilian; and, in 1571, the queen ſent two phyſicians to attend him when ſick at Louvain. On his return he ſettled at Mortlake, where he collected a library of above 4000 volumes; which, during his abſence in 1583, was plundered by the populace, who firmly believed that he had a familiar connection with the devil, by his magical incantations. The appearance of a new ſtar in 1572, and of a comet in 1577, gave him opportunities of diſtinguiſhing himſelf as an aſtronomer. In 1581, he began to penetrate more deeply into futurity, and launched forth into thoſe extravagancies in myſtery by which he pretended to holy intercourſe with departed ſpirits. He was then perſuaded by a Poliſh lord, who entertained the ſame notions of aſtrology, to paſs over to the continent, more ſecurely to indulge their myſterious incantations. After travelling through Germany, the conjurers reached Poland, and, after an introduction to the emperor Rodolph, and to Stephen king of Poland, Dee and his aſſociate Kelly were at laſt, after the exhibition of ſome magical tricks, baniſhed by the interference of the pope's nuncio. Elizabeth deſired Dee to return, and he came to England 1589, and a few days after was preſented to the queen, who received him graciouſly. Though powerful over ſupernatural agents, Dee was poor; but at laſt, by the interference of lady Warwick and Whitgift, he obtained the chancellorſhip of St. Paul's, and two years after, the wardenſhip of Mancheſter college. In 1604, he petitioned James that he might be tried, and that all aſperſions of magical incantations might be wiped away from his character; but the king diſregarded it; and Dee removed to Mortlake, where he began again to practiſe his myſterious arts. He died miſerably poor, in 1608, aged 80. The eldeſt of his ſons, Arthur, was brought up under Camden, and was phyſician to Charles I. His writings were very numerous.

DE FOE, Daniel, was born in the pariſh of St. Giles' Cripplegate, about 1668, where his father, James Foe, was a butcher. He was educated among the diſſenters, and he probably prefixed De to his name to conceal the obſcurity of his origin. He publiſhed 1680, a pamphlet on the conteſt between the Turks and Auſtrians, and in 1683 he followed the fortunes of Monmouth, and eſcaped the ſanguinary graſp of Jeffries. He became a liveryman of London 1688, and favored the revolution. About this time he was a hoſier, though he afterwards denied the occupation; and in 1692 he was ſo reduced, that he fled from his creditors, though he afterwards honorably diſcharged part of his debts. Though offered a commercial ſituation at Cadiz, he determined to live by his pen. In 1695 he was made accountant to the commiſſioners of the glaſs duty, in which he continued till the ſuppreſſion of the tax in 1699. He publiſhed various pamphlets, one of which, his "true born Engliſhman," a ſatire, in verſe, in defence of the revolution, recommended him to William. His "ſhorteſt way with the diſſenters," in 1702, reflecting on the government and the church, was noticed by the commons, and he was ſentenced to ſtand in the pillory, to be fined, and impriſoned. He was liberated from his confinement in 1704, by the friendſhip of Harley and of Godolphin, and retired to St. Edmundſbury. In 1706 he produced ſome eſſays to remove the prejudices of the Scotch againſt the union; and for his ſervices, he was ſent by Godolphin to Edinburgh to conſer on the ſubject with the leading men in Scotland. Upon the concluſion of the union, he was rewarded for his ſervices, and two years after, he publiſhed the hiſtory of the union, in a manner ſo ſatisfactory, that, in 1786, the ſame pamphlet was republiſhed, when the Iriſh union was projected. In 1713 he was for ſome of his publications proſecuted, but liberated from Newgate by the influence of Oxford. He was ſo neglected on the acceſſion of the houſe of Hanover, that he publiſhed his appeal to honor and juſtice, the laſt of his tracts, as he was ſeized with an apoplexy before the work was finiſhed. In 1715 he wrote the family inſtructor; and in April 1719 appeared the firſt part, and Auguſt following the ſecond part of Robinſon Cruſoe; a work which, though abuſed by ſome of his contemporaries, has ſurvived by its merit the malevolence of criticiſm, and ſtands now as the moſt lasting monument of the literary merits of the author. It is ſaid that this intereſting book was diſhoneſtly borrowed from the papers of Alexander Selkirk, a Scotſman, who lived four years and four months in an uninhabited iſland, till relieved by Captain Wood Rogers in 1709. Selkirk's adventures appeared before the public in the captain's voyage; and though the idea of a man thrown upon a deſert iſland might be borrowed from Selkirk's adventures, yet the reſt of the ſtory evidently belongs to the genius and ſuperſtructure of De Foe. This reſpectable writer died at his houſe at Iſlington 1731.

DELANY, Patrick, a divine, born in Ireland about 1686. His father was originally a ſervant in the family of ſir John Rennel, the judge. Young Delany was brought up as ſizar at Trinity college, Dublin. He formed an intimate acquaintance with dean Swift, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a popular preacher. Lord Carteret, in 1727, preſented him to the chancellorſhip of Chriſt-church, and a prebend in the cathedral of St. Patrick. In 1729 he began the periodical paper called the Tribune, continued to 20 numbers; and in 1731 he came to London, to publiſh his "revelation examined with candor," a work to which he added 2 volumes, and which was univerſally admired. When in London, he married Mrs. Margaret Teniſon, a rich Iriſh widow, who died 1741. In 1738 he publiſhed his "reflections upon polygamy," a curious work, which was followed, in 1740 and 1742, with an hiſtorical account of the life of David king of Iſrael, in 3 vols. In 1743, he took for his ſecond wife the widow of Alexander Pendarves, a woman of great excellence, and the following year he was raiſed to the deanery of Down. The moſt conſiderable of his productions after he became dean, was his "remarks on the life of Swift by lord Orrery." This publication ſet in fairer colors the character of Swift. Beſides theſe, he publiſhed ſermons, and ſome theological tracts. He died at Bath, 1768, in the 83d year of his age. Dr. Delany was remarkable, not more for his learning, than for his benevolence and hoſpitality.

DELANY, Mary, ſecond wife of Dr. Delany, was daughter of Bernard Granville, afterwards lord Lanſdowne, and was born at Coulton, Wilts, 1700. When 17, ſhe was influenced by her relations, againſt her inclinations, to marry Mr. Pendarves, a gentleman of great property, but much advanced in life; but though ſhe lived unhappy, her time was devoted to the cultivation of her mind, naturally vigorous and eager after improvement. In 1724 ſhe became a widow, and then reſided chiefly in London. She married, in 1743, Dr. Delany, whom ſhe had long known as the friend of dean Swift, and with him ſhe became the happieſt of wives, till his death in 1768. She wiſhed afterwards to ſettle at Bath, but the ducheſs of Portland who loved her virtues, inſiſted upon her living with her at Bulſtrode, and ſhe continued there ſome years. On the death of the ducheſs, the king aſſigned Mrs. Delany a houſe, ready furniſhed, in St. Alban's-ſtreet, Windſor, and granted her a penſion of 300l. a year which ſhe enjoyed till her death, 1788, at the advanced age of nearly 88. Mrs. Delany is well known for her ſpirited correſpondence with ſome of the learned of the times, but particularly for her great ſkill in drawing and painting. Her pieces, which are taſtefully executed, adorn the manſions of her relations, as well as her works in embroidery and in meils. She is alſo known for inventing, at the age of 74, an ingenious Flora, by the taſteful application of colored papers together, ſkilfully cut with ſciſſars, and ſo delicately diſpoſed upon black ground, as to imitate and almoſt equal the works of nature. In this elegant accompliſhment ſhe engaged till her 83d year, when her ſight began to fail; and not leſs than 980 plants were exhibited in her beautiful Flora.

DELAUNE, Thomas, a nonconformiſt, who, in 1683, wrote an anſwer to Calamy's diſcourſe concerning a ſcrupulous conſcience. His "plea for nonconformity," gave ſuch offence, that he was tried, and ſentenced to pay a heavy fine; which as he could not do, he died in priſon.

DELFT, Jacob, a portrait painter of Delft, who died 1661, aged 42. He was grandſon of Mirevelt, whom he rivalled.

DELOBEL, a painter, of the 17th century. His pieces, in a very ſuperior ſtile, adorn chiefly the churches and cathedrals of France.

DE LOLME, John Lewis, L. L. D. a native of Geneva, who for ſome years reſided in England. In the latter part of life he retired to the continent, and died in Switzerland 1807. He was in his character a man of information, witty in his converſation, temperate in his living, but in his perſon little attentive to the graces of outward appearance. He is author of parallel between the Engliſh conſtitution and the former government of Sweden, 1772—treatiſe on the conſtitution of England, 1775, a work of ſingular merit, often reprinted—eſſay on the union of Scotland with England, 1787—memorials of human ſuperſtition, &c.

DELRIO, Martin Anthony, a Jeſuit, born at Antwerp, of Spaniſh parents, 1551. He ſtudied at Paris, Douai, and Louvain. He became a counſellor of the parliament of Brabant, and entered the Jeſuits' order at Valladolid. He taught belles letters at Liege, Mayence, Gratz, and Salamanca, and died at Louvain, 1608. Beſides notes on Seneca, Claudian, and Solinus, he wrote explications of difficult paſſages in ſcripture—commentaries on the old teſtament, &c.

DEMETRIUS, czar of Ruſſia, is by ſome hiſtorians called the falſe Demetrius, and regarded as an obſcure native of Jaroſlaw, who was inſtructed to aſſume the character of the real Demetrius, who, it is ſaid, had been murdered. The adventurer, whether the prince or pretender, invaded Ruſſia with a ſmall army in 1604, and ſeated himſelf on the throne. After a ſhort reign of eleven months, he was aſſaſſinated, 1606.

DE MISSY, Cæſar, a divine, born at Berlin 1703. He ſtudied at Berlin and Frankfort on the Oder; and came to London, where he was ordained to the Savoy chapel, and in 1762, named by the biſhop of London, French chaplain to the king. He died 1775. He publiſhed ſome poetical pieces—eſſays on profane and ſacred literature—epitomes of books, memoires, &c. He aſſiſted Weſtein, in his edition of the Greek teſtament, and Jortin in his life of Eraſmus.

DEMOIVRE, Abraham, a mathematician, born at Vitri, Champagne, 1667. He left France at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and came to England, where he made himſelf maſter of mathematics. He was member of the royal ſociety in London, &c. and died in London 1754. His works ſhow ſuperior learning, and great application. He publiſhed miſcellanea analytica, 4to.—a treatiſe on annuities—and his great work, "doctrines of chances," in 1718, 4to. twice reprinted.

DEMOURS, Peter, of Marſeilles, known as a phyſician, and for the dexterity of his ſurgical operations, and his great ſkill as an oculiſt, died at Paris, 1795, aged 93, author of ſome reſpectable works on his profeſſion.

DEMPSTER, William, a Scotſman, born in the ſhire of Angus, 1490, and educated at St. Andrews, from whence he went to Paris, and was employed by the univerſity there to refute the books of Raymond Lully, who had impugned Ariſtotle's philoſophy. He returned to Scotland, of which he publiſhed an eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, in which he magnifies common events into miracles. He died at Paris 1557.

DEMPSTER, Thomas, a native of Scotland, who ſtudied at Paris, and there taught claſſical learning. His ſeverities to his pupils rendered him unpopular, and he returned to Scotland. He afterwards went to Piſa, and there read lectures on polite learning in various univerſities, and obtained a profeſſor's chair at Niſmes, from whence he retired to Bologna, where he died 1625. He wrote commentaries on Roſinus' Roman antiquities, and on Claudian—four books of epiſtles—dramatic pieces and poems—a martyrology of Scotland—a liſt of Scottiſh writers, &c. He was a man of aſtoniſhing memory, ſo that he was properly called a living library. He never ſtudied leſs than 14 hours daily, but he wanted diſcrimination. He was ſo partial to his country, that he attributed to the natives of it, nearly all the books which Engliſh, Welch, and Iriſh authors had compoſed.

DENHAM, ſir John, an Engliſh poet, born in Dublin 1615, ſon of the chief baron of the exchequer in Ireland. He was educated in London, and in 1631, entered at Trinity college, Oxford. He was ſo addicted to gaming and diſſipation, that his father not only augured the moſt fatal conſequences, but threatened to diſinherit him. In 1641, three years after the death of his father, he publiſhed his tragedy of 'Sophy," which, ſays Waller, broke out like the Iriſh rebellion threeſcore thouſand ſtrong, when nobody was aware of it. Soon after, he was ſheriff of Surrey, and governor of Farnham caſtle, and came to the king at Oxford, where in 1641, he publiſhed his "Cooper's hill," a poem, ſays Dryden, which for majeſty of ſtyle is and ever will be the ſtandard of good writing. His attachment to the royal cauſe during the civil wars enſured him the confidence of the queen, and he afterwards went ambaſſador with lord Croft from Charles II. to Poland. Returning to England, he found his eſtates reduced in conſequence of his former habits of gaming, and the perſecutions of the civil war. At the reſtoration he was made ſurveyor general to the king's buildings, and at the coronation he was created K. B. In the latter part of life, in conſequence of ſome domeſtic differences on his ſecond marriage, he unfortunately loſt his ſenſes, which he however recovered. He wrote ſome verſes on Cowley's death, and ſoon followed him to the grave. He died 1668, and was buried in Weſtminſter-abbey near the remains of Chaucer, Spenſer, and Cowley. His poems are above twenty in number, containing beſides the Sophy and Cooper's hill, the deſtruction of Troy, and Cato Major. Denham, as Johnſon has obſerved, is deſervedly conſidered as one of the fathers of Engliſh poetry. Cooper's hill is the work that confers upon him the rank and dignity of an original author. He ſeems to have been the author of a ſpecies of compoſition that may be denominated local poetry, of which the fundamental ſubject is ſome particular landſcape to be poetically deſcribed, with the addition of ſome embelliſhments as may be ſupplied by hiſtorical retroſpections or incidental meditations. He is one of thoſe who improved our taſte and advanced our language, and whom we ought therefore to read with gratitude, though having done much, he left much to do.

DENNER, Balthaſar, a portrait painter, born at Hamburgh 1685. He was offered, in London, for his excellent portrait of an old woman, 500 guineas. He died 1747.

DENNIS, John, an Engliſh critic, born in London 1657, and educated at Harrow and Caius college, Cambridge. He was expelled for attempting to ſtab a perſon in the dark, upon which he travelled on the continent, and at his return ſet up for a man of faſhion and of wit. He began his literary career as early as 1690, and continued to write till his death in 1733. His temper was so violent, and his pride and suspicions so great, that his life was a continual scene of tumult and quarrel. He wrote a pindaric ode on William's victory at Aghrim, and also honored the death of that monarch and that of his queen with poetical incense. In 1704 came out his favorite tragedy "Liberty asserted," in which he used such violent language against the French nation, that in the pride of self-consequence he persuaded himself peace could never be re-established without his being delivered up to the enemy. With this idea, he applied to the duke of Marlborough for protection, who declared to the alarmed poet that he thought, without being terrified, his own case as desperate, as he had done the French almost as much mischief as Mr. Dennis himself. This singular character is said on another occasion to have been walking near the sea in Sussex, and that at the sudden sight of a ship sailing as he imagined towards him, he decamped in the greatest hurry, calling the friend with whom he was a traitor for conspiring to deliver his person up to the French. His poems on the battles of Blenheim and Ramillies gained him the friendship of the victorious hero, who presented him with 100l. and procured him an appointment in the customs worth 120l. per annum. He wrote some prose pieces, especially priestcraft dangerous, &c. against Sacheverell's political union, and some reflections on Pope's essay on criticism, and Addison's Cato. This occasioned a curious pamphlet called the narrative of Dr. Robert Norris, concerning the deplorable frenzy of Mr. John Dennis, and drew upon him the satirist's resentment, and entitled him to a place in the Dunciad. Though now disregarded as a writer and a critic, he was esteemed in his day, but it was observed by a wit that Dennis was the fittest man to instruct a dramatic writer, for he laid down rules for good plays, and showed him what were bad by his own.

DENNY, sir Anthony, a favorite of Henry VIII. born at Chesshunt, and educated at St. Paul's school and St. John's college, Cambridge. He became gentleman of the bed chamber and a privy counsellor. He was also knighted, and in the general plunder of the church, he received very large grants of land in Hertfordshire. When Henry was on his death-bed, sir Anthony alone had the courage to approach him, to remind him of his situation, and to exhort him to devote the few moments of life to the momentous concerns of religion. The king made him one of the executors of his will, and of the counsellors of his successor, and gave him a legacy of 300l. Sir Anthony was a man of great piety as well as learning. He died 1550.

DENTON, John, an English divine, educated at Clare-hall, Cambridge, and ejected for nonconformity from Oswald Kirk, Yorkshire, in 1662. He afterwards conformed and was presented to Stonegrave, and a prebend of York, which he held till his death, 1708, in his 83d year. He published some sermons and religious tracts.

DENTRECOLLES, Francis Xavier, a Jesuit, of Lyons, who went to China as missionary with Parrennin, and died there 1741, aged 77. He wrote several works in the Chinese language to recommend the christian religion to the disciples of Confucius, &c.

DEPARCIEUX, Anthony, a mathematician, who wrote a treatise on trigonometry, 4to.—essays on the probabilities of the duration of human life, 4to. a valuable work—memoir on the inundations of the Seine, &c. He died 1768, aged 65.

DERBY, James Stanley earl of, an English nobleman, celebrated during the civil wars. With only 600 horse he defended himself at Wigan against 3000 horse and foot, but when taken at Worcester, he was basely beheaded, though promised pardon, 1651. His widow imitating his conduct, bravely defended Latham house, and retired to the isle of Man, where she defied her enemies. She was the last who submitted to the regicides.

DERING, Edward, an eminent divine, born in Kent, fellow of Christ's college, Cambridge. He was preacher at St. Paul's, London. He died 1576, much respected for his piety as well as learning. He wrote sermons —lectures on the epistle to the Hebrews, &c.

DERHAM, William, a philosopher and divine, born at Stoughton near Worcester, 1657, and educated at Blockley, and Trinity college, Oxford. He was presented in 1682 to Wargrave vicarage, Berks, and in 1689 to Upminster rectory, Essex. In 1716 he was made canon of Windsor, and the university of Oxford in 1730 granted him the degree of D D. for his services in the cause of science. This good man, always employed in the labors of philosophy, humanity, and religion, died 1735, aged 78. His publications are not less than 40, on philosophical subjects. The best known are his physico-theology, 16 discourses preached at Boyle's institution 1711 and 12, and in 1714 his astro-theology, and in 1730 his christo theology, to prove the divine origin of christianity, besides the artificial clock-maker, an ingenious book, the fourth edition of which was published 1734.

DERING, sir Edward, a native of Kent, very violent in parliament, where he brought in a bill for the abolition of bishops, deans, and chapters. Afterwards he espoused the royal cause, which he supported with a troop of horse at his own expence. He was a great sufferer in the civil wars, and died before the restoration. His speeches were published in 4to.

DERRICK, Samuel, a linen-draper of Dublin, who in 1751 came to London as a literary character. He attempted the character of Gloucester in Jane Shore, but with such ill success that it was never repeated. After this he subsisted by pamphlet writing, but his extravagance travagance led him into difficulties. He was on Beau Nash's death appointed in his place master of the ceremonies at Bath and Tunbridge, but ill conduct prevented indepengence, and he died poor 1769, aged 45. He translated among other things Sylla, a dramatic entertainment by the king of Prussia.

Desaguliers, John Theophilus, son of a protestant minister at Rochelle, where he was born 1683, and which he left at the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He was educated at Christ church, Oxford, and succeeded Dr. Keil as lecturer on experimental philosophy. He was the first who introduced the reading of lectures in London, where he had for his audience not only the learned, but also the royal family. The duke of Chandos gave him the living of Edgware, and he afterwards became chaplain to the prince of Wales, and had a valuable living in Essex. In the latter part of life, he had lodgings under the Piazzas, Covent-garden, where his lectures were continued till his death 1749. He was member of several foreign academies, and published a course of experimental philosophy, 2 vols. 4to. 1734.—Gravesande's mathematical elements of natural philosophy, &c.

Desaix, Lewis Charles Anthony, a French general, born near Riom 1768. At the revolution he assisted Custine as his aid-de-camp, and was wounded in the cheek at the battle of Lauterburg, but disregarding the pain, he boldly rallied the yielding battalions to the fight. He was general of division under Moreau, in his glorious retreat from the Danube; and afterwards he drove the Germans from the Rhine, and at the battle of Radstadt obliged the archduke Charles to retreat. He attended Bonaparte into Egypt, and there displayed the same presence of mind and bravery, and after dispersing the Arabs, and the forces of the beys, he was named commander of Upper Egypt. After Bonaparte's retreat from Egypt, he signed the treaty of El-arisch with the English and the Turks, and returned to Europe, but was detained by lord Keith. When set at liberty he hastened to France, and found Bonaparte advancing into Italy. His happy arrival, after a severe march of thirty miles, with a fresh squadron, gave the decision to the battle of Marengo, but at the moment of victory he received a fatal shot in the breast and immediately expired, 1800.

Desault, Peter, of Arsac, was distinguished as a physician. He treatise on the venereal disease, and the method of curing it, was much admired, and also that on the stone in the kidneys and the bladder. He died at Bourdeaux 1737, aged 62.

Desault, Peter Joseph, a French surgeon, whose journal de chirurgie was translated into English by Gosling. He died 1795, aged 46, not without suspicion of being poisoned for his attendance on the unfortunate Lewis XVII. It is remarkable that his successors, Clopart and Doublet, died within four days after. He had been much esteemed as professor of anatomy at Paris, where 300 pupils together attended his lectures.

Des Barreaux, James de Vallee lord, was brought up by the Jesuits, who in vain endeavoured to gain him over to their society, and he afterwards became counsellor in the parliament of Paris. He exposed himself to the resentment of Richelieu, by refusing to yield a favorite mistress to the hoary libertine. Reflecting at last upon his vices, he gave himself up to serious meditation and to penitence. He retired to the pure air of Chalon on the Soan, where, after an exemplary close of life, he died 1647. Some time before his death, he wrote the famous sonnet so full of contrition, "grand Dieu, tes jugemens," &c. He was author of some poems in Latin, and also in French, and of some popular songs, &c.

Desbillons, Francis Joseph, a French Jesuit, 1711. After reading lectures at Caen, Nevers, la Fleche, and Bourges, he came to Paris. At the abolition of his order 1762, he retired to Manheim, where he published his fables, 530 in number, divided into 15 books, in two vols. He also published an edition of Phædrus, and wrote some Latin poems, &c. He died 1788, aged 78.

Desbois, Francis Alexander, author of a military dictionary, 3 vols. 8vo.—a dictionary of agriculture, 2 vols. 8vo.—a dictionary of animals, 4 vols. 8vo. &c. died at Paris 1784, aged 85.

Des Cartes, René, a French philosopher. Vid. Cartes.

Desericius or Deseritz, Joseph Innocent, a native of Hungary, ambassador to the hospodar of Wallachia from Benedict XIV. He died 1765, aged 63. He wrote pro cultu literarum in Hungaria & vindicatio, 4to. &c.

Desgodets, Anthony, of Paris, was an eminent architect. Going to Rome in 1674, he was captured by the Algerines, and remained 16 months in slavery. He composed at Rome, "the ancient edifices of Rome drawn and measured with exactness," fol. 1682. He was comptroller of the royal buildings at Paris and architect to the king. He died 1728, aged 75.

Deshais, John Baptist Henry, a French painter, born at Rouen 1729. He visited Rome for improvement. The superior merit of his pictures promised the noblest monuments of genius to adorn the French school, but he unfortunately died 1765. The most celebrated of his pieces are the marriage of the Virgin, the resurrection of Lazarus, Potiphar's wife and Joseph, the combat of Achilles and Xanthus, Jupiter and Antiope, Artemisia at her husband's tomb, &c.

Desiderius or Didier, last king of Lombardy, 756. His invasion of the papal dominions was resisted by Charlemagne, and Didier was made prisoner and died in France.

Desmahis, John Francis Edward de Cor-

fambleu, a French writer, who died 1761, aged 38. He was a man of great abilities. He uſed to ſay, "When my friend laughs, it is his buſineſs to inform me of the cauſe of his joys; but when he weeps, it is mine to diſcover the ſources of his grief." He wrote the popular comedy of the "impertinent," and miſcellaneous works, and in his pieces diſplayed eaſe and elegance.

DES MAIZEAUX, Peter, a biographer, born at Auvergne 1666, where his father was a proteſtant miniſter. He came to England, and was elected ſecretary to the royal ſociety. He died 1745. He edited the works of St. Evremond, 3 vols. 4to. and alſo publiſhed the life of Bayle, prefixed to his dictionary. He aſſiſted in the general hiſtorical dictionary, 10 vols. fol, and in other works, &c.

DESMARES, Touſſaint, a prieſt, of Vire, in Normandy. He defended the Janſeniſts before pope Innocent X. and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſermons. Perſecuted for his opinions, he was protected by the duke of Liancourt, at whoſe houſe he ended his days, 1687, aged 87. He wrote the necrologe de port royal, &c.

DESMARETS, Nicholas, nephew of Colbert, and miniſter of ſtate under Lewis XIV. died 1721. He publiſhed a curious account of his adminiſtration.

DESMOLETS, Peter Nicholas, an eccleſiaſtic, of Paris. He edited Lamy's treatiſe de tabernaculo fœderis, &c.—Ponget's inſtitutiones, 2 vols. fol.—and continued Sallengre's memoires of literature, 11 vols. 12mo. He died 1760, aged 83.

DESMOULINS, Benedict Camille, a native of Guiſe in Picardy, known for his zeal at the taking of the Baſtile, and in the demolition of the monarchy. He was one of the founders of the Jacobin club, and he had a ſhare in the atrocities of the 20th of June and the 10th of Auguſt 1792. Robeſpierre marked him for ſlaughter when he defended Orleans, and talked of a committee of clemency. When ſeized in the night, he opened his windows to call in vain for help againſt the tyrants, and with Young's night thoughts, and Harvey's meditations in his hand, he was dragged to priſon, and immediately after to the ſcaffold, 1794. His writings were periodical—the revolutions of France and Brabant—the hiſtory of the Briſſotins—the Vieux Cordelier. His wife wiſhing to ſhare his fate, followed him ten days after to the ſcaffold. When aſked his age by the bloody tribunal, he anſwered, "My age is that of Jeſus Chriſt when he ſuffered death," 33.

D'ESPAGNE, John, miniſter of a French congregation at Durham houſe, Strand, died about 1660. He was admired as a preacher, and ſeveral of his works on theology have been tranſlated into Engliſh.

DESPARD, Edward Marcus, a native of Queen's county in Ireland. He was employed in the Weſt Indies, on the Spaniſh main, and in the bay of Honduras, as ſuperintendant of the Engliſh colony. His conduct gave offence to the ſettlers, and he was recalled home 1790; and when he applied to government to inveſtigate his adminiſtration his repreſentations were rejected. This rendered him a diſaffected ſubject, and at the French revolution he warmly embraced the new doctrines. He was ſeized under the ſuſpenſion of the habeas corpus, and confined in ſeveral priſons, but when liberated, paſt misfortunes had made no impreſſion upon him, he formed the plan of ſeducing the ſoldiery, and in ſecret committees it was agitated to aſſaſſinate the king, as he proceeded to parliament. This deſign was diſcovered by ſome of the accomplices, and Deſpard and his aſſociates were ſeized, and tried in Southwark, 1803, and on an impartial trial, his guilt was found too evident to deſerve pardon. He ſuffered on the 21ſt March with nine others, and without contrition, ſorrow, or concern, met his fate.

DESPAUTERE, John, a Flemiſh grammarian, born at Ninove, died at Comines 1520. He had the uſe of only one eye. His works were chiefly grammatical, and in great vogue at one time.

DESPLACES, a French engraver, who died 1749. His beſt pieces were the ſoldier holding a dagger at Aſtyanax in his mother's arms, his deſcent from the croſs, and his rape of Helen.

DESPORTES, Claude, a painter, of Champagne, who died at Paris 1743, aged 82. His beſt pieces were preſerved at Marly. He excelled in groteſque figures, and in animals, flowers, fruits, &c.

DESTOUCHES, Andrew, a Frenchman, who went to Siam, and abandoned the profeſſion of a ſoldier for that of muſician. By the mere powers of genius he produced his Iſſe, an opera, which ſo highly pleaſed the French king, that he gave him 200 louis. Afterwards he ſtudied the rules of muſical compoſition, but his other pieces were never equal to Iſſe. He died 1749.

DESTOUCHES, Philip Nericaut, a French dramatic writer, born at Tours, and educated at Paris. He was a negociator in Switzerland, and in London. The death of the regent ſhattered his hopes of future preferment and reward, and he retired near Melun, where he forgot the ingratitude of the court in the cultivation of the muſes and of agriculture. He died 1754. His works were publiſhed by his ſon, 4 vols. 1757, and 10 vols. 12mo. Though devoid of the gaiety of Regnard, and the ſtrong touches of Moliere, he commands attention by his intereſting ſcenes, and his tender delineations of nature. His Philoſophe Marié, and his Glorieux, a comedy, rank next to the compoſitions of Voltaire.

DEVAUX, John, a native of Paris, eſteemed as a ſurgeon, and author of a treatiſe on preſerving health by inſtinct, and other works, died 1729, aged 80.

DEVEREUX,

DEVEREUX, Robert, earl of Eſſex, the favorite of Elizabeth, was born 1567, at Netherwood, Herefordſhire, and was educated at Cambridge. His firſt appearance at court was in his 17th year, and in 1585 he accompanied Leiceſter to Holland, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the battle of Zutphen. He was maſter of the horſe, and at the aſſembling of an army at Tilbury fort againſt the Spaniſh invaſion, he was declared general under Leiceſter, and ſoon after made knight of the garter. He diſputed for the queen's favor with the earl of Devonſhire, who wounded him in the knee. In 1589 he went in the expedition to replace Antonio on the throne of Portugal. His private marriage with the widow of Sidney, daughter of Walſingham, diſpleaſed the queen, and his unſucceſsful expedition to aſſiſt Henry IV. of France, and his quarrel with Burleigh about the Spaniſh war, tended to ſhow the violence of his temper and the ambition of his heart. After the death of that ſtateſman, Eſſex found that he had loſt a valuable friend. When a conſultation took place about appointing a viceroy in Ireland, the queen recommended ſir William Knollis, and Eſſex ſir George Carew, and when the favorite ſaw his miſtreſs unwilling to yield to his perſuaſion, he contemptuouſly turned his back upon her. Elizabeth reſented this by giving him a box on the ear, upon which he placed his hand on his ſword, ſwearing he would not take ſuch an affront even from her father. The courtiers interfered, and he left the palace with unſubdued indignation. His friends prevailed upon him to make conceſſions, and he was apparently reconciled to Elizabeth, and ſent over to Ireland. The ill ſucceſs of his miniſtry there encouraged his opponents, who perſuaded the queen to levy an army to counteract the rebellious ſchemes of Eſſex. Eſſex heard of their plans, and coming ſuddenly over to England, he was received with cordiality, but ſoon after ſtripped of all his honors. Thus diſgraced, he wiſhed to reſtore himſelf to the queen's partiality by force, but though he diſapproved violent meaſures, he could not refrain ſaying the queen grew old and cankered, and that her mind was as crooked as her carcaſe. The raſh words were reported to the queen, and Eſſex was ſummoned to appear before the council, but he conceived his perſon in danger, and prepared to reſiſt. After an unavailing ſtruggle, and ſome blood ſhed, he ſurrendered and was conveyed to the tower. He was arraigned on the 19th February 1601, and condemned to loſe his head, and his execution took place on the 25th. He was in perſon tall, but careleſs in his dreſs. He was learned, and protected and encouraged learned men. Warm in his friendſhips, and ſound, except in few inſtances, in his morals, he was a good proteſtant. It is remarkable that his execution took place not without ſtruggle in the queen's affections. In the days of their friendſhip, ſhe had given him a ring with promiſes that it would reſtore him to her favor, and therefore ſhe ſacrificed the man who ſo proudly refuſed to purchaſe at ſo little a price her pardon. The fatal ring indeed was ſent by Eſſex, but lady Howard the bearer refuſed to deliver it, and on her death-bed ſhe revealed to the queen her ill conduct. The queen heard the dreadful tale, ſhe retired overwhelmed with grief, and a few weeks after expired.

DEVEREUX, Robert, earl of Eſſex, ſon of Elizabeth's favorite, was born 1592, and educated at Merton college, Oxford. His marriage with lord Suffolk's daughter was very unfortunate, for the lady accuſed him of impotency, and obtained a divorce to marry her favorite Carr earl of Somerſet. Eſſex ſerved in the Palatinate, and in Holland, and on his return was a violent oppoſer of the meaſures of government. During the civil wars he headed the parliamentary army, faced the king's forces at Edgehill, and at the firſt battle of Newbury, and after reducing Reading and relieving Glouceſter, he in 1644 returned to the weſt of England. Unſucceſsful againſt the king's troops, he owed his ſafety to flight by ſea from Cornwall. In 1645 the parliament, jealous of his power, deprived him of his office by the ſelf-denying ordinance, and the next year he died at Eſſex houſe in the Strand.

D'EWES, ſir Symonds, an Engliſh hiſtorian and antiquarian, born in 1602, at Coxden, Dorſetſhire. In 1618 he entered at St. John's college, Cambridge, and two years after began his collection of materials for an hiſtory of England. His learning recommended him to the notice of the moſt diſtinguiſhed characters of the times, of Spelman, Selden, and others. His great work was finiſhed when he attained his 30th year, but he did not publiſh it, and it appeared afterwards under the title of Journals of all the parliaments during the reign of Elizabeth, &c. He was ſheriff for Suffolk, and was knighted, and in 1641 was made baronet; but he notwithſtanding embraced the cauſe of the parliament. He ſat in the houſe till 1648, when he was ejected for ſuppoſed attachment to the king. He died 1650.

DE WITT, John, the famous penſionary of Holland, was born at Dort in 1625, and educated there. At the age of 23, he publiſhed his "Elementa curvarum linearum," a work diſplaying the deepeſt knowledge of mathematics. After taking the degree of L.L.D. and travelling for ſome time, he was made penſionary of his native town. He oppoſed the war between England and his country, and when raiſed to the high office of penſionary of Holland, he ſent ambaſſadors to Cromwell to negociate a peace. A pacification took place, but the ſecret article to exclude the family of Orange from the ſtadtholderſhip brought odium on De Witt's adminiſtration. Notwithſtanding the clamors of his enemies, and the invectives of the clergy, he ſubdued oppoſition by his firmneſs, and he was unanimouſly re-elected by the ſtates, 1663. When war was declared againſt England, De Witt exerted his power to make the naval armaments reſpectable, and after Opdam's defeat, he was one of thoſe named to preſide over the fleet. Whilſt the commanders conſidered it impoſſible to ſail but with only 10 points of the compaſs, he by mathematical calculation, convinced them that only four points were againſt them, and 28 for them, and in conſequence of this, the ſhips were ſafely conveyed from the Texel through a paſſage ſince that time called De Wirt's diep. Of this affair, and ſucceeding events, he wrote an accurate relation, for which he received the thanks of the ſtate. Of the famous battle of three days, in 1666, he alſo gave a full account to the ſtates, and in 1667 he eſtabliſhed an edict to aboliſh the ſtadtholderate in Holland; but in 1672 when the prince of Orange was nominated captain general, the mob invited him to accept the office of ſtadtholder, and De Witt reſigned his office after receiving the ſolemn thanks of the ſtates. When Holland was invaded by the French, the odium was thrown on De Witt and his party, and ſo violent were the tumults, that De Witt's brother, Cornelius, was accuſed by Ticklaer, a barber, and though declared innocent, was ſentenced to exile, and ſoon after, the priſon in which he was, was attacked, and he as well as his brother, who was preſent, were inhumanly butchered. Their dead bodies were dragged to the gallows, and the penſionary's remains were hung one foot higher than thoſe of his brother. Their bodies thus inſulted were cut into a thouſand pieces, and it is ſaid, that ſome of the fleſh was broiled and eat by the ſavage murderers. Thus fell this amiable man in his 47th year. As a politician he had no equal, and his love to his country was inferior to none of his other virtues. Without pride and pomp, he lived upon little more than 700l. a year; and with the moſt laudable integrity, he refuſed a gift of 10,000l. with which the ſtates wiſhed to reward his ſervices, obſerving, that ſuch liberality was a bad precedent. His work called, "the true intereſt and political maxims of the republic of Holland," tranſlated into Engliſh by Campbell, is a glorious monument of his abilities as a ſtateſman, and it diſplays the true maxims by which a government may become popular at home and reſpectable abroad, whilſt it maintains juſtice with liberty, and encourages trade without oppreſſion or monopoly.

DEWIT, James, a painter of Amſterdam, born 1695. His beſt work is Moſes appointing the 70 elders, painted for the Bourgomaſters of Amſterdam.

DEYSTER, Lewis, a painter and engraver of Bruges. who died 1711, aged 55. His death of the Virgin is his beſt piece.—His daughter Anna was equally famous as a painter, but ſhe relinquiſhed the profeſſion to conſtruct organs and harpſichords, and died poor 1746, aged 50.

DIACONUS, Paulus, a Lombard, of Friuli, educated at the court of Pavia. He became a monk, and compoſed his hiſtory of the Lombards, in ſix books. He is conſidered as accurate in the affairs of his own nation, though not equally exact in foreign affairs. He died 770.

DIAZ, Bartholomew, a Portugueſe navigator, who in 1466 diſcovered the moſt ſouthern cape of Africa, to which he gave the name of the Cape of Storms. This was altered by John II. king of Portugal, to the name of the Cape of Good Hope.

DIAZ, John, a Spaniard, who ſtudied at Paris, and embraced the doctrines of Luther. He afterwards viſited Calvin at Geneva, and Bucer at Straſburg, and met at Neuburg his brother Alphonſus, who, as a catholic, endeavoured to convert him from the proteſtant faith. Unable to do this, Alphonſus pretends to return home, and the next morning inſtigates an aſſaſſin to enter his brother's apartment, and with an axe to daſh out his brains, whilſt he himſelf waits at the door.—The aſſaſſins were purſued and ſeized at Inſpruck, but Charles V. took their puniſhment into his own hands, 1546.

DICETO, Ralph de, author of abbreviationes chronicorum, or an epitome of Engliſh hiſtory to the conqueſt, &c. was dean of St. Paul's, London, 1210.

DICK, ſir Alexander, ſon of ſir William Cunningham, was born 1703. He ſtudied medicine at Edinburgh, and afterwards under Boerhaave, and after viſiting ſeveral countries of Europe, he returned to England. On the death of his brother, he aſſumed the name of his maternal grandfather Dick, and retired to his family ſeat at Preſtonfield, where he died 1785. He was in 1756 preſident of the college of phyſicians in Edinburgh. He was in 1774 honored with a medal from the London ſociety of arts for his culture of rhubarb, the firſt attempt of rearing which in England was owing to him.

DICKINSON, Edmund, a phyſician, ſon of the rector of Appleton, Berkſhire, where he was born 1624. He was educated at Eton, and at Merton college, Oxford. He publiſhed in 1655 his Delphi Phœnicizantes, a learned work, in which he proved that the Greeks borrowed their hiſtory of the oracle of Delphi from the ſcriptures. This book was univerſally admired, and Sheldon the primate wiſhed in vain to turn the attention of the author to theology. After practiſing in Oxford, he, in 1684, ſettled in London, where, by recovering Arlington, he became phyſician to Charles II. Upon the abdication of James, he retired from practice, to complete his Phyſica vetus & vera, &c. which when finiſhed was unfortunately burnt, and coſt him the labor of recompoſition. It appeared in 1702, and proved that the method and mode of the creation of the univerſe, according to the principles of true philoſophy, are related in a general way by Moſes. He wrote beſides, diatriba de Noæ in Italiam adventu, &c.—de origine Druidum, &c. He died of the ſtone 1707, in his 83d year.

DICKSON,

DICKSON, David, a Scotch divine, born at Paifley 1591, and educated at Glafgow. He was an eloquent preacher; but was too violent againſt the epiſcopalians, which ſubjected him to perſecution. He was commiſſioner to the general aſſembly at Glaſgow, and in 1643 in Weſtminſter. He was divinity profeſſor at Edinburgh, but in 1662 he was ſtripped of his employments, and died two years after, aged 73. He wrote a commentary on St. Matthew—on the epiſtle to the Hebrews and Romans—and the pſalms, &c.

DIDEROT, Dionyſius, a celebrated writer, born at Langres 1713, and educated by the Jeſuits. Belles lettres were his favorite purſuits, and when ſettled in the capital, he acquired, by his wit and his genius, friends and encouragement. His firſt publication was Penſées philoſophiques in 1746, afterwards publiſhed under the title of Etrennes aux eſprits forts. He next publiſhed with Eidous and Touſſaint, an univerſal dictionary of medicine, in 6 vols. folio, which procured him great reputation. In his gigantic plan of a Dictionnaire encyclopedique, he was aſſiſted by d'Alembert and others, whoſe genius and diligence united to produce a work of merit. Diderot himſelf took the arts and trades, and infuſed into his ſubjects all the knowledge and the nervouſneſs of language of which he was ſo capable; but he did not find in his fellow laborers the ſame zeal nor the ſame abilities. While his own part was completed with ſpirit, his aſſociates proved too often inadequate to their undertakings. This great work, which coſt 20 years' labor to Diderot, was retarded by the ſuſpicions of the court, who conſidered ſome reflections on government and religion as improper, and not only ſome copies were ſeized, but the printers themſelves were ſent to the baſtile. The work was delivered to the public between 1752 and 1767, and ſoon ſold off, but Diderot did not find that independence which he expected, ſo that he was obliged to ſell his library, which was purchaſed for 50,000 livres by the empreſs of Ruſſia; but with a generoſity truly great, the philoſopher was permitted the uſe of it as long as he lived. Diderot wrote beſides, his Bijoux indiſcrets, 2 vols. 12mo. a licentious and diſguſting romance. the Fils natural, and the Pere de famille, 1757 and 1758, two proſe comedies, which, in a nervous ſtile paint the paſſions, ſtrongly intereſt the heart, and render virtue in her various trials truly great, noble, and amiable. His letters on the blind appeared in 1749, but the ſcepticiſm of the author coſt him his liberty, and he was impriſoned for ſix months at Vincennes. In 1751 he delivered his opinions on metaphyſics, poetry, eloquence, &c. in a letter on the deaf and dumb, 2 vols. 12mo. Diderot's other works are—principles of moral philoſophy, 12mo.—hiſtory of Greece tranſlated from Stanyan, 3 vols. 12mo.—pieces on mathematical ſubjects—the code of nature—the ſixth ſenſe—panegyrics on Richardſon—and the life of Seneca, a uſeful work, &c. He died ſuddenly on riſing from table, 1784 aged 71. Diderot's character has been variouſly deſcribed. His frankneſs and candor are extolled by his friends, whilſt his enemies reproach him as an artful, intereſted, pliant, and dangerous character. It is to be lamented, that his erudition was not always employed in the ſupport of virtue and morality, nor his abilities exerted to animate man in the cultivation of what is ſo neceſſary to his welfare and happineſs, the religious duties.

DIDOT, Francis Ambroſe, a printer at Paris, whoſe works were admired for the correctneſs, elegance, and beauty of the type, and among theſe, the edition of the claſſics publiſhed by order of Louis XVI. for the uſe of the dauphin, ranked very high. He made ſome uſeful improvements in paper mills, and in printing machines, and to his ingenuity the invention of ſtereotype printing may be fairly aſcribed. He died at Paris 1804, aged 74, and was ſucceeded in his buſineſs by his ſons.

DIECMAN, John, a native of Stade, ſuperintendant of Bremen and Verdun, and rector of Stade univerſity, where he died 1720, aged 73. Beſides theological, metaphyſical, and philoſophical works, he publiſhed an edition of Luther's works.

DIEMEN, Anthony Van, a native of Kuilenberg, where his father was burgomaſter. He went to the Eaſt Indies, and was governor of the Dutch territories there. He ſent in 1642 Taſman on a voyage of diſcovery, and the land which was diſcovered on the ſouth of New Holland was called in his honor Van Diemen's land. He died 1645.

DIEPENBECK, Abraham, a painter of Boiſleduc, who died at Antwerp 1675, aged 67. He firſt painted on glaſs, and afterwards in oil. His drawings are numerous, and his temple of the muſes is conſidered as a maſterpiece.

DIEST, Adrian Van, a landſcape painter, of the Hague, who died 1704, aged 49. He ſpent the beſt part of his life in England, where his pencil delineated the beauties of the weſtern plants of the iſland.

DIETRIC, John Conrad, a Lutheran, of Butzbach, profeſſor of Greek and hiſtory in his native town. He removed in 1653 to Gieſſen, when he died 1667, aged 55. He was author of a book de peregrinatione ſtudiorum—antiquitates Romanæ—lexicon etymologico-græcum, &c.

DIETRICH, John William Erneſt, a native of Weimar, where his father was eminent as a painter of battles and of portraits. His abilities recommended him to the public notice, and he was made profeſſor of Dreſden academy, and director of the painting ſchool at Miſſen, and died 1774, aged 62. His landſcapes, portraits, ſcripture pieces, converſations, &c. were much admired.

DIETRY, a painter of Dreſden, who died there 1730, aged 45. His two views near Rome are pleasing proofs of his great skill in landscape painting.

Dizu, Lewis de, a divine, born at Flushing, 1590. He refused to be the court minister at the Hague, as he was more desirous to censure than countenance the licentious morals of the great. He came to Leyden, and was divinity professor in the Walloon college till his death in 1642. He published in 1651 a commentary on the four gospels—and notes on the Acts, after a careful examination of several translations,—the history of our Saviour in the Persian language by the Jesuit Jerome Xavier, and a Latin translation—rudiments of the Hebrew and Persian tongues, &c.

Digby, Everard, an English gentleman of Dryftoke in Rutlandshire, educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He wrote some curious books, de arte natandi,—de duplici methodo, &c,—theoria analytica, &c. He died 1592.

Digby, sir Everard, son of the preceding, was educated in the Romish church after his father's death. He was knighted by king James. Though of mild manners, and rich and independent, he engaged in the schemes for the destruction of the government, and if not immediately an agent in the gunpowder plot with Guy Fawkes, he yet gave 1500l. towards the expences of it. On the discovery of this diabolical scheme, he was sent to the tower, and when arraigned, he pleaded for his conduct, that the king had broke his promises to the catholics; and he added, that as he alone was guilty, pardon should be extended to all others. He was hanged, drawn, and quartered at the west end of St. Paul's, London, and he died very penitent.

Digby, sir Kenelm, a philosopher, eldest son of the preceding, was born at Gothurst, Bucks, 1603. He was educated under Laud, and in 1618 he entered at Glocester-hall, Oxford, where he displayed great abilities. After travelling through Spain, he returned to England in 1623, and was knighted. He then engaged the public attention by the introduction of a secret medicine, called sympathetic powder, which he discovered in his travels. He was sent by Charles with a fleet into the Mediterranean in 1628, and acquired great reputation by his conduct at Algiers, and in the bay of Scandaroon. In 1636 he was reconciled to the Romish church, much to the regret of his friend Laud, who expostulated with him in vain. In 1639 he was active in levying contributions among the papists for the king's service, for which he was called before the parliament, and imprisoned, but released by the interference of the queen of France. Retiring to France, he devoted himself to philosophical pursuits, and published his treatise of the nature of bodies—and another on the operation and nature of man's soul, &c. Upon the destruction of the regal power, he returned to England to collect the remains of his fortune, but the parliament ordered him to leave the country. On his return to Paris he was made chancellor to Henrietta, and sent by her as negociator to Innocent X. The elevation of Cromwell enabled him to revisit England, and he afterwards spent some time at Toulouse and Montpellier. At the restoration he came back to England, and became a favorite at court, though his enemies represented him as lately employed in the service of the usurper. He was grievously afflicted the latter part of his life by the stone, of which he died at his house Covent Garden, 1665. His valuable library, which during the troubles had been removed to France, became at his death the property of the French king. He published besides, observations on Dr. Brown's religio medici—observations on the 22d stanza of the 9th canto, second book, of the fairy queen—a discourse on the vegetation of plants, &c.

Digby, John, of Magdalen college, Oxford, was introduced to James I. who appointed him gentleman of the privy chamber, and knighted him, and sent him as ambassador to Spain. In 1616 he became a privy counsellor and chamberlain, two years after he was made baron Digby of Sherbourne, and again sent ambassador on the continent. In 1622 he negociated the prince's marriage with the infanta of Spain, and on his return was created earl of Bristol. He opposed Buckingham in parliament, and for a while favored the popular party; but in the civil troubles he was exiled, and died at Paris 1653. He was author of some poems, of airs, dialogues, &c.

Digby, George, earl of Bristol, son of the preceding, was born at Madrid 1612, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. He embraced the popular cause, and was one of Strafford's accusers; but he afterwards favored the king's party, and was expelled from the house for defending that unfortunate nobleman. During the civil wars he was very active in the royal cause in Ireland, Jersey, and France. After Charles' death he was exempted from pardon by the parliament, and spent his life in exile, but at the restoration he was made a knight of the garter. He died at Chelsea, 1676. Though he wrote against popery he died a papist, and though a papist he spoke in favour of the test act.

Digges, Leonard, a mathematician, born at Barham, and educated at University college, Oxford. He wrote Tectonicum, to show the measuring of land, &c. 1556, 4to. improved by his son 1592,—a geometrical practical treatise—prognostication of everlasting right, &c. He died 1574.

Digges, Thomas, only son of Leonard, after studying at Oxford, proved himself a great mathematician. He published alæ sive scalæ, &c. mathematical wings or ladders, 1573, 4to.—an arithmetical military treatise, 4to.—a geometrical treatise, &c. He died 1595.

Digges, sir Dudley, eldest son of Thomas, was born 1583, and educated at University college, college, Oxford. He was knighted and travelled into foreign lands. He was in 1618 ambaſſador in Pruſſia for James I. and two years after went to Holland as commiſſioner. In parliament his conduct was very independent, and often hoſtile to the court, ſo that he was ſent to the tower for his accuſation againſt Buckingham. Such was his influence, that meaſures were adopted to gain him over, and by a reverſionary grant of the office of maſter of the rolls in 1630, which he obtained in 1636, he was brought to favor the meaſures of government. He died 1639, univerſally lamented He publiſhed a defence of trade, 4to —a diſcourſe on the rights and privileges of the ſubject—ſpeeches, &c.

Digges, Thomas, brother to ſir Dudley, was educated at Univerſity college, and improved himſelf by traveling abroad He tranſlated Gerardo, the unfortunate Spaniard, from Ceſpades—and Claudian's rape of Proſerpine into Engliſh verſe He died 1635.

Digges, Dudley, third ſon to ſir Dudley, was educated at Univerſity college, and became fellow of All-ſouls, 1633. He wrote an anſwer to obſervations on his majeſty's anſwers, &c. and died 1643.

Dillenius, John James, a botaniſt, born at Darmſtadt in Germany 1681, and educated at Gieſſen, in Upper Heſſe In his diſſertation on the coffee of the Arabians, he gives his preparations made with peaſe, beans, &c. and aſſerts, that from rye can be produced that which moſt nearly reſembles coffee. He enumerates alſo not leſs than 980 plants, excluſive of muſhrooms and moſſes in the neighbourhood of Gieſſen. From his acquaintance with Dr. Sherard, who had been conſul at Smyrna, he was prevailed upon to ſettle in England in 1721. He firſt engaged in a new edition of Ray's ſynopſis ſtirpium Britannicarum, and by the death of his friend in 1728, and his bequeathing of 3000l. to the univerſity of Oxford for a botanical profeſſorſhip, to which he was firſt to be appointed, he was raiſed to comfortable independence. In this ſituation he applied himſelf diligently to the improvement of botany, and in his hortus Elthamenſis, 417 plants, chiefly exotics, were deſcribed with the moſt careful attention. Botany however was not yet a favorite ſtudy, the author ſold few of his copies, and when he flattered himſelf with profit, he experienced only loſs. In 1735 the univerſity granted him the degree of M.D. and the following year he was honored with a viſit from his friend Linnæus. He devoted himſelf to the completion of an hiſtory of moſſes, and would have undertaken the funguſes, had not death cloſed his labors. He was attacked in March 1747 with an apoplexy, and died the 2nd April, aged 60. In his private character, Dillenius was very reſpectable, naturally of a mild temper, but fond of retirement. His drawings, dried plants, MSS. &c. were purchaſed by his ſucceſſor, and enrich the treaſures of Oxford.

Dilworth, Thomas, a ſchoolmaſter, whoſe ſpelling book—book-keeper's aſſiſtant—ſchoolmaſter's aſſiſtant—miſcellaneous arithmetic, &c. are well known and popular books. He was for ſome time engaged at Stratford-le-bow with Dyche, and then ſet up a ſchool at Wapping. He died 1781.

Dimsdale, Thomas, an Engliſh phyſician, born at Thoydon-garnon, Eſſex. His family were quakers, and his grandfather was the companion of Penn in America. Young Dimſdale ſettled at Hertford, and in 1745 engaged as ſurgeon in the duke of Northumberland's army in the Scotch campaign. On the taking of Carliſle he returned to Hertford, and in 1761 began to practiſe as phyſician. His celebrity as an inoculator in the ſmall-pox, recommended him to the empreſs Catharine, at whoſe requeſt he viſited Ruſſia in 1768. His ſucceſsful inoculation of the empreſs, and her ſon, was rewarded with the rank of baron of the empire, &c. beſides a penſion of 500l. per ann. and a preſent of 12,000l. In 1781 he was again in Ruſſia to inoculate the grand duke's two ſons, and he was elected member of parliament for Hertford in 1780, and again 1784. He loſt his eye-ſight by a catarrh, which was happily removed by Wenzell. He died 1800. He was author of tracts on inoculation, with an account of his journey to Ruſſia, 8vo. 1781.

Dingley, Robert, an Engliſh writer, educated at Magdalen college. He was a zealous puritan, and was rector of Brixton in the iſle of Wight, by the intereſt of his uncle Hammond, the governor. He died 1659, aged 40. He wrote the deputation of angels, proved by the divine right of nature, from many rubs and miſtakes, &c.

Dino, compiler of the ſix books of decretals, and author of a commentary on the rules of law, was profeſſor of juriſprudence at Bologna, and died about 1307.

Dinouart, Anthony Joſeph Touſſaint, was born at Amiens 1715, and died at Paris 1786. He firſt engaged at Paris in periodical publications, where the ſeverity of his remarks drew upon him trouble. In 1760 he began his eccleſiaſtical journal, but he was little attentive in this work to propriety, as noſtrums and ſermons were recommended in the ſame page to his readers, and large quotations were made without acknowlegement. His other works are embryologia ſacra, 12mo.—the manual for paſtors, 3 vols. 12mo. &c.

Diodati, John, of Lucca, profeſſor of philoſophy at Geneva, where he died 1652, aged 73, is known for his tranſlations of the bible into Italian, with notes 4to. 1607, into French, &c.

Dionis, Peter, a French ſurgeon who died 1718. His ſkill in chirurgical operations was very great. He publiſhed ſome valuable works on his profeſſion.

Dippel, John Conrad, a curious character, who called himſelf in his writings, Chriſtianus Democritus.

Democritus. He oppoſed the Pietiſts at Straſburg, and afterwards ſupported them at Gieſſen. When unable to get a wife and a profeſſor's chair, he inveighed againſt the proteſtants, and ſoon after pretended to have diſcovered the philoſopher's ſtone. He was ſucceſſively confined in the priſons of Berlin, Copenhagen, Frankfort, Amſterdam, &c. In 1727 he went to Stockholm to preſcribe for the king, but the Swediſh clergy, though pleaſed with the recovery of the monarch, baniſhed the operator. In 1733 he publiſhed a ſtatement to prove that he ſhould not die till the year 1808, but the next year, unfortunately for the prophecy, he was found dead in his bed at Widgenſtein, 1734. He wrote ſome enthuſiaſtic works.

Disney, John, a native of Lincoln, educated among the diſſenters, and afterwards removed to the Middle temple. He devoted himſelf to the arduous office of public magiſtrate in his native county, and was ſo zealous in the ſupport of virtue and morality, that he received the thanks of the judges of the aſſize. Though brought up among the diſſenters and the ſon of a diſſenter, he honored the church of England, and, at the age of 42, took orders and ſucceeded to the livings of Croft, and Kirkby on Bane, Lincolnſhire, and in 1722 to that of St. Mary Nottingham. He was author of two eſſays on the execution of the laws againſt immorality and profaneneſs, &vo. —remarks on Sacheverell's ſermon—primitiæ ſacræ—view of ancient laws againſt immorality, &c. folio, &c. He died at Nottingham 1730, aged 53.

Dithmar, Juſtus Chriſtopher, hiſtorical profeſſor at Frankfort, died there 1737. His works on the hiſtory of Germany evince great learning.

Ditton, Humphrey, a mathematician, born at Salisbury, 1675. He for ſome time officiated at a diſſenting meeting houſe at Tunbridge, where he married. The death of his father ſoon after enabled him to abandon divinity for mathematics. By the intereſt of his friends, eſpecially Newton, he was appointed maſter of the mathematical ſchool, Chriſt's Hoſpital, where he continued till his death 1715. He publiſhed ſome learned works, and his tracts on the tangents of curves, in ſpherical catoptrics, general laws of nature and motion, Alexandra's ſynopſis algebraica, the inſtitution of fluxions, &c. are well known.

Divini, Euſtachius, an Italian artiſt, eminent in the making of teleſcopes. He diſputed with Huygens about the diſcovery of Saturn's ring, but his teleſcopes were not ſo good as thoſe of his opponent. He died about 1664.

Dlugoss, John, a Pole, archbiſhop of Leopol, died 1480, aged 65, much perſecuted by king Caſimir. His hiſtory of Poland to 1444 in Latin, though accurate, is written in barbarous language.

Dobson, William, a painter born in London 1610. He copied Titian and Vandyck's pieces with ſuch ſucceſs that he was recommended by Vandyck to Charles I. Though highly favored at court, he died poor 1647. Had his genius been early tutored by the hand of art, he might have become a very great maſter. His pieces in hiſtory and portraiture exhibit unuſual powers.

Dod, John, a nonconformiſt of Jeſus college, Cambridge, who died about 1645. He was called the decalogiſt, from his expoſition of the 10 commandments. He was an Hebrew ſcholar.

Dodart, Denys, phyſician to Lewis XIV. was born at Paris 1634, and died 1707. He ſupported Sanctorius' notions about inſenſible perſpiration, and he made an experiment upon himſelf during lent, by which he found that he weighed at the end of that ſeaſon of abſtinence only 107 pounds 12 ounces, having loſt during that time eight pounds five ounces. He was a very religious and amiable character.

Dodd, William, a learned but unfortunate divine, born 1729 at Bourne, Lincolnſhire, and educated at Clare-hall, Cambridge. He publiſhed the beauties of Shakeſpeare, 2 vols. 12mo. and having entered into orders in 1753, he became a popular preacher in London, and was appointed lecturer to ſome charities, eſpecially the Magdalen, in whoſe eſtabliſhment he had been zealouſly active. In 1761 he wrote a ſonnet in praiſe of Squire, biſhop of St. David's, and for his flattery was made his chaplain, and prebendary of Brecon. Though his income was reſpectable, and though he was allowed by the booksellers 100l. a year to ſuperintend the Chriſtian's magazine, his expences were great from an improper ſpirit of extravagance and gaiety. In 1765 he publiſhed in weekly numbers his commentary on the bible, collected from the papers of Lock, Weſt, Clarendon, &c. completed in 3 vols. folio, and dedicated to biſhop Squire, who, unluckily for the author, died ſoon after. In 1766, he took the degree of LL.D. and ſoon after publiſhed a volume of poems, and in 1769 he tranſlated Maſſillon's ſermons, inſcribed to the prince of Wales. In 1771 appeared his ſermons to young men, 3 vols. 12mo. dedicated to his pupils Charles and Philip Stanhope, afterwards earl of Cheſterfield. He was preſented in 1772 to the living of Hockliffe, Bucks, by his pupil, but though his income was enlarged his expenditure encreaſed in greater proportion, and, in a thoughtleſs moment, he endeavoured to obtain the living of St. George's Hanover ſquare, by offering in an anonymous letter 3000l. to lady Apſley, if ſhe would uſe her influence for the appointment. The letter was divulged, and the chancellor Apſley laid it before the king, and Dodd, proved to be the author, was not only eraſed from the liſt of chaplains, but ridiculed in the papers, and lampooned in one of Foote's pieces at the Haymarket. Aſhamed of his conduct he fled to Geneva, where lord Cheſterfield gave him the living of Winge in Bucks: but ſo extravagant was the conduct of this illfated divine, that he appeared at the races at Sablons in a phaeton, in all the attire of French foppery. On his return to London he preached his laſt ſermon at the Magdalen 2nd February 1777, and two days after ſigned a bond for 4000l. forged in the name of lord Cheſterfield, by which he obtained money to relieve his neceſſities. The forgery was diſcovered, Dodd was tried and condemned at the Old Bailey 24th February, and executed at Tyburn 27th June. Between his ſentence and its execution, which had been delayed in conſequence of doubts about the evidence of the man who had drawn up the bond, great intereſt was made, and a petition ſigned by thouſands preſented to the king, to ſave from ignominious death this unfortunate man, but in vain. During his confinement he behaved with great penitence, and addreſſed his fellow priſoners in his "thoughts in priſon," with chriſtian fortitude. He tranſlated Callimachus, and wrote 4 vols. of ſermons on the miracles and parables of our Saviour. His publications amounted to 55 in number, chiefly on religious and moral ſubjects.

DODDRIDGE, or DODERIDGE, ſir John, a native of Barnſtaple, Devonſhire, educated at Exeter college, Oxford. He removed to the Middle-temple, and became ſerjeant at law, ſolicitor to the king, and a judge of the common pleas, and of the king's bench. He died at Egham, Surrey. He is author of the lawyer's light, or direction for the ſtudy of the law, 4to. 1639—a complete parſon, or deſcription of advowſons, &c. 4to.—the Engliſh lawyer 4to. 1631. &c.

DODDRIDGE, Philip D.D. an eminent diſſenting divine, ſon of an oilman in London, where he was born 1702. He was educated at Kingſton-on-Thames and at St. Alban's, and began at the latter place a laſting friendſhip with Dr. Samuel Clarke. Tinctured with the tenets of the diſſenters, he declined the offers of the duchefs of Bedford, who wiſhed to bring him up at the univerſity, and to raiſe him to preferment, and in 1719 he went to the academy of Mr. Jennings at Kibworth in Leiceſterſhire. He took the care of a ſmall congregation at Kibworth, and ſoon after ſucceeded on Jennings' death to his academy, which he removed to Northampton, where he continued the reſt of life, reſpected as a divine, ſucceſsful as an inſtructor, and beloved as a private man. He died 1715, at Liſbon, where he had gone for the recovery of his health. This amiable character, ſo much reſpected by all parties, publiſhed ſeveral religious tracts, the beſt known of which are, the principles of the chriſtian religion, &c.—the riſe and progreſs of religion in the ſoul,—remarkable paſſages in the life of col. James Gardiner, &c.—ten ſermons on the power and grace of Chriſt, &c.—the family expoſitor, containing a verſion and paraphraſe of the New teſtament with critical notes. &c. a valuable work, in 6 vols. 4to.

DODOENS or DODONÆUS, Rambert, of Malines, phyſician to the emperors, and profeſſor at Leyden, died 1585, aged 67. He wrote an hiſtory of plants fol. 1616.

DODSLEY, Robert, a bookſeller and writer, born at Mansfield, Nottinghamſhire, 1703. He began life as footman in the Lowther family, but in this ſituation he indulged his natural talents for poetry and ſatire, and wrote the muſe in livery, and a ſmall dramatic piece, called the Toyſhop, which was ſeen by Pope, and engaged all his attention. Intereſting himſelf for this humble poet, he procured for him the introduction of his piece at the theatre, and manifeſted for him to the end of life the moſt cordial friendſhip. The Toyſhop was ſucceeded by "the king and miller of Mansfield," in 1756, and from the great ſucceſs of theſe two pieces he ſettled independently as a London bookſeller. After acquiring a handſome fortune, Dodſley retired from buſineſs in favor of his brother, and died 1764, in his 61ſt year. His works conſiſt of ſix dramatic pieces of which the Cleone, a tragedy, is much admired; beſides public virtue, a poem 1754, 4to. trifles 1745, 8vo. Melpomene, agriculture a poem, the economy of human life. He alſo collected ſcattered poems of great merit in 6 vo's. 12mo. and alſo plays by old authors in 12 vol. 12mo. lately reprinted.

DODSON, Michael, a native of Marlborough, Wilts. Under the protection of his uncle ſir Michael Foſter the judge, he ſtudied the law, and was called to the bar 1783. In 1770 he had been made by lord Camden commiſſioner of bankrupts. Beſides a tranſlation of Iſaiah with notes in 1790, and ably defended againſt Dr. Sturges, he wrote the life of judge Foſter, for the Biographia Brit. the life of Hugh Farmer, &c. He died 1799, aged 67.

DODSWORTH, Roger, an indefatigable topographer, born 1585, at Newton Grange, Yorkſhire. He died 1654. In his reſearches in the antiquities of his native county he wrote 122 volumes, beſides other MSS. amounting to 161 folio. vols. depoſited in the Bodleian library.

DODWELL, Henry, a learned writer, born in Dublin 1641, of Engliſh parents. He was placed at a ſchool in York, but the death of his father by the plague at Waterford, and of his mother, by a conſumption, reduced him to an indigent ſituation, from which he was relieved by his uncle a clergyman of Suffolk, who in 1654 ſent for him. In 1656 he entered at Trinity college, but in 1666 quitted his fellowſhip becauſe he would not go into orders, as the ſtatutes required He paſſed over to England but afterwards reviſited Ireland, and in 1674 ſettled in London. In 1688 he was without his knowledge, elected Camden profeſſor of hiſtory at Oxford, of which he was deprived 3 years after for refuſing to take the oath of allegiance. He then ſettled at Cookham, Berkſhire, and ſeparated from the church becauſe new biſhops were appointed to ſucceed such as refused the oath of allegiance. In consequence of his acquaintance with Mr. Cherry of Shottesbrooke, he removed to that village, and married the daughter of the person where he lodged at Cookham, in 1694, by whom he had 10 children, six of whom survived him. He was afterwards reconciled to the church, and died at Shottesbrooke 1711, aged 70. His writings are very numerous, and prove him to have been a man of indefatigable diligence and extensive learning, and are on controversial, theological, and classical subjects. The best known are—annals of Thucydides and Xenophon—de veteribus Græc. Roman. cyclis, &c.—ætate Christi, dissertationes decem, cum tabulis necessariis, 4to. 1701, an excellent book according to Dr. Halley—an epistolary discourse proving from the scriptures that the soul is a principle naturally mortal, but immortalized, &c—chronology of Dionysius Halicarnassus—&c.

Dodwell, Henry, eldest son of the preceding, was author of an anonymous pamphlet, "Christianity not founded on argument;" an artful work, in which he attempted to vilify religion. It was answered by his own brother, &c. He was brought up to the law, and was a zealous promoter of the society for the promotion of arts, &c. His next brother William, D.D. of Trinity college, Oxford, was archdeacon of Berks, &c. Besides an answer to his brother's pamphlet, he wrote a dissertation on Jepthah's vow—practical discourses, 2 vols. —an answer to Dr. Middleton's free inquiry, &c.

Does, Jacob van der, a Dutch painter, who died 1673, aged 50. As his temper was gloomy, it is supposed his pictures partake strongly of his feelings.

Does, Jacob van der, son of the preceding, was born at Amsterdam, and died 1659, aged 19, giving, by the few pieces which he finished, the most promising tokens of a great genius.

Dogget, Thomas, an author and actor, born in Castle-street, Dublin. He first appeared on the Irish stage, and then came to England, and engaged in the Drury-lane and Lincoln's-inn-fields companies, and was particularly applauded in Fondlewife, in the Old Bachelor, and Ben, in Love for Love. He was joint-manager of Drury-lane with Wilks and Cibber; and retired in the meridian of his reputation, to the enjoyment of a moderate fortune. He died highly respected 1722. In his principles he was so strongly attached to the house of Hanover that he left a waterman's coat and silver badge to be rowed for yearly, by six watermen, on the Thames, against the stream, on the 1st of August, the anniversary of George I.'s accession. He wrote only one comedy, "the country wake," better known in its altered form of "Flora, or Hob in the well," a farce.

Doissin, Lewis, a Jesuit, who died 1753, aged 32. He wrote two poems on the art of sculpture and the art of engraving, in which he celebrates, in an animated style, the labors of Praxiteles, Miron, &c.

Dolben, John, was born at Stanwick, Northamptonshire, 1624, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ-church Oxford. During the civil wars, he espoused the king's side, and was major in his army; but on the triumph of the republic, he returned to college, and was turned out in 1648. At the restoration he became canon of Christ-church, archdeacon of London, dean of Westminster, and in 1666, bishop of Rochester, and in 1683 was translated to York, where he died 1686. His sermons, delivered before Charles II. and on other occasions, possess merit.

Dolce, Lewis, a native of Venice, who died there 1568, aged 60. He wrote several poems, and translated Ovid, Seneca, Euripides, &c. in a style pure and elegant.

Dolet, Stephen, of Orleans, was a printer and bookseller at Lyons, where he published some of his works for the improvement of the French language. Giving way to licentious and profane ideas in his writings, he drew upon himself the vengeance of the inquisition, and was condemned to be burnt for atheism. He suffered 1546. Though some attribute his sufferings to his attachment to Lutheranism, Beza and Calvin place him in the number of impious blasphemers.

Dolomieu, Deodat, commander of the order of Malta, exposed himself in the pursuit of knowledge to all the inclemencies of the air, the climate, and the seasons. He was in Egypt with Bonaparte, and on his return was taken prisoner, and liberated by the interference of sir Joseph Banks. He died suddenly near Macon, in 1802, as he was preparing a scientific excursion to the north, to examine the natural curiosities of those regions. He published a voyage to the isles of Lipari, 1781 —memoir on the earthquake of Calabria in 1783—a mineralogical dictionary—memoir on Ætna, &c.

Domat, John, a French lawyer, born at Clermont, in Auvergne, 1625. He studied the learned languages and belles lettres at Paris, and applied himself to the law at Bourges. He became a pleader at Clermont, and for thirty years he was, for his integrity, the arbiter of all the affairs of the province. He applied himself to simplify the laws of the state, and to reduce them from confusion to order and regularity; for which Lewis XIV. granted him a pension of 2000 livres. The first volume was published 1689, in 4to. called, "the civil laws in their natural order;" to which three volumes were afterwards added. He died at Paris 1696.

Domenichino, an Italian painter, born at Bologna 1581. He was the pupil of Calvert, and of the Caraccis; but he was so slow in his progress that his fellow students called him "the ox." Annibal Caracci observed, upon this ridiculous appellation, that "this ox, by dint of labor, would in time make his ground so fruitful, that painting itself would be fed by what it produced"—a prognostic of future greatness, truly fulfilled. He applied to his work with great study and zeal; and though he wanted genius, yet judgment, and a strong enthusiastic ardor, made him one of the greatest Italian masters. According to N. Poussin, his communion of St. Jerom and Raphael's transfiguration, were the two best pieces which ever adorned Rome. He also built the apostolical palace for Gregory XV. He was reserved, but mild in his manners. He died 1641, not without suspicion of poison.

DOMINIC, de Guzman, a Spaniard, born 1170, in Arragon, known as the founder of the order of the predicants, and the establisher of the inquisition in Languedoc. Before he was born, his mother dreamed she had a dog vomiting fire in her womb; and the dream was fulfilled, when Dominic, followed by fire and sword and the army of Innocent III. preached to the Albigenses, and, with the offer of death or abjuration, converted above 100,000 souls. He was the first master of the sacred palace, an office which at his suggestion Honorius III. established. He died at Bologna 1221.

DOMINIS, Mark Antony de, originally a Jesuit, afterwards bishop of Segni, and archbishop of Spolato, in the 16th century. He was very unsettled in his religious notions; and he wrote a famous book, called "de republicâ ecclesiasticâ," in which he assailed the papal power. This work was seen in MS. by Bedell, the chaplain of the ambassador of James I. at Venice, and by his means it was published in London. De Dominis accompanied his friend Bedell to England. He was made dean of Windsor; but, after preaching against the pope, and endeavouring to reconcile and re-unite the Romish and English churches, he expressed an inclination to return to Rome. He there abjured all his errors 1622; but an expression against Bellarmine rendered him suspected to the catholics. He was imprisoned, and died in confinement, in the castle of St. Angelo, 1645. It was afterwards discovered, that his writings had been very hostile to the pope, and therefore his body was dug up, and with his writings burnt in Flora's field. He wrote a treatise, de radiis visus et lucis, &c.

DONATO, Bernardino, Greek professor at Padua, died about 1550. He was the learned author of a Latin dialogue on the difference between Aristotle's and Plato's philosophy, and translated into Latin some of Galen's, Aristotle's, and Xenophon's works, &c.

DONATO, an architect and sculptor of Florence. His Judith cutting off the head of Holofernes is his best piece. He died 1466, aged 83.

DONATO, Jerom, a Venetian, eminent for his learning and his military services. He was ambassador in the reconciliation made between his country and pope Julius II. He died of a fever at Rome 1511.

DONATO, Alexander, a Jesuit of Sienna, who died at Rome 1640. He wrote a valuable description of Rome 1639, 4to. called Roma vetus & recens, besides poems in 8vo. &c.

DONCKER, Peter, a painter of Gouda, who studied at Rome, and died 1668.

DONDUS, or DE DONDIS, James, a physician of Padua. He was well skilled in mechanics and in mathematics, and he invented a clock on a new construction, which pointed out not only the hours, but the festivals of the year, and the course of the sun and moon. He found out also the secret of making salt from the wells of Albano, and died 1350. He wrote Promptuarium medicinæ, &c.

DONEAU, Hugh, professor of law at Bourges and Orleans, was saved from the massacre of Bartholomew by the affection of his scholars, and escaping into Germany, died at Altorf 1591, aged 64. He wrote commentaria de jure civili, &c.

DONI D'ATTICHI, Lewis, a Florentine, made by Richelieu bishop of Riez, and afterwards of Autun. He died 1664, aged 68. He wrote in French a history of the Minims, 4to. a society to which he belonged, &c.

DONI, John Baptiste, an Italian, who died in his native city of Florence 1647, aged 51. He was professor of eloquence, and invented a musical instrument called lyra barbarini. He wrote a treatise on music in Latin, and other tracts.

DONNE, John, an English poet and divine, born in London 1573. At the age of 11 he went to Oxford, and then removed to Cambridge, and three years after to Lincoln's-inn. His friends were papists, but, at the age of 19, he embraced the protestant faith. He accompanied the earl of Essex, in 1596 and 97, against Cadiz and the Azores, and then formed the resolution of going as far as Jerusalem, which however he did not do. He was secretary to Egerton, keeper of the great seal, but his secret marriage to the daughter of sir George More, chancellor of the garter, threatened for a time every misfortune to him. The father irritated, prevailed upon Egerton to dismiss him, and he procured his imprisonment, and that of the minister who had married him, and of the friend who had given the lady away. He at last liberated himself and his friends from confinement, and was reconciled to his father-in-law. Though not replaced in the favor of Egerton, he studied the civil and canon law. About 1612, he accompanied sir Robert Drury to Paris, and displayed such ability in a treatise on the oaths of allegiance and supremacy then agitated, that James highly favored him. In compliance with his intimation, he applied himself to divinity, and took orders, and was made king's chaplain. When ordained 14 livings in the country were offered to him, which he declined, to reside in London, where he became Lincoln's-inn preacher. In 1621, he was made dean of St. Paul's, and afterwards he was presented to St. Dunstan in the the weſt and another benefice. As his enemies repreſented him as hoſtile to the king, he was obliged to vindicate himſelf before James, who expreſſed himſelf pleaſed with his conduct. He was in 1630 attacked by a fever, which brought on a conſumption. He preached at court the firſt Friday in Lent, on the words "to God the Lord belong the iſſues from death," which was conſidered as his funeral ſermon. He died 1631. Dr. Donne was in his character an amiable and benevolent as well as an ingenious and learned man, and Falkland ſaid of him that he was "one of the moſt witty and moſt eloquent of our modern divines." To his pſeudomartyr he was indebted in ſome degree for his honors, but it is a book, as Warburton has obſerved, of little merit, agreeing merely with the opinions of the times. He publiſhed ſome poems, conſiſting of ſongs, ſonnets, epigrams, elegies, ſatires, &c. printed 12mo. 1719. In ſpeaking of theſe, Dryden has given Donne the character of the greateſt wit, though not the greateſt poet of the nation.

Donne, Benjamin, a mathematician, born at Biddeford, Devonſhire, where he kept a ſchool, and afterwards at Briſtol. He was maſter of mechanics to the king in 1796, and died two years after, aged 67. He wrote mathematical eſſays in 8vo.—treatiſes on geometry, book-keeping, and trigonometry, &c.

Doolittle, Thomas, a nonconformiſt, born at Kidderminſter 1630. He was for nine years miniſter of St. Alphage, London, from which he was ejected in 1662. He afterwards kept an academy in Monkwell-ſtreet, and officiated among the diſſenters till his death, 1707, at the age of 77. He wrote ſeveral books of practical divinity.

Doppel-Maier, John Gabriel, author of ſome tracts on geography, dialling, aſtronomy, of the account of the mathematicians of Nuremburg, and of ſeveral tranſlations from Engliſh mathematical works into Latin and German, died at Nuremburg, where he was profeſſor of mathematics 1750, aged 83.

Dorfling, a Pruſſian, who from a taylor became a ſoldier, and roſe to the higheſt military honors. Diſtinguiſhed againſt the Swedes, he became field marſhal, but ſome on envying his elevation, and obſerving that he had ſtill the appearance of a taylor, "Yes," ſays the valiant Dorfling, "I was once a taylor; I formerly cut out cloth, but now, (clapping his hand to his ſword,) here is the inſtrument with which I cut off the ears of them that ſpeak ill of me."

Doria, Andrew, a noble Genoeſe, born at Oneille 1468. He ſignalized himſelf in Italy, and particularly in Corſica. Diſtinguiſhed as a warrior by land, his countrymen wiſhed to employ him by ſea, and accordingly in 1513 he was named captain general of the gallies of Genoa, and ſoon enriched himſelf by attacking the pirates of the Mediterranean. The revolutions of Genoa engaged Doria in the ſervice of Francis I. of France, after whoſe defeat at Pavia, he became admiral to pope Clement VII. Upon the ſacking of Rome by Bourbon 1527, Doria returned to the French ſervice, and Francis granted him a penſion and appointed him admiral of the Levant. His talents were now employed in eſtabliſhing the preponderance of the French power in Italy, and the emperor ſaw his fleets deſtroyed and his armies defeated by the genius of this intrepid republican. When Naples, beſieged by the French forces, was ready to ſubmit, Doria changed the face of war. Francis, incited by his courtiers, ordered his perſon to be ſeized; but Doria's vigilance fruſtrated the deſign, and throwing himſelf under the protection of the emperor, he was received with open arms. Francis in vain endeavoured to regain his confidence, while the emperor wiſhed to ſecure him even by making him the ſovereign of Genoa, an office which Doria rejected with noble patriotiſm. Doria ſucceſsful in preventing the fall of Naples, attacked Genoa, which the French had ſeized, and though only with 13 gallies and 500 men, he in one night, 1528, made himſelf maſter of the place without bloodſhed, and was hailed by the Genoeſe as the father and deliverer of his country. A moderate government was eſtabliſhed, and Doria, now owner of 22 gallies, and ſupported by faithful aſſociates, took Coron and Patras from the Turks, and aſſiſted Charles V. in the reduction of Tunis and Goulette. The expedition againſt Algiers in 1541, and the affair of Prevezzo undertaken againſt his advice, proved unfortunate, and it has been inſinuated that Doria, oppoſed to Barbaroſſa, the Turkiſh general, did not diſplay his uſual valor, but ſecretly wiſhed to prolong a war which made him a neceſſary ally. He was loaded with honors for his ſervices by the emperor, and to the marquiſate of Turſi in Naples, was added the dignity of grand chancellor of that kingdom. Doria died 1560, aged 93, poor indeed in fortune, but honored by his country, and reſpected by the whole world.

Dorigny, Michael, a French painter, engraver in aquafortis. He was profeſſor of the academy of painting at Paris, and died 1665.

Dorigny, Nicholas, a French engraver, whoſe fineſt pieces are the bark of Lanfranco, the St. Petronilla of Guerchino, the deſcent from the croſs by Voleterra, the tranſfiguration after Raphael, &c. He was knighted by George I. and died at Paris 1746, aged 90.

Dorislaus, Iſaac, a Dutchman who came from Leyden to England, and read lectures on hiſtory at Cambridge. When expelled by the vice-chancellor, as ſuſpected of republican principles, he became judge advocate in the army againſt the Scots, but quitted the king's ſervice for that of the parliament, and aſſiſted, it is ſaid, in drawing up the articles of accuſation againſt his ſovereign. Thus recommended by guilt to the ruling powers, he went in 1649 as embaſſador from the republic to Holland, where he was attacked while at ſupper by ſome enthuſiaſtic royaliſts and ſtabbed to the heart. His body was brought over to England, and buried in Weſtminſter-abbey, but removed at the reſtoration to St. Margaret's church-yard.

Dorsch, Everard a Dutch engraver on gems of ſuperior abilities. He was born at Nuremburg, and died 1712, aged 63.

Dositheus, the firſt hereſiarch, a magician of Samaria, who pretended to be the true Meſſiah. Among his 30 diſciples he admitted a woman whom he called the moon. He retired to a cave where he ſtarved himſelf to death, that he might perſuade his followers that he was aſcended into heaven. His followers always ſtaid 24 hours in the ſame poſture in which they were when the ſabbath began.

Dove, Nathaniel, an ingenious penman, author of "the progreſs of time," containing verſes on the four ſeaſons and the 12 months of the year, with 16 plates. He kept an academy at Hoxton, and died 1754, aged 44.

Douffet, Gerard, a painter of Liege, born 1594. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the accuracy, variety, correctneſs, and ſweetneſs of his pieces. He died about 1660.

Douglas, Gawin, was born at Brechin in Scotland 1471, and educated at St. Andrew's. He travelled in Italy and Germany, where he cultivated the muſes. On his return to Scotland in 1496, he was made provoſt of St. Giles's church, Edinburgh, in 1515, and biſhop of Dunkeld. He came to London, where he died of the plague in April 1522. His chief works, which prove him to be an eminent ſcholar and poet, are a tranſlation of Virgil's Æneid—the palace of honor, a poem, &c. As Chaucer in England, ſo he in Scotland is the great forerunner of the revival of learning.

Douglas, William, a Scotch nobleman, commiſſioned by Robert Bruce, to go on a cruſade, to carry his heart to the holy land. Douglas ſet out after the king's death, 1327; but he periſhed by the way.

Douglas, James, an Engliſh anatomiſt, and great practitioner in the obſtetric art. He wrote bibliographiæ anatomicæ ſpecimen, 8vo.—miographiæ comparatæ ſpecimen, 1706—deſcription of the peritonæum, London, 1730—a hiſtory of the lateral operation for the ſtone, 8vo. &c. and died 1742.

Douglas, James, earl of Morton, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his love of ſcience and literature. He eſtabliſhed, when 26, the philoſophical ſociety of Edinburgh, and was, in 1733, elected preſident of the London royal ſociety. He died 1768.

Douglas, John, a learned prelate, born in 1721, in Fifeſhire. From Dunbar ſchool he removed, in 1736, to St. Mary-hall, Oxford, and two years after to Baliol college. He went to Montreal and to Ghent, to acquire a competent knowledge of the French language, and as chaplain of the 3d regiment of foot guards, he was preſent at the battle of Fontenoy, in 1745. He afterwards attended lord Pulteney in his travels on the continent; and on his return in 1749, he obtained ſome preferment from his patron. He was made, in 1760, chaplain to the king; and in 1762, he obtained a canonry of Windſor, afterwards exchanged for the reſidentiaryſhip of St. Paul's, reſigned by him in 1788 for the deanery of Windſor. In 1787 he was raiſed to the ſee of Cariſle, and tranſlated, in 1791, to Saliſbury. His powers as a writer were ſtrong, reſpectable, and multifarious. His firſt work was, the vindication of Milton from the charge of plagiariſm, againſt Lauder, 1750—the criterion of miracles, 1754, a work of great merit, of which he prepared another edition in 1806—an apology for the clergy againſt the Hutchinſonians, &c.—the deſtruction of the French foretold by Ezekiel—ſeveral pamphlets againſt Archibald Bower—a defence of lord George Sackville, &c. Beſides, he aſſiſted in the publication of lord Clarendon's diary and letters—of Cooke's voyages—of lord Hardwicke's miſcellaneous papers, &c. He died of a gradual decay, without a ſtruggle, 1807, aged 86, and was buried in St. George's chapel, Windſor.

Dousa, James, a Dutchman, born at Northwick 1545. After ſtudying at Paris, he returned to Holland, and applied himſelf to political affairs. For twenty years he was curator of the banks and dykes of Holland, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo much at the ſiege of Leyden in 1574, that the prince of Orange made him governor of the town. He was eminent as a ſcholar, and his genius was diſplayed in ſeveral poetical productions. He alſo wrote the annals of his country, beſides critical notes on Horace, Salluſt, Plautus, Catullus, Tibullus, &c. He died 1604. James, his eldeſt ſon, was a very extraordinary genius, who attained maturity of wiſdom and erudition in the flower of youth. Beſides poems of great merit, he wrote at the age of 19, his book de rebus cœleſtibus—and his panegyric on a ſhadow—critical notes on ſeveral Latin authors, &c. and died 1597, in his 26th year, when his abilities promiſed the nobleſt additions to the greatneſs and learning of his country.

Douvre, Thomas de, a native of Bayeux, raiſed by William the conqueror to the ſee of York, where he rebuilt his cathedral. He compoſed ſome books on muſic. He died 1100.

Dow, Gerard, was born at Leyden 1613. His pieces, which are all ſmall, and to be viewed to advantage, only by the help of a magnifying glaſs, poſſeſs aſtoniſhing expreſſion, and are extremely delicate. He was patient in his labors, and was not leſs than three days in repreſenting a broomſtick, and five in painting a hand. He died in a good old age.

Dowal, William Blue, a Scotchman, born in in 1590, and educated at Musselburgh and St. Andrew's. In 1614 he went to Groningen to study civil law. He was advocate to the army of count Nassau, and in 1629 and 1635 came an ambassador to Charles I. to support the freedom of the seas about the herring-fisheries. He was made by Charles one of the council of state for Scotland, in which office he was continued by Charles II. with the title of ambassador to the United States. He died in London.

DOWNHAM, John, was born at Chester. He was educated at Cambridge, and wrote that well known book, "the Christian warfare." He died in London 1644.

DOWNING, Calibut, an English divine. Disappointed in his views of preferment, he embraced the republican party, and preached violent sermons, asserting the lawfulness of subjects to take up arms against the king. In 1643 he was a grand covenanter, but died the next year.

DRABICIUS, Nicholas, an enthusiast, born 1587, in Moravia. He was a minister at Drakotutz; but the persecutions against him by the protestants obliged him to fly into Hungary, where he turned woollen draper. His frequent inebriety exposed him to the censures of his superiors; but in his 50th year he determined to be a prophet. His visions began in 1638, and though at first disregarded, they engaged the curiosity of the vulgar, and, by denouncing destruction against the house of Austria and the papal power, he inspired with fear even the bravest of generals. He was assisted in his reveries by Comenius, a man of learning but weak principles, with whom he published his revelations called "lux in tenebris." Drabicius was persecuted by the house of Austria, for the ruin which he prophesied against it, and what became of him is unknown. Some suppose that he was burnt as an impostor, and others say that he died in Turkey, where he had taken refuge.

DRACONITES, John, a Lutheran divine, born in Franconia. He was a bishop in Prussia, and the learned author of commentaries on the prophets and the gospels, and began a polyglott bible, and died 1566.

DRAGUT RAIS, i. e. captain Ragut, the successor of Barbarossa, was born of obscure parents in Natolia. He distinguished himself at Naples and Calabria; but being taken by Doria's nephew, he passed 7 long years in captivity. In 1560 he was besieged by Doria in the harbour of Gerbes; but the artful pirate eluded the vigilance of his enemies, by conveying his gallies across the land, and took the capital of Sicily, to the astonishment of his opponents. In 1566 he assisted Solyman II. against Malta, and while reconnoitering, a piece of stone struck by a cannot ball gave him so violent a blow on the ear that he died a short time after.

DRAKE, sir Francis, an illustrious navigator, son of a sailor, born at Tavistock 1545. He was brought up by his kinsman sir John Hawkins, and was purser to a Biscayan trader, and then went to Guinea, and at 22 obtained the command of the Judith. He distinguished himself in the gulph of Mexico under sir John Hawkins, and projected expeditions against the Spaniards in America, in 1570 and 1572. He served in Ireland under the earl of Essex, and at his death he was recommended to Elizabeth, who entered into all his views of attack and discovery. On the 13th of December 1577, he set out on his celebrated voyage, with five ships, and only 164 men. Of these ships two were destroyed on the coast of Brazil as unfit, and one returned home, so that only with his own vessel he entered the straights of Magellan, and coasting along Chili and Peru, he enriched his companions by the plunder of the Spaniards. He sailed as high as the 48 degree of north latitude to find a passage to the European seas, and gave the name of New Albion to the country. Thence he sailed for the Moluccas, and after visiting some savage islands, and enduring many hardships, he doubled the cape of Good Hope on the 15th of March 1580, having then only 57 men and three casks of water. He continued his voyage, and reached Plymouth on the third of Nov. after an absence of two years and ten months. The glory of sailing round the world, and the vast plunder obtained from the Spaniards, were however viewed with indignation by some who regarded Drake as a common pirate; but the queen approved the bold expedition, and on the 4th of April 1581, she went on board his ship at Deptford and dined with him, and conferred on him the honor of knighthood. This ship also was preserved to commemorate the glory of the enterprise, till decaying by time it was broken up, and a chair made of the timber presented to the university of Oxford. In 1585 Drake took St. Jago, St. Domingo, Carthagena, and in 1587 in the attack of Cadiz, he burnt more than 10,000 tons of shipping, which he merrily called burning the Spanish king's beard. When the armada approached England, Drake was made vice-admiral under Howard, and he behaved with great courage, though his eagerness to pursue the plunder proved nearly fatal, by his suffering his admiral to be exposed in the midst of the hostile fleet. He enriched himself by the seizure of Pedro's galleon, which produced 55,000 ducats of gold. He, in 1589, was sent to restore Antonio to the kingdom of Portugal; and he afterwards went to the West Indies, where his quarrel with sir John Hawkins disconcerted the plans of the expedition. These unfortunate events preyed much upon the mind of Drake, he fell into a melancholy, and was carried off by a bloody flux on board his ship near the town of Nombre de Dios 1596. He was twice member of parliament for Bossiney, and afterwards for Plymouth, a town where his name is still revered for the water which he conveyed there in 1587 by a circuitous canal of 20 miles from ſprings at the diſtance of eight miles.

DRAKE, James, a phyſician and political writer, born at Cambridge 1667, and educated there. His "hiſtory of the laſt parliament of king William," 1702, was conſidered as ſo ſevere, that he was proſecuted by the attorney general but acquitted. In 1704, upon the rejection of the bill to prevent occaſional conformity, he ventured with Poley member for Ipſwich, to publiſh the memorial of the church of England, &c. which highly offended Godolphin, and the houſe of commons, who offered a reward for the diſcovery of the author, who however, remained unattacked. In 1706 he was proſecuted for the publication of Mercurius Politicus, a newſpaper, which ſeverely reflected upon government, and though acquitted through a flaw in the information, he took to heart the aſperity of his perſecutors, and falling into a fever he died at Weſtminſter 1707. He wrote, beſides the "Sham lawyer," a comedy,—an Engliſh tranſlation of Herodotus, never publiſhed,—a "new ſyſtem of anatomy," a work of great merit.

DRAKE, William, a phyſician of York. He collected various records, and publiſhed a valuable hiſtory of York, with copper-plates, &c. fol. He died 1760, aged 73.

DRAKE, Roger, D. D. a phyſician, afterwards a popular preacher in London, and one of the Savoy commiſſioners. He died after the reſtoration. He wrote ſome ſermons—a ſacred chronology, &c.

DRAKENBERG, Chriſtian Jacob, the well known centenary of the north, was born at Stravenger, Norway, 1624, and died at Aarrhuys in 1770, aged 146. After living in celibacy till his 113th year, he married a widow, aged 60. His great age brought about him many viſitors, who were pleaſed with his good ſenſe, his humility, and the ſound ſtate of his faculties.

DRAKENBORCH, Arnoldus, profeſſor of hiſtory and eloquence at Utrecht, died 1748, aged 64. He is well known as editor of Livy, 7 vols. 4to. and Silius Italicus with learned notes.

DRAN, Henry Francis le, a famous ſurgeon and lithotomiſt, who died at Paris 1770, aged 85. He was author of obſervations on ſurgery, 2 vols. 12mo.—on gunſhot wounds, &c.

DRAPER, ſir William, an Engliſh general, educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge. He in the Eaſt Indies acquired the rank of colonel. In 1761 he was brigadier in the expedition againſt Belleiſle, and in 1763 he went with Corniſh againſt Manilla. The place was taken, but the ranſom of four millions of dollars, which the governor pledged himſelf to pay, was reſiſted by the Spaniſh government, and the conquerors were thus robbed of their expected reward. Draper was made knight of the bath, and on the reduction of his regiment, colonel of the 16th. In gratitude for his education, he preſented the colors of the conquered fort to King's college. In 1769 he engaged againſt the celebrated Junius, in defence of the marquis of Granby, and his two letters were anſwered with great ſpirit and ſeverity by his unknown antagoniſt. In 1769 he went to America for his health. In 1779 he was made lieutenant governor of Minorca, and on the ſurrender of the place he exhibited 29 charges againſt the governor, Murray, 27 of which were deemed frivolous, and for the other two the governor was reprimanded; after which the accuſer was directed by the court to make an apology to his general. He died at Bath 1787.

DRAYTON, Michael, an Engliſh poet, born at Harſhull, in Warwickſhire, 1563, and educated at Oxford. In 1593 he publiſhed the ſhepherd's garland, after reprinted under the name of paſtorals, and before 1598 he preſented before the public his Barons' wars, England's heroical epiſtles, downfalls of Robert duke of Normandy, Matilda, and Gaveſton. Thus diſtinguiſhed, he welcomed the arrival of James I. in a congratulatory poem, but he met with marked neglect from the court. In 1613 he publiſhed the firſt part of his Poly-Olbion, a deſcriptive poem, which in its account of the rivers, mountains, antiquities, and remarkable hiſtorical features, contains more correctneſs and truth of delineation than real poetry. The metre of 12 ſyllables is particularly offenſive, and the poem is now regarded only for the accuracy of its deſcription. In 1627 Drayton publiſhed a ſecond volume of his poems, containing the battle of Agincourt, miſeries of queen Margaret, court of fairies, queſt of Cynthia, ſhepherds' ſyrena, elegies, and a ſpirited ſatire againſt female affectation called mooncalf. In 1630 another volume appeared called the muſes' elyſium, &c. Drayton died 1631, and was buried among the poets in Weſtminſter-abbey.

DREBEL, Cornelius, a philoſopher, born at Alcmaer 1572, died in London, 1634. As he pretended to be an alchymiſt ſome particulars are related with reſpect to his power to cauſe rain, cold, &c. by his machines. Some attribute the invention of the microſcope and the thermometer to him, to which ſome add the teleſcope.

DRELINCOURT, Charles, a calviniſt miniſter, born at Sedan 1595, and educated there and at Saumur. Though a proteſtant, and the enemy of the papiſts, he was univerſally eſteemed by them. His diſcourſes as a preacher were very edifying, and his writings particularly conſolatory, as intereſting the ſoul in that inward devotion and ſincerity of prayer which alone can prove acceptable to the God of purity. Of his writings, 13 were controverſial. He alſo publiſhed conſolations againſt the fear of death, which have paſſed through more than forty editions, and have been tranſlated into various languages,—his charitable viſit, in 5 vols. and 3 vols. of ſermons, &c. are equally remarkable for piety and devotion. He died 1669.

bey of St. Juſt, and became counſellor of ſtate, and in 1717, paſſed as ambaſſador to England to ſign the triple alliance. He was next miniſter and ſecretary of ſtate, archbiſhop of Cambray, and in 1722 raiſed to the dignity of prime miniſter. He died 1723, aged 67, deſpiſed as an intriguing politician, an immoral prieſt, and a deſigning hypocrite.

DUBOIS, Dorothea, daughter of Anneſley, afterwards earl of Angleſea, married a muſician, and endeavoured by her writings to reclaim her rights from her father, who had diſowned her as his child. She wrote the divorce, a muſical entertainment,—and Theodore, a novel, two vols. 1770, in which ſhe delineates her hiſtory. She died 1774.

DUBOIS, Simon, a painter of Antwerp, who came to England, where he met encouragement. His battles, cattle, &c. were highly finiſhed. He died 1708.

DUBOS, Jerome, a Dutch painter, whoſe repreſentation of hell was finiſhed with ſuch effect that it ſtruck terror into the ſpectators. He lived in the 16th century.

DUC, Fronton du, a Jeſuit of Bourdeaux, well known as a critic and Greek ſcholar. He is the editor of Chryſoſtom's work, ſix vols. fol. 1613,—three volumes of controverſy,—of the hiſtoire tragique de la pucelle d'Orleans, &c. He died of the ſtone at Paris, 1624.

DUCAREL, Andrew Coltee, a learned antiquarian, born at Greenwich 1714, and educated at Eton, and St. John's college, Oxford. In 1757 he was Lambeth librarian under Hutton, and he devoted himſelf in improving the catalogues of that valuable collection. Of all his preferments that which pleaſed him moſt was his commiſſariate of St. Catharine's, of which he has given an elaborate hiſtory, with beautiful engravings. He was ſo fond of antiquities that he travelled every year in company with his friend Gale, with a Camden's Britannia and a ſet of maps, and by proceeding about 15 miles a day, examined every place with accuracy. He was chearful and hoſpitable, and of his knowledge of antiquities, the beſt ſpecimen is his hiſtory of Croydon palace, and of Lambeth, &c. He died at South Lambeth, aged 72, 1785.

DUCART, Iſaac, a flower painter of Amſterdam. He painted generally on ſatin, with extraordinary effect. He died 1697, aged 67.

DUCAS, Michael, a Greek hiſtorian, author of a hiſtory of the Grecian empire from Andronicus the elder to the fall of the empire. Though his language is inelegant, he relates with impartiality.

DUCHAL, James, a diſſenting miniſter, born in Ireland 1697, and educated at Glaſgow. After being 11 years miniſter of a diſſenting congregation at Cambridge, he ſucceeded at Antrim, and then ſettled in Wood-ſtreet, Dublin. He died 1761. In the decline of life he wrote about 700 ſermons, out of which were ſelected the three vols. 8vo. publiſhed 1764.

DUCHANGE, Gaſpard, a French engraver, who died 1757, aged 97. After engaging on the engraving of Leda, Io, and Danae, without draperies, he executed the driving of the money changers, and the phariſee's ſupper.

DUCHAT, Jacob le, a Frenchman, born at Metz 1658. After the revocation of the edict at Nantes, he ſettled at Berlin, where he died 1735. He edited the Menippean ſatires, the works of Rabelais, &c. and contributed much to the completion of Bayle's dictionary.

DUCHATEL, Gaſpard, a deputy in the French convention, celebrated for his manly defence of Lewis XVI. Theſe honorable efforts were regarded by the tyrants with envy, and Duchatel, falſely accuſed of holding a treaſonable correſpondence with the Vendean rebels, was guillotined 1793.

DUCHE' DE VANCY, Joſeph Francis, a French poet, born at Paris 1668. He was patroniſed by madame Maintenon. He was member of the academy of inſcriptions, &c. and died 1704, aged 37. He wrote three tragedies, Jonathan, Abſalom, and Deborah, beſides ballets and pieces for the opera, of great merit.

DUCK, Arthur, a civilian, born in Devonſhire 1580, and educated at Exeter college, and Hart-hall, Oxford. He became fellow of All-ſouls, and after travelling through France, Italy, and Germany, he was made chancellor of Bath and Wells, afterwards of London, and then maſter of the requeſts. He ſuffered much during the civil wars for his loyalty, and died at Chiſwick 1649. He wrote vita Henrici Chichele, &c.

DUCK, Stephen, a poet, of extraordinary fortune, who from a threſher became the reſpectable miniſter of a pariſh. Though little bleſſed with education, he was endowed with a ſtrong mind and perſevering temper; and at 24 he applied to the acquiſition of knowledge thoſe few hours which he could ſpare from the menial occupation of a ſervant. By little and little he purchaſed a few books, and became ſomething of a poet and of a philoſopher. The lines of Milton enriched his imagination, and the correctneſs of Addiſon's Spectators improved his underſtanding, and helped him in the regular diſpoſition of his thoughts. His poetical attempts were made known to ſome of the clergy, and at laſt to queen Caroline, who ſettled a penſion of 30l. upon him, and enabled him not only to live independently, but to take orders; after which he was preſented to the living of Byfleet, Surrey. Here he behaved with great propriety; he was followed as a preacher, and reſpected as a man; but his ſpirits ſunk into a dreadful melancholy, and, in an unfortunate moment, he threw himſelf from a bridge, near Reading, into the Thames, and was drowned 1756. His poems have been publiſhed; and though he was not a firſt-rate poet, yet he poſſeſſed merit.

DUCLOS, Charles Dineau, hiſtoriographer of France, was born in Bretagne, 1705, and educated at Paris. In 1744 he was mayor of Dinant, and in 1755 received a patent of nobility, and died 1772 refpected and beloved. Though confidered as one of the philofophers of France, he was moderate in his opinions, and the friend of morality and virtue. He never publifhed any thing as hiftoriographer, and obferved, that he never would ruin himfelf by fpeaking truth, nor debafe himfelf by flattery. His hiftory of Lewis XV. was, after his death, lodged in the hands of the minifter. His works are romances, ingenious and intereffing—the confeffion of count —the baronefs de Luz —hiftory of Lewis XI. 3 vols. 12mo. &c.

Dinant,

Duclos, Mary Ann, a French actrefs, of merit, born at Paris. She excelled in the reprefentation of queens and princeffes. Her name of Duclos was aflumed; fhe married, in 1730, Duchemin, an actor, from whom fhe was divorced three years after. She died 1748, aged 78.

Ducreux, N. a native of Paris, eminent as a painter. He was at Vienna to take portraits of the imperial family. He died of an apoplexy, 1802, aged 64.

Dudeffant, N. a French lady, well known in Paris for her knowledge of criticifm, her elegant tafte, and her pleafing manners. She died 1780, aged 84, the laft thirty of which fhe had been blind.

Dudith, Andrew, a divine born at Buda, 1533, and employed by Ferdinand II. in affairs of importance, and made bifhop of Tina, in Dalmatia. He was a man of fuch application that he is faid to have tranfcribed three times Cicero, to make himfelf mafter of his ftyle and manner. He was at the council of Trent, where he became intimate with cardinal Pole; and at his return he embraced the proteftant religion, refigned his bifhopric, and married one of the queen's maids of honor. He died 1589. His works on phyfic, controverfy, and poetry, are numerous, and poffefs merit.

Dudley, Edward, a celebrated lawyer and ftatefman, born in 1462. He was educated at Oxford, and removed to Gray's inn; Henry VII. made him one of his favorites. In 1504 he was fpeaker of the houfe of commons, and two years after he obtained the ftewardfhip of the rape of Haftings. It is faid that Henry, to fill his coffers, ufed this artful favorite, who, little regardlefs of confcience or of reputation, joined with Empfon to oppreff the people, and by various methods of intrigue, or terror, extorted great fines, fo that, according to Bacon, they turned law and juftice to wormwood and rapine. But Henry was fcarce in his grave before the public indignation called for punifhment; and Empfon and Dudley after being attainted and convicted of high treafon, loft their heads on Tower-hill, 1510. During his imprifonment in the Tower, Dudley wrote "the tree of the commonwealth."

Dudley, John, fon of the above, earl of Warwick, and duke of Northumberland, was born in 1502. He was reftored in blood, and became known at court as the friend of Suffolk, of Wolfey, and of Cromwell, and as the favorite of the king. Henry created him vifcount l'Ifle, and afterwards, for his fervices, appointed him high admiral for life. On the death of Henry, Dudley was fucceeded as high admiral by fir Thomas Seymour, brother to Somerfet the protector; but, as an equivalent, he was created earl of Warwick. He was employed againft the infurgents of Norfolk, and inftead of fighting, he prevailed upon them to deliver up their leaders. His influence was fo great, that the young king confided much to his advice; he was made duke of Northumberland, and a fhort-lived reconciliation was effected between him and Somerfet. Rivalfhip, however, could never be extinguifhed. Somerfet, though uncle to the king, was tried and executed for a pretended confpiracy againft Northumberland. The victorious but guilty favorite fucceeded to all the honors of his enemy, and not only guided the young king, but in confequence of his weak ftate determined to raife his own family to the fovereign power. He effected a marriage between his fourth fon Guilford Dudley, and lady Jane Gray, in whofe favor he caufed Edward to fettle the fucceffion. No fooner had Edward expired than Jane was proclaimed queen. When the men of Suffolk rofe up in favor of Mary, Northumberland advanced to check the infurgents. He foon found however the unpopularity of his meafures, and retired to Cambridge, where feeing his followers defert, he affected attachment to Mary, and caufed her to be proclaimed queen. Mary pleafed with her fuccefs did not relent towards her enemy, Northumberland was arraigned and loft his head on Tower-hill, after making a profeffion of the Romifh religion 22d Aug. 1553. Thus fell this powerful fubject, whofe virtues were loft by reftlefs ambition, which fwept away not only him but the innocent lady Jane, and her virtuous confort.

Dudley, Ambrofe, fon of the preceding, was knighted for his bravery againft the Norfolk infurgents, and fhared the condemnation of his father, but was pardoned. In 1557, he diftinguifhed himfelf at the fiege of St. Quintin, and was reftored in blood by Mary, and was under Elizabeth created earl of Warwick. He had no fhare in the difgraceful meafures of the times, and therefore was called "the good earl of Warwick." He died of the amputation of his leg from a wound received in the defence of Newhaven againft the French, 1589.

Dudley, Robert, earl of Leiceffer, fon of John duke of Northumberland, was born 1532. He became a favorite at the court of Edward, and was knighted, but under Mary he fell into difgrace and was condemned, but by the queen's favor reftored in blood. On the acceffion of Elizabeth he became a great favorite, and was made knight of the garter, mafter of the horfe, and fo much flattered that he was called "the heart of the court." Though opposed by Sussex, he obtained the grant of whatever lands and offices he pleased, to gratify his pride, or the avarice of his friends. Elizabeth proposed him in marriage to Mary queen of Scots, with the intention of admitting him to share her bed, if that princess listened to the proposal. Mary however rejected this offer from Dudley, who in 1560 had caused his wife to be strangled and thrown down a pair of stairs at Cumnor near Abingdon, that she might not stand in the way of his ambition. In 1564 he was created earl of Leicester, and to the honors of chancellor of Oxford and high steward of Cambridge, was added the order of St. Michael from the king of France. About 1572 he privately married lady Douglas Sheffield, but he never acknowledged her as his wife, and when he espoused lady Essex, he, after attempting in vain to pacify her, endeavoured to cut her off by poison, from which she escaped, with the loss of her hair and nails. Though Leicester stood high in the graces of the queen, Elizabeth was highly displeased with his union with lady Essex, of which she had been kept ignorant, and in 1584 an attack was made on him by a work called "Leicester's commonwealth," which exhibited him in the odious character of an atheist, a traitor, a public oppressor, and a monster of ambition, cruelty, and lust. This famous book, considered as so hostile to overgrown ministers, and afterwards republished to bring into disgrace the government of Charles I. and of Anne, was read with avidity by the people; but Elizabeth screened her favorite. In 1585 he went to the Low countries as governor, but his conduct was displeasing to the queen, and he was recalled, but soon to be reinstated in the royal favor. In 1588 he was made lieutenant-general of the army assembled at Tilbury to oppose the Spanish armada, and he there received high commendation from the queen. He died Sept. 4th, 1588, at Cornbury Oxfordshire. This ambitious favorite was endowed with great talents; the influence which he possessed over the queen he maintained by duplicity. He affected regularity and piety to an offensive degree, but when his views were thwarted, neither virtue nor innocence could resist the secrecy of his measures. Poisoning was the favorite recipe to which he had recourse to remove his enemies or rivals.

DUDLEY, Robert, son of the earl of Leicester by lady Douglas Sheffield, was born at Sheen in Surrey 1573. His birth was carefully concealed from the queen, as well as lady Essex. He was educated at Offingham in Sussex, and Christchurch, Oxford. Though he inherited the better part of his father's estate, yet dissatisfied with indolence, he projected a voyage to the South seas, which however the government would not suffer to proceed till 1594. In 1605 he commenced a suit to prove the legitimacy of his birth, but he was opposed by the lady dowager of Essex, and he retired to the continent, where he assumed the title of earl of Warwick. He settled at Florence, where he was patronised by Cosmo II. and by the influence of his consort, sister to the emperor Ferdinand II. he was created a duke of the Roman empire, and afterwards enrolled by pope Urban VIII. among the Roman nobility. He formed the plan for draining the morass between Pisa and the sea, and he raised Leghorn from an insignificant town to a populous sea port. He lived in great magnificence, and to his titles assumed that of duke of Northumberland. He died at Carbello, near Florence, 1659. In philosophy, chemistry, and physic, he was as eminent as in politics. The account of his voyage is published in Hackluyt's collection, and his principal work besides, is "del arcano del mare," &c. valuable for its charts and plans, and for projects for the improvement of commerce and navigation. He also wrote a proposition to bridle the impertinence of parliaments, &c. submitted to James, and intended to pave the recall of the intriguing author to England.

DUFFET, Thomas, from a milliner, became a dramatic writer. He travestied Dryden, Shadwell, and Settle, but his plays have long since been forgotten. His Mock tempest, Psyche, Emperors of Morocco lived for a day. He flourished in the 17th century.

DUFRESNE, Abraham Alexis Quinault, a French actor of eminence. It is remarkable that in private life, he could scarce forget the authority which he exercised as a theatrical monarch. He died 1767 aged 72.

DUFRESNY, Charles Riviere, of Paris, was called grandson of Henry IV. from his great resemblance to that monarch. He was employed about the court, in laying out garden and pleasure grounds, and became a dramatic writer. He died 1724, aged 86.

DUGARD, William, of Broomsgrove, Worcestershire, was educated at Worcester school, and Sidney college, Cambridge. About 1631 he was master of Stamford school, and in 1637 of Colchester school, and in 1644 of merchant taylors', London. He was displaced for assisting in the printing of Salmasius's defence, and was imprisoned in Newgate, and his wife and children reduced to poverty, 1650. He was reinstated in 1662 but again rejected, when he opened a school in Coleman-street. He died 1682. His "Lexicon Græci Testamenti" has been improved by Bowyer. He wrote besides a compendium of rhetoric, a Greek grammar, &c.

DUGDALE, sir William, an historian and antiquary, born at Shustoke near Coleshill, Warwickshire 1605. He was educated at Coventry grammar-school, and in 1623 he married and settled at Blythe-hall near Coleshill. He devoted himself to the study of antiquities, and in 1638 he came to London, and procured an appointment in the Herald's office. In this favorite retreat he improved his collections, and took draughts of the most celebrated of the English cathedrals. He was with Charles at the battle of Edge-hill, and at the ſiege of Oxford. After compounding for his eſtate he applied himſelf in completing a collection from the records of the Tower, and other places. Of his monaſticon Anglicanum the firſt volume appeared in folio 1655, the ſecond 1661, and the third 1673, a curious collection of all the foundation charters of diſſolved monaſteries. His antiquities of Warwickſhire were publiſhed in 1656, after 20 years' labor. His hiſtory of St. Paul's cathedral was publiſhed in 1658. At the reſtoration, he was made norroy king at arms, and in 1677 created garter, and knighted by the king. He died at Blythe-hall, of a cold, 1686, in his 81ſt year. One of his daughters married Aſhmole of antiquarian memory, his ſons all died young except John, who was Windſor herald, and norroy king at arms, and was knighted, and died 1690. Sir William wrote alſo the hiſtory of draining and embanking fens and marches, &c.—Spelman's councils from 1066, to 1531—Spelman's gloſſarium archaiologicum, &c.—origines juridicales, &c.—the baronage of England three vols. fol.—a ſhort view of the late troubles in England, &c.—the antient uſage of bearing arms, &c.

Dugomier, N. a French general, born at Martinico. He commanded in Italy, retook Toulon from the Engliſh, and defeated the Spaniards, but was killed 1794, at St. Sebaſtian.

Duguay-Trouin, René, a French admiral, born at St. Maloes, 1673. In various encounters with the Engliſh and the Dutch, he came off victorious, and in 1711 he took Rio Janeiro from the Portugueſe, and every where diſplayed the greateſt ſkill united with the moſt conſummate wiſdom. He died at Paris 1736.

Duguet, James Joſeph, a French writer, born 1649. He was a prieſt of the oratory, and went to Bruſſels, but returned to Paris, where he led a retired life, and died 1733. He wrote nearly 20 works in French, on theological ſubjects, in a ſtyle clear, pleaſing, and perſpicuous.

Duhalde, John Baptiſt, a French Jeſuit. His hiſtorical and geographical deſcription of the empire of China, and Chineſe Tartary, in 4 vols fol. was compiled from the records of French miſſionaries, a work of great merit. He wrote beſides Latin poems—eſſays—letters &c. and died at Paris 1743, aged 69.

Duhamel du Monceau, Henry Lewis, a Frenchman who devoted himſelf to agriculture and commerce, the marine, and mechanical arts. He publiſhed various ingenious works, and died 1782, aged 82.

Dujardin, Charles, of Amſterdam, died at Venice 1674, aged 34. He excelled in the delineation of markets, robbers, mountebanks, and landſcapes. About 50 of his engravings in aqua fortis are preſerved.

Duke, Richard, a poet, educated at Weſtminſter ſchool and Trinity college, Cambridge. He was the friend of Otway, and was tutor to the duke of Richmond. His poetry is not very reſpectable. He was chaplain to the king, prebendary of Glouceſter, and obtained the living of Witney, Oxfordſhire, where he was found dead in his bed, 1711. He publiſhed a volume of ſermons and another of poems.

Dulau, John Marie, of Perigueux, was archbiſhop of Arles. Though he did not, through timidity, ſpeak in favor of moderation in the revolution yet he wrote with ſpirit and ability againſt the baniſhment of the prieſts. He was arreſted, and was ſacrificed in the priſon of the Carmes Sept. 1792.

Dulaurent, N. of Artois, employed his abilities on ſubjects of licentiouſneſs. The beſt known of his immoral works, is his Compere Matthieu, 3 vols. He died about the end of the laſt century.

Dume'e, Joan, of Paris, married very young, and at 17 loſt her huſband, who fell in Germany at the head of his company. She devoted herſelf to aſtronomy, and publiſhed in 1680, "diſcourſes of Copernicus on the mobility of the earth," 4to. in which ſhe diſplays great knowledge.

Dumont, John, of Carlſcroon, hiſtoriographer to the emperor, fled to Holland, upon the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He wrote "des memoires politiques, &c." 4 vols. 12mo. an uſeful performance to the year 1676 —travels in France, Italy, &c. 4 vols. 12mo. —&c. He died about 1726 at a great age.

Dumourier, Anthony Francis Duperier, of Paris, was author of Richardet, a poem, 2 vols.—ſome comedies tranſlated from the Italian, Spaniſh, and Engliſh—an opera, &c. He died 1767, aged 60.

Dun, David Erſkine lord, of Dun, was educated at St. Andrew's and Paris. He was called to the bar, 1696, and oppoſed the Scottiſh union. He was called to the bench 1711, and took the name of Dun. He died at Dun 1755, five years after he had retired from the court of juſticiary, aged 85. His "advices," is an excellent performance.

Dunbar, William, a poet of Scotland, born 1465 at Salton. After travelling as a noviciate of the franciſcan order, he returned home in his 25th year. His "thiſtle and the roſe," was written on the marriage of James IV. with Margaret daughter of Henry VII. but whilſt he expected preferment for his poetry, he was diſappointed; for the great liſten with delight to the compliments of the learned, but ſeldom reward merit. He wrote beſides, the goldin terge,—the freirs of Berwick—the twa marrit wemen—and the wedo. His poetry is commended by Warton, as next in rank to Chaucer's and Lydgate's. He died about 1580.

Duncan, Mark, profeſſor of philoſophy, and principal of the Calviniſts' college at Saumur, was invited by James I. to ſettle near his perſon, which he declined, and he died 1640 at Saumur. He wrote ſome philoſophical works, &c.

DUNCAN, Daniel, was a phyſician of Montauban in Languedoc, of a family of Scottiſh original. His mother's brother, Daniel Paul, had him educated, and at Montpellier he ſtudied eight years, and took his degree of M. D. From Montpellier he came to Paris, and publiſhed his "explication nouvelle & mechanique des actions animales, 1678," which was well received, and then he viſited London. After a reſidence of two years he was recalled to Paris, on account of the health of his patron Colbert. About this time he publiſhed his "chymie naturelle, ou explication de la nourriture de l'animal," which was read with univerſal applauſe. On the death of Colbert he retired to Montauban with the intention of ſettling in London. The perſecution of the proteſtants forced him for refuge to Geneva, and afterwards to Berne, where he obtained the profeſſorſhip of anatomy. He went next to attend the princeſs of the landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel, where, for three years, he was treated with the reſpect due to his merit. At this time he wrote his popular treatiſe on the abuſe of hot liquors, eſpecially tea, coffee, and chocolate. He next ſettled at the Hague, and 12 years after went to London, where he died 1735, aged 86. He wrote beſides, "hiſtoire de l'animal, &c." and left beſides ſeveral manuſcripts on medical ſubjects.

DUNCAN, William, profeſſor of philoſophy in the Mariſchal college of Aberdeen, was born at Aberdeen 1717, and educated there. He came to London in 1739, and employed himſelf in writing for the booksellers. He tranſlated ſome books from the French, and was concerned in Watſon's tranſlation of Horace. He was the coadjutor of Johnſon, Campbell, and Fordyce, in the preceptor which Dodſley publiſhed, and wrote the logical part. He alſo tranſlated ſeveral of Cicero's orations, and likewiſe Cæſar's commentaries, &c. In 1753 he removed to Aberdeen, and died 1760, aged 43.

He became aſſiſtant preacher at St. Anne's Soho, where his eloquence as an orator gained him reſpect. He married in 1763, the daughter of Mr. Highmore the painter, and in 1766, Secker appointed him one of the ſix Canterbury preachers, and the next primate, Cornwallis, preſented him to Herne, ſix miles from Canterbury. He was alſo maſter of Harbledown and St. John's hoſpitals, and as an active magiſtrate he encouraged virtue and checked vice. He was attacked by a paralytic ſtroke 1785, from which he never recovered, and died the following January. His works are chiefly fugitive pieces publiſhed in Dodſley's collection, and in periodical magazines, beſides the Seminead, and a poem on the death of Frederic prince of Wales.

DUNLOP, William, M. A. of Glaſgow, ſtudied the law at Utrecht, but abandoned it at the repreſentation of Mr. Wiſhart, and became regius profeſſor of divinity and church hiſtory at Edinburgh 1716. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf much as a preacher, and died of a dropſy 1720, aged 28. He publiſhed two volumes of ſermons 12mo. and an eſſay on confeſſions of faith.

DUNLOP, Alexander, M. A. brother to the above, was born 1684, in America, where his father was in exile. He came over at the revolution, and was in 1720 profeſſor of Greek in Glaſgow univerſity. He publiſhed in 1736, a Greek grammar ſtill uſed in the Scotch univerſity, and died 1742, aged 58.

DUNN, Samuel, a mathematician of Crediton, Devonſhire, where he kept a ſchool. He removed to Chelſea, where he was appointed mathematical examiner of thoſe officers who entered into the Eaſt India company's ſervice. He died 1792, author of ſeveral mathematical treatiſes, &c.

DUNNING, John, lord Aſhburton, was born 1731, at Aſhburton, in Devonſhire. He roſe by his merit at the bar, and was raiſed to the peerage in 1782, and made chancellor of the duchy of Lancaſter, and recorder of Briſtol. He died 1783.

DUNOIS, John, natural ſon of Lewis duke of Orleans, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in arms, in the defeat of the earls of Warwick and Suffolk, folk, and in the defence of Orleans, till relieved by Joan of Arc. He purfued the Engliſh, and took from them Blaie, Bourdeaux, Bayonne, &c. He was rewarded by Charles VII. who called him the reſtorer of his country, and gave him the office of grand chamberlain of France. He died 1468, aged 61.

Duns, John, called Duns Scotus, of the franciſcan order, was born at Dunſtance, Northumberland. He was fellow of Merton, Oxford, and went over to Paris, where his abilities procured him the appellation of the ſubtile doctor. He oppoſed the doctrines of Aquinas, hence his followers were called Scotiſts, and his opponents Thomiſts. He afterwards went to Cologne where he died 1308. It has been ſaid by Paul Jovius that he was attacked by an apoplexy and buried as dead, and that on his recovery, he languiſhed in his coffin till he expired. His works were 10 vols folio.

Dunstan, St. archbiſhop of Canterbury, was born in 924. He was alſo abbot of Glaſtonbury. He is well known as a man of intrigue, and of great ſpiritual power. The pope knowing his influence, made him his legate. He died 988.

Dunton, John, of Graffham, Huntingdonſhire, upon failing in his buſineſs as bookſeller, after 20 years' ſucceſs, began author, and 1701 was employed in the Poſt angel paper. He afterwards began the Athenian Mercury, and in 1710 he publiſhed his Athenianiſm, containing 600 treatiſes, in proſe and verſe, on all ſubjects. Though prolix he poſſeſſes merit as a ſatiriſt. He alſo wrote "Dunton's life and errors," and died about 1725.

Du Paty, preſident of the parliament of Bourdeaux, died at Paris 1788. His hiſtorical reflections on penal laws, are valuable. He wrote alſo academical letters and diſcourſes on Italy, 2 vols. 8vo.. 1788.

Duphot, N. a French general, ambaſſador to the pope. He was there aſſaſſinated in 1797, and though the pope could not prevent the fatal commotion, the death of the ambaſſador was made a pretext by the French for ſeizing the eccleſiaſtical ſtates.

Dupin, Lewis Ellis, a critic of Paris. He devoted himſelf to the compoſition of his great work called "Bibliotheque univerſelle des auteurs eccleſiaſtiques," the firſt volume of which appeared 1686. The boldneſs with which he ſpoke of various writers offended the critics, and the author was obliged to retract ſome of his opinions, and to ſuppreſs the work in 1693, with the privilege of continuing it under the title of Bibliotheque nouvelle. Beſides this work brought down in ſeveral volumes to the end of the 16th century, Dupin wrote others, the chief of which are—prolegomena to the bible,—notes on the pſalms and pentateuch,—a profane hiſtory,—a treatiſe of power eccleſiaſtical and temporal,—and method of ſtudying divinity, &c. He was profeſſor of the Royal college, from which he was removed in the famous cas de conſcience, but afterwards reſtored. He died at Paris 1719, aged 62. He was a man of extenſive erudition, and of indefatigable application.

Dupleix, Scipio, of Condom was maſter of requeſts, and hiſtoriographer of France. In his old age he wrote a book on the liberties of the Gallican church, which he preſented to chancellor Seguier, but the courtier threw it into the fire, which ſo ſhocked the venerable author, that he returned to Condom and died ſoon after, of deep vexation 1661, aged 92. His works are memoirs of the Gauls 1650 folio. a book of great value,—hiſtory of France in 6 vols folio.—Roman hiſtory 3 vols. folio,—a courſe of philoſophy 3 vols. 12mo. &c.

Dupleix, Joſeph, was director of Chandernagore in the Eaſt Indies, a colony which, by his wiſdom, he raiſed to conſequence and opulence. He eſtabliſhed mercantile connections with the Red ſea, the Maldives, Goa, the Manillas, &c. and was made governor of Pondicherry in 1742, and defended the place in 1748 for 42 days againſt two Engliſh admirals. For theſe ſervices he was rewarded by the French king with the title of marquis, and by the great mogul with the title of nabob. He was recalled in 1753, and ſo hurt by being removed from the exerciſe of ſovereign power to a private ſtation, that he fell under a dejection of ſpirits and died ſoon after.

Duport, James, of Cambridge, profeſſor of Greek, and maſter of Magdalen college. He was dean of Peterborough and died 1680. He wrote a Greek verſion of the pſalms,—gnomologia Homeri, &c.

Duppa, Brian, a learned prelate, born 1589 at Lewiſham, Kent, and educated at Weſtminſter, and Chriſt-church, Oxford. In 1612 he was elected fellow of All-ſouls, and after travelling in France and Spain, he was in 1629 made dean of Chriſt-church. In 1638 he became tutor to prince Charles, and to his brother James, and was raiſed to the ſee of Chicheſter. In 1641 he was tranſlated to Saliſbury, and on the ſuppreſſion of epiſcopacy he attended his maſter, eſpecially in the iſle of Wight, and aſſiſted him it is ſaid in the compoſition of the Eikon Baſilike. He afterwards lived retired at Richmond, till the reſtoration, when he was made biſhop of Winchеſter, and lord almoner. He died in 1662 aged 73. A few hours before he expired, Charles II. viſited this venerable prelate, and kneeling by his bedſide implored his bleſſing, which the dying man, placing one hand on the king's head, and raiſing the other to heaven, gave him with great fervor. He wrote ſome things on devotional ſubjects, &c.

Duprat, Anthony, a French ſtateſman, who roſe to the firſt preſidency of the parliament of Paris 1507, and the chancellorſhip of France 1515. He was tutor to Francis I. and by checking his criminal paſſion for the wife of Lewis XII. he gained his confidence. He adviſed him to raiſe money by ſelling the offices offices of judicature, and by his suggestion the chamber called Tournelle was established, which improved the royal revenue. By his advice Francis also abolished the pragmatic sanction, and established the concordat, by which the king nominated to vacant benefices. This rendered Duprat a favorite at Rome, and from the fees of Meaux, &c. he was honored with the purple 1527. He was afterwards a legate in France, and on the death of Clement VII. aspired to the tiara, which the French king by no means promoted. He died at Nanteuillet 1535, overwhelmed with remorse, and worn out by diseases. To increase his power or enlarge his fortune, he scrupled at no sacrifice either of fame or virtue, and therefore his death was as unlamented as his life had been guilty. The king observed of his hall at Hotel Dieu, that it should have been much larger, if it could contain all the poor Duprat had made.

Dupre, Mary, of the 17th century, studied Descartes, and was called the Cartesienne. She was intimate with the learned, and her pieces of poetry and also her prose writings were read with applause.

Dupre de St. Maur, Nicholas Francis, of Paris, died 1774, aged 80. He translated Milton's Paradise lost, with Addison's odes, and also Paradise regained, 4 vols. 12mo. He wrote an essay on the coins of France, 1740, 4to. a valuable work—inquiries on the value of money, &c.

Durant, Gilles, advocate in the parliament of Paris, was appointed by the court to reform the customs of Paris. He possessed great talents for ludicrous poetry, and his verses on the ass that had joined the league, and had fallen during the siege of Paris 1590, are much admired. He wrote other humorous pieces, some of which are licentious.

Durant, John Stephen, of Toulouse, violently opposed the league, and perished in a tumult which he endeavoured to appease, 1589. This meritorious martyr had the year before preserved Toulouse from the plague, and he had deserved the affection of his country by his liberality and charity. He wrote a book de ritibus ecclesiæ.

Durbach, Anne Louisa, a German poetess, born 1722. From watching cattle, she rose to distinction by the reading of books. At 17 she married a woolcomber, but was exposed to great poverty, till the age of 40, when her muse celebrated in a triumphal ode the battle of Lowoschutz. This piece was noticed by the Prussian monarch, who sent for the poetess to Berlin, and placed her above want. She died about 1780.

Durell, John, was born 1626 in Jersey, and educated at Merton college, which he left at the beginning of the civil wars. He was ordained by the bishop of Galloway at Paris 1651, and at the restoration was chaplain to the king, and preferred to a prebend at Salisbury, afterwards at Windsor, and then at Durham. In 1677 he was made dean of Windsor. He died 1683, aged 58. His writings were chiefly controversial,—a vindication of the church of England against schismatics—a view of the government, &c. of the church of England, 4to. &c.

Durell, David, of Jersey, was educated at Pembroke college, Oxford, and became fellow of Hertford college, of which in 1757 he was made principal. In 1767 he was made prebendary of Canterbury, and was vice chancellor, and died 1775, aged 47. He was author of critical remarks on the books of Job, Psalms, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, 4to.—the Hebrew text of the parallel prophecies of Jacob and Moses, relating to the 12 tribes, &c. 4to.

Durer, Albert, a painter and engraver, born at Nuremberg 1471. After being well instructed in arithmetic, perspective, and geometry, he exhibited some of his pieces before the public, and his three graces fixed the admiration of his country upon him, in 1497. He painted little, therefore his pictures are very scarce, and as highly valued. His Adam and Eve are still preserved at Prague, and also a picture of Christ bearing the cross, an adoration of the wise men, &c. His engravings are highly admired. Instead of engraving on copper, he first attempted to work on wood, and his first pieces in that way, were the beheading of John the Baptist, and the presentation of his head to Herod, published in 1510. One of his best pieces is said by Vasari to be a St. Eustachius kneeling before a stag. He died in his native city 1528. Besides his reputation as an artist, he possessed a respectable character in private life. He wrote some books in German, on the rules of painting,—institutiones geometriæ, &c. His wife, who was beautiful, but is described by some as a Xantippe, sat to him, and from her features he painted the Virgin Mary.

Duret, Lewis, a physician, who practised at Paris. He was esteemed by Henry III. who granted him a pension, and was present at the marriage of his daughter. He died 1506, aged 59. He was a true follower of Hippocrates, and treated medicine after the manner of the ancients. His best work is a commentary on Hippocrates, folio.

D'Urfey, Thomas, a facetious poet. His parents were Huguenots, from Rochelle, who settled at Exeter, where the poet was born. He applied to the law, but the volatility of his mind carried him to poetry, and as he possessed wit and the keenness of satire, his plays were received with great applause. His facetiousness and easy manners recommended him to Charles II., who was often seen with him most familiarly leaning on his shoulder, or humming over a song with him. But though popular, his ballads, songs, and plays, possessed all the coarseness of wit, licentiousness, and indelicacy, so that within 30 years after his death, none of his pieces were suffered to appear on the stage.

ſtage. He lived much with lord Dorſet at Knole, where there is ſtill preſerved a picture of him, taken by ſtealth, as he was ſleeping in his chair after dinner. In the laſt part of life he was haunted by poverty, for, regardleſs of the morrow, he always ſquandered the preſent away. To relieve him from diſtreſs, the players, at the ſolicitation of Addiſon, performed the "Plotting ſiſters" for the benefit of the author, who humorouſly ſaid, he had written more odes than Horace, and four times as many comedies as Terence. He died 1723, aged about 70. His ſonnets, ballads, &c. are contained in 6 vols. 12mo. and called "Pills to purge melancholy," and they are handſomely recommended by the 29th number of the Guardian, &c.

DURHAM, James, a Scotch divine, educated in St. Salvador's college, St. Andrew's. He became a popular preacher at Glaſgow, and died of a conſumption 1658, aged 38. He wrote a commentary on the revelations—diſcourſe on ſcandal—ſermons on the 53d of Iſaiah, &c.

DURINGER, Melchior, profeſſor of eccleſiaſtical hiſtory at Berne, fell from the ſtory of his houſe, which was on fire, and died an hour after, 1723, aged 76. The author of phyſica ſacra is much indebted to him.

DURY, or DURÆUS, John, a Scotch divine, who labored to reconcile the Lutherans and Calviniſts, but to little purpoſe. He travelled through Europe, and after conferring with the divines of England, Germany, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Geneva, &c. he, after 40 years' laborious purſuit, found himſelf diſappointed, and though all commended his intentions, none would reſign their faith to the deciſion of their neighbours. In the laſt part of life he was patroniſed by Hedwig Sophia, princeſs of Heſſe. He wrote much in favor of his grand plan.

DUSSAULX, John, of Chartres, after diſtinguiſhing himſelf in the war of Hanover, devoted himſelf to literary purſuits. At the revolution he was one of the 73 proſcribed deputies. He was afterwards member of the council of ancients, and preſident of the national inſtitute, and died at Paris 1799, aged 71. He publiſhed a tranſlation of Juvenal—de la paſſion du jeu, 8vo.—eloge de Blanchet, &c.

DUVAL, Peter, geographer royal of France, died at Paris 1683, aged 65. He is the author of ſome geographical tracts and maps, formerly in great eſteem.

DUVAL, Valentine Jamerai, of Artonay in Champagne, at the age of 10, loſt his father, who was a poor laborer, but though deſtitute, hoped for better times. He hired himſelf to keep the poultry yard of a neighbouring farmer, and by his ſuperior agility guided the ſports of his aſſociates In the winter of 1709 he travelled towards Lorraine, and in the cold journey was attacked by the ſmall-pox under which he muſt have ſunk, but for the timely aſſiſtance of a ſhepherd. Recovered from this malady he went to Clezantine, and was two years in the ſervice of another ſhepherd, and then became an attendant on brother Palemon, at the hermitage of La Rochette. From this abode he removed to the hermitage of St. Anne, near Luneville, and there he learnt to write. His activity was here employed in the purſuit of game, which he ſold to encreaſe his books and knowledge, and his finding of a ſeal belonging to Mr. Forſter, an Engliſh reſident at Luneville, which he very honorably advertiſed, procured him new advantages. Forſter rewarding his honeſty, aſſiſted him in the purchaſe of books and of maps, and his library ſoon encreaſed to 400 volumes. Here, while one day engaged in the ſtudy of a map at the foot of a tree, he was found by the princes of Lorraine, and the ſenſible remarks which he made to his illuſtrious viſitors, engaged ſo much their attention that they promiſed him protection. The young adventurer quitted the hermitage with tears of gratitude, and under the Jeſuits of Pont-a-Mouſſon, he made himſelf maſter of hiſtory, geography, and antiquities. In 1718 he viſited Paris in the ſuite of his patron Leopold, and at his return became his librarian, and alſo profeſſor of hiſtory at Luneville. In this new office he was attended by ſeveral Engliſhmen, and particularly by Pitt, afterwards earl of Chatham, whoſe genius and manners he admired, and whoſe future eminence he prophetically announced. Raiſed to independence, he ſhowed his gratitude to the hermits of St. Anne, by rebuilding their reſidence. On the death of Leopold in 1738, he followed his ſon Francis to Tuſcany, and ſoon after to Vienna, where he had the care of the medals. Here Duval lived reſpected and beloved, and in 1751 he was nominated preceptor to prince Joſeph. In 1752, he viſited Paris, and was honorably received by the learned, and on his return paſſing by Artonay, his native village, he purchaſed the cottage, which the indigence of his ſiſter had ſold, and built on the ſpot where he was born a neat houſe, which he appropriated to the reſidence of the public ſchoolmaſter of the place. This pious character died 1775, aged 81, diſplaying in his laſt moments that reſignation and faith which cloſe the life of a good man.

DYCHE, Thomas, a clergyman, well known as a ſchoolmaſter, at Strafford-le-bow, and as the author of an Engliſh dictionary, ſpelling book, Latin vocabulary, &c. He died about 1750.

DYER, ſir James, of Roundhill, Somerſetſhire, was educated at Broadgate hall, Oxford, and the Middle temple, London. In 1552, he was made ſerjeant at law, and ſpeaker of the houſe of commons. In 1556, he was one of the judges of the common pleas, in 1557 removed to the king's bench, and next was made chief juſtice of the common pleas. He died at Stanton, Huntingdonſhire, 1581, aged 70. He wrote a large volume of reports, com-commended by ſir Edward Coke. He left alſo ſome other law tracts.

Dyer, William, was ejected from his living of Cholesbury, Bucks, in 1662, and turned quaker, and died 1696, aged 60. He wrote ſome ſermons and theological tracts.

Dyer, John, a poet, born at Aberglaſney, Caermarthenſhire, 1700. He was educated at Weſtminſter ſchool, and ſtudied the law, but had a greater reliſh for poetry and deſign, and therefore determined to become a painter. In 1727 he publiſhed his "Grongar-hill," a beautiful little poem, and afterwards ſet out for Italy to delineate the antiquities of that celebrated country. At his return in 1740, appeared his poem, "the ruins of Rome," and ſoon after he took orders. He was preſented to Calthorp, Leiceſterſhire, which he exchanged for Belchford, Lincolnſhire. In 1752 he was preſented to Coningſby, and in 1756 the chancellor added to it, Kirkby on Bane; but whilſt he prepared the improvements of his parſonage, the cup of felicity was daſhed from his hand, and he was carried off by a rapid conſumption, 1758. He left one ſon and three daughters. The ſon, heir to his father's taſte and claſſical knowledge, died in London 1782, aged 32, as he was preparing to extend his travels to Italy. The "fleece," which was publiſhed a little before the poet's death—Grongar-hill—and the ruins of Rome, are the three poems which raiſed Dyer above mortality. The ſimplicity of his lines is enriched with true ſublimity, and the whole breathes forth the pureſt flames of benevolence and humanity.

E.

Eachard, Dr. John, a divine, of Suffolk, educated at Catharine hall, Cambridge, of which he became maſter. He died 1697, aged 61. He is well known as the author of the grounds and occaſions of the contempt of the clergy and religion inquired into, attacked by ſeveral writers, and anſwered by him. In 1672 he publiſhed Hobbes' ſtate of nature conſidered, &c.

Eames, John, of London, was educated at Merchant-taylors', and intended for the miniſtry among the independent diſſenters. A ſtrong defect of ſpeech rendered it impoſſible for him to appear before a congregation, and he employed himſelf in educating young perſons, and after undertaking the claſs of mathematics, the learned languages, and philoſophy, he filled the chair of divinity. His learning recommended him to ſir Iſaac Newton, and procured him a ſeat in the royal ſociety, whoſe tranſactions he abridged. He died 1744.

Earle, John, of York, was educated at Merton college, Oxford, and was tutor to Charles prince of Wales. He was at the reſtoration made dean of Windſor, then biſhop of Worceſter, and in 1663 biſhop of Saliſbury, where he died two years after. He was author of a tranſlation of the Icon Baſilike into Latin —micro coſmography, &c.

Earle, William Benſon, of Shafteſbury, was a man of poliſhed manners, and well acquainted with the circle of belles lettres. He left by his will 2000 guineas to the matrons in biſhop Ward's hoſpital, Sarum, and to various other public inſtitutions in Wincheſter, Saliſbury, &c. handſome legacies. He died 1796, in the Cloſe, Sarum.

Ebion, the founder of a ſect about the year 72. St. John is ſuppoſed to have written his goſpel againſt the Ebionites, who denied the divinity of our Saviour.

Ebroin, mayor of the palace under Clotaire III. and Thierry I. maintained for a while his power, but his pride offended the French nobles, and he was confined in a monaſtery. He eſcaped and returned with an army to regain his loſt influence. His enemies were ſacrificed to his ambition, and the greateſt atrocities were exercited in the name of public juſtice. He was at laſt aſſaſſinated by Hermanfroi, a noble whoſe death he meditated, 681.

Eccard, John George d', a German hiſtorian and antiquary, born at Duingen, 1670. He was profeſſor of hiſtory at Helmſtadt, and ſucceeded Leibnitz in the chair of Hanover, 1716. He was ennobled by the emperor, and died 1730. His works are Corpus hiſtoricum medii ævi, &c. a learned work—leges Francorum, &c.

Ecchellensis, Abraham, a profeſſor of oriental languages at Rome, tranſlated from the Arabic into Latin ſome of the books of Apollonius' comics, and aſſiſted le Jay at Paris in the publication of his polyglott bible. He died at Rome 1664.

Eccles, Solomon, an Engliſh muſician, who turned quaker, and deſtroyed his inſtruments. He became as ridiculous as he had been admired, and for a while amuſed the public by his plans, to reconcile all mankind to one religion. A priſon at laſt cured him of his follies, lies, but he died without religion at the end of the 17th century.

ECHARD, Jacques, a dominican, who died at Paris 1774, aged 60. He wrote an account of the learned men of his order, 2 vols. folio.

ECHARD, Lawrence, an hiſtorian and divine, born at Baſſam near Beccles, Suffolk, 1671, and educated at Chriſt college, Cambridge. In 1706, he publiſhed his hiſtory of England, from the time of the Romans to James I. in one vol. folio, to which he added a ſecond and a third volume 1718, up to William and Mary. He wrote alſo an eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, and an Engliſh tranſlation of Plautus and Terence, beſides a gazetteer, &c. He was prebendary of Lincoln, and in 1712 archdeacon of Stowe, and ſoon after preſented to the livings of Rendleſham, Sudborn, and Alford, Suffolk. His declining ſtate of health obliged him to go to Scarborough for the waters, but he died by the way, while in his chariot, 1730. He was an author of great judgment, but the labors of more modern writers have rendered his works obſolete.

ECKIUS, John, a profeſſor of Ingoldſtadt. He oppoſed the leaders of the reformation, and diſputed at Leipſic with Luther, and at Worms againſt Melancthon. His writings are chiefly on controverſial ſubjects, in ſupport of the popiſh ſupremacy. He died at Ingolſtadt 1543.

ECLUSE, Charles de l', a phyſician of Arras, who had the care of the ſimples of Maximilian II. and Rodolphus II. Diſliking the life of a courtier, he retired to Frankfort, and then to Leyden, where he died profeſſor of botany, 1609, aged 84. His works are on botanical ſubjects, 2 vols. fol.

EDEMA, Gerard, a Dutch painter. He viſited Surinam and America, to paint the views, the trees, inſects, &c. of the country, and came to London 1670. He was much admired for the bold features of his landſcapes; his rocks, mountains, and cataracts. He haſtened his diſſolution by drinking, and died about 1700.

EDGAR, ſucceeded on the throne of England 959, and deſerved the name of peaceable. He obtained ſome victories in Scotland and in Ireland, and alſo in Wales, where he expected from the inhabitants a tribute of wolves' heads, which thus cleared the country from thoſe rapacious animals. After the death of his queen Egelflida, he married Elfrida, daughter of the earl of Devonſhire, whom his favorite Ethelwolfe had claimed for himſelf. He died 975, aged 33.

EDGAR, king of Scotland, died 1107. His ſiſter married Henry, king of England.

EDMER or EADMER, abbot of St. Alban's, and biſhop of St. Andrew's, in Scotland, wrote the hiſtory of his own times from 1066 to 1122, called Hiſtoria novorum, and alſo the life of Anſelm and Wilfred, and ſome other tracts.

EDMONDES, ſir Thomas, of Devonſhire, was introduced at court under ſir Francis Walſingham. When Elizabeth's ambaſſador at Paris he was allowed only 20 ſhillings a day, ſo that he complains of his inability to ſupport the dignity of a royal repreſentative, and adds that "he has not the means wherewith to put a good garment on his back, to appear in honeſt company." He was ſent in 1599 to Bruſſels, and was knighted by James I. and appointed comptroller of the king's houſehold, and privy counſellor, and treaſurer of the houſehold. In the two firſt parliaments of Charles I. he ſat for Oxford. In 1629 he went as ambaſſador to the French court, and died in peaceful privacy 1639. He was a man of great abilities, eminent as a negociator, active as a courtier, upright, firm, and incorruptible, as attached to the privileges of his king and country.

EDMONDES, Clement, ſon of the preceding, was born at Sharwardine in Shropſhire, and educated at All-ſouls' college. He was ſecretary for the French to Elizabeth, and remembrancer of the city of London, and clerk to the council, and in 1617 knighted. He wrote obſervations on the firſt five books of Cæſar's civil wars 1600, fol. beſides obſervations on the commentaries, &c. He died 1622.

EDMUND, St. king of the Eaſt Angles, was taken priſoner in 870, by Ivar the Dane, and ſhot to death with arrows, faſtened to a tree.

EDMUND, St. of Abingdon, ſtudied at Paris, and was made archbiſhop of Canterbury by Innocent III. A quarrel with Henry III. obliged him to leave the kingdom, and retire to France, where he died 1240.

EDMUND I. ſon of Edward the elder, ſucceeded as king of England 941, and added Mercia, Northumberland, and Cumberland, to his dominions. He was ſtabbed to death at Puckle church 948, by Leolf, whom he had baniſhed.

EDMUND II. ſurnamed Ironſide, ſucceeded 1016, and took for his partner on the throne Canute. He was aſſaſſinated at Oxford by two of his ſervants 1017.

EDWARD, the elder, ſucceeded Alfred 900. He defeated the Scotch and Welſh, and repreſſed the invaſion of the Danes. He erected five biſhoprics, and by founding Cambridge he protected learning. He died 925.

EDWARD, St. or martyr, the younger ſon of Edgar the great, ſucceeded 975, and was murdered at Corfe caſtle 978, by his ſtepmother Elfrida.

EDWARD, ſurnamed the confeſſor, ſon of Ethelred, ſucceeded 1041. He was a weak prince, and governed by Godwin, whoſe daughter he had married. At his death, unwilling to ſettle the ſucceſſion, he left his kingdom a prey to faction. He died 1066, and after the ſhort reign of Harold, he was ſucceeded by William the conqueror.

EDWARD I. ſon and ſucceſſor of Henry III. was born at Wincheſter. He was recalled from from his expedition againſt the infidels to aſcend the throne 1272, and he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the vigor of his government. The Welſh were ſubdued, and to reconcile them to their new maſter, the king created his own ſon prince of Wales. In 1286 he was appointed umpire between the competitors for the crown of Scotland, and he ſo artfully conducted himſelf, that he nearly made the whole kingdom ſubſervient to his power. He died at Carliſle 1307 aged 68, as he was marching againſt the Scots, who had revolted againſt him. From the wiſdom of the laws which he eſtabliſhed, Edward has been called the Engliſh Juſtinian, and to his fondneſs for war the people are indebted for their liberties, cemented by the conſequence given to their repreſentatives firſt called to ſanction the meaſures and the taxes of government.

EDWARD II. ſon and ſucceſſor of the preceding, 1307, was devoid of that vigor and firmneſs requiſite in the head of a turbulent kingdom. His attachment to his favorites Gaveſton and the Spencers raiſed his barons in oppoſition to his meaſures, and embittered his life. After the puniſhment of his favorites, he was depoſed by the nobles, and ſhut up in Berkeley caſtle, where ſoon after he was murdered in the moſt barbarous manner, 1327, aged 42.

EDWARD III. ſon of the preceding, was born at Windſor 1312, and aſcended the throne 1327. After a glorious campaign in Scotland, he turned his arms againſt France. His ſucceſſes brought on the celebrated victory of Creſſy 1346, in which 30,000 French fell, and after the capture of Calais, peace was re-eſtabliſhed. The ſucceſſion of John on the French throne renewed the war, and in 1357 a dreadful battle was fought at Poitiers, by the black prince, who took the French monarch priſoner. The arms of Edward had alſo been ſucceſsful againſt the Scotch, and their king David was taken priſoner, and thus England ſaw two captive monarchs in her capital. Theſe glorious actions were obſcured by the misfortunes of the latter end of the king's reign. The monarch loſt himſelf in the groſſeſt ſenſuality. He died 1377, aged 65. During his reign England was improved by her connection with the continent, and the arts and manufactures of the Flemiſh, were tranſplanted into the iſland, where the induſtry and the bold genius of the inhabitants have ſince improved them. The order of the garter was eſtabliſhed in this reign.

EDWARD IV. ſon of Richard of York, claimed the crown in preference to Henry VI. This rivalſhip had already been diſputed in ſix battles, in one of which Richard of York fell, and in ſeven others it continued to engage contending armies, till Edward prevailed, and was crowned at Weſtminſter 1461. His marriage with Elizabeth Woodville diſguſted his friend Warwick, the king-maker. Warwick joining himſelf to the depoſed Henry, defeated Edward's army at Banbury 1469, and ſoon after took him priſoner. Edward eſcaped, and Warwick, defeated in his turn, fled to France, and ſoon returned to place Henry from a priſon on a throne. In his turn, Edward became a fugitive, but collecting forces on the continent, he defeated his enemies, and ſlew Warwick in the field of battle. Edward became deſpicable as a monarch, and loſt himſelf in effeminacy. He died 1483, aged 41.

EDWARD V. ſon of Edward IV. was only 12 years old on his father's death. The guardianſhip of his minority was entruſted to his uncle Glouceſter, whoſe ambition prompted him to the commiſſion of the fouleſt crimes. The young monarch, with his brother the duke of York, were on pretence of greater ſafety, conducted to the tower, and ſoon after ſmothered, 1483, and the cruel uncle aſcended the throne under the name of Richard III. The bodies were diſcovered in 1678, and conveyed to Weſtminſter abbey.

EDWARD VI. ſon of Henry VIII. by Jane Seymour, aſcended the throne at the age of 10, 1547. His character exhibited ſtrong marks of benevolence; but his inclinations were often prevented by the intrigues of his miniſters. He continued the reformation, and nearly ſettled the religious eſtabliſhment in the form in which it now exiſts. To avoid a popiſh reign, he ſet aſide his two ſiſters Mary and Elizabeth, and ſettled the crown on lady Jane Grey, but his wiſhes failed. He died of a conſumption 1553, aged 16. He founded ſeveral ſchools in the kingdom, and endowed Chriſt church, Bridewell, and St. Thomas' hoſpitals.

EDWARD, prince of Wales, ſurnamed the black prince from the color of his armour, was eldeſt ſon of Edward III. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the wars of France, eſpecially at Creſſy, and afterwards he commanded the Engliſh forces on the glorious victory of Poitiers, where he took John king of France and one of his ſons priſoners. Senſible of the deference due to royalty, he waited behind the chair of his priſoner on the evening of the battle, and when he conveyed him to London he entered the capital mounted on a ſmall black horſe, while the royal captive was borne by a beautiful white charger. This warlike prince died of a conſumption before his father 1376, aged 46; and by a daughter of Edmund of Kent, he left one ſon Richard, who aſcended the throne after Edward III. The creſt which he took from the blind king of Bohemia became the creſt of the ſucceeding princes of Wales, diſtinguiſhed by three oſtrich feathers, and the motto Ich dien, I ſerve.

EDWARDS, Richard, of Somerſetſhire, 1523, was of Corpus Chriſti college, Oxford, and then elected ſtudent of Chriſt's church. He was gentleman of Elizabeth's chapel, and taught muſic to the children of the choir. He wrote three plays, beſides poems, called "a paradiſe of dainty deviſes." He died 1566.

EDWARDS,

EDWARDS, Thomas, of Trinity college, Cambridge, was a nonconformiſt, and oppoſed the royaliſts during the civil wars. After the fall of royalty, he expreſſed his diſapprobation againſt the independents, with ſuch freedom, that upon the return of Cromwell, he fled to Holland, where he died of a quartan ague, 1647, aged 48. His writings are extremely virulent and abuſive, chiefly in favor of the puritans, and of the preſbytery.

EDWARDS, John, ſon of the preceding, was born at Hertford 1637, and educated at Merchant-taylors' and St. John's college, Cambridge. He undertook the care of Trinity church, Cambridge, where his ſenſible diſcourſes procured him a large audience. In 1668, he went for one year to St. Edmundſbury as lecturer, and on his return, in conſequence of ſome diſpute with his college, he removed to Trinity hall. He next reſided on the ſmall living of St. Peter's, Colcheſter, for three years, but diſpleaſed with the conduct of the Colcheſter clergy towards him, he removed to Cambridge. He died 1716, aged 79. Dr. Edwards, in his writings, which are numerous, ſhowed himſelf moſt indefatigable, well ſkilled in eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, and a ſubtle and able polemic. His occaſional unpopularity aroſe from his partiality for calviniſtic principles, and his bias towards the abjured doctrines of the old puritans. Dr. Kippis has called him the Paul, the Auguſtine, the Bradwardine, the Calvin, of his age. His writings are now little known.

EDWARDS, George, the father of ornithologiſts, was born at Stratford, Eſſex, 1694. He was brought up to trade, but his genius developed itſelf by the peruſal of books on natural hiſtory, antiquities, &c. and at the end of his apprenticeſhip he travelled abroad, and viſited Holland and Norway. In 1733 he was choſen librarian of the college of phyſicians, and he became afterwards fellow of the royal and antiquarian ſocieties. The firſt of his learned labors appeared in the hiſtory of birds, 4 vols. 4to. in the years 1743, 1747, 1750, and 1751; and in 1758, 1760, and 1764, 3 more 4to. vols. were added, called "gleanings of natural hiſtory:" two valuable works, containing engravings and deſcriptions of upwards of 600 ſubjects in natural hiſtory. He died 1773, aged 81.

EDWARDS, Dr. Jonathan, wrote againſt the Socinians. He was of Jeſus college, Oxford, of which he became principal, 1686. His writings are chiefly controverſial.

EDWARDS, Thomas, an elegant writer. He purchaſed Turrick, in Bucks, where he chiefly reſided; and he died on a viſit to his friend Richardſon, at Parſon's Green, 1757, aged 58. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf as an able critic in his canons of criticiſm, firſt printed 1747, and his letter to the author of a late correſpondence, &c. which drew upon him Warburton's vengeance. He alſo wrote ſome ſonnets, &c.

EDWARDS, Thomas, of Coventry, was educated at Coventry ſchool and at Clare hall, Cambridge. He publiſhed a new Engliſh tranſlation of the pſalms from the original Hebrew, with notes, 8vo. 1755. In 1758 he was choſen maſter of Coventry grammar ſchool and rector of St. John the Baptiſt in that city. In 1759 he publiſhed his uſeful work, "the doctrines of irreſiſtible grace proved to have no foundation in the writings of the new teſtament;" and in 1752 he attacked Dr. Lowth's "metricæ Harianæ brevis confutatio." In 1770, on obtaining the living of Nuneaton, Warwickſhire, he retired from Coventry, and died at Nuneaton 1785, aged 56. He publiſhed alſo two diſſertations on bigotry, and on the interpretation of the new teſtament, and ſome learned notes on the idyllia of Theocritus.

EDWARDS, Jonathan, of Windſor in Connecticut, was educated at Yale college, and was miniſter of a preſbyterian congregation at New York 1722, and two years after he was made tutor in his college. He was in 1750 ejected for refuſing to adminiſter the ſacrament to ſome particular perſons; and the next year he went as miſſionary among the Indians. In 1757 he was made preſident of the college, New Jerſey, and died of the ſmall-pox the next year. He was author of the life of David Brainerd, a miſſionary——narrative of the work of God in the converſion of many hundred ſouls in Northampton——ſermons, &c.

EDWARDS, William, a common maſon, who acquired celebrity as a bridge-builder. His bridge over the river Taaff, which is the ſegment of a circle, the chord of which is 147 feet from the ſurface of the water, is a remarkable inſtance of his ingenuity. He was occaſionally a methodiſt preacher; and died 1789, aged 81.

EDWY ſucceeded as king of England 955, and married Elgiva, who was related to him within the prohibited degrees. This circumſtance proved his ruin, and that of his queen, who was ſeized by Odo, the archbiſhop, and, after being brauded with a hot iron in the face, was baniſhed to Ireland, where ſhe expired by a moſt cruel death. The king died in exile 959.

EECKHOUT, Gerbrant Vanden, a painter, born at Amſterdam 1621. He preferred hiſtorical ſubjects to portraits, and excelled chiefly in the repreſentation of the feelings of the ſoul in the features of the countenance. His beſt pieces are a Jeſus among the doctors——the infant Jeſus in the arms of Simeon——Abraham diſmiſſing Hagar and Iſhmael——the continence of Scipio——and a woman looking for the fleas of her dog. He died 1674, a bachelor.

EECKHOUTE, Anthony Vanden, a painter, of Bruges. He travelled into Italy with his brother in-law Deyſter, and while he executed the flowers and the fruits, his companion completed the figures of the ſeveral pictures which were were thus conjointly produced. After his return, he purchaſed a poſt under the biſhop of Bruges; but, to the aſtoniſhment of all, he ſuddenly abandoned his country, and embarked for Italy. In his way he was carried by a ſtorm to Liſbon, where his works ſoon recommended him to general notice; and after two years he married a lady of quality. His rivals, however, viewed his ſucceſs with jealouſy, and as he was riding out in his coach, he was ſhot with a ball and inſtantly expired, 1695.

EGBERT, laſt king of the Saxon heptarchy, and firſt king of England, was proclaimed monarch of Weſſex 800, and of all England in 828. He died 10 years after.

EGEDE, John, a Dane, miſſionary to Greenland 1721. His deſcription of Greenland appeared 1729, and he died 1758. His ſon Paul aſſiſted him in converting the Greenlanders, and was biſhop of the country, and died 1789, aged 81. He republiſhed his father's hiſtory, &c.

EGERTON, Thomas, a natural ſon of ſir Richard Egerton, of Cheſhire, was educated at Brazen-noſe college, Oxford, and Lincoln's-inn. In 1591 he was ſolicitor general; in 1592 attorney general, and afterwards maſter of the rolls, and keeper of the great ſeal. James I. in 1603, created him baron Elleſmere, and made him chancellor of England. He died 1617. He left ſome law manuſcripts, and publiſhed ſome obſervations on his office, its privileges, and prerogatives, &c.

EGERTON, John, a prelate, born 1721, in London, and educated at Eton and Oriel college, Oxford. He was ſon of the biſhop of Hereford, and deſcended from the Bridgewater family. In 1749, he was chaplain to the king, and in 1750 dean of Hereford. In 1756 he was conſecrated biſhop of Bangor, and in 1768 tranſlated to Litchfield, and in 1771 to Durham. This high preferment was not undeſerved. The biſhop poſſeſſed among many virtues the manners of conciliation and humility, and by a condeſcending conduct he reſtored peace and good will among the political factions which unhappily divided his county when he ſucceeded to Durham. He publiſhed only three ſermons preached on public occaſions and died 1787.

EGGELING, John Henry, of Bremen, travelled to encreaſe his knowledge and enlarge his mind. On his return he was made ſecretary to his republic, and died reſpected 1713, aged 74. He wrote explications of medals and other monuments.

EGMONT, Lamoral count, one of the lords of the Low Countries, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the ſervice of Charles V. in Africa, and alſo under Philip II. at St. Quintin and Gravelines. He was unwilling to aſſiſt in the enſlaving of his country, and therefore being ſuſpected by Alva of favoring the prince of Orange, and moreover hated for his ſuperior abilities, he was beheaded at Bruſſels 1568. On this occaſion the French ambaſſador wrote to his court that he had ſeen that head fall which had twice made France to tremble, and Philip obſerved that the heads of ſalmons were of greater account than many thouſands of frogs.

EGMONT, Juſtus Van, of Leyden, reſided a long time in France, where he was painter to Lewis XIII. and XIV. and one of the 12 elders in the eſtabliſhment of the academy for painting and ſculpture. He returned to Antwerp, where he died 1674.

EGNATIUS, John Baptiſt, of Venice, was pupil to Politian, and like him he contributed to the revival of learning. When grown old, the republic paid him the higheſt honors for his eminent ſervices in education, and decreed that his ſtipend ſhould be continued, and that he ſhould be exempted from all taxes. The works which he publiſhed are numerous, but they do not exhibit any marks of ſuperior excellence, as his abilities conſiſted chiefly in an aſtoniſhing retentive memory, in a ſtriking ready elocution, and in a convincing mode of conveying inſtruction. He died at Venice 1553. His works are orations—epiſtles—a poetical panegyric on Francis I. of France—de Romanis principibus vel Cæſaribus—de exemplis virorum illuſtrium, &c.

EHRET, George Dionyſius, a German. After painting the beautiful figures of the Hortus Cliffortianus, he came to England, where he met with encouragement, and was made member of the royal ſociety. One hundred of his botanical figures appeared in the Plantæ ſelectæ. He died 1770, aged 60.

EISENSCHMIDT, John Gaſpar, a mathematician and phyſician of Straſburg, where he died 1712, aged 56. He wrote a treatiſe on the weights and meaſures of various nations, and the value of ancient coins, &c.

EKINS, Jeffery, D.D. a divine, educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge. He held the rectories of Quainton, Sedgefield, and Morpeth, Durham, and was dean of Carliſle. He publiſhed a tranſlation of Apollonius Rhodius' loves of Jaſon and Medea, 3 vols. 4to. and died 1791.

ELBEE, N. d', of Poitou, during the revolution eſpouſed the cauſe of his ſuffering countrymen in la Vendée, and put himſelf at the head of the royaliſts there, 1793, and ſucceeded in defeating the republicans. After the victories of Grolleau, Thonars, Saumur, Chatenay, Cliſſot, &c. he was unfortunately defeated at Chollet, and retired to Noirmontiers, where he was taken, and condemned to be ſhot.

ELBŒUF, René de Lorraine, marquis d', ſeventh ſon of Claude of Guiſe, died 1566. His grandſon Charles married Catharine, the daughter of Henry IV. and died 1657. Theſe illuſtrious characters were concerned in the intrigues of the French court under Richelieu and Mazarin. The laſt male deſcendant of this houſe was Maurice, duc d'Elbœuf, who died died in France 1763, aged 86. He is particularly known as the discoverer of Herculaneum. As he had served the emperor in Naples, he settled there at Portici, and being offered pieces of ancient marbles to ornament his villa, by a peasant who found them in digging a well, he purchased the ground, and by making excavations Herculaneum was discovered.

ELEANOR, DUCHESS OF GUIENNE, succeeded her father William IX. in 1137, though only 15, and the next year she married Lewis VII. of France. Lewis was full of oddity and superstition, and when he cropped his hair, and shaved his head, at the instigation of Peter of Lombardy, who told him that God hated long hair, he soon appeared despicable to his wife, who was playful and volatile. His conduct produced inconstancy, and Eleanor passed many guilty hours in the company of her uncle, Raymond of Antioch, and of Saladin, a Turk; and when Lewis complained of her levity, a divorce ensued, 1152. Six weeks after, Eleanor married Henry duke of Normandy, afterwards Henry II. of England, by whom she had four sons and a daughter. Guienne and Poictou, the dowry which she brought to her husband, afterwards proved the source of those dreadful wars which for three centuries deluged France with English blood. Eleanor gave up Guienne to her son Richard, and died 1204, a nun at Fontevrault. Her quarrel with her husband, who had an adulterous intercourse with the fair Rosamond in Woodstock park, incited her to encourage the rebellion of her sons against their father, and at last procured her imprisonment for sixteen years.

ELEAZAR was high priest of Judea 292 B. C. It is said that he gave Ptolemy Philadelphus a copy of the bible, which was translated by 70 persons, known by the name of the septuagint.

ELI, judge of the Israelites, B. C. 1156, was regardless of the conduct of his sons, Hophni and Phineas, against whom the anger of the Lord was denounced. The aged father heard the threatened punishment with resignation, and when the ark of God was taken by the Philistines, and his two sons were slain in battle, he, at the report, fell from his seat, and broke his neck, in the 93d year of his age.

ELIAS, Matthew, a painter, of Peene, near Cassel, was born 1658. As he one day kept the only cow belonging to his mother, Corbeen, the painter, observed him making a fortification by the road side, and pleased with him, he prevailed upon him to live with him at Dunkirk. Here he engaged the affection of his friend and patron, by his application and abilities; and at the age of 20 he went to Paris, further to improve himself. His pieces soon gained the public attention; but though flattered, he never forgot his gratitude to his benefactor. He afterwards visited Dunkirk, and settled there, employing his pencil in adorning the churches and chapels of that part of France. Mild in his manners, inoffensive in his conduct, he was seldom seen but at church and in his work room. He worked till the last period of life, and expired 1741, aged 82, highly respected. Though correct and grand in his drawings, he failed in his draperies; and some of his female figures are represented without taste.

ELIAS, Levita, a German rabbi, of the 16th century, who taught Hebrew at Venice and Rome. He published lexicon Chaldaicum—traditio doctrinæ, &c. 4to.—some Hebrew grammars — nomenclatura Hebraica, 1542, 4to &c.

ELICH, Lewis Philip, of Marpurg, is known in the 17th century for his book de magiâ diabolicâ. He avoided persecution by flight, and turned Roman catholic. He published another book de miseriâ hominis, &c. He was immoral and impious in his sentiments.

ELICHMAN, John, of Silesia, practised physic at Leyden, and was well acquainted with sixteen languages, and, according to Salmasius, superior to every European in the knowledge of Persian. He wrote in Arabic, de usu Arabicæ linguæ in medicinâ—a dissertation de termino vitæ, &c.

ELIJAH, a prophet of Israel, under Ahab and Ahaziah. After suffering persecution from Jezebel, he was taken up to heaven in a chariot of fire, 895 B. C. and left his mantle and his prophetic powers to Elisha.

ELIOT, Thomas, of Suffolk, sheriff of Cambridge under Henry VIII., resided at Cambridge, and was author of the first dictionary, Latin and English, ever published in England. He died 1546.

ELIOT, John, a puritan, educated at Cambridge. He went to America in 1631, and established a grammar school and an independent congregation at Roxburg. He learned the Indian language 1646, and as a missionary he converted many of the natives to the Christian religion, and translated into their language the bible, and some popular tracts. He died 1689.

ELIOTT, sir John, of Peebles, showed great application in his youth, and became well acquainted with Latin and Greek. He was first employed in the shop of an apothecary in the Haymarket, London, and then went to sea as surgeon. A rich prize rewarded his labors, and enabled him to assume the air and the name of physician. He soon gained reputation and opulence. His address recommended him, and though he was neither very learned nor very ingenious, he became one of the most popular physicians in London; his fees amounted to little less than 5000l. a year. Thus raised to eminence, he showed that he knew well how to use the favors of fortune. His hospitality was very great; but while the friend of the witty and the learned, he did not forget the labors of his profession, nor did he, while attending the opulent, disdain to administer to the poor without fee or reward. The hoſpitable treats with which he delighted his friends, and the pleaſures of the table, in which he moderately indulged, haſtened the decay of his conſtitution. He died ſuddenly at Brocket-hall, 1787.

ELIOTT, George Auguſtus, the brave defender of Gibraltar, was born at Stobbs, Roxburgſhire, 1718, the youngeſt of the nine ſons of ſir Gilbert Eliott. He went to Leyden, where he made great progreſs in military ſcience, which he completed at La Fere in Picardy. He afterwards ſerved in the Pruſſian ſervice, and in his 17th year he entered as volunteer in the 23d regiment of foot. The next year he went into the engineer corps at Woolwich, and as adjutant of the ſecond troop of horſe grenadiers; he was in Germany at the battle of Dettingen, where he was wounded. After being lieutenant colonel in this regiment, he reſigned, and became aid-de-camp to George II. In 1759 he raiſed and diſciplined the firſt regiment of light horſe called after him Eliott's, and with them he went to Germany, where diſcipline and enterprize reflected the higheſt honor on the general and on the men. He was ſecond in command againſt the Havannah, where his courage and his humanity were eminently diſplayed. At the peace, the gallant regiment was reviewed in Hyde park by the king, who was ſo pleaſed with their appearance, that he beſtowed on them the appellation of royals. In 1775 general Elliott ſucceeded A'Court as commander in chief in Ireland, and ſoon after was nominated governor of Gibraltar. While he eſtabliſhed in the garriſon a ſyſtem of diſcipline, he exhibited to the ſoldiers an example for them to follow. He inured himſelf to the ſevereſt privations, he eat no fleſh, nor drank wine, but lived on vegetables and water; he never ſlept more than four hours at a time, and therefore the vigilance of the general was ſoon ſeen and imitated as the beſt qualification of a good ſoldier. Thus perſevering and vigilant, he defended the barren rock with victorious ſucceſs againſt Spain and France. The ſkill and valor diſplayed in the memorable ſiege of 1782, had fixed upon the gallant commander and his brave garriſon the admiration of the world, and therefore on his return to England he was greeted by the nation with acclamations, by the ſenate with thanks, and by the king with the honorable reward of a peerage, by the title of lord Heathfield, baron Gibraltar. This illuſtrious veteran died at his chateau, at Aix-la-Chapelle, of a ſecond attack of the palſy 1790, in his 73d year.

ELIOTT, Richard, of Kingſbridge, Devon, was educated at Bene't college, Cambridge. He was expelled from St. George's chapel, Hyde park, for printing a ſermon on ſalvation by faith without works, and became diſſenting miniſter in Glaſs-houſe yard, Alderſgate-ſtreet. He died ſuddenly in his pulpit 1789. He publiſhed ſome controverſial tracts and ſermons.

ELISHA, a prophet, called from the plough to become the ſervant of Elijah. When his maſter was carried up to heaven in a chariot of fire, he received his mantle and was appointed his ſucceſſor. He died at Samaria about 830 B. C.

ELIZABETH, queen of England, daughter of Henry VIII. by Ann Boleyn, was born 1533. She was declared illegitimate by her father, but her mother recommended her to the care of Parker afterwards archbiſhop of Canterbury, by whom her principles of religion were fixed. She lived in privacy, but on Mary's acceſſion ſhe was nearly ſacrificed to the queen's bigotry by the influence of Gardiner. Philip interceded for her, as he marked her for his ſecond wife on Mary's deceaſe. Drawn from priſon to ſit on the throne 1558, and educated in the ſchool of adverſity, ſhe came to govern a gallant and rising nation, and by her wiſdom to fix their deſtinies on the moſt glorious baſis. With a ſoul heroic and magnanimous, an underſtanding poliſhed by literature and learned languages, ſhe yet poſſeſſed the weakneſs of her ſex, and loved to be admired and courted for the elegancies of her dreſs, and the beauties of her perſon. Prudent and diſcerning in her meaſures, ſhe proceeded with caution in eſtabliſhing the proteſtant religion, treating the catholic party with tenderneſs, and profeſſed a willingneſs to be on amicable terms even with pope Paul IV. Before ſhe aſcended the throne, the king of Sweden made propoſals of marriage to her, which ſhe rejected. Philip her brother-in-law was equally unſucceſsful, and the duke of Anjou, who for a while ſeemed to be treated with partiality, was diſmiſſed at laſt with indifference. Her parliament interfered, but ſhe declared that ſhe was wedded to her people, and that ſhe wiſhed her tomb-ſtone to record that after reigning ſo long ſhe had lived and died a virgin queen. Authors have been puzzled to account for this ſettled averſion to marriage, and while ſome ſuggeſted that this coldneſs of conſtitution aroſe from natural cauſes, others have intimated that her hours of retirement were not always devoted to continence. The ſuſpicions are illiberal; though ſhe was beautiful and young, and loved entertainments and dreſs, though ſhe ſelected the handſomeſt for her favorites, yet nothing can be advanced againſt her chaſtity. Though ſhe had favorites, in no inſtance is it mentioned that ſhe forgot her dignity, and indeed there were ſo many watchful eyes about her perſon, that had ſhe been incontinent, her weakneſs would have been divulged. That ſhe wiſhed to govern her favorites by the ſoft influence which female charms poſſeſs over the heart is probable: but when it is conſidered that when ſettled on her throne ſhe was nearly 30, that the warmer paſſions of youth had ſubſided, and that her great ambition was to rule without a ſuperior or rival in the affection of her ſubjects, the wonders of her celibacy will ceaſe. She was fortunate in the choice of her miniſters, but though ſhe could depend on Cecil and on Walſingham, ſhe yet loved buſineſs. It is unneceſſary to mention the glorious events of her reign. The moſt indelible blot however on her character, is her treatment of the unfortunate Mary. Inſtead of pitying her misfortunes ſhe deceived her; and inſtead of replacing her on her throne, ſhe led her to a ſcaffold, and then meanly pretended to blame the horrible proceedings as the act of her miniſters. After a reign of 44 years four months and ſix days, and after ſeeing her people grown powerful in arms, ſucceſsful in navigation and commerce, and diſtinguiſhed in ſcience and literature, this great princeſs died 24th March 1603, aged 70. Never, ſays a Jeſuit, did a crowned head better underſtand the art of government, and commit fewer errors in it, during a long reign. She was not a warlike princeſs, but ſhe knew ſo well how to train up warriors, that England had not for a long time ſeen a greater number of them, nor more experienced.

ELIZABETH, of Auſtria, married Charles IX. of France 1570. The maſſacre of St. Bartholomew overwhelmed her with grief, but ſhe avoided the dangers of polities, and retained the affections of her huſband, who on his death bed tenderly recommended her and her daughter to Henry IV. king of Navarre his ſucceſſor. She died at Vienna in a convent which ſhe herſelf had founded, 1592, aged 38, ſincerely lamented.

ELIZABETH, Petrovna, daughter of Peter the Great, was born 1709. She had among her ſuitors Lewis XV. of France, Charles Auguſtus biſhop of Lubec, Charles margrave of Anſpach, Kouli Khan, and Lewis of Brunſwick, but ſhe rejected all. She did not however diſlike favorites, as her amours were frequent. She aſcended the throne in 1741, and received the appellation of humane, becauſe ſhe made a vow that no capital puniſhment ſhould be inflicted during her reign. Severities however were practiſed, and Elizabeth herſelf gave a ſtrong example of cruelty in condemning two ladies of her court, women of beauty and rank, to receive 50 ſtrokes of the knoot, in the open ſquare of Peterſburgh, to have their tongues cut out, and to be baniſhed to Siberia, for divulging her ſecret amours. Though given to incontinence, Elizabeth pretended to be a ſtrict devotee; ſhe was ſcrupulous in her yearly confeſſions at eaſter, ſhe expreſſed contrition for her faults, and was punctual in all the external offices of religion. She died 1761, in the 21ſt year of her reign, and 52d of her age.

ELLER DE BROOKHUSEN, John Theodore, phyſician to the king of Pruſſia, died at Berlin 1760, aged 71. He wrote a Latin treatiſe on the knowledge and treatment of diſeaſes.

ELLIGER, Ottomar, ſon of a phyſician, was born at Gottenburg 1633. His father wiſhed to make him a ſcholar, but nature had formed him for a painter, and he ſoon diſplayed ſuperior excellence in painting flowers and fruit. He was invited to Berlin, where he became a great favorite. His pieces are much admired in Germany.

ELLIGER, Ottomar, ſon of the preceding was born at Hamburgh 1666. He ſtudied under his father, but his great maſter was Laireſſe. Taking nature for his model, he finiſhed his pictures in a ſtyle pleaſing to the man of taſte as well as the ſcholar. In his back grounds he introduced the fineſt remains of Egyptian, Grecian, or Roman architecture, and diſplayed correctneſs of conception and ſublimity of genius. His beſt pieces are the death of Alexander, and the nuptials of Thetis and Peleus, for the elector of Mentz, which the prince wiſhed to reward by granting the painter a handſome penſion. Theſe honors Elliger refuſed, preferring liberty to the ſervice of the greateſt potentates The latter part of his life was clouded by intemperance. He died 1732, aged 60.

ELLIS, Clement, M. A. of Cumberland, went to Queen's college, Oxford, and at the reformation obtained the living of Kirkby-weſtern, Notts, and in 1693 the prebend of Southwell. He died 1706, aged 70. He wrote the genteel ſinner—the ſcripture catechiſt—the ſelf deceiver, &c.

ELLIS, John, an Engliſh poet, born in London 1698. As his father was a man of an eccentric character, and his mother a diſſenter, who puniſhed him even for looking at a top on Sunday, his education was little attended to. He was placed in the office of Taverner, a ſcrivener, where, beſides his buſineſs, he attended to the claſſical inſtructions which young Taverner received from his father. With this indolent youth, after the father's death, Ellis was united in partnerſhip, and from his imprudence he was a great ſufferer. His literary qualifications introduced him to the learned. Though for ſeventy years he wrote, without ever publiſhing, ſmall poetical pieces, he did not neglect his buſineſs, and, as a ſcrivener of probity, he was the agent of many reſpectable families. In 1750 he was elected a common councilman of London; and he was for many years deputy of his ward, and four times elected maſter of the ſcriveners' company. By temperance he attained a great age, though he had a weakneſs in one of his eyes, which, in his 86th year, paſſed to the other in a ſingular manner, which he has deſcribed in a letter to his friend Dr. Johnſon. The laſt years of life were clouded with diſtreſs, in conſequence of incautiouſly truſting ſome money into the hands of an artful villain. Cheerful to the laſt, he was capable of walking twenty and even thirty miles a day even to his 85th year. He died gently, ſitting in his chair, the 31ſt December 1791, in his 94th year. As he had been brought up a diſſenter, he ſoon ſaw the hypocriſy of the ſect, and he expreſſed the ſtrongeſt averſion for them. His hours of relaxation were always employed in walking; and when queſtioned why he neglected to go to church, he replied, "Nathan walked with the Lord." To the character of an honeſt and independent man, he added that of poetical merit; and his pieces poſſeſſed neatneſs, elegance, ſpirit, and naiveté. Many of his poems were long preſerved in manuſcript. Beſides ſome pieces to be found in Dodſley's collection, he wrote a tranſlation of Dr. King's templum libertatis—a Hudibraſtic traveſty of Maphæus—the South Sea dream—the ſurprize—a tranſlation of ſome of the epiſtles and of the metamorphoſes of Ovid—ſome parts of Æſop's fables, of Cato, &c.

ELLWOOD, Thomas, of Crowell, Oxfordſhire, turned quaker, and thus loſt the protection of his father. He was for ſome time reader to Milton, and wrote a ſacred poem on the life of David—an hiſtory of the old and new teſtaments—beſides an edition of George Fox's journal, &c. He died 1713, aged 74.

ELLYS, Anthony, was born in 1693, and educated at Clare-hall, Cambridge. In 1724 he was vicar of St. Olave's Jewry, &c. and the next year prebendary of Glouceſter. In 1752 he was made biſhop of St. David's, and died at Glouceſter 1761. Beſides three occaſional ſermons, he publiſhed, in 1736, a plea for the ſacramental teſt, &c. 4to.—remarks on Hume's eſſay on miracles, &c.

ELMACINUS, George, an Egyptian, author of a Saracen hiſtory, from Mohammed to the year 1118. He profeſſed himſelf to be a Chriſtian, and held places of honor under the caliphs.

ELPHINSTONE, William, born in the county of Stirling 1432, was educated at St. Salvador's, St. Andrew's, and Paris. He became archdeacon of St. Andrew's, and biſhop of Aberdeen. In 1483 he went as ambaſſador to France, and in 1489 to Henry VII. of England; and in 1495 he was made chancellor of Scotland. The death of James, at the battle of Flodden-field, 1513, ſo overpowered his ſpirits that he died ſoon after, aged 81. He was a munificent benefactor to the univerſity of Aberdeen.

ELSHEIMER, Adam, a painter, of Frankfort on the Maine. Though the ſon of a taylor, he was by his induſtry enabled to go to Rome, where he ſoon became a diſtinguiſhed artiſt. His landſcapes, hiſtories, and night-pieces, are ſo highly finiſhed, ſo ſcarce, and ſo valuable, that they are to be ſeen only in the collection of princes. He was a man of a melancholy diſpoſition, and died 1610, aged 36.

ELSNER, James, profeſſor of theology and oriental languages at Lingen, wrote obſervationes ſacræ in novi teſtam. libros—explanation of the epiſtle to the Philippians, &c. He died 1750, aged 58.

ELSTOB, William, of Newcaſtle, was educated at Eton and Catharine-hall, Cambridge. He afterwards removed to Queen's college, Oxford, and was choſen fellow of Univerſity. In 1702 he became rector of St. Swithin and St. Mary Bothaw, London, where he died twelve years after. He publiſhed Lupus' Saxon hiſtory tranſlated into Latin, and alſo Aſcham's Latin letters, and wrote an eſſay on the great affinity and mutual agreement of the two profeſſions, law and divinity. He was engaged alſo in the laborious edition of the Saxon laws, with notes, &c.

ELSTON, Elizabeth, ſiſter of the preceding was well ſkilled in the Saxon language. She retired, after her brother's death, to Eveſham Worceſterſhire, where ſhe kept a ſmall ſchool She obtained from queen Caroline an annuity of 21l.; but after the death of her majeſty ſhe was again reduced to poverty, and though ſkilled in eight languages, ſhe was obliged to become a governeſs. She was then engaged in the duchеſs of Portland's family, where ſhe continued ſeventeen years, and died at Bulſtrode, 1756, aged 73. In 1715 ſhe publiſhed a Saxon grammar, &c. and as Rowe Mores obſerves, "ſhe was the indefeſſa comes of her brother's ſtudies, a female ſtudent of the univerſity, upon a genteel fortune, but purſuing too much the drug called learning."

ELSYNGE, Henry, clerk of the houſe of commons, was born at Batterſea 1598, and educated at Weſtminſter and Chriſt church Oxford. He reſigned his office when he ſaw the determination of parliament to try the king; and he retired to his houſe at Hounſlow where he died 1654. To learning, and the knowledge of French and Italian, he added the noble character of an honeſt man. He publiſhed "the ancient method and manner of holding parliaments in England," 1663, reprinted 1768, &c.

ELVIUS, Peter, of Upſal, was eminent for his knowledge of mathematics. He made ſurveys of the Swediſh lakes, and of the coaſts of the country, beſides obſervations on the heavenly bodies, from Uraniburg. He wrote a journal of a tour in Sweden, and died 1749, aged 39.

ELWES, John, of ſaving memory, was ſon of a brewer in Southwark, of the name of Meggot. He went to Weſtminſter ſchool ten or twelve years, and then viſited Geneva, where, for three years, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf in dividing the palm of horſemanſhip with Worſley and Sydney Meadows. On his return to England he viſited in the aſſumed garb of a miſer, his uncle, ſir Harvey Elwes, in Eſſex, whoſe ſole pleaſure was the hoarding up of money. He afterwards ſucceeded to his fortune, which was little leſs than 250,000l, and changed his name to that of Elwes. He was then forty years old; but though known, for the laſt fifteen years, in all the circles of diſſipation in London, he did not, upon the acquiſition of ſuch an ample fortune, to which his own was equal, launch out into the extravagances of the times. He was naturally fond of gaming, and did not give it up till late in life. "He has been known," as his biographer has obſerved, "after ſitting up a whole night at play, for thouſands, in elegant apartments, ornamented with the moſt ſplendid decorations, and and with waiters at his call, to walk out about 4 in the morning, and proceed to Smithfield to meet his own cattle coming to market from Eſſex. Forgetful of the ſcenes which he had juſt left, he would ſtand there, often in the cold and rain, diſputing with a carcaſe-butcher for perhaps a ſhilling. Sometimes, when the cattle did not arrive at the hour he expected, he would walk on, in the mire and dirt, to meet them, and more than once he has gone the whole way to his farm without ſtopping, though 17 miles from London. Denying himſelf every comfort, he walked home to London in the rain, ſooner than pay a ſhilling for a coach; he would ſit in wet clothes, rather than have a fire to dry them; he would eat his proviſions in the laſt ſtate of putrefaction, ſooner than have a freſh joint; and he wore a wig for a fortnight, which I," ſays the biographer, "ſaw him pick up from a rut in a lane." Yet when this paſſion of ſaving did not interfere, he performed very kind offices. In 1774, when aged 60, he was elected member for Berkſhire, and for twelve years ſerved the county, the moſt independent man in the commons. He came in without expence, and therefore expected no favor, and voted as in the pureſt days of parliamentary repreſentation. In 1788 he began to feel the infirmities of age, but with the ſtrongeſt antipathy to apothecaries, he endeavoured to ſupport life by regular exerciſe. In November 1789 nature ſeemed exhauſted, and, no longer able to walk, he crept into his bed on the 21ſt, and on the 26th expired, without a groan, leaving, beſides entailed eſtates at Marcham, Berks, in Eſſex, &c. upwards of 500,000l. Though, however, ſo fond of money, he never did an unjuſt action to increaſe his ſtore. He was cruel to himſelf, and benevolent to others. To others he lent much, to himſelf he denied every thing.

ELXAI, or ELXÆUS, founder of a ſect in the ſecond century, commanded his followers, whenever they prayed, always to direct their faces towards Jeruſalem. As he was an enemy to continence, he obliged all his followers to marry.

ELYS, Edmund, of Devonſhire, was educated at Baliol college, Oxford. He publiſhed ſome divine poems and miſcellanea, in Latin and Engliſh verſe. In 1659 he ſucceeded his father as rector of Eaſt Allington, Devonſhire, from which he was afterwards ejected. His pamphlet againſt Tillotſon's ſermons on the incarnation, and his volume of letters, were much admired. He died after 1693.

ELZEVIRS, celebrated printers in Amſterdam and Leyden, inferior to the Stephens in learning, but ſuperior in the neatneſs and elegance of their ſmall characters. There were five brothers, Lewis, Bonaventure, Abraham, Lewis, and Daniel. Lewis became known 1595, and was the firſt who marked the diſtinction between v conſonant and u vowel. Daniel was the laſt of his family diſtinguiſhed over other printers. He died 1681.

EMANUEL, king of Portugal 1495, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by patroniſing commercial adventures. By the perſevering boldneſs of the Portugueſe, the way to India by the Cape was diſcovered by Gama, and Brazil was viſited in 1501 by Cabrale. Deſervedly called the great, he died 1521, aged 53.

EMERSON, William, a mathematician, born 1701, at Hurworth, Durham. He followed the profeſſion of his father as ſchoolmaſter; but ſoon reſigned it, ſatisfied with a ſmall eſtate of about 60l. or 70l. a year. He was not only a general ſcholar, but well ſkilled in claſſical learning, and knew ſomething of phyſic. With a noble independence of mind, his manners, as well as his dreſs, were ſingular and eccentric. His dreſs, when in company, conſiſted of a flaxen wig without a ſingle crooked hair in it; his ſhirt had no opening before, but buttoned cloſe at the collar behind; his waiſtcoat always open before, except the lower button; and his coat, the only one he had, always open; with one hat, which ſerved him the whole of life, as he gradually leſſened the flaps, bit by bit, as it loſt its elaſticity. He always walked, though he kept a horſe; and when preſſed by the duke of Mancheſter, who often was delighted to pay him a viſit, to get into his coach, he would anſwer, "Damn your whim-wham, I had rather walk." When he had any thing for the preſs, he walked to London, and corrected every ſheet himſelf. He was fond of fiſhing, and generally ſtood up to his middle in the water while engaged in it. After hard ſtudy he retired to the ale-houſe for relaxation, and there procured whomever he could to drink and to talk with him. He lived very healthy, till 1781, when, being afflicted with the ſtone, and apprehending his diſſolution, he ſold all his books, and expired 1782, aged near 81. His publications were ſixteen in number, and all on mathematics, fluxions, algebra, optics, navigation, and mechanics, conſidered as very learned and accurate.

EMLYN, Thomas, of Stamford, Lincolnſhire, was educated for the miniſtry among the diſſenters. After being at a private ſchool, he entered at Emanuel college, Cambridge. He became, in 1683, chaplain to the counteſs of Donegal, and lived in her family even after her marriage to ſir William Franklin. He was ſo reſpected that his patron ſir William offered him a living in England, which he refuſed, in conſequence of his adherence to the nonconformiſt doctrines. The troubles of Ireland, however, ſoon put an end to his peaceful retirement, and he returned to London about 1688. In 1689, on the invitation of ſir Robert Rich, one of the lords of the admiralty, he undertook the care of a diſſenting congregation at Leoſtoff, where he continued about a year and a half. The flight of James II. from Ireland allowed the diſſenters to re-eſtabliſh their congregations, and Emlyn, well known as a preacher in Dublin, was invited to ſettle there by his friend Boyſe, in Wood-ſtreet. Emlyn consented, and in 1691 removed to Dublin, and displayed great powers of eloquence as a preacher; and insured the public esteem by his discourses, especia ly by that pathetic sermon called funeral consolations, which he delivered in consequence of his wife's death. This event in 1701, followed by the death of his mother, and of a son, affected him most bitterly; but to domestic calamities was now added public persecution. His opinions with respect to the Trinity began to be suspected, and he openly declared his sentiments, and was suspended from his office, and persuaded abruptly to leave the country. He came to London, where he published his case; but returning to Dublin, he roused the indignation of all parties by the publication of his "humble enquiry into the scripture account of Jesus Christ, or a short argument concerning his deity and glory, according to the gospel." This book drew the arm of the law upon its author. He was arrested at the instance of the dissenters, his book was seized, and he was tried, and found guilty of blasphemously asserting that Jesus Christ was not equal to God the Father. He was accordingly sentenced to suffer a year's imprisonment, and to pay a fine of 1000l. to the queen. The ignominy of the pillory was not added to his sentence, as he was a man of letters; but he was conducted round the four courts with a label on his breast. After two years' confinement the fine was reduced to 70l. and he was liberated. He returned to London, where he preached among the dissenters; but his congregation diminishing, he retired to solitude engaged in polemical divinity, about various parts of scripture. He had several invitations to take an active part in the ministry, particularly at Exeter; but all these he rejected. He died 1743, aged 79. His writings on controversial subjects are even now held in estimation by some, who have embraced his opinions as an unitarian or high arian.

Emma, daughter of Richard II. of Normandy, married Etheldred of England, with whom she fled on the invasion of the Danes. She afterwards married Canute; and when her son Edward, called the confessor, ascended the throne, she reigned conjointly with him. Her enemy the earl of Kent opposed her; and when she appealed for assistance to the bishop of Wincheste r, she was accused of criminal intercourse with that prelate; from which she extricated herself by walking barefoot, and unhurt, over nine burning ploughshares.

Emmius, Ubo, born in East Friesland, was rector of Norden college, 1579, but expelled for refusing to subscribe the confession of Augsburg, and 1588 he became rector of Leer college, which he raised to high eminence. In 1594 he was appointed over Groningen college, and when it was changed, in 1614, into an university, he was made professor of history and Greek. He died at Groningen 1625. He was author of several works, the most known of which are, Vetus Græcia illustrata, 3 vols. published after his death—history of William Lewis count Nassau—decades rerum Frisicarum, &c.

Empereur, a French engraver, in the 18th century, whose best pieces are, the triumph of Silenus and the bathers—Aurora and Tithonus, and the rape of Europa—Pyramus and Thisbe.

Empson, sir Richard, the favorite of Henry VII. was son of a sieve-maker at Towcester, Northamptonshire. His conduct in raising the king's revenues rendered him unpopular, and in the beginning of the next reign he was beheaded, 1510.

Enfield, William, of Sudbury, was educated at Daventry, and in 1763 was minister of a dissenting congregation in Liverpool. He was in 1770 tutor in belles lettres to the Warrington academy, and afterwards, in 1785, settled at Norwich, where he died, 1797, aged 56. He published two volumes of sermons of considerable merit—an history of Liverpool—institutes of natural philosophy—prayers and hymns—an history of philosophy, 2 vols. 4to. —biographical sermons—the speaker, a popular school book—and, since his death, 3 vols. of sermons have appeared.

Engelbrecht, John, of Brunswick, 1599, after working as a clothier, became, in 1622, a fanatical visionary, and gained the attention of the vulgar by his pretended intercourse with spirits, angels, and devils, and even with Christ himself, who, as he said, showed him his five holy wounds. As heaven and hell were thus open to his view, he received divine letters from above, and was called the mouth of the Lord. He died in 1641.

Enghelbrechtsen, Cornelius, a painter, the first Dutchman who painted in oil. His Christ on the cross, his Abraham's sacrifice, and his descent from the cross, are preserved in the church of Notre Dame du Marais; but his best piece is a picture with two sides, designed for the tombs of the barons Lockhorst, representing the lamb of the apocalypse. He died at Leyden 1533, aged 65.

Enghien, duke of, son of the duke of Bourbon, and grandson of the prince of Condé, was seized in the night at Ettenheim, in the territories of the elector of Baden, by direction of Bonaparte, and hurried to Paris. This was followed by a mock trial, and the prince condemned for having carried arms against his country during the reign of Robespierre. The sentence of his judges was carried into execution in the night of the 22d of March 1804, and he was shot in the wood of Vincennes. He died with resignation, rejoicing in his last moments that the soldiers who shot him were not Frenchmen.

English, Hester, a Frenchwoman, eminent for fine writing in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. Her performances are preserved in libraries and private hands. One of her pieces was preserved by Mr. Cripps, London, called, "Odonaires upon the vanitie and inconstance inconſtancie of the world, written by Eſter Inglis, the firſte of Januarie 1600."

ENJEDIM, George, an unitarian of Hungary, who died 1597. He wrote a learned book, called explicatio locorum ſcripturæ ex quibus dogma Trinitatis ſtabiliri ſolet, 4to.

ENNODIUS, Magnus Felix, a writer, born in Italy about 473. The loſs of an aunt, at the age of 16, reduced him to poverty, from which he was relieved by marrying a lady of fortune. He afterwards took orders; and his lady retired to ſecluſion. In 511 he was advanced to the biſhopric of Pavia, and afterwards he negociated an union between the weſtern and eaſtern churches. He died at Padua 521.

ENOCH, the ſeventh from Adam, is celebrated for his integrity and virtues, for which he was taken up to heaven without dying, B.C. 3017, in the 365th year of his age.

ENSENADA, Zeno Somo de Silva, marquis de la, a miniſter of Spain. From the office of a book-keeper to a banker, he roſe to places of honor, and being ennobled, took the name of Enſenada (nothing in itſelf.) He was intimate with Farinelli, who, like himſelf, had riſen from obſcurity; and when diſmiſſed, by the intrigues of Hueſcar, his friend reflected upon the ſeverity of the meaſure in the preſence of the queen. Though never reinſtated in the office of prime miniſter, he retained in privacy the eſteem of his ſovereign. He died 1755.

ENT, George, of Sandwich, Kent, was educated at Sydney college, Cambridge. He afterwards took his degree of M.D. in Padua, and was elected fellow, and afterwards preſident, of the college of phyſicians, and knighted by Charles II. He died in London 1689. As the friend of Harvey, he wrote apologia pro circulatione ſanguinis, contra Æmilium Pariſanum, 8vo.—animadverſiones in Thruſtoni diatribam de reſpirationis uſu primario, 8vo. &c.

ENTICK, John, a clergyman and ſchoolmaſter at Stepney, known as the author of a Latin and of a ſpelling dictionary. He alſo wrote a hiſtory of the war terminated in 1763, 5 vols. 8vo. and a hiſtory of London, 4 vols. 8vo. abridged from Stow, and other works. He died 1780.

ENTINOPE, of Candia, in the 5th century, was one of the chief founders of Venice. He fled from the Goths, in 405, and concealed himſelf in the marſhes on the borders of the Adriatic, and the houſe he built was the beginning of the republic. The people of Padua ſought the ſame reſidence afterwards, and 24 houſes were erected there in 413. His houſe was afterwards converted into a church, dedicated to St. James, and ſtill exiſts in the Rialto.

ENZINAS, Francis, of Burgos, became a diſciple of Melanchthon, and tranſlated the new teſtament into Spaniſh, for which he was impriſoned; but eſcaping, he fled to Calvin at Geneva, 1545. He wrote a hiſtory of the Low Countries, and of Spain, which forms part of the proteſtant martyrology.

EOBANUS, Elias, ſurnamed Heſſus, as born in an open field near Heſſe, 1448, was profeſſor of belles lettres at Erfurt, &c. Though a good poet and an elegant ſcholar, he was very fond of drinking, and he is ſaid to have conquered a hard German drinker by emptying a bucket of beer. He poſſeſſed all the eaſe and elegance of Ovid, though he was inferior in imagination. He died 1540, aged 52. His works are, Latin tranſlations, in verſe, from Theocritus and from Homer—elegies—ſylvæ—bucolics, much eſteemed—epiſtolæ, &c.

EON, de l'Etoile, a fanatic of Britany. Taking advantage of his name, he thought himſelf the ſon of God, and the judge of quick and dead, per eum qui juſtificaturus eſt vivos et mortuos. He gave rank to his followers, calling ſome angels and ſome inferior ſpirits; and as he bribed thoſe who were ſent to ſeize him, it was conſidered by the vulgar that it was impoſſible to apprehend him. He was brought before Eugenius at the council of Rheims in 1148, and pretended, that when he held up to heaven the forked ſtick in his hand, two thirds of the world were under the power of God, and the other of himſelf, and when he turned the ſtick to the earth, that his authority extended over two parts, and that of God only over one. He died in priſon, and ſome of his followers choſe to be burnt rather than abjure.

EON DE BEAUMONT, Charlotte-Genevieve-Timothée d', of Tonnerre ſur Armencon, was born 1728. She was brought up as a boy by her parents, who wiſhed at her birth to have a ſon, and was recommended to the court, and ſent as ambaſſador to Ruſſia. She afterwards ſerved in the army under Broglio, and behaved with unuſual courage, and after the peace of 1762, ſhe was ſent as ſecretary to the embaſſy in London, and alſo ſucceeded as ambaſſador. A wager determined her ſex in London, and before the king's bench ſhe declared herſelf to be a woman. The penſion ſhe had received was continued by the French king, but on condition ſhe aſſumed the dreſs of her ſex. She died in 1790. She publiſhed tracts on her negociations.

ERE'E, Charles Michael de l', an eccleſiaſtic, celebrated for his humane efforts in favor of the deaf and dumb. By his ſalutary inſtruction, theſe unfortunate perſons have acquired the knowledge of even ſix different languages, and have become profound mathematicians, and ready calculators. This benevolent man, after receiving honorable marks of eſteem and gratitude from the empreſs of Ruſſia, the emperor of Germany, the king of France, and the whole of Europe, died at Paris, 1790. He was ſucceeded by l'abbé Sicard.

EPHRAIM, ſon of Joſeph, was adopted among the tribes of Jacob. He was born about 1710 B.C.

EPHREM, St. a father of the church, born at Edeſſa. He devoted himſelf to the monaſtic life, and refuſed to be a biſhop. He wrote ſeveral books in Syriac, which are highly eſteemed. He died 378.

EPISCOPIUS, Simon, a divine, born at Amſterdam, 1583, and educated there and at Leyden. During the controverſy between Gomarus and Arminius about predeſtination, he embraced the opinions of the latter, and was expoſed to perſecution. He was in 1612 appointed divinity profeſſor at Leyden, in the room of Gomarus. In 1615 he went to Paris; but on his return he was accuſed of concerting with father Cotton the ruin of the proteſtant church and the United States. He appeared before the ſynod at Dort, and becauſe he and his friends refuſed to ſubmit to the authority of arbitrary judges, they were depoſed from their functions, and baniſhed. He retired to Antwerp, and ſeverely attacked the popiſh tenets. He afterwards viſited Paris; and was again permitted to return to Holland, in 1626, where he became miniſter of the remonſtrants' church at Rotterdam. In 1634 he was choſen rector of the college of his ſect at Amſterdam. He died 1643, of a retention of urine, a dreadful diſorder, which had two years before carried off his wife. As the moon was eclipſed at his death, his friends, in their grief, conſidered it as the emblem of the church, which loſt its brighteſt light by the departure of Epiſcopius. He did not always act with that humility of temper and moderation ſo becoming a Chriſtian. His character was highly reſpected by Grotius, who always carried with him his theological inſtitutions. As an Arminian, and the leader of the remonſtrants, he was engaged in ſevere controverſies, in which he diſplayed commanding eloquence and ardent zeal. His works have appeared in 2 vols. fol.

ERPENDORF, Henry, a German noble, who acquired celebrity by his diſpute with Eraſmus. He was born near Friburg, and though he boaſted of his nobility, was the ſon of a plebeian. He reflected on the illegitimate birth of Eraſmus, who in his turn retorted againſt his adverſary. The interference of friends produced a reconciliation, but it was momentary, and a war of letters aroſe more fierce and inveterate.

ERASMUS, Deſiderius, an illuſtrious character in the republic of literature, and in the cauſe of religion, was born 28th October, 1467, at Rotterdam. His father Gerard, of Tergou, fell in love with Margaret, daughter of a phyſician of Lovenbergen, and after mutual promiſes of marriage, which were never realized, the lovers forgot themſelves in criminal intercourſe, and gave birth to two ſons. One of theſe died early, and the other was called Gerard after his father, a name which he exchanged for Deſiderius, in Latin ſignifying the ſame as Gerard in Dutch, that is, amiable. The conduct of Gerard gave ſuch uneaſineſs to his relations that they determined to make him an eccleſiaſtic, but he fled to Rome. Here he was falſely informed, that his beloved Margaret was no more, and in deſpair he became a prieſt. On his return, however, he was aſtoniſhed to find his Margaret alive, but though diſpleaſed with his relations, he abſtained from all improper intercourſe, and Margaret herſelf, faithful to her firſt vows, led ever after a life of celibacy. Gerard devoting himſelf to the education of his only ſon, ſaw with admiration the opening of thoſe powers, which proved the envy and wonder of all Germany. His ſtudies at Deventer where he had for his fellow ſtudent Adrian VI. were interrupted by the plague, which proved fatal to his mother, who had accompanied him to this ſeat of learning. The death of Margaret was followed by that of Gerard, and Eraſmus now an orphan, was removed to Tergou, about the age of 14, and placed under guardians, who wiſhed to obtain his ſmall patrimony by devoting him to the ſecluſion of a monaſtery. He was firſt ſent to a convent at Bois-le-duc, then removed to Sion, and afterwards to Stein near Tergou, where he became a regular canon 1486. In a convent, which, as he deſcribes, is a place of impiety rather than of religion, where every thing was done to which a depraved inclination could lead, under the maſk of piety, and where it was hardly poſſible for any one to keep himſelf pure, Eraſmus could not long be confined. He was introduced to the archbiſhop of Cambray, who wanted a ſecretary on his viſit to Rome; but though the journey was laid aſide by the prelate, Eraſmus did not return to the convent, but ſet out for Paris in 1496. To maintain himſelf he inſtructed ſome pupils, and in 1497 he left Paris, and was kindly received at Cambray by the biſhop. The ſame year he viſited England under the patronage of his former pupil lord Montjoy, and he entered at St. Mary's college, Oxford, where, in the company of Colet, Latimer, More, &c. he devoted himſelf to claſſical ſtudies, eſpecially to Greek, which now began to revive in England, and of which he knew nothing. After nearly a year's reſidence, he returned to Paris, and in conſequence of the plague then in that city, he paſſed to Orleans, and in 1498, completed his Adagia. He again, in 1499, viſited for a little time, England, which he deſcribes as abounding with humanity, politeneſs, and learning. His Adagia was publiſhed 1500, and to it he added a panegyric on England, and ſoon after he printed his book de copiâ verborum, & de conſcrib. epiſtolis. But whilſt riſing in literary fame, Eraſmus was poor. In 1502 he purſued his theological ſtudies at Louvain, under his friend, afterwards Adrian VI., and in 1503, he publiſhed his "Enchiridion militis chriſtiani," which aſſailed the corruptions of the Romiſh church. He had now applied for three years to Greek, and he publiſhed ſome tranſlations from Greek authors, and dedicated to Henry VIII.

one of Plutarch's treatiſes, the Hecuba of Euripides to Warham, and Lucian's Toxaris to Fox biſhop of Wincheſter. He now travelled to Italy, and taking his degree of D.D. at Turin, proceeded to Florence, and was preſent at the pompous entry of Julius II. into Bologna, a ceremony which excited his indignation, when he compared it to the meek entry of the lowly Jeſus into Jeruſalem. After ſtaying about a year at Bologna, he went to Venice, where Aldus printed a new improved edition of his Adagia, and of his tranſlations from Euripides, Terence, and Plautus. At Padua, he ſuperintended the education of Alexander, the natural ſon of James V. of Scotland. He afterwards paſſed to Rome, where he was received with all the reſpect due to his merit; and he would have ſettled there, had he not previouſly engaged to return to England. Going back to Sienna, where he had left his pupil, he parted with him at Cumæ, and afterwards heard that he had periſhed in the bloody battle of Flodden-field 1513. From Italy, Eraſmus paſſed through Conſtance, Briſgau, Straſburg, Holland, and Antwerp, and arrived in England in the beginning of 1510. Though flattered with expectations, he found himſelf diſappointed, and regretted he had not fixed his reſidence at Rome. While in England he lodged in the houſe of More, where in the courſe of a week he wrote his "encomium moriæ," in which he laſhed the follies of the church of Rome. He afterwards went to Cambridge, and was appointed lady Margaret's divinity profeſſor, and profeſſor of Greek. How long he continued in theſe offices is not known, he had unfortunately a fondneſs for wandering, and was diſſatisfied with the ſlow progreſs of preferment, which, while it frequently falls rapidly on the head of perſons of no merit, with difficulty overtakes thoſe whoſe ſervices have been moſt active in the cauſe of ſcience and of virtue. In 1514, Eraſmus was in Flanders, flattered with the title of counſellor to Charles of Auſtria, and in 1515 he went to Baſil, with the intention of printing there, his new teſtament, and other works. The new teſtament appeared in 1516, and as it was the firſt time it was printed in Greek, it drew upon him the cenſure of ignorant divines. But to his labors, perhaps more than to any other man, was learning indebted for its revival. While engaged in the cauſe of literature, the opinions of the world were agitated by the oppoſition of Luther to the papal authority. It was expected that Eraſmus would have joined the reformer, as in his Enchiridion he had ridiculed the popiſh ceremonies, and as he was conſidered "to have laid the egg which Luther hatched;" but though ſolicited by Luther, he declined to take a ſhare in the diſpute. This timidity was agreeable to neither party, who eagerly wiſhed for his abilities to defend their cauſe, and therefore while he pretended on one ſide to be well affected towards the pope, and on the other hand, commended the conduct of Luther, he found himſelf expoſed to the odium of all. In 1518 he was invited by Henry VIII. to ſettle in England, but he was ſuſpicious of Wolſey, and thanked the king in general terms. At laſt Eraſmus attacked Luther on free will, and beſtowed high encomiums on the book of Henry VIII. againſt the reformer, but theſe things appeared feeble to the catholics, and the publication of the Colloquia, proved that the author had no objection to ridicule the pope. The book, though full of wit and good ſenſe, was afterwards condemned by the faculty of theology at Paris, and prohibited by the pope. On the ſucceſſion of Adrian VI. Eraſmus congratulated his old ſchool fellow, but though repeatedly invited by him to Rome, with every offer of protection, he refuſed to truſt himſelf into the hands of men whom he had offended, and with juſtice, for he ſoon diſcovered that the advice which he offered about healing the diſſenſions of the church, was received not only with indifference, but with evident marks of diſpleaſure. The latter part of his life was ſpent chiefly at Baſil. Though exaſperated by Luther, who in his anſwer to his book, in a mixture of compliment, ridicule, and invective, called it "an excrement in a golden diſh," and diſpleaſed with the philippics of J. Scaliger againſt his "Ciceronianus," he ſtill preſerved that neutrality which either the love of eaſe or cowardice had ſuggeſted. It is ſaid that as his health declined he was flattered with a cardinal's hat, but he firmly reſiſted. He died at Baſil 12th July 1536, aged 69. Baſil ſtill retains her reſpect for the aſhes of this great man, the houſe in which he died is ſtill ſhown, and his cabinet containing his ring his ſeal, his ſword, knife, pencil, and his will written by himſelf, and his picture by Holbein, is ſtill viſited with veneration by the curious. Rotterdam alſo has not forgotten the celebrity ſhe derives from giving him birth. The houſe in which he was born is marked out by a becoming inſcription, the college bears the name of Eraſmus, and a beautiful copper ſtatue erected in 1622, points out with how much pride the inhabitants reckon Eraſmus among their fellow citizens. The perſon and the manners of Eraſmus have been delineated by his friend Beatus Rhenanus, and his features are moſt correctly expreſſed by Hans Holbein. Great and reſpectable as the character of Eraſmus is, he had his failings. Too fickle in his attachments, and irreſolute in his opinions, he has been cenſured for luke-warmneſs, timidity, and unfairneſs in the reformation. Though diſguſted with the ſuperſtition of Rome, his meek ſpirit was equally hurt by the violence of the reformers, and perhaps to the prejudices of his early education may be aſcribed, the conduct he purſued in not embracing the tenets of Luther. Indifference to the ſucceſs or jealous of the labors of the reformers, Eraſmus claims the gratitude of poſterity by the excellence lence of his writings, in which he ſpent a long life, in oppoſing ignorance and ſuperſtition, and in promoting literature and true piety. His works are very numerous, and diſplay the eloquence and the graces of Cicero, and are publiſhed in 10 vols. fol. by le Clerc.

ERCILL-YA-CUNIGA, Don Alonzo d', a Spaniard, in the ſervice of Maximilian. He was at the battle of St. Quintin 1557, and afterwards travelled through France, England, and Italy. Animated with romantic bravery, he went to attack the Indians in Chili and Peru, and defeated them, and made his adventures the ſubject of his poem called Araucana. This poem, conſiſting of 36 cantos, contains tedious repetitions, but it abounds in bold deſcriptions, and poſſeſſes the charms of animated poetry.

EREMITA, Daniel, of Antwerp, was intimate with Scaliger and Caſaubon. He was inſinuating in his manners, but without principle, and in his converſation very licentious. Recommended to the great duke of Florence, he obtained a penſion for his verſes on the marriage of the duke with Magdalen of Auſtria 1608. He went in the ſuite of the duke's envoy to Germany, and made himſelf ridiculous on his return by the ſhameleſs untruths which he delivered. He became afterwards a deiſt, and died 1613. His opera varia were publiſhed by Grævius, written with elegance, eaſe, and purity of ſtyle. He wrote beſides Latin poems, &c.

ERIC IX. king of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, after Margaret 1412, married the daughter of Henry IV. of England. His pilgrimage to the holy land and his captivity in Syria, diſordered his affairs, and on his return he found the Swedes diſſatisfied, and the Danes anxious to revolt. He found oppoſition unavailing, and was ſolemnly depoſed 1439, and retired to Pomerania, where he died in privacy 1459.

ERIC XIV. ſucceeded his father Guſtavus, and was the unſucceſsful ſuitor of Elizabeth of England. His marriage with the daughter of an obſcure peaſant rendered him unpopular. His cruelties encreaſed the diſſatisfaction, and he reſigned the crown 1568, and died in confinement 1578.

ERIC, Peter, a Venetian, ſeized in 1584 a veſſel which carried the widow of the baſhaw of Tripoli to Conſtantinople, with all her treaſures. Putting to death the ſailors, he offered violence to the females, and then cut their bodies to pieces and threw them into the ſea. This barbarity was puniſhed, and Eric was beheaded by order of the ſenate, and his riches reſtored to the emperor of Turkey.

ERIGENA, John Scotus, a celebrated ſcholar, born at Ayr in Scotland. He travelled into foreign lands, and at Athens ſo perfected himſelf in oriental literature, that he proved the greateſt philoſopher of the age. At the invitation of Charles the Bald he reſided at the French court, and the king offered him the moſt honorable patronage, and bore with the ſeverity of his raillery with good humor. As the monarch and the philoſopher ſat one day oppoſite each other at table, Charles aſked him in a merry mood, Pray what is between a ſcot and a ſot? Nothing but the table, anſwered the bold courtier. The king hearing the rebuke without being offended, laughed heartily. Scotus wrote ſome works, but though all admired his learning, the clergy were offended with his attacks on their notions of predeſtination, and of tranſubſtantiation. His books therefore were regarded as heretical, as they ſeemed to contain the errors of Pelagius. His next work was a tranſlation of the works of Dionyſius, which the Greek emperor had ſent to Charles, and which Erigena tranſlated. The work was received with gratitude by the weſtern clergy, but as it attacked in ſome paſſages the Romiſh church, pope Nicholas ſent a letter to the French king, deſiring the baniſhment of Erigena, and his appearance at Rome. Charles inſtead permitted him to eſcape to England, where he was employed under Alfred in reſtoring literature in Oxford. He was in 879 profeſſor of mathematics and aſtronomy in that univerſity, and then retired to Malmſbury, where he opened a ſchool. His ſeverity here was ſaid to be ſo great that his pupils murdered him with iron bodkins, the inſtruments with which they then wrote, though ſome imagine that this was committed at the inſtigation of the monks, who were jealous of Scotus. This event is placed in the year 883, by ſome in 886, but by Mackenzie in 874.

ERIZZO, Lewis and Mark Anthony, two brothers of Venice. They conſpired in the murder of their uncle a ſenator of Ravenna 1546, to obtain his riches. This was diſcovered by an accomplice, and Lewis was beheaded and Mark died in priſon.

ERIZZO, Paul, was governor of Negropont. When obliged to capitulate to the Turks, on condition of having his life ſpared, Mahomet II. ordered him 1469 to be ſawn in two, and cut off, with his own hands, the head of his daughter, who refuſed to gratify his paſſion.

ERLACH, John Lewis, of Berne, was at the head of the ſix families of that name, ſo illuſtrious in Switzerland. He ſo diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the ſervice of France, that Lewis XIV. made him commander in chief of his troops. He died 1650, aged 55, at Briſach, of which he was governor.

ERNESTI, John Auguſtus, profeſſor of theology at Leipſic, &c. died 1781, aged 74. Beſides excellent editions of Cicero, Xenophon, Suetonius, Homer, Tacitus, Callimachus, &c. with learned notes, he publiſhed inſtitutio interpretis Novi Teſtam. Leipſ. &c.

ERPENIUS, Thomas, a learned writer, of Gorcum in Holland. He ſtudied at Leyden, and afterwards travelled into England, France, Italy, and Germany. His learning, and the fame of his works, made him known to the learned learned of Europe. In 1612 he was profeſſor of Arabic and of oriental languages at Leyden, where he died of a contagious diſeaſe 1624. His abilities were ſo much admired that he was ſolicited to ſettle in England, alſo in Italy, and in Spain, and his knowledge of Arabic was ſo correct that the emperor of Morocco ſhowed his nobles, as a curioſity for its elegance and purity, a letter in Arabic, which he had received from him, as the interpreter of the ſtates of Holland. Though he was but 40 years old at his death, he publiſhed 19 various works, on oriental hiſtory, and on ſubjects connected with his profeſſorſhip.

ERSKINE, Ralph, of Alloa, was educated there and at Edinburgh. He was miniſter of Falkirk but ejected for nonconformity 1662, and when afterwards impriſoned by his enemies, he was liberated by the influence of lord Mar. On the re-eſtabliſhment of the preſbytery he was made 1690 miniſter of Churnſide, Berwick, where he died 1696, aged 68. He left ſome Latin MSS. on difficult paſſages of ſcripture.

ERSKINE, Ebenezer, ſon to the preceding, was born 1680, in the priſon of Baſs, where his father was confined. He was miniſter of Portmoak, Fifeſhire, from whence he removed in 1728 to Stirling. In 1747 he joined the burghers, and died at Stirling 1755, aged 75. Four volumes of his ſermons were printed 1762, 8vo. &c.

ERSKINE, Ralph, brother to the preceding, was born at Roxburgh 1682, and educated at Edinburgh. He was miniſter of Dunfermlin, Fifeſhire, 1711, and was depoſed 1734, for joining the ſeceders. He died 1751, aged 69. His works were publiſhed 2 vols. fol. conſiſting of a polemical treatiſe, goſpel ſonnets, and above 200 ſermons, &c.

ERSKINE, James, lord Alva, was born at Edinburgh 1722, and made one of the barons of the exchequer 1754, which he reſigned in 1761, on being appointed to the ſupreme civil court of Scotland. He exchanged the name of lord Barjarg for that of Alva, and died at Drumſheugh, near Edinburgh, 1796.

ERXLEBEN, John Chriſtian Polycarp, of Quedlinburg, gave at Gottingen lectures on phyſic, the veterinary art, and natural hiſtory. His principles of natural hiſtory in 8vo. are particularly admired. He died 1777, aged 33.

ERYCEIRA, Ferdinand de Menezes count d', of Liſbon, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in military affairs. He wrote the hiſtory of Tangiers, fol. —hiſtory of Portugal, 2 vols, folio to 1657, &c.

ERYCEIRA, Francis Xavier de Menezes count d', great-grandſon or the foregoing, was born at Liſbon 1673, and died 1743. He was honored by ſeveral princes and learned men, and by the preſent of their works he encreaſed the library of his anceſtors with 15,000 new volumes, and 1,000 manuſcripts. He wrote above 100 different publications, the beſt known of which are his memoirs on the value of the coins of Portugal,—reflections on academical ſtudies,—58 parallels of illuſtrious men,—and 12 of illuſtrious women,—the Henriade of Voltaire tranſlated, &c.

Es, James Van, of Antwerp, is well known for his pictures of birds, flowers, fiſhes, and fruit. His lobſters, crabs, oyſters, &c. are incomparable, and in his grapes, nature is ſo ſkilfully imitated, that the ſtones are viſible through the ſkin.

ESAU, ſon of Iſaac and Rebecca, ſold his right of primogeniture to his brother Jacob, who, afterwards, alſo obtained his father's bleſſing. This proved ſo offenſive to Eſau, that he meditated his death, but he was afterwards reconciled to him. He was father of the Edomites, and died about 1719 B.C. aged 126.

ESCALO, Maſtin de l', podeſtat of Verona 1259, was aſſaſſinated 1273. The ſovereign authority remained in his family, and his deſcendant Maſtino III. added Vicenza, Breſcia, and even Padua to his dominions. His tyranny at laſt was repreſſed by the Venetians, and he died 1387. The families of l'Eſcalo and the Carraras of Padua had long conteſts, but Verona at laſt became independent.

ESCALQUENS, William, of Toulouſe 1326 rendered himſelf known by cauſing himſelf to be carried in a coffin, with all the funeral pomp of a departed ſaint to the cathedral.

ESCOUBLEAU, Francis d', cardinal de Sourdis, was a great favorite with pope Leo IX. and a warm advocate for church diſcipline. He died 1686, aged 53.

ESCOUBLEAU, Henry d', brother and ſucceſſor to the preceding, as archbiſhop of Bourdeaux. He was at the ſiege of Rochelle, and quarrelled with the duke of Epernon, who ſtruck him a blow, which was puniſhed by the excommunication of the guilty lord. He died 1645.

ESPAGNAC, John Baptiſt Joſeph de Sapuguet Damarzil baron d', a French general, who died at Paris 1783, aged 70. He ſignaliſed himſelf in the campaigns of Italy and Bavaria, and wrote ſeveral books on the military profeſſion, among which are his campagnes du roi, 1745, &c. 4 vols. 8vo.—eſſai ſur. la ſcience de la guerre, a valuable work, 3 vols. 8vo. —Hiſtoire du marechal de Saxe, 3 vols. 4to. &c.

ESPAGNE, John d', of Dauphiné, came to England in James' reign, and officiated as miniſter of a French proteſtant congregation in London. He wrote a treatiſe of ſome merit on popular errors in religion, with ſome ſtrictures on Calvin's principles, dedicated to Charles I.

ESPAGNET, John d', preſident of the parliament of Bourdeaux, became known by his Enchiridion phyſicæ reſtitutæ, in which he eſtabliſhed a complete ſyſtem of phyſics contrary to the tenets of Ariſtotle. He wrote alſo on the philoſopher's ſtone, &c 1616.

ESPAGNOLET, Joſeph Kiberia l', a Spaniſh painter, painter. In poverty he was happy in his delineations, but prosperity rendered him indolent. The countenances of his figures were extremely expressive, and he was particularly successful in the representation of terror, anguish, and ferocity. He died 1656, aged 76.

ESPEN, Zeger Bernard Van, was professor of laws at Louvain. His observations on the formulary and the bull unigenitus, proved the source of bitterness to him, so that to avoid persecution, he retired to Amersfort, where he died 1728, aged 83. His works are valuable, especially his jus ecclesiasticum universum.

ESPER, John Frederic, of Drossenfeld, in Bayreuth, wrote an accurate description of the lately discovered zoolites of unknown animals, and of several caverns, &c. fol. 1774, a method of determining the orbits of the comets, and other celestial bodies, without astronomical instruments, &c. He died 1781, aged 49.

ESPERIENTE, Philip Callimachus, of St. Geminiano, in Tuscany, under Pius II. formed an academy, the members of which assumed Greek or Latin names. Under Paul, Pius' successor, the academy was considered as an assembly of seditious men, and the founder fled to Poland, where he became preceptor to the children of king Casimir III. He was also ambassador to Constantinople, Vienna, and Rome, and on his return to Poland, an accidental fire destroyed his house, library, and manuscripts, and overwhelmed him with grief. He died soon after 1496. His works are commentarii rerum Persicarum, &c.

ESPREMENIL, James Duval d', a Frenchman, born in Pondicherry. He was remarkable for his violent proceedings during the revolution. He was guillotined 1794. He wrote remonstrances, published by the parliament 1788,—nullity and despotism of the assembly, 8vo.—actual state of France.

ESPRIT, James, an agreeable writer, born at Beziers 1611. He became, by his wit, sense, and elegant manners, the friend of Seguier, Rochefoucault, and Conti. He died 1678, aged 67. He wrote paraphrases on the psalms, the fallacy of human virtues, 2 vols. 12mo. &c.

ESSARS, Pierre des, a French nobleman, who served in the Scotch army against the English, and was taken prisoner in 1402. He lost his head on the scaffold, 1413.

ESSARS, Charlotte des, a lady of great beauty. She was in England with the countess de Beaumont, and on her return to France she was introduced 1590 to Henry IV. by whom she had two children, afterwards legitimated. She afterwards lived with cardinal de Guise, by whom she had a son called de Romorentin, and she married in 1630 de l'Hopital. Her wishes to advance her son Romorentin proved fatal to her, as she was arrested by Richelieu, and put in confinement where she died 1651.

ESSEX, James, F.A.S. was born 1723, and distinguished himself by his knowledge of architecture. He repaired King's college chapel, Cambridge, and the cathedrals of Ely and Lincoln, besides other colleges in Cambridge. He died 1784, in his 61st year, at Cambridge, his native town.

ESTAING, Charles Henry count d', a French admiral born in Auvergne. He was under Lally in the East Indies, and escaped from an English prison, by breaking his parole. He commanded the French squadrons in the American war, and took Grenada. He was guillotined 1793, as a suspected character.

ESTAMPES, Anne of Pisselieu duchess of, a woman of great beauty. She attended as maid of honor, Louisa of Savoy when she went to meet her son Francis I. at Madrid, and she was no sooner seen than loved by the monarch. Though Francis forgot himself with her, he yet attempted to cover her dishonor by marrying her to one of his flatterers, whom he created duke of Estampes. In the declining years of the monarch, the duchess, who still possessed the influence of her charms, entered into correspondence with Charles V. to counteract the views of the dauphin, and of his mistress Diana de Poitiers. By her perfidious communications Charles, at the head of an almost famished army, was enabled to take Epernay and Chateau-Tierri, where the magazines of the French troops were deposited, and as no measures were taken by the dauphin without consultation with Francis, every secret was imparted to the faithless mistress, and by her to the enemy, so that the ruin of the kingdom seemed inevitable. After the death of Francis the worthless favorite returned to her country seat, and died a protestant.

ESTAMPES, Leonard d', archbishop of Rheims, was zealous against the Jesuits 1626, who had attacked the authority of the king, in church affairs. The censure of d'Estampes was however resisted, as in the states general of 1614 the tiers etat could never obtain the declaration, "that no power, temporal or spiritual, has the right to dispose of the kingdom, and to dispense the subjects from their oaths of fidelity."

ESTCOURT, Richard, of Tewkskury, Gloucestershire, at the age of 15 escaped from his friends to join a company of strolling players at Worcester, where he appeared in women's clothes, in the part of Roxana in Alexander the great. He was pursued to Chipping-Norton, by his father, who bound him to an apothecary in Hatton-garden, London. Here he continued till business failed him, and he then went to Ireland, where he was well received, and he appeared at Drury-lane, in the part of Dominic in the Spanish Fryar. His chief merit consisted in mimicry. Without great powers of his own, he could imitate the greatest players of the times, though he frequently offended by the introduction of sentences which the author never wrote. He became a great favorite of the town, and when the leading men of the times, and among them Marlborough, rough, erected the beef steak club, Estcourt was appointed providore, and wore as the badge of his office, a gold gridiron suspended from his neck, by a green silk ribbon. Some years before his death he quitted the stage. He died 1713. He left two dramatic pieces, Fair example, a comedy, and Prunella, an interlude.

Esther, a Jewish maid, whom Ahasuerus king of Persia took for his wife, after his divorce from Vashti. She defeated the machinations of Haman against her nation, and she saw her cousin Mordecai raised to the same honors which the favorite possessed. This deliverance of the Jews was celebrated by a particular feast called Purim. The Ahasuerus of scripture is supposed to be Darius son of Hystaspes.

Estoile, Pierre de l', grand auditor of the chancery of Paris, died 1611. From his MSS. were published his journal of Henry III. from 1574 to 1589,—Journal of the reign of Henry IV. four vols. 8vo. These works are valuable, and illustrate the private history of France.

Estoile, Claude de l', son of the preceding, died 1652, aged 54. He was one of the five authors consulted by Richelieu in the making of his bad plays. D'Estoile wrote some poems and plays, and it is said that like Moliere and Malherbe, he read his pieces for the stage to his maid servant, on whose approbation proceeding from simple motives, he could depend.

Estrades, Godfrey count d', marshal of France was an able negociator. He was ambassador in England in 1661, and he negociated with Charles II. for the evacuation of Dunkirk. In 1666, he had a dispute with the Spanish ambassador, about precedency in London, and the year following he negociated the peace of Breda, and in 1673, assisted at the conferences of Nimeguen. He died 1686, aged 79. His negociations were printed nine vols. 12mo. from the originals, consisting of 22 vols. folio.

Estre'es, John d', page to Anne of Britany, died 1567, aged 81. He distinguished himself greatly in several battles and at the taking of Calais 1588. He improved the manner of casting cannon, and was the first gentleman of Picardy who embraced the protestant religion.

Estre'es Francis Annibal d', son of the preceding, was bishop of Laon. He soon quitted the church for the army, and distinguished himself at the taking of Treves, and by other military exploits. He was made duke, peer, and marshal of France, and was employed in 1636, as ambassador at Rome. He died at Paris 1670, aged 98. He wrote in an unadorned stile, but with great fidelity, memoirs of the regency of Mary de Medicis,—relation of the siege of Mantua in 1630, &c.

Estre'es, Cæsar d', cardinal, was son of the preceding, and bishop of Laon 1653. He was afterwards employed at the court of Bavaria, and also at Rome, where he skilfully conducted himself to procure the elections of Alexander VIII. Innocent XII. and Clement XI. He accompanied Philip V. when he took possession of the Spanish throne, and died 1714, aged 87, respected as an able negociator and a benevolent man.

Estre'es, Gabrielle d', sister of Francis Annibal d'Estrées, became the favorite of Henry IV. who saw her first in 1591, at the castle of Cœuvres. The king, to please her, embraced the popish religion, and determined to marry her, though he was himself married to Margaret de Valois. While engaged in procuring the divorce, Gabrielle died suddenly 1599. It was suspected that she was poisoned by Zamet, as her head the day after her death was so distorted that her beautiful features had disappeared. During her amours she had married d'Amerval, with whom however she never cohabited. She had three children by Henry. The king put on mourning for her, and honored her memory as if she had been a queen. Though fond of her, Henry did not forget his duties, and when Gabrielle, displeased with some of his ministers, solicited their dismission, he replied that he would sooner part with 10 mistresses than one of his long-tried servants.

Estre'es, Victor Marie d', vice admiral of France, bombarded Barcelona and Alicant 1691, and again in 1697 he besieged Barcelona. In 1701 he commanded the French and Spanish fleets, and in 1703 was created marshal of France, &c. He died at Paris 1737, aged 77.

Estre'es, Lewis Cæsar duke d', marshal of France and minister of state, first distinguished himself in the war against Spain, and afterwards in the war of 1741, where at the blockade of Egra, the battle of Fontenoi, the sieges of Mons, Charleroi, &c. his bravery was conspicuous. In 1756 he was placed at the head of the French forces in Germany, and gave battle to the duke of Cumberland at Hastenback, and paved the way for the success of Closterseven. He was made a duke in 1763, and died 1771, aged 76.

Ethelbert, king of Kent, became a christian by the preaching of Austin, who came to England at the invitation of Bertha the queen. He enacted a code of laws, and died 616, in the 56th year of his reign.

Ethelbert, second son of Ethelwolf, succeeded his brother Ethelbald 860, and was a popular prince.

Ethelred, son of Edgar, was king 978. To deliver himself from the tax paid to the Danes, called Danegelt, he caused those unfortunate foreigners to be all murdered, in consequence of which Sweyn the Danish king invaded the kingdom. He died 1016.

Ethelwolf, king of England 838, went to Rome to improve the education of his son the great Alfred. He died 857.

ETHEREGE, George, a dramatic writer, born 1636, in Oxfordſhire. His comedy of "The comical revenge, or love in a tub," appeared in 1664, and recommended him to the wits of the times, in whoſe company he ſhone as a man of humor, lively in his converſation and of a refined taſte. His ſecond play appeared in 1668, called "She would if ſhe could," and the laſt in 1676, called the "man of mode, or ſir Fopling Flutter." Of theſe the laſt was the moſt finiſhed, and as it cenſured the vices of ſome of the faſhionable men of the times, it was very popular. His gaiety made him poor, but to recruit his finances, he paid his addreſſes to a rich old widow, who however refuſed to marry him except he was knighted, and to make her a lady and obtain her fortune, he ſolicited and obtained the honor of knighthood, 1683. Etherege, whoſe manners were ſo faſcinating that he was humorouſly called gentle George, and eaſy Etheredge, was patronized by the ducheſs of York, by whoſe influence he was ſent ambaſſador abroad. He was at Ratiſbon in 1688, where drinking with more freedom than prudence, he tumbled down ſtairs and broke his neck, though ſome accounts ſtate that he followed James II. to France, and died ſoon after. Etherege had no children by his wife, but he had a daughter by Mrs. Barry the actreſs, with whom in thoſe days of general depravity he lived. Beſides his plays he wrote various ſonnets, ſongs, and ſhort poems, which with great eaſe and elegance contain the voluptuous deſcriptions, and the immoral levities ſo faſhionable in the reign of Charles II. His comedies are not free from licentiouſneſs; and however we may admire the politeneſs of the dialogue, the ſprightlineſs of the converſation, the faithful delineation of the characters, and the intereſting intricacies of the plots, yet the looſe tendency of the whole cannot eſcape the ſevereſt cenſures of every friend of virtue and morality.

ETHYG, George, or Etheridge, of Thame, Oxfordſhire, was educated at Corpus Chriſti college, Oxford. He was king's Greek profeſſor, but in Elizabeth's reign he was diſmiſſed, and then practiſed medicine at Oxford, and engaged in the education of young perſons. He was living in 1588, but the year of his death is unknown. He excelled in the knowlege not only of the Greek and Hebrew, and of medicine, but alſo of muſic.

ETTMULLER, Michael, a phyſician, born at Leipſic. After travelling through France, England, Holland, and Italy, he was appointed aſſeſſor of the medicinal faculty, and in 1681 profeſſor of botany. He died in conſequence of an unſucceſsful operation in chemiſtry, 1683. He wrote ſeveral things on medicinal ſubjects.

ETTMULLER, Michael Ernſt, ſon of the preceding, was born at Leipſic 1673. After viſiting England, Holland, and Germany, he was elected profeſſor of anatomy and ſurgery at the Lazaretto Leipſic 1706, and was made in 1730, director of the imperial academy of naturæ curioſorum, and died 1732. He publiſhed his father's works, with a preface, and wrote ſeveral curious treatiſes on medical ſubjects.

EVANS, Cornelius, ſon of a Welſhman by a Provence woman, was born at Marſeilles. During the civil wars he came to an inn at Sandwich in 1648, pretending that he was the prince of Wales eſcaped from France. When the impoſition was diſcovered he was ſent to Newgate, but he extricated himſelf from confinement, and it never was known what became of him.

EVANS, Arife, a Welſh conjuror, brought up at Oxford. He reſided on a curacy at Enfield in Staffordſhire, from which he fled on account of his irregularities. He came to London in 1632, and was conſidered as ſo powerful in the management of ſupernatural beings, that he was ſolicited by lord Bothwell, and ſir Kenelm Digby, to ſhow them a ſpirit. At the appointed time when all were within the magical circle, Evans was ſuddenly carried out of the room and thrown into a field at Batterſea-cauſey near the Thames, where he was found the next morning aſleep. Theſe aſtrological incantations were the faſhionable ſtudy in the reign of Elizabeth and James I. Evans died about the time of the rebellion.

EVANS, Abel, the epigrammatiſt, of St. John's Oxford, was intimate with the wits and poets of the times, eſpecially Pope, dean Swift, &c. He was vicar of St. Giles' Oxford, and burſar of his college. His poetry is now forgotten. A good ſpecimen of it may be ſeen in Nichols' collections, eſpecially his "apparition," and "Vertumnus," and ſome epigrams.

EVANS, John, D.D. a diſſenting miniſter born in Shropſhire 1680. He ſucceeded Dr. Williams as paſtor in Petty France, Weſtminſter, and printed ſome occaſional ſermons, but his 38 ſermons on the chriſtian temper is his beſt work. He died of the dropſy 1732, aged 52.

EVANS, Caleb, of Briſtol, became a preacher and inſtructed young people for the diſſenting miniſtry. He died 1791, aged 54. He publiſhed ſcripture doctrine of the ſon and holy ſpirit,—hymns for public worſhip,—addreſs to ſerious profeſſors of Chriſtianity—the doctrine of atonement, &c.

EVANS, Evan, of Cardiganſhire, was educated at Jeſus college, Oxford. Addicting himſelf to intemperate drinking, he died 1790, aged 60. He publiſhed two vols. of ſermons by Tillotſon and others, tranſlated into Welſh, —the love of our country, an Engliſh poem,—diſſertatio de bardis, with ſpecimens of Welſh poetry, 4to.

EVANSON, Edward, of Warrington, was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, after which he became curate to his uncle at Mitcham, Surrey and then obtained in 1768, ſouth Mimms living, Middleſex. In 1770, he was preſented to the living of Tewkſbury, Glouceſterſhire, and afterwards to Longdon, Worceſterſhire ceſterſhire. His conduct in theſe pariſhes, and the alterations which he introduced in the forms of the church duty, offended his auditors, and he reſigned his livings in 1778. He afterwards reſided at Mitcham, where he took ſome pupils and he died at Colford, Glouceſterſhire, 1805, aged 74. He publiſhed without his name in 1772, the doctrines of a trinity and the incarnation of God examined, &c.—the diſſonance of the four generally received evangeliſts, 8vo.—argument againſt and for the obſervance of Sunday, &c.—letter to Dr. Prieſtley,—reflection on the ſtate of religion in chriſtendom, &c.

Eudes, John, brother of the hiſtorian Mezerai, was born in the dioceſe of Sees in 1601. In 1643 he founded the congregation of the Eudiſts, and died at Caen 1680, aged 79, leaving ſeveral devotional works.

Eudocia aſcended the imperial throne of Conſtantinople at the death of her huſband, Conſtantine Ducas, 1067. One of her generals, Romanus Diogenes, conſpired againſt her; but ſhe pardoned him, and made him her huſband. In 1071, her ſon Michael proclaimed himſelf emperor, and ſhut her up in a monaſtery, where ſhe ended her days.

Eudocia, Feodoreuna, daughter of the boyar Feodor Lapookin, was made, 1689, the firſt wife of Peter the great, whom he choſe out of the hundred girls that he had by proclamation aſſembled at Moſcow. Her complaints againſt the infidelity of her huſband produced her diſgrace. She was divorced in 1696, and confined in a convent at Suſdal. She was releaſed at the acceſſion of her grandſon Peter II. at whoſe coronation ſhe was preſent, and ſhe died in 1731, aged 59.

Evelyn, John, a learned writer, born at Wotton, in Surrey, 1620, and educated at Lewes grammar-ſchool and Baliol college. At the beginning of the civil wars he obtained permiſſion to travel. To enlarge his mind by obſervations on the manners and habits of various countries, to examine their commercial and agricultural concerns, and the curioſities, the productions, the arts, and the ſciences, of every place, was the great object of his intentions; and to theſe purſuits about ſeven years were devoted. In 1647, at Paris, he married Mary, daughter of ſir Richard Browne, the king's miniſter at the French court; and on his return, in 1651, he fixed his reſidence at her ſeat, at Sayes Court, in Kent. Attached to a life of retirement, he had little concern with public affairs; but after the expulſion of Richard Cromwell, he promoted the reſtoration of the royal family. At the eſtabliſhment of the royal ſociety in 1662, Mr. Evelyn was appointed one of the firſt fellows, and counſel; and in 1664 he was made one of the commiſſioners of the ſick and wounded, and next one of the commiſſioners for the rebuilding of St. Paul's. In 1669 he was honored at Oxford with the degree of LL.D. out of reſpect, not only to his abilities, but the active part he had taken in procuring the Arundelian marbles, which, by his interceſſion with lord Henry Howard, were handſomely preſented to that learned body. Under James II. he was one of the commiſſioners to execute the office of lord privy ſeal; and after the revolution he became treaſurer of Greenwich hoſpital. This good man died in the 86th year of his age, 27th February 1706, and was interred at Wotton in a ſtone coffin, over which was this inſcription: "That living in an age of extraordinary events and revolutions, he had learned from thence this truth, which he deſired might thus be communicated to poſterity, that all is vanity which is not honeſt, and that there is no ſolid wiſdom but in real piety." His works amount to more than 25 various publications, beſides papers in the tranſactions of the royal and other ſocities. Of theſe, the moſt known are his ſculptura, or the hiſtory and art of chalcography and engraving in copper, with an ample enumeration of the moſt renowned maſters and their works, with the new manner of engraving, or mezzotinto, communicated by his highneſs prince Rupert to the author, London, 1662, 8vo, a very valuable work, edited again in 1755—Sylva, or a diſcourſe of foreſt trees, and the propagation of timber in his Majeſty's dominions, to which is annexed, Pomona, concerning fruit trees, &c. 1664, folio, a popular work, which, as the author ſays in the ſecond edition, 1669, was the cauſe that more than two millions of timber trees had been furniſhed in the three kingdoms. He wrote alſo a parallel of ancient architecture with the modern, &c. the third edition of which appeared in 1733, folio—kalendarium Hortenſe, from which all modern gardening books are borrowed—public employment and active life preferred to ſolitude—the perfection of painting demonſtrated from the principles of art, &c.—a philoſophical diſcourſe on earth, relating to the culture and improvement of it for vegetation, &c.—mundus muliebris, or the lady's dreſſing-room unlocked—Numata, a diſcourſe on medals, &c. His ſervices to literature and mankind have been celebrated by Cowley, Glanville, Wotton, biſhop Burnet, Roger North, &c. and, among foreigners, by Morhoff and others. He was alſo an an artiſt, for "if he had not been," ſays Mr. Walpole, "I ſhould have found it difficult to deny myſelf the pleaſure of allotting him a place among the arts he loved, promoted, patronized. If I have once or twice criticiſed him, they are trifling blemiſhes, compared with his amiable virtues and beneficence. It may be remarked, that the worſt to be ſaid of him is, that he knew more than he always communicated. His life was a courſe of inquiry, ſtudy, curioſity, inſtruction, and benevolence. He knew that retirement in his own hands was induſtry and benefit to mankind, in thoſe of others lazineſs and inutility."

Evelyn, John, ſon of the preceding, was born born at Sayes-court, 1654. In 1666 he went to Oxford, and when little more than 15, he wrote that elegant Greek poem prefixed to the second edition of his father's Sylva. The powers of genius thus early displayed gave birth to some other original pieces of poetry, inserted in Dryden's miscellanies. He also translated the four books of gardens from the poems of Renatus Rapinus, besides Alexander's life, from Plutarch, and the history of the grand visiers, &c. with the secret intrigues of the seraglio, 8vo. He was one of the commissioners of the revenue in Ireland, and died in London 1698, aged 45.

EUGENE, Francis, prince of Savoy, was born in 1663, son of Eugene Maurice, general of the Swiss, by Olympia Mancini, niece of Mazarin. He was intended for the church, but the death of his father, before he was 10 years of age, altered his prospects. The banishment of his mother to the Low Countries raised his indignation; and as Curtius and Cæsar seemed more favorite authors with him than all the divines of the church, he panted for military employments, and when refused by the king he removed to Vienna. The emperor received him with great courtesy, and and he and his brother Philip rejecting the offers of France, became subjects of the imperial house. The death of Philip whilst bravely fighting, left Eugene to avenge his fall, and to conduct his regiment to victory. In 1683 Eugene displayed astonishing powers of valor in the raising of the siege of Vienna; and at New Lausel and Buda his bravery again became so conspicuous, that the duke of Lorraine, in presenting him to the emperor, said,—"May it please your majesty, this young Savoyard will some time or other be the greatest captain of the age." On the declaration of war against the empire by Lewis XIV. Eugene was removed from his campaign against the Turks, to resist the French; and he so blocked up Mantua that for two years his enemies were unable to advance in Italy. The peace between Savoy and France, in 1696, enabled Lewis to negociate with Eugene; but nothing could shake his fidelity. He was made commander in chief of the imperial forces in Hungary, and he defeated the Turkish army, commanded by the grand seignor in person, 1697, at Zenta, near Peterwaradin, where the Turks lost 20,000 men killed, 12,000 drowned, and 6,000 prisoners, besides oxen, camels, and horses, and a booty amounting to several millions of pounds sterling. The peace of Carlowitch, in 1699, insured by Eugene, put an end to a war of 15 years. While France claimed the succession to Spain, the emperor set forth also his title to the crown, and Eugene in Italy opposed the French forces under Villeroi. Though inferior in numbers, he planned his measures with such wisdom, that he surprised Cremona, and carried Villeroi away his prisoner. The English viewing with jealousy the elevation of the duke of Anjou to the throne of Spain, and resenting the acknowledgement of the pretender, joined the imperialists. Eugene again displayed his usual abilities, and the battles of Schellenburg, Blenheim, Turin, &c. became the scenes of the superior powers of his mind. His influence was such, that his enemies determined to cut him off by poison. He accordingly, in 1710, received a letter, enclosing a paper poisoned to such a degree that it made him, and three more who touched it, ready to swoon, and killed a dog upon the spot upon his swallowing the contents. In 1712 he came over to England, to induce the court to continue the war; but found his friend Marlborough in disgrace, and a new ministry averse to his measures. He however received the honor due to his merit; he was feasted in the city of London, and received a sword worth 5000l. from the queen, which he wore on her birth-day. He returned to the armies, where he acted upon the defensive. In March 1714 he signed preliminary articles of peace, which were the September following concluded by a treaty. He was received at Vienna in the most flattering manner; but when the Turks threatened the imperialists in 1716, he placed himself at the head of the army in Hungary, and defeating them, took Temeswaer, of which they had had possession 164 years, and afterwards reduced Belgrade. In 1733 he was engaged in the wars between the imperialists and the kings of France, Spain, and Sardinia, where his usual prudence was displayed. He died at Vienna, 10th April, 1736, aged 73. His death was sudden, as the preceding day he had entertained company, and he is supposed to have been choaked in the night by a strong defluxion of rheum. This heroic general was affable, modest, generous, and humane. He was also the patron of learned men, and himself no indifferent scholar. Thomas â Kempis' book, de imitatione, was the constant companion of his campaigns, and he observed, with Gustavus Adolphus, that a good christian always made a good soldier.

EUGENIUS, I. St. pope, after Martin 654, died three years after.

EUGENIUS II. succeeded Pascal I. 824, and died three years after.

EUGENIUS III. pope 1145, retired to Pisa, and then to Rheims, where he called a council. He died at Tivoli 1153.

EUGENIUS IV. Gabriel Condolmero, a Venetian, pope 1431, after Martin V. He had a dispute with the council at Basil, and issued a bull to dissolve it; but the bishops resisted his authority. Another council at Ferrara was equally obstinate, though the pope proposed a reconciliation and union between the eastern and western churches. The council of Basil presumed to depose the pontiff, and to appoint Amadeus VIII. of Savoy, in his room; but the cause of Eugenius prevailed, and he died at Rome 1447, aged 64.

EUGENIUS, a grammarian, proclaimed emperor peror in Dauphiné, after the death of Valentinian the younger, 392. He fell in battle 394.

Euler, Leonard, a mathematician, born at Basil 1707. His father, intending him for the miniſtry, inſtructed him in mathematics, for the ground work of all other improvements; but his genius was bent to philoſophical purſuits. Encouraged by the Bernoullis, he followed them, 1727, to Peterſburg, where Catharine I. had founded an academy of ſciences, and he was appointed adjutant to the mathematical claſs. His publications on the nature and propagation of ſound, on curves, on the calculus integralis, the movement of the celeſtial bodies, and other uſeful ſubjects, raiſed his reputation among philoſophers. While his fellow academicians aſked four months to complete an important calculation, he finiſhed it in three days, but ſo intenſe was his application that it produced a fever, which robbed him of the ſight of one of his eyes. He gained, in 1740, with Maclaurin and D. Bernoulli, the prize of the academy of Paris, on the nature of tides; and theſe three illuſtrious men traced the effects, though by different roads, to the ſame cauſes. In 1741 he removed to Berlin, and aſſiſted in the eſtabliſhment of an academy of ſciences. Still indefatigable, he produced his theory of the motions of the planets and comets, the theory of magnetiſm, the theory of light and colors againſt Newton's ſyſtem of emanations, and the theory of the equilibrium and motion of floating bodies and the reſiſtance of fluids. In 1773 he publiſhed his theorie complette de la conſtruction et de la manœuvre des vaiſſeux, which was tranſlated into all languages, and was rewarded by the French king, as his theorems before had been rewarded with 300l. from the Britiſh parliament. His labors of thirty years on the moſt intricate ſubject of infiniteſimals were communicated to the public by his "introduction to the analyſis of infiniteſimals," and followed by leſſons on the calculus integralis, and differentialis. While arranging his thoughts on the motion of the aeroſtatical globes, and converſing with Lexell on the new planet, he was ſuddenly attacked by a fit of apoplexy. The ſtroke was immediately fatal. "I am dying," were his laſt words, and a few hours after he expired, 1783, aged 76 years, 5 months, 3 days. Beſides the works already enumerated, there are many others on geometrical and philoſophical ſubjects. He was a man, indeed, as his impartial eulogiſt, Fuſs, has mentioned, of aſtoniſhing powers, great and extenſive erudition, and of ſuch retentive memory that he could repeat the whole of the Æneid, and in one night he calculated in his head the ſix firſt powers of all the numbers above 20, which he repeated the next day correctly to his aſtoniſhed friends. Affable, humane, and benevolent in his conduct, he could abandon the moſt abſtruſe ſtudies to mix with the general amuſements of ſociety. His piety was ardent but ſincere, he loved mankind, and defended the great truths of religion with earneſtneſs and fidelity. He was twice married, and was father of thirteen children; four of whom only ſurvived him.

Evremond, St. Charles de St. Denis, lord of, a French writer, born at St. Denis le Guaſt, 1613. He was educated at Clermont, Paris, and Caen, and being a younger ſon, was intended for the law, but his inclinations turned to a military life. He was as well known for his politeneſs and literary accompliſhments, as for his valor, ſo that the duke of Enghien admiring his character made him lieutenant of his guards. He was at the ſiege of Arras in 1640, and ſerved at Rocroy and Friburg, and was wounded in the knee at Nortlingen. After the taking of Furnes in 1646, the duke commiſſioned him to convey the news to the court and to concert with Mazarin meaſures for the reduction of Dunkirk, but he was in 1648, for ſome ſatirical remarks, diſmiſſed from the confidence of the duke, who unfortunately loved raillery, but was not magnanimous enough to pardon it. Afterwards the king, well acquainted with his merits, made him in 1652 a major-general, and granted him a penſion. He ſerved in Guienne under Candale, and after a confinement of three months, for reflections on Mazarin's character, he attended the campaign of Flanders in 1654. In 1657 he fought a duel with de Force, which proved ſo offenſive to the court, that he retired into the country, till his friends could procure his pardon. In 1649 he ſerved in Flanders, and ſoon after accompanied Mazarin in the negociation with the Spaniſh miniſtry. Of this he gave a written account to Crequi, containing ſuch ſevere reflections on Mazarin, and ſuch odious charges of ſacrificing the honor of France to private intereſt, that the compoſition was conſidered as treaſonable, and though the cardinal was dead, the writer fled to Holland, in 1661, from the perſecution of the court. From Holland he paſſed to England, where he had the year before congratulated Charles on his reſtoration, and he was received with great courteſy. Devoting himſelf here to literature, and the ſociety of his friends, he did not however forget his native country, and he ſolicited his return, but to no purpoſe. He afterwards viſited Flanders, Spa, and Liege, and wiſhed to fix his reſidence in Holland, but the invitations of Charles prevailed upon him to return to England, where the king granted him 300l. a year. On the death of Charles he loſt his penſion; but though deſerted by his country, he refuſed to accept near James's perſon the honorable office of private ſecretary of the cabinet. The revolution proved favorable to his intereſts, William honored him with his friendſhip, and while he patroniſed him, he delighted in his converſation. At laſt the French king relented, but St. Evremond refuſed to quit a country where he had been ſo hoſpitably treated, and where his old age could meet with a continuation of long experienced comforts. He died 1703, of a ſtrangury, in his 95th year, and was buried in Weſtminſter abbey. St Evremond was an accompliſhed gentleman, and though his morals were not rigid, he was generous in his conduct, humane, and benevolent. Though ſuſpected by Bayle of being a free-thinker, he always profeſſed the Romiſh faith, and though giving a looſe to ſatire, and making pleaſure the ſole buſineſs of life, he never ſpoke with jocularity or indecorous freedom of religion or morality. Of his works, conſiſting of light pieces of poetry and proſe, the beſt edition is that of Amſterdam, 1726, 5 vols. 12mo. with two other volumes of pieces attributed to his pen.

Eusden, Lawrence, a poet, born at Spotſworth in Yorkſhire, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge. He was patroniſed by lord Halifax, and by the duke of Newcaſtle, whoſe marriage with Henrietta Godolphin he celebrated in verſe, for which the duke, on Rowe's death, appointed him laureat 1718. This elevation was envied by contemporary bards; and Pope aſſigned to the laureat a diſtinguiſhed place in his Dunciad. Euſden died at his rectory at Coningſby, Lincolnſhire, 1730. One of his biographers has aſſerted that in the latter part of his life, he became a very great drunkard, but perhaps without authority. He left a MS. tranſlation of Taſſo.

Eusebia, abbeſs of St. Cyr, at Marſeilles, is ſaid to have cut off her noſe, to ſecure herſelf from the brutality of Saracen raviſhers. Her nuns followed her example, but they were all murdered by the barbarians, 731.

Eustache, David, a proteſtant miniſter, of Montpellier, ſent in 1669 by the ſynod of Ludun, to addreſs the French king. His ſpeech on the occaſion was much admired. He was author of ſome theological tracts.

Eustachius, Bartholomew, an Italian phyſician of San-Severino. He ſettled at Urbino, and afterwards at Rome, where his anatomical tables were engraved 1552, though not publiſhed till 1714. His opuſcula anatomica were republiſhed by Boerhaave 1707. He died 1570.

Eutychianus, pope after Felix 275, was martyred 283.

Eutychius, a Chriſtian author of Cairo. He practiſed phyſic among the Mahometans, and became, in 933, patriarch of Alexandria. He wrote, in Arabic, annals from the beginning of the world to 900, curious, but not always authentic.

Euzorius, a deacon of Alexandria, depoſed and condemned by the council of Nice for his attachment to the tenets of Arius. He died 376.

Ewald, John, of Copenhagen, in the hopes of ſeeing the world, became a ſerjeant in the Pruſſian ſervice. He afterwards deſerted, and returned to Denmark, where he ſtudied divinity. Poetry was his favorite purſuit, and, to enlarge his underſtanding, he ſtudied the beſt Engliſh poets. He wrote poems in the ſtile of Oſſian—Adam and Eve, a dramatic poem—a theatrical piece called the fiſherman——and other poems, which poſſeſs great merit, and rank high in the temple of poetry. He died 1781, aged 38.

Eyck, John van, died 1441, aged 71. He is ſuppoſed to be the inventor of painting in oil, which he diſcovered by mixing linſeed oil in the compoſition of a brilliant varniſh. The ſecret was conveyed to Italy by one of his pupils, and divulged to the world. His hiſtorical pieces and landſcapes are much admired.

Eymar, A. M. d', a deputy in the ſtates-general in 1789, evinced his attachment to the ſyſtem of Rouſſeau, as a lover of republicaniſm. He was ambaſſador in Piedmont, and diſcovered the treaty made by the Sardinian king againſt France; and by his intrigues he forced the unfortunate monarch from his Italian dominions. He was afterwards prefect of Leman, and died at Geneva 1805. He wrote ſome ſmall tracts, not devoid of merit.

Ezekiel, the third of the greater prophets, was a captive at Babylon, 597, before Chriſt, and there he wrote his prophecies. His ſtyle, according to Lowth, is bold, vehement, and tragical, abounding with figurative expreſſions, and worked up occaſionally to a degree of tremendous dignity. He foretold the coming of the Meſſiah.

Ezekiel, a Greek Jew and poet, author of ſome tragedies on ſcripture ſubjects. It is ſuppoſed that he floriſhed about 300 years before Chriſt.

Ezra, one of the deſcendants of Aaron, ſhared the captivity of Babylon, and was permitted by Artaxerxes to conduct a colony to Jeruſalem, and to re-eſtabliſh the laws of Moſes, about 467 before Chriſt. A book bearing his name in the bible, and two in the apocrypha, are preſerved.

F.

FABER, John, a divine, born in Suabia, and, from one of his works againſt the reformers, called the Mallet of Heretics. He was, in 1531, advanced to the ſee of Vienna, where he died 1542, aged 63. He owed his elevation to his zeal againſt Luther. His works diſplay warmth and fluency of language, in 3 vols. fol.

FABER, Baſil, a Lutheran, born 1520, in Luſatia. He was teacher in the ſchools of Nordhauſen and Tennſtadt, and rector of Erfurt. His moſt valuable work is theſaurus eruditionis ſcholaſticæ, improved afterwards by Cellarius and others, 2 vols. fol. He died 1576.

FABER. Vid FEVRE.

FABERT, Abraham, marſhal of France under Lewis XIV., diſtinguiſhed himſelf in 1635, at the ſieges of Turin 1640, of Perpignan 1642, and in 1654 at the taking of Stenai As he was not qualified by nobility of anceſtors, he refuſed the collar of the royal order, obſerving, he would not be decorated with a croſs, with his ſoul diſgraced by an impoſture. He was childiſhly addicted to aſtrological calculations.

FABIAN, Robert, of London, was ſheriff and alderman of his native city, where he died 1512. His chief work is his "Chronicle of England and France," firſt printed 1516, and again 1553, 2 vols. folio. The firſt volume begins with Brute, and ends at the death of Henry II. and the ſecond, which is very valuable, ends 1504. Stow calls the work a painful labor, to the great honor of the city, and of the whole realm.

FABIAN, pope 326, was active in the diſſemination of Chriſtianity and the building of churches, and ſuffered martyrdom in the perſecution of Decius.

FABRE, Jean Claude, a prieſt of the oratory of Paris, who died there 1753, aged 85. He wrote two dictionaries, an indifferent tranſlation of Virgil, and a continuation of Fleury's eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, &c.

FABRE, N. of Languedoc, is famous for filial piety. When his father was condemned to the gallies for his adherence to Calviniſm, in 1752, he, unperceived, took his place among the condemned, and remained for ſix years in confinement, till Mirepoix, the governor of the province, liberated him, and preſented him to the court as an illuſtrious character.

FABRE D'EGLANTINE, Philip Francis Muzaire, of Carcaſſone, became ſucceſſively an actor, a comic writer, and a ſtateſman. In the convention he was the friend of Danton, and the other promoters of the maſſacres of France, and though originally poor, he became very rich. Robeſpierre, who viewed him with jealouſy, hurled him from his eminence, and he was guillotined 1794. He wrote ſome plays which poſſeſs merit, and he is known for introducing in France that puerile calendar which combated the opinions of Europe.

FABRETTI, Raphael, an antiquary, born at Urbino in 1619. He was ſent to negociate into Spain, and he conducted himſelf there with ſuch ability, that he was made procurator fiſcal of the kingdom. After 13 years' reſidence, he returned to Rome, where he was appointed judge of appeals to the capitol, and afterwards auditor of the legation of Urbino. After Alexander's death he devoted himſelf to the ſtudy of antiquities, and with his horſe, called by his friends Marco Polo, he made excurſions in the neighbourhood of Rome to examine whatever was moſt rare and valuable. Innocent XII. drew him from his retirement to make him maſter of the ſecrets of the pope's temporal ſtate. He died 1700. He publiſhed theſe valuable works, de aquis & aquæductibus veteris Romæ diſſertationes tres, 4to. 1680—de columnâ Trajanâ ſyntagma, &c. fol. 1683—Jaſithei ad Gronov. apologema, de Tito Livio, &c. 4to.—inſcriptionum antiquarum, &c.

FABRI, Honoré, a jeſuit, of Bellay, 1607; profeſſor of philoſophy at Lyons, and penitentiary at Rome, where he died 1688. He wrote ſeveral works on theology, optics, plants, &c. and he is ſaid by ſome to have diſcovered the circulation of the blood before Hervey.

FABRICIUS, George, of Chemnitz, in Miſnia, is famous for his Latin poetry. He travelled to Italy as tutor to a nobleman, and at Rome compoſed his work called Roma, containing an intereſting deſcription of that city. After returning home, he was for 26 years maſter of the ſchool of Meſſein, where he died 1571, aged 55. His poems are written with great powers of genius, and in the moſt elegant and correct language, 2 vols. 8vo. He wrote alſo ſome odes, hymns, &c. beſides proſe works, &c.

FABRICIUS, Jerome, a phyſician, called Aquapendente, from the place of his birth.

He ſtudied languages at Padua, and acquired his medical knowledge under Fallopius. He practiſed for 40 years at Padua with ſuch repute that Venice ſettled an annual penſion of 1000 crowns of gold on him, beſides the honor of a golden chain, and of a ſtatue. He died about 1603, and left 2 vols. folio, the one on ſurgery, and the other on anatomy.

FABRICIUS, William, a ſurgeon, born near Cologne, who became public phyſician at Berne, where he died 1634, aged 74. He wrote tracts on gangrene and ſphacelus—on burns, on gun-ſhot wounds, on lithotomy—ſix centuries of obſervations and cures, &c. in 4to.

FABRICIUS, John Lewis, of Schaffhauſen, profeſſor of theology and philoſophy at Heidelberg, was author of tracts de viis dei, et quouſque ſunt ſimiles viis hominum — on infant baptiſm, &c. He died at Frankfort, 1697, aged 58.

FABRICIUS, John Albert, a learned native of Leipſic, educated at Quedlinburg. He was profeſſor of eloquence at Hamburgh 1699, and was invited by the landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel, to ſettle in his dominions, but the ſenators of Hamburgh prevailed upon him by a ſuperior ſalary not to relinquiſh them. He died at Hamburgh 1736, aged 68. Of his works the moſt uſeful are bibliotheca Latina, ſive notitia auctorum veterum Latin. 2 vols. 4to. republiſhed by Erneſti, 3 vols. 8vo.—bibliotheca Græca, ſive notitia ſcriptorum veterum Græc. 14 vols. 4to.—codex apocryphus novi teſtamenti, collectus, &c. 3 vols. 8vo. 1719—codex pſeu-depigraphus veteris teſtamenti, 2 vols. 8vo. 1722 and 1723—bibliographia antiquaria, 4to. 1716—delectus argumentorum & ſyllabus ſcriptorum adverſos atheos, &c. 4to. 1725—ſalutaris lex evangelii, &c. 4to. 1731—bibliotheca, mediæ & infimæ latinitatis, 5 vols. 8vo.

FABRICIUS, Vincent, of Hamburgh, wrote Latin poetry with great elegance. He was counſellor to the biſhop of Lubec, and ſyndic to Dantzic, where he became burgomaſter, and was 13 times deputy to Poland. He died at Warſaw, 1667, aged 54. The beſt edition of his poems is that of Leipſic 1685, under the care of his ſon.

FABRICIUS, Baron, a German writer, the favorite of Charles XII. with whom he reſided as envoy from Holſtein, during that monarch's captivity at Bender. He was afterwards in the ſervice of Staniſlaus of Poland, and of George I. whom he accompanied in his laſt journey to Hanover. Fabricius is known for his intereſting letters, which give an account of Charles XII. while reſident in Turkey.

FABRONI, Angiolo, of Marradi in Tuſcany, was made prior of St. Lorenzo's church at Florence, and afterwards curator of Piſa univerſity. He wrote an account of the learned men of Italy in the 17th and 18th centuries, of which 18 vols. were publiſhed, and one left unfiniſhed. He publiſhed alſo an account of Coſmo Lorenzo, and other members of the houſe of Medicis, beſides religious tracts, &c. He died 1802, aged 70.

FABROT, Charles Hannibal, of Aix in Provence, was profeſſor of law. In 1617 he came to Paris, and in 1637 gave an edition of the Baſilicæ, or conſtitutions of the eaſtern emperors, in 7 vols. fol. 1647, with a Latin tranſlation and notes, and two years after he publiſhed Cedrenus, Nicetas, Anaſtaſius, in 2 vols. fol. with curious notes. In 1658 he publiſhed the works of Cujacius, reviſed, 10 vols. fol. His great application brought on diſorders, which put an end to his life, 1659.

FACIO, Bartholomeo, of Spezzia near Genoa, was ſecretary to Alphonſo king of Naples, and intimate with Æneas Sylvius, afterwards pope Pius II. He died about 1457. He wrote de bello Veneto Claudiano, ſeu inter Venetos & Genuenſes, anno 1391—de rebus ab Alphonſo Neapolit. geſtis libri decem—de humanæ vitæ felicitate ad Alphonſum. Neap. reg., &c.

FADLALLAH, or Chodſa Raſchid Addin, a Perſian hiſtorian. He wrote at the deſire of the Sultan an hiſtory of the Moguls, finiſhed 1294, to which he added a ſupplement.

FAERNUS, Gabriel, of Cremona, is known as a critic and a poet in the 16th century. He wrote Latin elogies, beſides pieces of criticiſm, and notes on Terence, ſo valuable that Bentley has inſerted them in his edition of that poet. He wrote alſo in iambics 100 fables, ſo much in the ſtyle of Phædrus, that Thuanus has accuſed him of concealing from the world that Latin fabuliſt then unknown, to procure celebrity for his own compoſition; but of his 100 fables only five treat the ſame ſubjects as Phædrus. Faernus died at Rome 1561.

FAGAN, Chriſtopher Bartholomew, a French comic writer, who died 1755, aged 53. Of his works in 4 vols. 12mo. 1760, the moſt approved comedies are "the rendezvous" and "the ward," written in a delicate and lively ſtyle.

FAGE, Raimond de la, a ſelf-taught genius in drawing with the pen, or Indian ink, born in Languedoc. His intemperance ruined his proſpects; as his time was ſpent at the alehouſe, where he frequently diſcharged his bills by producing a ſketch. He died 1690, aged 42.

FAGIUS, Paul, a proteſtant miniſter of Germany, born 1504. He was educated at Heidelberg and Straſburg, and after making great proficiency in Hebrew, then become faſhionable, he undertook in 1527 the care of a ſchool at Iſna. He afterwards entered into orders, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf in 1541 by his zeal in adminiſtering to the neceſſities of the poor, during the plague which raged at Iſna, from the infection of which he happily eſcaped. He afterwards became profeſſor at Heidelberg, where he publiſhed ſome works for the advancement of Hebrew literature. During the perſecution of the proteſtants in Germany, he was invited to England by Cranmer, where he came with Bucer in 1549. Theſe two learned men engaged at Cambridge to complete a new translation of the bible, Fagius of the old, and Bucer of the new teſtament. This was never completed, as Fagius died of a fever at Cambridge 1550, and Bucer about a year after. The bodies of theſe two divines were dug up and burnt under the gallows, in the reign of Mary. Fagius wrote on the Hebrew language and on the Targums.

FAGNANO, Julius Charles, count of, of Sinigaglia, publiſhed 2 vols. 4to. in which he treats in a clear manner of the diſcoveries of the property and of the uſe of the geometrical curve, called the Lemniſcate. He died 1760, aged 70.

FAGON, Guy Creſcent, a phyſician of Paris, who ſupported the doctrine of the circulation of the blood, and gained the royal approbation by his indefatigable reſearches in collecting plants on the Alps. He was profeſſor of botany and chemiſtry in the royal gardens, and phyſician to Lewis XIV. in 1693. It was by his advice that the king ſent Tournefort to collect plants in the Eaſt. Though of a delicate conſtitution he lived by proper regimen to the age of 80, and died 1718.

FAHRENHEIT, Gabriel Daniel, an ingenious experimentaliſt, born at Dantzic, 1686. In 1720 he improved the thermometer by ſubſtituting mercury for ſpirits of wine, and fixed the extremity of his ſcale at the point of cold, which he had obſerved in Iceland in 1709, but at Peterſburg the cold has been known forty degrees below the ° of this thermometer. The Engliſh in general have adopted his ſcale, but the French adhere to Reaumur's. He travelled through Holland and the continent, and died 1736. He wrote a diſſertation on thermometers, 1724.

FAIRCLOUGH, Samuel, of Haveril, was miniſter of Barnardiſton, and of Ketton, Suffolk, and was ejected for nonconformity 1662. Though he diſapproved of ſome things in the liturgy, he was the friend of epiſcopacy. He publiſhed ſermons and other tracts, and died 1678, aged 84.

FAIRFAX, Edward, an Engliſh poet, in the reigns of Elizabeth and James. His poetical talents were ſuch that, according to Dryden himſelf, a judge of merit, he deſerved to be ranked above Spenſer in point of harmony. His firſt attempt was a tranſlation of Taſſo's Godfrey of Bouillon, a performance highly valued by the wits of the times. He wrote ſome eclogues, beſides controverſial treatiſes on the pope's infallibility, &c. He died about 1632, at Newhall, between Denton and Knareſborough.

FAIRFAX, Thomas lord, eldeſt ſon of Ferdinando lord Fairfax, was born at Denton, Yorkſhire, 1611. After ſerving in Holland under lord Vere, he embraced the party of the preſbyterians in the civil war againſt the king. He was engaged in the north where he ſuffered ſome defeats, eſpecially at Adderton moor 1643, but he retrieved his affairs in the battle of Marſton moor, and was entruſted with the chief command of the army on the reſignation of Eſſex. He contributed to the king's defeat at Naſeby 1645, and marched to the reduction of the weſt. In 1648 he ſucceeded to the title on the death of his father, and that year reduced Colcheſter, and, much to his diſgrace, ordered ſir George Liſle and ſir Charles Lucas, to whom he had promiſed pardon, to be ſhot. On the king's trial it was ſuppoſed that he would interfere, but during the execution he was kept at a diſtance from the ſcene, engaged with Harriſon in the hypocritical attitude of offering up prayers to God. After the deſtruction of royalty he favored the views of the uſurper, and was treated with unuſual ceremony in London, but when offered the command of the army againſt the preſbyterians of Scotland, he refuſed it, and it was granted to Cromwell. At the reſtoration he was reconciled to the king, and went to the Hague to congratulate him. He wrote an account of his public life, and died 1671.

FAIRTHORNE, William, an Engliſh painter. He was a ſoldier in the civil wars, and being taken at Baſing-houſe, was baniſhed for refuſing allegiance to Cromwell. On his return home he applied himſelf chiefly in engraving, in which he alſo excelled. He wrote a book upon "drawing, graving, and etching," celebrated by Flatman, the poet, and died 1691, aged 75. His ſon William acquired celebrity by mezzotinto engraving.

FAISTENBERGER, Anthony, of Inſpruck, died 1722, aged 44. His landſcapes, caſrades, rocks, and rivers, were all in a maſterly ſtyle. His younger brother Joſeph, was equally eminent in landſcapes.

FALCANDUS, Hugo, a reſpectable hiſtorian of Sicily, who publiſhed an account of the affairs of his country for 23 years under William I. and II. His preface was written 1126.

FALCONBERG, Mary, counteſs of, third daughter of Oliver Cromwell, and ſecond wife of viſcount Falconberg, poſſeſſed great beauty, and ſo much ſpirit and activity that, as Burnet obſerves, ſhe was more worthy to be protector than her brother. On Richard's depoſition ſhe exerted herſelf ſtrenuouſly for the reſtoration of Charles II. She died 1712.

FALCONER, William, a Scotſman, who came to London in 1762, where he publiſhed "the ſhipwreck," in three cantos, a very pathetic poem. He wrote alſo the marine dictionary, 4to. He unfortunately periſhed in the Aurora in 1769, after touching at the Cape of Good Hope in its way to India, and was never heard of.

FALCONET, Camille, the friend of Malebranche, was born at Lyons, 1671. He was elected in 1716 into the French academy, and from his collection of nearly 500,000 volumes, he enriched the royal library with ſuch books as were wanting. He lived to the age of 91 in 1762, and is ſuppoſed, like Fagon, to have prolonged life by his medical ſkill. He wrote a tranſlation of Villemont's ſyſtema planetarum —an edition of the paſtorals of Daphnis and Chloe—diſſertations, &c.

FALDA, Giovanni Baptiſta, an Italian engraver of the laſt century, whoſe etchings in aqua fortis are much admired.

FALETI, Jeronimo, of Savona, near Genoa, publiſhed in 1557 a poem on the wars of Charles V and other poems. He was alſo an orator, hiſtorian, and ſtateſman, and was employed as ambaſſador to Venice by the duke of Ferrara.

FALIERI, Ordelafo, a doge of Venice, who with a fleet in 1102 aſſiſted Baldwin of Jeruſalem in the conqueſt of Syria. He conquered Dalmatia, Croatia, and other provinces, and afterwards loſt his life at the ſiege of Zara in Dalmatia, 1120.

FALIERI, Marino, a doge of Venice, 1354, conſpired to make himſelf abſolute by the aſſaſſination of all the ſenators. His plot was diſcovered, and he loſt his head, aged 80, with above 400 of his aſſociates.

FALK, John Peter, of Weſtrogothia, ſtudied medicine and botany under Linnæus. He was profeſſor of botany in the Apothecaries' garden at Peterſburg, and keeper of the natural hiſtory cabinet, and publiſhed obſervations on his travels, 3 vols. 4to. 1785. In a fit of melancholy he deſtroyed himſelf, 1774, aged 47.

FALKENSTEIN, John Henry, of Franconia, was in 1714 director of the academy of noblemen at Erlingen. He left the proteſtant for the Roman catholic religion, and died 1760, aged 78. He publiſhed "the antiquities of Nordgan," 3 vols. folio, and other works.

FALKLAND, lord, Vid. CARY.

FALLE, Philip, author of "the hiſtory of Jerſey," where he was born 1655. He entered at Exeter college, Oxford, and afterwards removed to Alban hall. He was rector of St. Saviour's in the iſland, and was one of the deputies of the ſtates to William and Mary. He publiſhed three ſermons.

FALLOPIUS, Gabriel, phyſician and anatomiſt, was born at Modena 1490. He travelled through Europe, and was profeſſor of anatomy at Piſa, 1548, and three years after at Padua, where he died 1563, aged 72. He made various diſcoveries in anatomy, and eſpecially the tubes by which the ova deſcend from the female ovarium into the uterus, called from him "Fallopian tubes." His works, all on ſubjects of medicine and anatomy, were publiſhed in 3 vols fol.

FALSTER, Chriſtian, a Daniſh critic, who wrote ſupplementum linguæ Latinæ, 1717—animadverſiones epiſtolicæ — quæſtiones Romanæ—cogitationes philologicæ—ſermo panegyricus, &c.—Vigilia prima noctium Ripen. &c.

FANCOURT, Samuel, a diſſenting miniſter, ſettled at Saliſbury, where for 20 years he took ſome pupils, and had the care of a congregation. His writings againſt Calviniſm expoſed him to perſecution. About 1740, or 1745, he eſtabliſhed the firſt circulating library in the kingdom; but his plans did not ſucceed to his wiſhes, and after advertiſing for ſubſcribers, and offering to teach the claſſics, ſo as to enable his pupils to write and ſpeak in twelve months for twelve guineas, he ſunk into poverty, and from the corner of one of the ſtreets of the Strand, where he had a ſhop, he retired to Hoxton ſquare, where he died 1768, aged 90.

FANSHAW, ſir Richard, tenth ſon of ſir Henry Fanſhaw, of Ware park, Herts, was born 1607. After ſtudying at Cambridge, he travelled on the continent, and in 1635 was ſent by Charles I. as envoy to Spain. In 1644 he attended the king at Oxford, and was afterwards ſecretary to Charles prince of Wales, whoſe wanderings he ſhared in the weſt of England, and in Scilly and Jerſey. He was treaſurer of the navy under Rupert, and was created, 1650, a baronet by Charles II., and ſent as envoy to Spain. He was taken at the battle of Worceſter, and impriſoned in London, but liberated by giving bail At the reſtoration, he was maſter of requeſts and ſecretary of the Latin language. He afterwards was ambaſſador to Portugal, to negociate the marriage of Charles and the infanta Catharina, and in 1664 was ſent to Philip IV. of Spain, with whoſe ſucceſſor he concluded a treaty of peace in 1665. He died at Madrid, 1666, of a fever, as he was preparing to return home. He wrote ſome reſpectable pieces, and among them a tranſlation in rhyme of Guarini's paſtor fido, a tranſlation of Fletcher's faithful ſhepherdeſs, into Latin verſe—odes of Horace, tranſlated into Engliſh—Virgil's fourth Æneid—and Camöens' Luſiad, tranſlated into Engliſh, beſides ſome poems, &c.

FARE, Charles Auguſtus, marquis de la, a captain in the French guards, known as a writer and as the author of "memoirs and reflections on the reign of Lewis XIV." 12mo. and of ſome little pieces of poetry. He began to be a poet when 60 years old, and died 1712, aged 68.

FAREL, William, an able reformer, born at Gap in Dauphiné 1489. He ſtudied at Paris the Hebrew and Greek tongues, but the ſpirit of perſecution drove him from France. He went to Straſburg, and then to Switzerland, and he engaged with the duke of Wirtemberg, to introduce the reformation into Montbeliard and other places. He afterwards went to Geneva, but was reſiſted by the clergy, and he retired, though in 1534 he was recalled. In 1538 he was again baniſhed from Geneva with Calvin, and retired to Baſil and then to Neufchatel. Though expoſed to a thouſand dangers from perſecution, he eſcaped them all, and after increaſing his profelytes at Metz and other places, he viſited Calvin on his death-bed at Geneva 1564, and expired himſelf the next year at Neufchatel. At the age of 69 he married, an event in his life which expoſed him to the ridicule of his enemies. Eraſmus among others has ſpoken of him ſeverely, but rather unjuſtly, unjuſtly, when he calls him a falſe, virulent, and ſeditious evangeliſt. Nothing could, indeed, reſiſt his zeal, though ſurrounded by drawn ſwords, though interrupted by the ringing of bells, and by the clamors of his enemies, he yet preached boldly, and made as many converts as any of the reformers.

FARET, Nicholas, one of the firſt members of the French academy, known more for the excellent ſtatutes which he formed for the inſtitution, than the books he wrote. He died 1646, aged 46.

FARIN, Emanuel de Souſa, a Portugueſe knight, who died at Madrid 1650, aged 60, reduced to poverty by his negligence. He wrote poems in a nervous ſtile, collected into ſeven volumes, beſides moral and political diſcourſes, commentaries on the Luſiad of Camoens, a hiſtory of Portugal to the reign of Henry the cardinal, and Portugueſe Europe. Aſia, &c. Though a Portugueſe, he preferred the Caſtilian language to his own.

FARINATO, Paul, a painter, of Verona His mother died in giving him birth, and he and his wife both expired at the ſame moment in 1606, aged 84. One of his paintings in St. George's church, Verona, is as much admired as that of Paul Veroneſe, which is placed near it.

FARINELLI, Vid. BROSCHI.

FARINGDON, Anthony, a divine, born at Sunning, Berks, 1596. He was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, and afterwards was vicar of Bray, near Maidenhead, 1634, and divinity reader in Windſor chapel. In the civil wars he was ejected, and reduced to poverty, till invited to officiate at St. Mary Magdalen, Milk-ſtreet, London, where he died 1658. He publiſhed in 1657, a folio volume of his ſermons, &c.

FARMER, Hugh, a diſſenting miniſter, ſettled at Walthamſtow, in the houſe of his friend Mr. Snell, where he died 1787. He wrote a diſſertation on miracles, 8vo.—a treatiſe on the worſhip of human ſpirits among the heathens, 8vo.—on Chriſt's temptation, 8vo.—and on the Demoniacs, 8vo.

FARMER, Richard, of Leiceſter, was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge. In 1766 he publiſhed his valuable eſſay on the learning of Shakeſpeare, in which he maintains that the bard obtained his knowledge of ancient hiſtory and mythology from tranſlations and not from original claſſical authors. He was in 1775 elected maſter of his college, and then took his degree of D. D. He obtained afterwards a prebend, and the chancellorſhip in Lichfield cathedral, the place of librarian in Cambridge, and a prebend in Canterbury, which he exchanged for a reſidentiary ſhip of St. Paul's. He had collected materials for the hiſtory of his native town, which he gave to his friend Mr. Nichols, for his Leiceſterſhire hiſtory. He died 1797, aged 62, and his collection of ſcarce and curious books was ſold by public auction.

FARNABY, Thomas, a grammarian, born in London 1575. He was of Merton college, Oxford, and was ſeduced by the jeſuits to leave his country and religion for Spain. Tired of his new inſtructors, he eſcaped, and went a voyage with ſir Francis Drake and ſir John Hawkins 1595. He afterwards ſerved as a ſoldier in the Low Countries, and returned to Cornwall, poor and deſtitute. He ſettled at Martock, Somerſetſhire, where he taught grammar, and then came to London, where he had not leſs than 300 pupils. In 1616 he took his maſter's degree at Cambridge. About 1636, on account of the ſickneſs in London, he removed to Seven Oaks, Kent, where he purchaſed an eſtate. During the civil wars he became obnoxious to the parliament, becauſe he had ſaid it was better to have one king than 500. He was therefore impriſoned in Newgate, and died 1647. His works were notæ ad Juvenalis et Perſii ſatiras—notæ ad Senecæ tragœdias—ad Martialis epigr.—ad Lucani Pharſalia, — index rhetoricus, &c. — florilegium epigrammat. Græc.—notæ ad Virgil.—ſyſtema grammatic. &c. His works diſplay every where great erudition, and his notes, ſays Boyle, are of great uſe, being ſhort and learned.

FARNESE, Peter Louis, ſon of pope Paul III. by a ſecret marriage, was made duke of Parma and Placentia. The tyranny of his government rendered him ſo unpopular, that he was aſſaſſinated at Placentia 1547.

FARNESE, Alexander, eldeſt ſon of the preceding, was made biſhop of Parma, and advanced to the purple in 1534, by his grandfather Paul III. by whom he was employed as ambaſſador to Germany. He died at Rome 1589. Charles V. ſaid of him, when dean of the ſacred college, that if all the members reſembled him, the college would be the moſt auguſt aſſembly in the world.

FARNESE, Alexander, third duke of Parma, diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the ſiege of Lepanto, and at the taking of Antwerp. He received a mortal wound at Rouen, when beſieged by Henry IV. of France, and died at Arras 1592.

FARNEWORTH, Ellis, a divine, born at Bonteſhall, Derbyſhire, and educated at Cheſterfield and Eton, and at Jeſus college, Cambridge. He was rector of Carſington, Derbyſhire, 1762, and died there 1763. He wrote the life of pope Sixtus V. from the Italian of Leti, fol.—Davila's hiſtory of France, 2 vols. 4to.—Machiavel's works tranſlated.

FARQUHAR, George, a comic poet, born at Londonderry 1678. He was educated at Dublin college, and afterwards engaged with a company of players. At the repreſentation of Dryden's Indian Emperor, he was nearly converting the play into a real tragedy, for forgetting to exchange his ſword for a foil, he wounded his antagoniſt Vaſquez ſo dreadfully that from that moment, he in terror bid adieu to the ſtage He came to London in 1696, and at the ſolicitation of Wilks the actor, he turned his thoughts to the compoſition of a theatrical piece. In 1698 his firſt comedy appeared, called "Love in a bottle," and in 1700 "the conſtant couple, or trip to the jubilee," was acted, and gave Wilks the opportunity of diſplaying ſir Harry Wildair with all the gaiety and vivacity of the character. The ſame year Farquhar was in Holland, and he has given a facetious and intereſting account of the place and people in two letters. In 1701, appeared "ſir Harry Wildair, or the ſequel of the trip to the jubilee," which was received with uncommon approbation. He publiſhed in 1702, miſcellanies, or collections, of poems, letters and eſſays, and the next year came out his "Inconſtant, or the way to win him." In 1704 appeared his "ſtage coach," the next year "the twin rivals," and in 1706 "the recruiting officer," dedicated to "all friends round the Wrekin," a hill near Shrewſbury, where he had obſerved on a recruiting party the manner in which clowns are inveigled into the army, and the milk maids are robbed of their virtue and happineſs by military men. His laſt comedy was "the beaux's ſtratagem," the great ſucceſs of which he did not live to ſee, as the unkindneſs of a courtier, who had promiſed, and forgot to patronize him, and the preſſure of his debts, broke his heart. He died 1707, before he had reached his 30th year. He had married in 1703 a lady who had fallen in love with him, and who to gain the affections of a diſſipated ſuitor, had falſely repreſented herſelf as a woman of great opulence. He married, but though bitterly diſappointed, he never upbraided his wife with the artifice, but became a tender and indulgent huſband. He left two daughters whom in his papers he had recommended to the friendſhip of Wilks. Wilks became a father to them, he procured a benefit for each of them, and continued his parental fondneſs, even after they were ſettled in buſineſs. For the ſucceſs of his comedies, Farquhar is indebted to the natural delineation of his characters, the intereſting tendency of his plots, and the flowing ſprightlineſs of his wit. The ſame popularity attends them now as upon their original production, though it is to be lamented that a ſpirit of indelicacy is obſerved throughout, to be attributed not ſo much to depravity of heart in the author, as to the impure taſte of the age.

FASTOLFF, ſir John, a valiant general, born at Yarmouth in Norfolk. He was with the duke of Clarence in Ireland, and in 1408 he married a rich widow of that kingdom, and ſoon after went to France, where he was promoted to places of truſt and honor. He returned home 1440, covered with laurels bravely won in the field, and in his private conduct exhibited the hoſpitable, generous, and benevolent man. He beſtowed legacies to Cambridge to build the ſchools of philoſophy and civil law, and was a moſt liberal benefactor to Magdalen college, Oxford, founded by Wainfleet. He died 1459, aged upwards of 80. Shakeſpeare has been ſeverely cenſured for abuſing this great man under the character of ſir John Falſtaff. The age and the name of theſe two knights are ſo different, that the apparent coincidence muſt be purely accidental. Faſtolff, as is well obſerved, was a diſcreet and valiant, chaſte and ſober commander abroad, and eminent for every virtue at home; but the Falſtaff of the poet is an old, humorous, vaporing, cowardly, lewd, lying, drunken debauchee. It is beſides to be recollected that Shakeſpeare's Falſtaff was firſt acted under the name of ſir John Oldcaſtle, though modern critics diſpute it.

FAVART, Charles Simon, known for his operas, died at Paris 1793, aged 83.

FAVART, Marie Juſtine Benoite, a French actreſs, wife of the preceding. She was never ſurpaſſed in the ſenſibility, eaſe, and livelineſs of her comic characters. She died at Paris 1772, aged 45.

FAUCHET, Claude, hiſtoriographer to Henry IV., died 1601, aged 72. The monuments of his extenſive reading are found in his Gauliſh and French antiquities—a treatiſe on the liberties of the Gallican church—on the origin of knights, armorial bearings, and heralds, &c. Theſe works are curious, but ſo inelegant that, it is ſaid, the peruſal of them gave Louis XIII. a diſtaſte for reading.

FAUCHET, Claude, of Dorne in the Nivernois, was preacher to Louis XVI. The theatrical manner of his delivery offended the monarch, and in conſequence of this he was at the revolution moſt hoſtile to the government. He was moſt active in the deſtruction of the baſtile, and preached a thankſgiving ſermon on the event, and was ſo forgetful of his character, that he called Jeſus Chriſt the firſt ſans culotte of Judæa. Theſe extravagances rendered him popular with the mob; he was deputy from Calvados, and became the conſtitutional biſhop of Bayeux. He was at laſt accuſed as a diſaffected perſon before the revolutionary tribunal, and guillotined 1793, in his 49th year. He wrote a panegyric on St. Lewis, before the French academy—funeral oration for the duke of Orleans—Eloge on Benjamin Franklin, &c.

FAUCHEUR, Michael le, a proteſtant divine, admired as a preacher at Montpellier, Charenton, and Paris. After hearing him diſcourſe on duelling, marſhal de la Force ſaid; "If a challenge was ſent to me, I would refuſe it." He died at Paris 1667. He wrote a treatiſe on oratorical action—ſermons in 8vo.—chriſtian prayers and meditations—a treatiſe on the euchariſt againſt Perron, folio.

FAULKNER, George, a printer of eminence, the firſt who raiſed his profeſſion in Ireland to reſpectability. He was the friend of dean Swift, and of lord Cheſterfield, whoſe letters to him under the name of Atticus are much admired. He broke his leg, in conſequence of which, Foote, with more humor than good breeding, introduced him in his Orators, 1762, in the character of Peter Paragraph. Faulkner commenced an action againſt the mimic, which however was dropped by the interference yence of lord Townſhend. He raiſed himſelf to opulence by the ſucceſs of his "journal," and died alderman of Dublin 1775.

FAVORINUS, Varinus, of Favera, near Camerino, in Italy, was a diſciple of Politian, and became a Benedictine monk. He was keeper of the Medicean library of Florence, and biſhop of Nocera, and died 1537. He publiſhed in 1523 his Greek lexicon at Rome, one of the firſt of modern lexicons, compiled from Suidas, the Etymologicum Magnum, Heſychius, &c. He wrote beſides, cornucopiæ et horti Adonidis—and Stobæus' apophthegmata, tranſlated.

FAUR, Guy de, of Toulouſe, was ſent by Charles IX. as ambaſſador to the councils of Trent, where he defended the Gallican church. In 1572 he vindicated the maſſacre of St. Bartholomew, no doubt compelled by his ſuperiors, as his own character was mild and far from vindictive. He made peace between the court and the proteſtants under Henry III. whom he had accompanied to Poland. He poſſeſſed great influence with his maſter, and was created one of the chief preſidents of the court of law. He died 1584, aged 56. He is beſt known by his "Quatrains," or moral ſtanzas of four lines, ſo much admired at that time, that they were tranſlated into all languages, and into Engliſh by Sylveſter.

FAVRE, Anthony, or Faber, a lawyer, born 1557 at Breſſe. He was governor of Savoy, and was engaged in ſeveral negociations between that dukedom and France. He died 1624. He wrote 10 vols. fol. on juriſprudence and civil law, beſides quatrains preſerved among thoſe of Faur.

FAVRE, Claude, Vid. VAUGELAS.

FAWCETT, ſir William, a general, born at Shipdenhall, near Halifax, Yorkſhire. He received his education at a grammar ſchool in Lancaſhire, and ſerved in Germany during the ſeven years' war under Eliot and Granby. The king of Pruſſia made him liberal offers to accept a command in his army, but he preferred the ſervice of his native country. He was knight of the bath, colonel of the third regiment of dragoon guards, and governor of Chelſea hoſpital. He died 1804. He tranſlated from the French count Saxe's reveries, or memoirs on the art of war, 4to.—regulations for the Pruſſian cavalry, from the German —regulations for the Pruſſian infantry, and the Pruſſian tactics.

FAWKES, Francis, a poet, born in Yorkſhire 1721, and educated at Leeds, and at Jeſus college, Cambridge. He ſettled at Bromham, Yorkſhire, and removed to Croydon, Surrey, where Herring gave him the vicarage of Orpington, with St. Mary Clay, Kent, which he exchanged in 1774 for the rectory of Hayes. He died 1777. He publiſhed an ode inſcribed to Herring, and lamented his death in 1756 in a pathetic elegy. His poems appeared by ſubſcription 1761, in 8vo. but his chief merit was tranſlation, as is evinced by his ſpirited verſions of Anacreon, Sappho, Bion, Moſchus, and Muſæus, 12mo.—and the Idylia of Theocritus, 8vo. His Apollonius Rhodius appeared 1780.

FAYDIT, Anſelm, a Provençal poet of celebrity, noticed by the princes of his time, for his wit. He was relieved from indigence by Richard Cœur de Lion who admired his poetry, and he died at Aix 1220. He wrote a poem on the death of his benefactor Richard, the palace of love, imitated afterwards by Petrarch, beſides comedies, &c.

FAYDIT, Peter, a prieſt of the oratory, born at Riom in Auvergne, and died there 1709, aged 60. He is known for his ſatirical attacks on great characters, eſpecially Boſſuet and Fenelon for his Telemachus, and his illuſtrations of eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, 8vo.

FAYETTE, Louiſa de la, a French lady. She was maid of honor to Anne of Auſtria, and enjoyed the confidence of Lewis XIII. So great was her influence upon this monarch that ſhe reconciled him to the queen, and when ſhe had thus ſerved the man whom ſhe reſpected, ſhe retired uncontaminated, and took the veil. Lewis viſited her in her retreat, but ſhe reſiſted every invitation to the court. She died in her convent, univerſally beloved, and deſervedly admired for that uncommon diſplay of virtue and ſelf-command which, in a beautiful woman, could reſiſt the moſt flattering offers of diſtinction and of rank, and ſacrifice the world and her innocent attachment to a king, to devotion.

FAYETTE, Marie Madeleine, counteſs of, wife of count de la Fayette, is celebrated for her knowledge of literature and of the fine arts, and her intimacy with Rochefoucault, Huetius, and other learned men. She died 1693. Though abuſed for levity of conduct by the author of the memoirs of madam de Maintenon, ſhe is repreſented by madam de Sevigné as a woman of exemplary character. She wrote Zaide—la princeſſe de Cleves—la princeſſe de Montpenſier, romances—memoires de la cour de France — hiſtoire d'Henriette d'Angleterre — divers portraits, &c. works ſtill eſteemed. She is the firſt, ſays Voltaire, who exhibited in her romances the manners of people of faſhion in a graceful and natural way.

FEATLY, Daniel, or FAIRCLOUGH, a divine, born at Charlton, Oxfordſhire, 1582. He was educated at Magdalen college ſchool and Corpus Chriſti, Oxford. He was ſent as chaplain to ſir Thomas Edmund's embaſſy to France, and became, in 1613, rector of Northill, Cornwall, and chaplain to Abbot the primate, who made him rector of Lambeth. He afterwards received from the primate the rectory of All-Hallows, Bread-ſtreet, London, which he exchanged for Acton, and he was the laſt provoſt of Chelſea college. He ſuffered much by the civil wars, and hardly eſcaped with his life, as he was impriſoned in 1643, for oppoſing the covenant. He grew ſo weak and dropſical from the confinement that he was permitted to remove to Chelsea college, where he died 1645. He was an able disputant, and a most smart scourge, says Wood, of the church of Rome. He published nearly 40 works, all of the polemical kind, besides "cygnea cantio."

FECKENHAM, John de, was born in Worcestershire. He was educated in the monastery of Evesham, and afterwards at Gloucester hall, Oxford. He was afterwards chaplain to bishops Bell and Bonner, and in 1549 he was committed to the tower for refusing, it is said, to administer the sacraments after the manner of the protestants. On Mary's accession he was raised to distinction in the church. In 1554 he disputed at Oxford with Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, before they suffered martyrdom; but though favored by the papists, he exercised every office of benevolence towards the suffering protestants. In 1556 he was made D. D. in compliment to his great learning, and appointed abbot of Westminster. On Mary's death, Elizabeth, before her coronation, sent for him, and as he had interested himself warmly in her favor during the last reign, she acknowledged his services, and offered him the archbishopric of Canterbury, if he would conform, which he refused. In the queen's first parliament he was the last abbot that sat there, and he then spoke so boldly against the reformation, that he was sent to the tower in 1560. He continued in custody, and died a prisoner in Wisbech castle, 1585. His works were chiefly sermons and controversial tracts, now little regarded.

FEIJOO, Benedict Jerom, a Spanish Benedictine, who attempted to correct and reform the vitiated notions of his countrymen. His Teatro Critico, in 14 vols. 4to. is a work of great merit, which, with great freedom, censures the licentiousness of the clergy, and exposes the futility of pilgrimages and superstitious exorcisms. This unusual boldness proved very offensive to the church, and the author was with difficulty saved from the inquisition. He died 1765.

FEITHIUS, Everard, a German, born at Elburgh, in Guelderland. The invasion of the Spaniards under Spinola so terrified him, that he retired to France, where he taught Greek, and was honored with the friendship of Casaubon, Thuanus, Du Puy, and other learned men. As he walked one day at Rochelle, he was invited into a house by one of the citizens, and from that moment it never could be known what became of him, though the mysterious occurrence was diligently inquired into by the magistrates of the place. He was then young, but had given great specimens of superior learning. Of his MS. works were published antiquitatum Homericarum libri quatuor, 12mo.—de Athenien. republicâ—de antiquit. Atticis, &c. very learned.

FELIBIEN, Andrew, historiographer to the French king, was born at Chartres 1619. He improved himself at Paris, and also at Rome, and was patronized by Fouquet and Colbert, and placed by the king in offices of respectability. He died 1695, aged 76. His principal works are entretiens sur les vies & les ouvrages des plus excellens peintres, anciens & modernes, 5 vols. 4to.—les principes de l'architecture, de la sculpture, & de la peinture, avec un dictionnaire des termes propres, de ces arts, de l'origine de la peinture, &c.—descriptions of several entertainments given by the king, &c.—the conferences of the royal academy of painting, &c. —the description of the abbey de la Trappe, &c. His dialogues on the lives of the painters is the work most admired. It is elegant and profound.

FELIBIEN, John Francis, succeeded his father in all his appointments, and inherited his taste and knowledge of the fine arts. He wrote an historical collection of the lives and works of the most celebrated architects, 4to.—description of Versailles, ancient and modern, 12mo., and died 1733.

FELIBIEN, Michael, son of Andrew, engaged to write the history of Paris, which he did not live to complete. It was finished by Lobineau, 5 vols. fol. 1725. He died 1719, aged 53. He had published the history of the abbey of St. Denys, in folio.

FELIX I. pope after Dionysius, 269, was put to death 274, and canonized.

FELIX II. was, in 355, elevated to the papal chair by Constans, during the exile of Liberius. On the return of his rival, Felix wished to retain his office conjunctly with him, but the Romans exclaimed, "one God, one Christ, one pope," and he retired to exile, and died 365.

FELIX III. successor of Simplicius, quarrelled with Zeno, and died 492.

FELIX IV. pope after John I. 526, died four years after. He was a prelate of great piety and exemplary goodness. He was the first who introduced extreme unction in the church.

FELL, Dr. John, a prelate, born at Longworth, Berks, 1625. He was educated at Thame school, and Christ church, Oxford, where his father was dean. During the civil war, he bore arms for the king, and being expelled from the college, he lived in retirement till the restoration, when he was made prebendary of Chichester, and canon and dean of Christ church. He was liberal to his college, and built the tower over the principal gate, into which in 1683 he caused to be removed the bell called great Tom, said to have been originally brought from Oseney abbey. He served the office of vice-chancellor, and in 1675-6 was made bishop of Oxford, without giving up his deanery, and applied a large part of his income to the rebuilding of Cuddesden palace. He died 1686. He wrote the life of Dr. Hammond—historia & antiquitates universitatis Oxon. 2 vols. fol. translated from Wood's —Alcinoi in Platonicam philosophiam introductio—in laudem musices carmen Sapphicum—St. Clement's two epistles to the Corinthians, Greek and Latin—Allestree's life—sermons—ſermons—an edition of Cyprian, and other claſſics. The biſhop's father was born in London, 1594, and educated at Weſtminſter and Chriſt church. He was ſucceſſively miniſter of Freſhwater, iſle of Wight, chaplain to James I. prebendary of Worceſter, dean of Lichfield, and in 1638 dean of Chriſt church. He died 1649, of a broken heart, in conſequence of the murder of his royal maſter. He wrote primitiæ, ſeu oratio, &c. and concio Latina ad baccalaureos, &c.

FELL, John, a diſſenting miniſter, of Cockermouth. He was originally a taylor, but acquired ſome knowledge of the claſſics, and became paſtor of a congregation at Eccles, Suffolk, and afterwards Thaxſted, Eſſex. He was afterwards tutor at an academy at Homerton, from which he was diſmiſſed, ſays his biographer, for reading a newſpaper on a ſunday. A ſubſcription of 100 guineas was made for him to preach ſermons on the evidences of chriſtianity. Four only of theſe were delivered at the Scots church, London Wall, when the preacher fell a victim to a dropſy, 1797. The ſermons were continued by Dr. H. Hunter. Fell was the author of anſwers to Farmer's eſſay on the Demoniacs—and his treatiſe on the idolatry of Greece and Rome—genuine proteſtantiſm—an eſſay, on the love of one's country—a letter to Burke on the penal laws—an eſſay on Engliſh grammar, &c.

FELLER, Joachim Frederic, a German, born at Leipſic, 1673. He was ſecretary to the duke of Weimar, and travelled to viſit foreign libraries. He died 1726. The beſt known of his works is monumenta varia inedita, Jena, 1714, in 12 numbers, 4to. He wrote alſo miſcellanea Leibnitiana, &c.

FELLER, Francis Xavier, an ex-jeſuit, born at Bruſſels. He wrote an hiſtorical and literary journal, from 1774 to 1794, at Luxemburg—a geographical dictionary—obſervations on Newton's philoſophy—and Buffon's epochs of nature examined—an hiſtorical dictionary, 8 vols. 8vo. and died at Ratiſbon, 1802, aged 67.

FELLTHAM, Owen, an Engliſh writer, in the reign of James I. His learning and virtues recommended him to the notice of the earl of Thomond, in whoſe family he lived in eaſy and honorable dependence. He wrote Reſolves, divine, moral, and political, a work of ſingular excellence, of which the 12th edition appeared in 1709, in 8vo. This book, ſo valuable for its refined ſentiments of morality, its pointed delineations of duty, and its intereſting tendency to improve the heart in the road to virtue, has lately been edited by Mr. Cumming.

FELTON, John, was the aſſaſſin of Villiers, duke of Buckingham, 1628, a crime which he committed in the full perſuaſion that he thus ſerved God and man. He was tried and executed. He had been a lieutenant in the army which beſieged the iſle of Rhé, and becauſe he did not ſucceed to a company, he became a bigoted diſſatisfied puritan. His grandfather, of the ſame name, had in the reign of Elizabeth, affixed on the palace gates of the biſhop of London, the bull of Pius V. by which the queen was declared a heretic. He was tried and executed for this conduct, 1570.

FELTON, Henry, principal of Edmund hall, Oxford, was author of a diſſertation on reading the claſſics, and forming a juſt ſtyle, a work of merit. He wrote alſo ſermons, and died 1739.

FENELON, Francis de Salignac de la Motte, archbiſhop of Cambray, was born at the caſtle of Fenelon in Perigord, 1651. He was educated at Cahors and Paris, and at the age of 24 took orders, and in 1686, after the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he was ſent at the head of the miſſionaries to convert the proteſtants of the coaſt of Saintonge and the Pays de Aunis. In 1689 he was appointed tutor to the dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berri, and the king for his ſervices gave him the abbey of St. Valery, and the ſee of Cambray, 1695. In 1697 he was expoſed to perſecution, by the publication of his explication of "the maxims of the ſaints concerning the interior life," in which he ſupported the claims of madame Guyon, to exalted devotion, and her myſtical interpretation of Solomon's ſong. Fenelon was offered to ſign a recantation, and when he refuſed, the affair was referred to the king, and then to the pope, who in condemning the archbiſhop's book, declared that he had erred from exceſs of love of God, and his opponents, from exceſs of love of their neighbour. This affair, to which ſuch importance was attached, was ſuppoſed to ariſe from the wiſh of preventing the appointment of Fenelon to the office of almoner to the ducheſs of Burgundy. Fenelon ſubmitted to the deciſion of the pope, and read the ſentence, and his recantation in his own dioceſe, where, by his exemplary life, he gave luſtre to the epiſcopal office. He afterwards aſſiſted the Jeſuits againſt the Janſeniſts, and procured the diſgrace of Noialles their patron. The work from which Fenelon derives immortality is his "Telemachus". It was expoſed to the jealouſy of Lewis and his courtiers, who pretended to ſee the character of madam de Monteſpan in Calypſo, of mademoiſelle de Fontanges, in Eucharis, of the ducheſs of Burgundy, in Antiope, of Louvois in Proteſilaus, of James II. in Idomeneus, and of Lewis XIV. in Seſoſtris, but though its publication was prohibited in France, it appeared at Paris ſurreptitiouſly in 1699, and in a corrected form at the Hague 1701. Such is the merit of the work, that it ranks, though in proſe, among epic poems, and by the elegance of its ſtyle, and the ſublimity of its moral, it has ſecured univerſal applauſe, and has been tranſlated into all the languages of Europe. This amiable prelate died 7th January 1715, aged 63. Beſides his Telemachus, and his explication of the maxims, he wrote a treatiſe on the education of daughters, 12mo. much admired—dialogues of the dead, 2 vols. 12mo.—dialogues on eloquence, and the eloquence of the pulpit, 12mo.—lives of ancient philosophers, abridged, 12mo.—spiritual works, 4 vols. 12mo.—a demonstration of the existence of God, 12mo.—sermons, &c.

FENTON, Elijah, a poet, the youngest of 12 children, born at Shelton, near Newcastle-under-Line, Staffordshire. He was educated at Cambridge, and became usher in Bonwicke's school, at Headley, in Surry. He afterwards was master of Seven Oaks school, and next was secretary to lord Orrery, and tutor to his son lord Boyle, and by Pope's recommendation he was placed near Craggs, secretary of state. Though not rich he ended his life in ease, and died at the house of lady Trumbal, East Hampstead, Berks, 13th July, 1730. He published in 1709, "Oxford and Cambridge verses," and in 1717, a volume of his own poems, and in 1723, his tragedy of Mariamne. He also assisted Pope in the Odyssey, and translated the first, fourth, 19th, and 20th books. He also edited Waller's poems, with notes, and published a life of Milton, commended by Dr. Johnson. Fenton, though of no superior genius as a poet, yet possessed great merit. His epitaph was written by Pope, and the praises bestowed on him are not overcharged, for he was an honest man, unenvied by rivals, mild, humane, and benevolent in his conduct, and he lived "content with science, in the vale of peace."

FENTON, sir Geoffrey, served Elizabeth in Ireland, where he became member of the privy council 1581, and where he married the daughter of Dr. Robert Weston, lord chancellor of the island. He was afterwards secretary to the lord lieutenant, and continued so under all the changes of government. He died 1608. He translated Guiciardini's wars of Italy, dedicated to Elizabeth, besides golden epistles from Guevara's works, &c.

FERDINAND I. second son of the archduke Philip, was crowned king of Hungary and Bohemia 1527, on the death of Louis the younger, and in 1531 he was elected king of the Romans, and in 1558 he succeeded as emperor, on the abdication of his brother Charles V. He governed with moderation, and died of a dropsy at Vienna 1564, aged 61.

FERDINAND II. archduke of Austria, raised to the imperial throne 1619. His subjects of Bohemia placed on the throne Frederic V. elector palatine, but Ferdinand defeated them at the battle of Prague 1620, and the victories of Tilly, the imperial general, rendered opposition hopeless. These successes roused against Ferdinand, the king of France, and Gustavus Adolphus, of Sweden, and the imperial general was defeated at Leipsic, though soon after the Swedish conqueror fell covered with glory in the battle of Lutzen. Ferdinand died at Vienna, 1637, aged 59.

FERDINAND III. surnamed Ernest, eldest son of the preceding, was elected emperor on his father's death. He pursued the same plans of ambition and aggrandizement, but in his war against the Swedes, his troops were defeated by Bernard duke of Weimar, who, in four months, gained four important victories. Tranquillity was restored by the peace of Westphalia, 1648, and the treaties of Osnaburg and Munster tolerated the Lutherans and Calvinists in the midst of the Roman Catholic religion. The emperor died 1657, aged 49.

FERDINAND I. king of Castile and Leon, surnamed the Great, was son of Sancho III. of Navarre. He defeated Alphonso of Leon, 1037, and caused himself to be crowned king of Leon, and of the Asturias. He next marched against the Moors, took several of their towns, and penetrated into the heart of Portugal. He died 1065.

FERDINAND II. younger son of Alphonso VIII. of Leon and Castile, made war against the Portuguese. He made the most temperate use of his victory, and died 1187, after a reign of 30 years.

FERDINAND III. St. son of Alphonso IX. obtained the crown of Castile by the abdication of his mother Berengere 1217, and ascended the throne of Leon 1230. He made war against the Moors, and took Cordova, Murcia, Seville, Xeres, Cadiz, &c. and died 1252.

FERDINAND IV. succeeded to the throne of Castile 1295, at the age of 10. His minority was governed by his mother Mary. He made war against the Moors, and died suddenly 1312, aged 27.

FERDINAND V. surnamed the Catholic, was son of John II. of Arragon. He married Isabella of Castile, and thus united the kingdoms of Castile and Arragon. He made war against Alphonso king of Portugal, and defeated him at Toro 1476, and he next subdued Grenada, after a war of eight years, and put an end to the Mooriſh power, which for 800 years had flourished in Spain. By means of his general Gonsalvo of Cordova, he conquered part of the kingdom of Naples, but whilst his dominions were enlarged in Europe and Africa, a new continent submitted to his power by the discoveries of Columbus. Ferdinand died 1516.

FERDINAND VI. surnamed the Wise, was son of Philip V. and Mary of Savoy, and succeeded his father 1746. He was a most benevolent prince, and two days in a week freely gave access to his subjects, and redressed personally their grievances. He engaged in the war of 1741, and in the peace of 1748 he obtained for one of his brothers the crown of the two Sicilies, and for the other the duchies of Parma and Placentia. Under his government industry was encouraged, abuses were reformed, and canals were made to convey plenty and commerce through the country. He died without children at Madrid 1759, aged 46.

FERDINAND I. succeeded in 1458 to Alphonso phonſo of Arragon as king of Naples and Sicily. Though he protected commerce, he was unpopular on account of his debaucheries. He died little regretted 1494, aged 70.

FERDINAND, king of Portugal after Peter 1367, died 1383. He aſſumed the title of king of Caſtile after Peter the Cruel, and was engaged in war with Henry of Tranſtamare, whoſe daughter he married, to re-eſtabliſh the general tranquillity.

FERDINAND I. grand duke of Tuſcany after his brother Francis II. 1587, was eminent for his wiſdom. He died 1609.

FERDINAND II. grand duke of Tuſcany, ſucceeded Coſmo II. and gained the reſpect of the neighbouring princes, by his neutrality during the wars between France and Spain. He ſupported the Venetians in their war in Candia, and died 1668.

FERDINAND of Cordova, in the 15th century, was ſo well ſkilled in the logic of Ariſtotle, and the learning of the ancients, that he paſſed among the vulgar for a magician. He wrote de artificio omnis ſcibilis — and commentaries on Ptolemy's almageſt, and on the bible.

FERDONSI, Haſſan Ben Scharf, a Perſian poet, whoſe epic poem called Schanameh is very celebrated. It is the labor of 30 years, and conſiſts of 60,000 verſes, each of which is a diſtich. He died at Thous 1020.

FERG or FERGIRE, Francis Paul, a painter of Vienna. He came to London, where he was much eſteemed, but an imprudent marriage ruined his expectations. He was found dead at the door of his lodging 1740, worn out with diſeaſe and wretchedneſs. His landſcapes are beautifully enriched with ruins of caſtles and towers.

FERGUS I. king of Scotland, aſſiſted the Scots in repelling the Picts, and for his ſervices was elected king. He was drowned as he returned to Ireland 404.

FERGUSON, Robert, was ejected from the living of Godmarſham in Kent, for nonconformity, 1662. He afterwards kept a ſchool, and then became a court ſpy. He was next the aſſociate of Monmouth, whom, as it is thought, he betrayed. He wrote the intereſt of reaſon in religion, 8vo.—a diſcourſe concerning juſtification, &c. and died poor, 1714.

FERGUSON, Robert, of Edinburgh, ſtudied divinity, but preferred literary fame to all other purſuits. He obtained a place in the ſheriff clerk's office, Edinburgh, but diſſipation abridged his days, and he died inſane 1774, aged 24. His paſtoral, humorous, and lyric poems, have been edited in Anderſon's collection.

FERGUSON, James, a ſelf-taught philoſopher, born of poor parents in Bamffſhire, 1710. He was a common ſhepherd, and in this employment marked accurately the poſition of the ſtars with a thread and bead. His ingenuity was encouraged by his opulent neighbours, who had him inſtructed in arithmetic, algebra, and geometry. His ingenuity was ſo great, that after the ſight of a watch and of a clock, he made one of each with wood. In 1744 he came to London, and in conſequence of his aſtronomical rotula to ſhew the new moon and eclipſes, he was made fellow of the royal ſociety. The king at his acceſſion granted him a penſion of 50l. a year, and occaſionally took great delight in his converſation. He invented ſome uſeful inſtruments, and died 1776. He wrote "ſelect mechanical exerciſes,"—introduction to electricity—to aſtronomy—treatiſe on perſpective—and aſtronomy explained on Newton's principles, edited for the fourth time 1770—lectures on mechanics, hydroſtatics, hydraulics, &c. edited the fifth time 1776, &c.

FERGUSON, William, a Scotch painter, who died 1690. He excelled in repreſenting dead birds, game, and ſtill life.

FERMAT, Peter, a mathematician of Touloufe. As a philoſopher he may be ſaid to have prepared the way for the infinites of Newton and Leibnitz, and to have introduced new geometry. He was connected with Deſcartes, Huygens, and Paſcal, and died 1664. His works were publiſhed 2 vols. fol. 1679. His ſon Samuel wrote ſome learned diſſertations.

FERMOR, William count Von, of Phaſkow, was ſon of a Scotchman. He like his father was in the Ruſſian ſervice againſt the Turks. For his ſervices he was made count of the empire by the emperor Francis. He defeated the king of Pruſſia at the famous battle of Zorndorff, and afterwards took Berlin. He died 1771, aged 64.

FERNEL, John Francis, phyſician to Henry II. of France, was born in Picardy 1506. His lectures on philoſophical ſubjects at Paris were greatly admired for eloquence and erudition. He afterwards ſtudied phyſic, and divided his time between his patients and his books, allowing himſelf ſcarce five hours of reſt in 24. When invited to court by the king, whoſe friendſhip he had ſecured by curing one of his favorites, he excuſed himſelf, and preferred retirement to every other purſuit. On the death of the king's firſt phyſician, he ſettled at the court, but the ſudden death of his wife, who fell a ſacrifice to her grief in leaving her relations to live at Fontainbleau, ſo affected him, that he died within a month after, 1558. He wrote ſeveral works on medical ſubjects in high repute.

FERNOUILLOT DE FALBAIRE, Charles George, a French author, who died 1801, aged 74. He wrote ſome articles in the Encyclopedie, beſides dramatic pieces.

FERRACINO, Bartolomeo, a ſelf-taught mechanic of Padua. His invention of a ſaw which worked by the wind recommended him to the notice of the great. He built a famous bridge over the Brenta in his native town, and died 1764, aged 72.

FERRAND,

FERRAND, James, a French phyſician of Agen. He wrote a book "on the diſtemper of love," Paris, 1622.

FERRAND, Anthony, of Paris, died 1719, aged 42. His madrigals, ſongs, epigrams, &c. are well known.

FERRAND, James Philip, a French painter in enamel, born at Joigni in Burgundy. He died at Paris 1732, aged 79. He wrote a treatiſe on enamel painting, and another on miniatures, 12mo.

FERRAR, Robert, of Halifax, Yorkſhire, was educated at Cambridge and Oxford, and made biſhop of St. David's by Cranmer. He was impriſoned in Edward's reign, and under Mary he was burnt as a heretic at Caermarthen, 1555.

FERRAR, Nicholas, of London, was educated at Cambridge, and after travelling on the continent, was made ſecretary to the Virginia company, and in 1624 elected member of parliament, and directed, with two others, to draw the impeachment againſt lord Granfield, the treaſurer. He ſoon after retired to Little Gidding, Huntingdonſhire, where he eſtabliſhed a proteſtant monaſtery. In 1626 he took deacon's orders, and died 1637. He had tranſlated from the Spaniſh Valdeſſo's conſiderations on religion.

FERRARI, Lewis, of Milan, was profeſſor of mathematics at Bologna, where he died 1565, aged 45. He invented the method of reſolving biquadratic equations.

FERRARI, Octavian, an Italian author, profeſſor of ethics and politics at Venice, Padua, Milan, and other places of Italy. He died at Milan, 1586, aged 68, conſidered for his learning as a ſecond Ariſtotle. He wrote de ſermonibus exoreticis—de origine Romanorum —a Latin tranſlation of Athenæus, and notes on Ariſtotle.

FERRARI, Franciſco Bernardino, of the ſame family, was born at Milan, 1577. He was encouraged by the archbiſhop of Milan to travel not only to improve himſelf, but to make a collection of books. This valuable ſelection, made in Spain, Italy, &c. laid the foundation of the Ambroſian library. Ferrari died at Milan 1669, aged 92. He wrote de antiquo eccleſiaſticarum epiſtolarum genere libri tres—de veterum acclamationibus & plauſu libri ſeptem. Theſe works are curious, and diſplay great erudition.

FERRARI, Octavio, of the ſame family, was born at Milan, 1607, and educated at the Ambroſian college, where he became profeſſor of rhetoric at the age of 21. Six years after he was invited by the Venetians to Padua, where as profeſſor of Greek, of eloquence, and politics, he collected a great number of pupils. His fame was ſo deſervedly eſtabliſhed, that Chriſtina of Sweden honored him with preſents, and Lewis XIV. ſettled on him a penſion of 500 crowns for ſeven years. He died 1682. His works are chiefly on claſſical antiquities, the moſt known of which is origines linguæ Italicæ, fol. a ſubject treated before by Scaliger, in 24 books, now loſt.

FERRARS, George, was educated at Oxford, and removed to Lincoln's-inn, and ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf as an advocate under Cromwell, earl of Eſſex. He became next a favorite with Henry VIII. and his arreſt, when he was member of parliament for Plymouth, created ſuch confuſion, that in the event it eſtabliſhed the privileges of the members of the houſe. On the fall of Somerſet under Edward VI. he was named lord of miſrule, to entertain the public with paſtimes, and for 12 days he exhibited at Greenwich all the pomp of aſſumed greatneſs, to the ſatisfaction of the court, and of the populace. Ferrars poſſeſſed ſuch verſatile talents, that while the religion of the court changed at the caprice of the ſovereign, he continued a favorite with all, and died a proteſtant, 1579. He wrote the hiſtory of queen Mary, and alſo contributed to the poetical work called "the mirror for magiſtrates," publiſhed 1559—the fall of Robert Treſilian, chief juſtice, &c. &c.

FERRARS, Edward, a Warwickſhire poet, educated at Oxford. He was a favorite with Henry VIII. and died 1564. He wrote ſome comedies and tragedies.

FERRARS, Henry, of the ſame family, was educated at Oxford, and made large collections for the hiſtory of his native county. His papers laid the foundation of Dugdale's antiquities of Warwickſhire. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf alſo as a poet. He died 1633, aged 84, leaving behind him, ſays Wood, the character of a well-bred gentleman, a good neighbour, and an honeſt man.

FERRAUD, N. of Daure, near the Pyrenees, was a deputy in the convention, and diſtinguiſhed by his enmity to the monarchy. He was commiſſary in the armies of the Rhine, where he behaved with coolneſs, and on his return to Paris, when oppoſing the attack made on the convention, 1795, he was ſhot through the heart with a piſtol. His murderer was executed, and the convention appointed a day to celebrate his obſequies.

FERRERAS, Don John of, a Spaniſh divine, educated at Salamanca. His wit and learning recommended him to the court, from whoſe favors he refuſed two biſhoprics. He contributed much to the Spaniſh dictionary, publiſhed by the academy 1739, in 6 vols. folio, and died 1735, leaving ſeveral works in philoſophy, divinity, and hiſtory.

FERRETI or FERRETUS, a poet and hiſtorian of Vicenza, of the 14th century, who contributed much to the revival of learning in Europe. He wrote an hiſtory of his own times from 1259 to 1328, &c. in Italian.

FERRI, Paul, was born at Metz 1591, and educated at Montauban. As miniſter in his native town, he gained popularity by his eloquence, and zealouſly employed himſelf to reconcile the proteſtants, but for this he was accuſed of being bribed by Richelieu to form a coalition of the two religions. He died 1669, of the ſtone, and more than 80 calculi were found in his bladder. He publiſhed ſcholaſtici orthodoxici ſpecimen, a book approved by Du Pleſſis Mornay—vindiciæ pro ſcholaſtico orthodox, &c.

FERRI, Ciro, a painter, born at Rome, 1634. The excellence of his pieces, on which he ſet a very high price, recommended him to Alexander VII. and his three ſucceſſors. The duke of Florence alſo granted him a penſion to finiſh the imperfect figures of Cortona, and nominated him chief of the Florentine ſchool. He was alſo great as an architect, and ſeveral palaces and altars at Rome were raiſed from his deſigns. It is ſaid that he died through chagrin at ſeeing the ſuperior coloring of Bacici's picture of angels near his own works in the palace of Navona, 1689, aged 55.

FERRIER, Arnaud de, a lawyer of Toulouſe, from the greatneſs of his abilities, called the Cato of France. He was profeſſor of the univerſity, and in 1562 he was deputed by the French king to the council of Trent, where the boldneſs of his harangues in favor of his maſter offended ſome of his Italian hearers. He afterwards went to Venice, where he aſſiſted father Paul in collecting materials for the hiſtory of the council of Trent. He was at heart a proteſtant, and was made chancellor to the king of Navarre, and formed the deſign to declare the French king head of the church, after the example of England. He died in his 79th year. He wrote ſome works.

FERRIER, Jeremy, divinity profeſſor at Niſmes, became papiſt, even after declaring in a public diſputation that Clement VIII. was Anti-chriſt. He was afterwards ſtate counſellor to the French king, and was patronized by Richelieu, and wrote ſome tracts, eſpecially "Catholique d'etat," in favor of his religion and principles. He died of a hectic fever 1626.

FERRIER, Lewis, a poet, of Avignon. He was impriſoned for ſome licentious verſes in his "preceptes galantes," but liberated by intereſt. He wrote Anne of Britany, Adraſtus, and Montezuma, tragedies, and died in Normandy 1721, aged 69.

FERRON, Arnauld du, a lawyer of Bourdeaux, who died 1563, aged 48. He wrote in elegant Latin, and continued to the reign of Francis I. the Latin hiſtory of France by Paulus Æmilius the Veroneſe.

FERTE', Henry de Seneſterre Mareſchal de, a famous general under Lewis XIII. diſtinguiſhed at the ſiege of Rochelle 1626, and at the battle of Rocroi and Lens. In 1650 he defeated the duke of Lorraine, at the battle of St. Nicholas, but in 1656 he was taken priſoner at Valenciennes, and died 1681, aged 82.

FETTI, Dominico, a painter of Rome, 1589. He imitated the paintings of Julio Romano, and was patronized by the duke of Mantua, whoſe palaces he adorned with his pieces. He ruined his conſtitution by licentious indulgences at Venice, and died in his 35th year. His pictures are very ſcarce. His ſiſter, a nun, was alſo a good painter, and ſhe adorned her convent with ſome of her pieces.

FEVARDENTIUS or FEWARDENT, Francis, a Franciſcan friar of Coutances, Normandy. He was a furious oppoſer of the proteſtants, and even the third and fourth Henries were objects of his attack. He publiſhed the five books of Irenæus, with learned notes, &c. and died 1641.

FEUILLE'E, Lewis, a French naturaliſt, born in Provence 1660. He travelled in different parts of the world, to advance the knowledge of natural hiſtory, and at his return received a penſion, and an obſervatory was built for his reſidence at Marſeilles, where he died 1732. He wrote a journal of obſervations phyſical, botanical, &c. on the coaſts of South America, 3 vols. 4to. and preſented the French king with a folio of curious drawings, &c.

FEVRE, Guy le, a poet of Lower Normandy, well ſkilled in oriental literature. He publiſhed ſome works in Syriac and Chaldee, and aſſiſted in the editing of Montanu's Polyglott bible. He died 1598, aged 57.

FEVRE, Anthony le, brother to Guy, was employed near the perſon of Henry IV. of France, and ſent as ambaſſador to England, and other countries. He died 1615, aged 60 His memoirs appeared in 5 vols. 12mo.

FEVRE, Nicholas le, a jeſuit, author of a treatiſe on true religion—and a critical examination of Bayle's works. He died 1755.

FEVRE, James le, or Jacobus FABER, a learned Frenchman, born at Eſtampes, in Picardy, 1440. He was ſuſpected of proteſtantiſm, and therefore flying, found a ſafe retreat at Nerac, under the protection of Margaret, queen of Navarre, ſiſter of Francis I. He died there 1537, nearly 100 years old. Though not profeſſedly a proteſtant, he yet diſapproved of many of the tenets of the church of Rome, and held a conference with Bucer and Capito about the reformation of the church. In 1512 he publiſhed a tranſlation of St. Paul's epiſtles, with notes, &c. Though the correſpondent of Eraſmus, he quarrelled with him in conſequence of ſome diſputed paſſages in ſcripture, and Eraſmus, much to his honor, after repelling the attack, ſolicited the continuance of his friendſhip. It is ſaid that he was murdered in his bed, after weeping in the preſence of Margaret, and lamenting that he had not, like many of his diſciples, had the fortitude to become a martyr in the defence of his opinions.

FEVRE, Nicholas le, or Nicolaus FABER, a learned man, born at Paris 1544. In his youth, while cutting a pen, a ſmall piece of the quill flew into his eye, and cauſed ſuch acute pain, that he lifted, in ſudden anguiſh, the knife, and ſtruck the eye out of the ſocket. He ſtudied the civil law at Toulouſe, Padua, and Bologna, and after reſiding 18 months in Rome, Rome, he returned to Paris, and applied himself to belles lettres. His edition of Seneca, appeared in 1587, with learned notes. He also studied mathematics, and discovered the falsity of Scaliger's demonstration of the quadrature of the circle. On the accession of Henry IV. to the crown, he was made preceptor to the duke of Condé, and after the king's death, he held the same office in the education of Lewis XIII. He died 1611. His works, which are few, were collected after his death in a 4to. vol. 1614, Paris.

FEVRE, Tanaquil, or Tannequi, a learned man, father of madame Dacier, was born at Caen in Normandy 1615. After studying at home, he went to Paris, and was soon recommended to the patronage of Richelieu, who settled a pension of 2000 livres upon him, to inspect the books published at the Louvre. The death of his patron, and the neglect of Mazarin, altered his plans of life, and he turned protestant, and accepted a professorship at Saumur. Here his reputation drew pupils, but an unfortunate assertion that he could pardon Sappho's love for her own sex, since it produced a beautiful ode, proved the cause of a dispute with the university, and at last in 1672, he was invited to Heidelberg. A fever prevented his departure, and he died 12th Sept. 1672. He left a son of his own name, who was a protestant divine in Holland, and at London, but became a Roman catholic at Paris, and published a tract, de futilitate poetices, and besides madame Dacier, another daughter married to Bauldri, professor at Utrecht. Faber was agreeable in his person, but rather effeminate, as to appear with neatness, he procured gloves, &c. from London, and essences from Rome. He published, among other books, Luciani de morte peregrini libellus, 4to.—diatribe Flavii Josephi de Jesu Christi testimon. supposittum esse, 8vo. —epistolarum pars prima, secunda—a short account of the lives of Greek poets—the life of Theseus, from Plutarch, &c.—editions of Xenophon's convivium, of Plato's Alcibiades, of Plutarch's de superstitione, besides notes on Apollodorus, Longinus, and other classics.

FEVRE, Roland le, a painter of Anjou, called sometimes a Venetian. His naked figures were much admired. He stained marble curiously. He died in England 1677.

FEVRET, Charles, a French civilian, of Saumur, 1583. He studied at Heidelberg, and returned to Dijon, where he married Anne Brunet, by whom he had 19 children, 14 of which were born in eight years. He was a popular advocate at Dijon, and when Lewis XIII. came to Dijon to punish an insurrection, he was the only person considered as capable to plead the cause of the insurgents, and so eloquent and persuasive was his address, that the king desired him to print it, and forgave the rebels. He died at Dijon 1661, aged 78. He published a Latin treatise de claris fori Burgundici oratoribus.—and in 1653 his famous "traité de l'abus," frequently reprinted.

FEUSTKING, John Henry, of Holstein, was professor and doctor of divinity at Wittemberg. He was also confessor to the elector of Saxony, and died 1713, aged 41. He wrote various works in German and in Latin.

FEVRET DE FONTETTE, Charles Marie, great grandson of the preceding, was born at Dijon 1710, and eminent as a lawyer. He was laboriously employed in editing "le Long's bibliotheque historique de la France," which he enlarged from one to five large fol. vols. He died 1772.

FICHARD, John, a lawyer, of Frankfort on the Mayne, where he died 1581, aged 69. The best known of his works are, vivorum qui superiori nostroque sæculo eruditione et doctrinâ illustres atque memorabiles fuerunt, vitæ, 1536, 4to.—onomasticon philolosophico-medico synonymum, &c.

FICINUS, Marsilius, of Florence, was educated at the expence of Lorenzo de Medicis, to whom his father was physician. He restored in the west the study of the Platonic philosophy, and translated not only Plato, but also Plotinus, Proclus, Iamblicus, Porphyrius, &c. Though a sceptic, the preaching of Savanorola brought him to a due sense of religion, but like many of the learned of his time he remained devoted to astrology. By a proper regimen he supported his naturally feeble constitution to the age of 66. He died at Correggio 1499, and soon after, as Baronius gravely affirms, appeared according to his promise to his friend Mercatus, to prove thus the immortality of the soul. His writings sacred and profane are very numerous, collected in 2 vols. fol.

FIDANZA, Johannes, a philosopher, poet, and theologist, of Tuscany, called from his learning the seraphic doctor. He died 1274, aged 53, author of some books now little known.

FIDDES, Richard, was born at Hunmanby, near Scarborough, Yorkshire, 1671, and educated at Corpus Christi college, whence he removed to University college. In 1694 he was presented to the living of Halsham, but the marshy situation of the place proved so injurious that he was suddenly deprived of his speech, and never after completely recovered it. He came to London 1712, and no longer able to shine as an eloquent preacher, he maintained himself by his pen. By the friendship of Swift he was recommended to Oxford, who made him his chaplain, but the hopes of preferment vanished at the death of the queen. He died at Putney 1725, aged 54, leaving in destitute circumstances his wife and six children. Of his writings the most known are, "a body of divinity explaining the principles and the duties of natural and revealed religion, 2 vols. fol.—52 discourses—and the life of cardinal Wolsey, in fol. These works appeared under the patronage of a large subscription, but their their popularity was severely attacked. Stackhouse found great fault with the divinity, and for the life of Wolsey the author was censured in the London journal, as being a friend to popery, and the secret enemy of the reformation. Dr. Knight afterwards, in his life of Erasmus, repeats the accusation, and charges Fiddes with favoring the claims of the pretender, as he wrote his book in the house and under the eye of Atterbury, whose opposition to the Hanoverian family was then very unpopular.

FIELD, Richard, was born at Hempstead, Herts, 1561, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. He afterwards removed to Magdalen hall, and in 1594 became reader to Lincoln's-inn society, and obtained the living of Burrowclere, Hants. In 1598 he was chaplain to Elizabeth, and under James, her successor, he was made canon of Windsor, and dean of Gloucester. The bishopric of Oxford was intended for him, but he died before the appointment, 1616, aged 55. He was a man highly respected for his learning, and anxiously devoted to the healing of dissensions in the church. The first time the king heard him preach he quaintly observed, "this is a field for God to dwell in," and almost in similar words he was styled by Fuller, "that learned divine, whose memory smelleth like a field which the Lord hath blessed." The most famous of his works is his "four books of the church," augmented with a fifth in the second edition, which appeared 1610. His memory was retentive to a surprising degree, so that whatever he read he accurately remembered.

FIELDING, Henry, the celebrated novelist, was born at Sharpham park, Somersetshire, 22d April, 1707. His father was grandson to an earl of Denbigh, and his mother was daughter of the first judge Gould. Young Fielding was educated at home, under Mr. Oliver, a clergyman, whom he afterwards turned to ridicule in the coarse character of parson Trulliber. He then went to Eton, where he formed an early intimacy with Lyttleton, Fox, Pitt, and others, and when 18 he passed to Leyden, to study civil law. Being ill supplied with money by his father, who had taken a second wife, and had another family, he returned to London, and there regardless of temperance and of virtue, he gratified every passion, and laid the seeds of lasting infirmities. With a straitened purse he commenced author, and produced his first dramatic piece, "love in several masques," 1727, which, together with "the temple beau," the next year, drew forth the applauses of crowded audiences. He was not, however, always successful, and he published one of his pieces, bearing in the title "as it was damned at the theatre-royal, Drury-lane;" but the severity of criticism was unheeded in the patronage of the great, especially of the duke of Argyle and lord Lyttelton. About 1734 he married miss Craddock, at Salisbury, a woman of great beauty, and a fortune of about 1500l. but this, together with an estate in Dorsetshire, on his father's death, was quickly squandered away in expensive hospitality, and at 30 Fielding found himself destitute of every resource. He now applied to the law, and was called to the bar, and began to make a respectable figure in Westminster hall; but the gout, and all the diseases engrafted on a licentious youth, prevented his success. To maintain himself and a wife and children, he wrote various pamphlets and tracts. He produced Joseph Andrews, and Tom Jones, novels so universally admired, as to be above the praise of his biographer. His "wedding day," however, did not meet the success expected, and the death of his wife came to embitter his affliction, which was so poignant, that his friends dreaded the loss of his senses. Reduced in his income, he found assistance in the appointment of justice of the peace for the county of Middlesex, procured by the influence of his friends, which, though unpopular, was discharged by him with impartiality. In the avocation of this office he executed his Amelia, a work very respectable, but inferior to Tom Jones. His constitution was now so enfeebled, that his friends advised his removing to Lisbon, and two months after he arrived there, he died, 1754, aged 48. Yet though laboring under the attacks of disease, he wrote the humorous journal of his voyage to Lisbon, published in London 1755. Besides, he wrote an essay on conversation—on the knowledge and characters of men—a journey from this world to the next—the history of Jonathan the wild, &c. His dramatic pieces are 26 in number, and the whole of his works has been published in several sizes, with an essay on his life and genius, by Murphy. His biographer attributes much in the history of Fielding's life to slander and defamation; but he wisely observes that quick and warm passions should be early controuled, and that to their licentious indulgence the author of Tom Jones sacrificed his health, his happiness, and the prospect of a lengthened life. So fatal to peace is the wild indulgence of those passions which providence has given to man for his comfort, if decently enjoyed, and for his misery, if riotously abused.

FIELDING, Sarah, third sister of the preceding, was born 1714, and died unmarried 1768. She wrote the Cry, and David Simple, and also translated Xenophon's memorabilia, &c.

FIELDING, sir John, the fourth half brother to Henry Fielding, was his successor as Westminster magistrate. Though blind from his youth, he discharged his duty with great activity, and for his services was knighted, 1761. He published various tracts on subjects of police, charges to the grand jury, essays on important subjects, cautions against the tricks of sharpers, &c. He died at Brompton 1780.

FIENNES, William, lord Say and Sele, born at Broughton, Oxfordshire, 1582, was educated at Winchester and New college, Oxford. He was made a viscount by James I. In the long parliament of 1640 he was very active with Hampden and Pym, and though made master of the court of wards, he slighted all reconciliation with the king. After the king's death he left the presbyterians, and joined the independents, and during the usurpation he was created one of Cromwell's peers. At the restoration he was noticed by Charles II. made lord privy seal, and lord chamberlain, though, as Wood observes, he had been a grand rebel for 20 years, and while others who had been reduced to a bit of bread for his majesty's cause, were left to languish under disappointment, and though a promoter of the rebellion, and in some respect accessary to the murder of Charles, he died quietly in his bed 1662. He is called by Whitlock a man of great parts, wisdom, and integrity, and Clarendon, allowing him the same merit, describes him as ambitious, the enemy of the church, and a violent and dangerous leader of the discontented party. He wrote some political tracts.

FIENNES, Nathanael, second son of the above, was born at Broughton 1608, and educated at Winchester and New college, Oxford. He travelled on the continent, and at his return was made member for Banbury, and displayed the same violence against the royal party as his father. During the civil wars he was colonel under Essex, and governor of Bristol, which he yielded to prince Rupert, for which he was condemned to lose his head. His father's influence, however, saved him, and he left the army disgraced. He joined the independents, and when Cromwell became protector, he was made one of his privy council, and of his lords. At the restoration he retired into the country, and died at his seat near Salisbury, 1669. He wrote some things in support of Cromwell's usurpation, and in another tract defended his conduct at Bristol.

FIENUS, Thomas, of Antwerp, was professor of physic at Louvain, and physician to the duke of Bavaria. He died at Louvain 1631. He wrote "de viribus imaginationis," in which he relates a curious story of a hypocondriac, who thought himself so large that he could not get out of his room—de formatione & animatione fœtus, &c.

FIESCHO, John Lewis, a Genoese, who conspired against Andrew Doria, with the intention of delivering the gallies to the French, and of making himself sovereign. He was drowned in the attempt, 1547, and his family banished from Genoa to the fifth generation.

FIGRELIUS, Edmundus, a Swede, professor of history at Upsal. He wrote a book de statuis illustrium Roman. and died 1676.

FILANGERI, Gaetano, of Naples, was in 1777 employed about the court as gentleman of the bedchamber, and in 1787 was raised to an office in the college of finance. He wrote a popular work on legislation, the first vol. of which appeared in 1780, and the eighth in 1791. He died 1787, aged 35.

FILICAJA, Vincentio di, an elegant poet of Florence, who died 1707, aged 65. His poems, in a delicate and refined style, were collected by his son in folio.

FILMER, sir Robert, of East Sutton, in Kent, was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, and died 1688. He wrote the anarchy of a limited and mixed monarchy—"Patriarcha"—and "the freeholder's grand inquest."

FINÆUS, Orontius, professor of mathematics at Paris, was born in Dauphiné, 1494. He died very poor 1555. He invented a clock in 1553, and pretended that he had found out the quadrature of the circle. His works were collected in 3 vols. fol.

FINCH, Heneage, earl of Nottingham, was born in 1621, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ-church, Oxford, and at the Inner Temple. He was made solicitor general to Charles II. and created a baronet, and in 1661 elected member for the university of Oxford. He was active in the impeachment of lord Clarendon, in 1667, and in 1670 he was attorney-general, and three years after lord keeper. In 1675 he was appointed lord chancellor, and in 1681 created earl of Nottingham, and died the year after. He was a man of great wisdom and eloquence. Burnet has commended him for his attachment to the church, Dryden has recorded him in his Absolom and Achitophel, in the character of Amri, and for his powers in oratory, he deserved the name of the Roscius and Cicero of England.

FINCH, Daniel, son of the preceding, was born in 1647. Though one of the privy counsellors who proclaimed the duke of York to the throne, he never appeared at court during the reign of James, but upon the abdication he wished the appointment of a regent. He was secretary under William, and under Anne, till 1704. At the accession of George I. he was president of the council. He retired from public affairs 1716, and died 1730. He wrote an elaborate book in reply to Whiston's letter to him on the trinity, for which he was thanked by the university of Oxford.

FINCH, Edward, brother of sir Heneage Finch, first earl of Nottingham, was vicar of Christ-church, London, from which he was ejected. The crimes alledged against him were, that he preached in a surplice, worshipped the great idol set up in the church, i. e. the altar, and associated with women. He died 1642.

FINCK, Thomas, of South Jutland, became physician to the duke of Sleswick. He was made in 1591 professor of mathematics at Copenhagen, and in 1602 professor of eloquence, and 1603, of medicine. He wrote tracts, geometriæ rotundi—de medicinâ, &c. and died 1656, aged 95.

FINET, sir John, one of the courtiers of James I. and Charles I. born at Soulton near Dover

Dover in Kent. He died 1641, aged 70. He wrote "Fineti philoxenus," a book on the precedency, treatment, audience, &c. towards foreign ambaſſadors at the Engliſh court, 1656.

FIRENZUOLA, Angelo, an Italian poet, patroniſed by Clement VII. He was an advocate, and became an eccleſiaſtic, and died at Rome 1545. His proſe works were publiſhed 1548, 8vo. and his comedies and other poetical pieces the year after.

FIRMIN, Thomas, born at Ipſwich 1632, was apprenticed by his parents who were puritans, to a linen-manufacturer in London. He was very proſperous in buſineſs, and he honourably employed the fruits of his induſtry to charitable purpoſes. He was in his religious opinions a Socinian, but he nevertheleſs was held in eſteem by the clergy, by Wilkins, Whichcot, and eſpecially Tillotſon. He ſettled in Lombard-ſtreet, and the plague in 1665, and the fire of 1666, gave full activity to his benevolence. In 1676 he erected a warehouſe in Little Britain, for the poor in the linen manufacture, and in 1682 he eſtabliſhed another of the ſame kind at Ipſwich, for the proteſtants who had fled from France. For the laſt 20 years of his life he was governor of Chriſt hoſpital, London, to which he was a great benefactor. He died 1697, aged 66. He publiſhed in 1678, propoſals for the employing the poor, and the prevention of beggary, &c. 4to.

FIRMIN, Giles, of Suffolk, was educated at Cambridge, and ſtudied phyſic, which he afterwards practiſed in New England. On his return to England he became miniſter of Shalford, from which he was ejected 1662. He reſumed the practice of phyſic, and died 1697, aged 80. The beſt known of his works is "the real Chriſtian."

FIRONZABADI, a learned Perſian, author of al Tanbidh, or general information on the Mahometan law in the 11th century.

FISH, Simon, of Kent, was educated at Oxford, and Gray's-inn. He fled into Germany for acting in a play, in which cenſures were thrown upon Wolſey. He wrote in 1527, "the ſupplication of beggars," a violent fire on biſhops and clergy, and the peruſal of this piece by Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn, reſtored him to favor, and after Wolſey's fall he returned. He died of the plague 1571. He tranſlated the Dutch book called the ſum of the ſcriptures.

FISHER, John, a prelate, born at Beverley, Yorkſhire, 1459. He was educated at Michael-houſe, a college afterwards incorporated with Trinity college, Cambridge, and in 1495 was elected maſter of Michael-houſe, and then became confeſſor to Margaret of Richmond, mother to Henry VII. who by his advice founded St. John's and Chriſt colleges, at Cambridge. In 1501 he was vice chancellor of Cambridge, and in 1504 was nominated biſhop of Rocheſter, and the next year accepted the headſhip of Queen's college, Cambridge. On Luther's appearance he ſtood forth as the champion of Rome, but fell under the king's diſpleaſure 1527, on account of his defence of the queen, in the affair of her divorce. In 1530 he narrowly eſcaped poiſoning by one Rouſe, who threw in the cook's abſence poiſon into the gruel, of which the biſhop did not taſte, but which proved fatal to two of the ſervants, and nearly ſo to 15 others who partook of it. He, in 1531, oppoſed the king's ſupremacy, and encreaſed the diſſatisfaction of the court, by liſtening to the predictions of the holy maid of Kent, and more by refuſing to take the oaths of allegiance. He was committed to the Tower for his contumacy, and attainted of high treaſon. When created a cardinal by Paul III. Henry gave orders that none ſhould bring the hat into his dominions, and when the biſhop ſaid that he would receive the cardinal's hat, the angry monarch ſwore by the mother of God, that he ſhould wear it on his ſhoulders then, for he would leave him never a head to ſet it on. He was ſoon after arraigned, and condemned to ſuffer death, and on the 22d June, 1535, he was beheaded, and his head fixed on London-bridge. He was then nearly 77. His works are chiefly on controverſial ſubjects, &c.

FISHER, Mary, an enthuſiaſtic quaker, in the 17th century, who travelled to Conſtantinople, with the intention of converting the grand ſegnior. Mahomet heard her with patience, and ſent her back in ſafety. She afterwards married a preacher of her perſuaſion, and then went into Languedoc, to convert the proteſtants there.

FITZHERBERT, ſir Anthony, a lawyer, born at Norbury, Derbyſhire. He was educated at Oxford, and at one of the inns of court, London, and was made ſerjeant at law, knighted, and in 1523 appointed juſtice in the court of common pleas. After ſupporting his high ſtation with integrity, he died 1538. He wrote the office of juſtice of the peace, &c.—the office of ſheriffs, &c. and other law tracts, beſides "of the ſurveying of lands," &c.

FITZHERBERT, Thomas, grandſon to ſir Anthony, was born 1552, and educated at Oxford. He left the univerſity without a degree, and retired to privacy, but on account of his attachment to the jeſuits, he expoſed himſelf to difficulties, and fled to France 1582. He afterwards went to Madrid, and at laſt entered into the ſociety of Jeſus, at Rome, 1614. He afterwards for 22 years preſided over the Engliſh college at Rome, where he died 1640, aged 88. He wrote ſeveral books on controverſial ſubjects, againſt Barlow, Andrews, and other divines. His treatiſe concerning policy and religion, in three parts, was much admired.

FITZHERBERT, Nicholas, grandſon to ſir Anthony, and couſin to Thomas, was educated at Exeter college, Oxford. In 1572 he went abroad on account of his religious principles, and ſettled at Bologna, and afterwards at Rome. He was unfortunately drowned in a journey from Rome 1612. He wrote caſæ Galatæi de bonis moribus—Oxonienſis in Angliâ academiæ deſcriptio—de antiquitate & continuatione catholicæ religionis, in Angliâ, &c.

FITZJAMES, James, duke of Berwick, natural ſon of the duke of York, afterwards James II. by Arabella Churchill, ſiſter to the duke of Marlborough, was born at Moulines 1671. Inured to a military life, he was wounded at Buda 1686, and ſignalized himſelf at the defeat of the Turks at Mohatz, and afterwards in Ireland at the ſiege of Londonderry, and at the battle of the Boyne. In 1703, he headed the French in Spain, and in 1705 took Nice, and for his ſervices was made marſhal of France. He gained the famous victory at Almanza, over the Engliſh and Portugueſe, under Galloway 1707, and thus ſecured the Spaniſh crown to Philip V. He was killed by a cannon ball at the ſiege of Philipſburg, in Germany 1734. He was a man of a benevolent character, generally poor from the great ſacrifices which he made to ſupport the emigrants in his father's cauſe. Monteſquieu has drawn up his character.

FITZ-STEPHEN, William, a monk of Canterbury, was preſent at the murder of Becket, of which he wrote an account. His deſcription of London is very curious, and the oldeſt extant. He died 1191.

FIXMILLNER, Placidus, of Linz, in Auſtria, ſtudied mathematics at Straſburg under Stuard, and was eccleſiaſtical profeſſor for 40 years at Kremſmunſter. He publiſhed ſome works on aſtronomical ſubjects, beſides tracts on the canon law, &c. He died 1791, aged 71.

FLAMEEL, Bertholet, a painter of Liege, 1675, improved himſelf in Italy, and was noticed at Florence by the grand duke. Some of his pieces adorn the churches of Paris and of Liege.

FLAMEL, Nicholas, of Paris, roſe from poverty to extenſive opulence, and gave riſe to a report that he had diſcovered the philoſopher's ſtone. His riches were nobly uſed in the relief of indigence. It is ſuppoſed that his wealth aroſe from ſucceſsful ſpeculations in commerce, at that time little known. He was living in 1399, and Lucas amuſed his readers by declaring that he had ſeen him in India after his deceaſe.

FLAMINIO, Giovani Antonio, an orator, poet, and hiſtorian of Bologna, author of the lives of Albertus Magnus, &c. He died 1536, aged 72.

FLAMINIO, Marc Antonio, ſon of the preceding, was patroniſed by cardinal Farneſe, who appointed him his ſecretary at the council of Trent. He died at Rome 1550, aged 57. His letters and epigrams appeared 1561, 8vo. —and his paraphraſe of 30 pſalms 1558. His latinity is very pure.

FLAMSTEED, John, an aſtronomer, born at Derby, 1646. When he left ſchool in 1662, he ſaw for the firſt time an aſtronomical book, Sacroboſco's de Sphærâ, which fixed deeply h attention, and directed all his thoughts to aſtro nomy. He not only conſtructed dials, but b the help of Street's Caroline tables, he calcu lated an eclipſe, and ſo ingenious did this ap pear, that the calculation was ſhewn to Mr Halton, a gentleman of mathematical know ledge in the neighbourhood, who applauded th young aſtronomer, and ſupplied him with free books. In 1669, he communicated his calcu lations of the eclipſes of the fixed ſtars by th moon, to the royal ſociety, and received th thanks of that body. In 1670 his father, wh had hitherto viewed his ſtudies with jealouſy pleaſed with his correſpondence with learne men, adviſed him to go to London. At Cam bridge he became acquainted with Barrow an Newton, and he entered at Jeſus college, a that univerſity, where he continued his aſtro nomical ſtudies. In 1673-4, he wrote h Ephemeris, to ſhow the folly of aſtrology, t which he added tables of the moon's riſing an ſetting, and at the requeſt of his friend ſir Jon Moore, he compiled an account of the tide and conſtructed a barometer for the king. O taking his maſter's degree at Cambridge, h wiſhed to take orders, but his friend ſir Jon diſſuaded him, and procured him the place aſtronomer royal, with a ſalary of 100l. a yea He was, however, ordained, and when in 167 the firſt ſtone was laid for the building Greenwich obſervatory, he lodged at th queen's houſe there, and obſerved the ap pulſes of the moon and planets to the fixe ſtars, and in 1681, publiſhed the doctrine the Sphere, in ſir Jonas Moore's poſthumo work of a new ſyſtem of mathematics in 4t In 1684 he obtained Burſtow in Surrey, th only preferment he ever held, but though h genius entitled him to higher emoluments, h was ſatisfied with moderate competence, mo pleaſed in his favorite ſtudies, and in the frien ſhip of ſuch men as Newton, Halley, Mo neaux, Wallis, Caſini, &c. than in the poſſeſſio of unbounded opulence. He died of a ſtra gury, 31ſt Dec. 1712, aged mere than years. His hiſtoria cœleſtis Britannica, which the beſt part was printed before h death, was publiſhed by his widow, 1725, in vols. fol. dedicated to the king.

FLANDRIN, Peter, of Lyons, ſtudied t veterinary art under his uncle Chabert, a acquired celebrity in the knowledge of comp rative anatomy. He viſited England and Sp in ſearch of information about the manageme of cattle and the improvement of wools, a publiſhed an intereſting treatiſe on the ſubje He died 1796.

FLASSANS, Turaudet de, a Provençal p of the 14th century. He wrote a poem cal "leſſons to avoid the treacheries of love," which he was rewarded by de Ponteves, wit piece of land.

FLATMAN, Thomas, a poet, born in derſgate-ſtreet, London, 1633, and educ at Wincheſter and New college, Oxford.

was barrister of the Inner Temple, but never followed the law. He wrote several light poems, one of which, on the death of lord Ossory, was read by the father, the duke of Ormond, with such gratification, that he sent the author a mourning ring, with a diamond in it, worth 100l. He died in Fleet-street, London, 1688. He was an indifferent poet; but, says Granger, succeeded better as a painter, as one of his heads is worth a ream of his Pindarics.

FLAVEL, John, a divine, born in Worcestershire, and educated at University college, Oxford. He was ejected from Dartmouth, in 1662, for nonconformity, and retired to Hudscott, near South Molton. He returned to his living on the indulgence granted by Charles II. and died there 1692. He wrote "navigation and husbandry spiritualized," &c.

FLECHIER, Esprit, a French prelate, born 1632, near Avignon. He distinguished himself as a popular preacher, and as an elegant scholar, by his poetical description of a carousal in pure latinity. His funeral orations were much admired, especially that on Turenne, and that on Montausier. In 1679 he wrote his "history of Theodosius the Great," and in 1685 he was promoted to the see of Lavaur, on which occasion the king said, 'Be not surprized I have so long delayed to reward your merit; I was afraid of losing the pleasure of hearing your discourses.' In 1687 he was translated to Nismes, where he drew many of the protestants to the catholic faith. In the famine of 1709 his benevolence was unbounded. This most exemplary man died 1710, lamented, says d'Alembert, by the catholics, and regretted by the protestants. His works are œuvres melées—panegyric of saints—funeral orations—sermons, 3 vols. 12mo.—the history of Theodosius—Gratiani de casibus illustr. vir.—the life of Ximenes, 4to.—letters, 2 vols. 12mo.—the life of cardinal Commendon, 4to. —posthumous works.

FLECKNOE, Richard, an English poet, formerly, it is said, a jesuit. At the revolution, when Dryden was dismissed as being a catholic, from the office of laureat, Flecknoe was appointed, which so exasperated the bard, that he vented his indignation in a severe poem called, from his humble antagonist, Mac Flecknoe. He wrote some plays, one only of which was acted. His "damoiselles a-la-mode," and his "love's kingdom," were both hissed off the stage. He wrote besides, enigmas, epigrams, &c. The time of his death is unknown.

FLEETWOOD, William, an English lawyer. He was educated at Oxford, and at the Middle Temple. He was recorder of London 1569, and showed himself very active against masshouses and popish priests. He died 1593. He was an eloquent orator, says Wood, and his skill as a politician recommended him much to the notice of Leicester. He published an oration at Guildhall before the lord mayor—a table to Plowden's reports—the office of a justice of the peace—annalium tam regum Edwardi V. Richardi III. Henrici VII. quam Henrici VIII.

FLEETWOOD, William, an English prelate, born in the tower of London 1656. He was educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge, and was chaplain to king William, and afterwards obtained a fellowship at Eton, and the rectory of St. Austin's, London. In 1706, without any solicitation, he was nominated to the see of St. Asaph, and in 1714 was translated to Ely. He died at Tottenham, in Middlesex, where he had retired for change of air, 1723. His only son Charles, rector of Cottenham, Cambridgeshire, did not long survive him. Bishop Fleetwood's character was respectable: he made an exemplary life, and a benevolent heart, the noblest ornaments of his persuasive eloquence in the pulpit. His sermons and divinity tracts were widely circulated; but the firmness of his opinions drew upon him the censure of the house of commons. His preface to his sermons, on the deaths of Mary, of the duke of Gloucester, and of William, and on the accession of Anne, gave such offence to the ministry that the book was burned publicly, 1712; but it was more universally read, and even appeared in the Spectator, No. 384. Besides these, Fleetwood published Inscriptionum antiquarum sylloge, 8vo.—a translation of Jurieu's method of devotion—an essay on miracles, 8vo.—the reasonable communicant—sixteen practical discourses on the relative duties of parents, &c. 2 vols. 8vo.—the thirteenth of Romans vindicated—the judgment of the church of England in lay baptism and dissenters' baptism, &c.

FLEMING, Robert, was educated at St. Andrew's, and at the age of 33 became pastor of a congregation, from which he was ejected after the restoration. He then settled at Rotterdam, as minister of the Scots congregation there, and died 1694. His "fulfilling of the scriptures," has been a popular work.

FLEMING, Robert, son of the preceding, was a native of Scotland, and educated at Leyden and Utrecht. He settled at Leyden, and then removed to Amsterdam, from whence he came to London, and officiated at the Scotch church, Lothbury, and at Salters' hall. He wrote sermons—tracts—christology, 3 vols. 8vo.—the rise and fall of popery, &c. He died 1716.

FLEMING, Caleb, of Nottingham, pastor of a dissenting congregation in London, wrote "a survey of the search after souls," and other tracts, and in his tenets he was a strict Arian. He died 1773, aged 75.

FLEMMING, or FLEMMYNGE, Richard, of Croston, Yorkshire, was educated at University college, Oxford, and made prebendary of York, 1408. He was, in 1424, bishop of Lincoln, and the pope raised him to York, but the king refused his consent. He died 1431 He was founder of Lincoln college, Oxford, and was a strenuous opposer of Wickliffe's doctrines, which he afterwards as warmly embraced.

FLETCHER, Dr. Richard, father of the dramatic poet, was born in Kent, and educated at Benet college, Cambridge. He was dean of Peterborough 1583, and three years after attended the Scotch Mary's execution, where he diſplayed more zeal than good ſenſe in preſſing that unfortunate queen to turn proteſtant. In 1589 he was advanced to the ſee of Briſtol, in 1592 tranſlated to Worceſter, and 1594 to London. After the death of his wife he took a ſecond, about 1595, and this ſo offended Elizabeth, who was averſe to the marriage of the clergy, that ſhe cauſed Whitgift to ſuſpend him. Though reſtored to favor, the queen's conduct ſat heavily upon him, and he died ſuddenly in his chair 1596. As he was fond of tobacco, then little known, Camden imputes his death to an immoderate uſe of it.

FLETCHER, Giles, brother to the biſhop, was educated at Eton and King's college, Cambridge. He was employed by Elizabeth, as commiſſioner in Scotland, Germany, and the Low Countries, and in 1588 went as ambaſſador to Ruſſia, to reconcile the Ruſſians to the Engliſh commerce. He died 1610. He wrote a curious account of the Ruſſian commonwealth, with a deſcription of the faſhions and manners of the people, 1590, 8vo.

FLETCHER, John, a dramatic writer, ſon of the biſhop of London, was born in Northamptonſhire 1576. He was educated at Cambridge, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a writer of plays conjointly with Beaumont. He alſo aſſiſted Ben Jonſon in his "widow," and after Beaumont's death, he conſulted Shirley in the plots of his pieces. The reſpective ſhare of theſe joint authors is not known, though it is ſaid that Beaumont's judgment corrected the redundancies of Fletcher's wit. Once at a tavern the brother bards debated upon the plot of a tragedy, and Fletcher being overheard by the waiter to ſay that he would kill the king, he and his friend were both ſeized, till explanations proved to the magiſtrate that the intended murder was the innocent ſacrifice of a theatrical hero. Fletcher died of the plague in London 1625. He was ranked with Jonſon and Shakeſpeare, in the great triumvirate of chief dramatic authors, and Dryden ſays that his plays, amounting to about 50, poſſeſſed gaiety in the comic parts, and pathos in the ſerious characters.

FLETCHER, Phinehas, ſon of Giles Fletcher, was educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge. He was miniſter of Hilgay in Norfolk, 1621, and died there about 1650. He is author of "purple iſland," a poem, containing an allegorical deſcription of man, very popular at the time of its publication. He wrote beſides, "piſcatory eclogues," &c.

FLETCHER, Giles, brother of Phinehas, was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, and died at his living of Alderton, Suffolk, 1623, equally beloved, ſays Wood, of the muſes and graces. His "Chriſt's victory," firſt publiſhed 1610, is a poem of ſome merit, as the perſonifications are very natural, and the language dignified.

FLETCHER, Andrew, of Saltoun, Scotland, was educated under Burnet, and when in parliament he ſo ſtrongly oppoſed the court, that he was obliged to fly to Holland. He landed in the weſt of England with Monmouth 1685, and afterwards fought againſt the Turks in the Hungarian army. The revolution reſtored him to his country, and he was a commiſſioner to ſettle the government of Scotland. He died in London 1716. His works are all on political ſubjects.

FLETCHER, Abraham, of Little Broughton, Cumberland, was brought up under his father as a tobacco pipe manufacturer. He raiſed himſelf to public notice, and, though ſelf-taught, became at 30 a teacher of mathematics; and as aſtrologer and univerſal doctor, he acquired a fortune of 3000l. His "univerſal meaſurer," 8vo. is a work of great merit, and exhibits his perfect knowledge of mathematics. He died 1793, aged 79.

FLEURY, Claude, a French advocate, born at Paris 1640. He in 1672 became preceptor to the princeſs of Conti, and in 1680 to the count de Vermandois, and then to the dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berri, and for his ſervices was made abbot of Locdieu, which he reſigned for the rich priory of Angenteuil. In 1716 he was confeſſor to Lewis XV. and died 1723, aged 82. His works are numerous, the chief of which are, manners of the Iſraelites—manners of the Chriſtians—eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, in 13 vols. 4to. a valuable book—inſtitution of eccleſiaſtical law, &c.

FLEURY, André Hercule de, a cardinal, born in Languedoc 1653, and educated at Paris. He roſe to be biſhop of Frejus, and was appointed by Lewis XIV. preceptor to his grandſon, after Boſſuet and Fenelon. In 1726 he was made cardinal and prime miniſter, though aged 70, and ſo active was his conduct, that the kingdom of France proſpered greatly under his adminiſtration, the ſucceſſion war was glorioufly finiſhed, and Lorraine added to the French dominions. His economy, however, ruined the marine, and in the war of 1740 his plans were not crowned with victory, ſo that it is ſaid, he died with a heart broken with grief, 1743. Without the pride of Richelieu, and the avarice of Mazarin, he poſſeſſed great abilities, and though the misfortunes of the laſt war were attributed to him, he rather deſerved gratitude for his management of the finances, and more for the benevolence of his heart.

FLOOD, Henry, ſon of the chief juſtice of the king's bench in Ireland, was educated at Dublin univerſity, and at Oxford. He ſat in the Iriſh houſe of commons, and acquired great popularity by his eloquence, but his conſequence ceaſed when he obtained a ſeat among the Engliſh commons, ſo that his addreſſes on public occaſions were received with little intereſt. He died 1791. He wrote a Pindaric ode to fame—a poem on the death of Frederic prince prince of Wales, found in the Oxford collection, &c.

Florian, John Peter Claris de, of Languedoc, was educated under the care of Voltaire, by whose influence he became page to the duke of Penthievre. Though honored by his patron, and promoted in the army, he preferred literary reputation to all other objects, and published in 1782 his first work Galathée, a romance. His wrote afterwards Theatre, Voltaire et le ferf de Jura, which obtained the prize of the French academy—Estelle—Numa Pompilius, &c. During the revolution his sentiments in Numa drew upon him the resentment of Robespierre, but he was liberated, and died at Seaux, 1794, aged 39. He began during his confinement a poem on William Tell, never completed. He wrote also Ebrahim, a poem, &c.

Florio, John, the resolute, was born in London in the reign of Henry VIII. His parents who were descended from the Florii of Tuscany, had fled from the persecutions of popery, and settled in England. Florio taught Italian and French at Oxford, and was admitted at Magdalen college. He was tutor in those languages to prince Henry, and to Anne the queen of James I. to whom he was clerk of the closet. He died of the plague at Fulham 1625, aged 80. His principal works are, "first fruits and second fruits," containing proverbs and witty sentences—garden of recreation—a translation of Montaigne's essays—and an Italian and English dictionary, fol. 1597, a work of merit.

Floris, Francis, of Antwerp, was like his father a sculptor till the age of 20, and then he studied painting, and acquired celebrity and opulence. He worked seven hours each day, and devoted the rest of the time to drinking. He died 1570, aged 50. He was called the Raphael of Flanders.

Floyer, sir John, of Hinters, Staffordshire, was educated at Queen's college, Oxford. He settled as a physician at Lichfield and was knighted. He wrote the touchstone of medicines, 2 vols. 8vo.—the virtues of cold water, 8vo, and died 1720, aged 71.

Fludd, Robert, an English philosopher, born at Milgate, Kent, 1574. He was of St. John's college, Oxford, and travelled in France, Spain, Italy, and Germany, to improve himself. He took his degrees in medicine 1605; and settled in London. He was a voluminous writer, chiefly on the powers and wonders of Alchymy, and the Rosicrucian doctrines. His works are in Latin, and written in an obscure and mysterious language. They amount to about 20.

Foglieta, or Folieta, Uberto, a Genoese, banished from his country on account of the freedom of his writings. Cardinal d'Este, at Rome, became his patron; and he died there 1581, aged 63. He wrote historia Genuensium, 12 libr. fol.—de causis magnitudinis Turcarum imperii—della republica di Genoa, 8vo. &c.

Fohi, first king of China, and founder of the monarchy about 20 years after the deluge, removed the seat of empire from Xen Si, to Chin Cheu, and invented instruments of music, and established proper laws respecting marriage; instead of the promiscuous intercourse of the sexes. It is said that he reigned 115 years, but fable is strongly intermixed with his history.

Foix, Odel de, a French general, wounded under Lewis XII. at the battle of Ravenna 1512, and appointed governor of Milan by Francis I. The success of Colonna drove him from Milan, Pavia, Lodi, Parma, and Placentia, and after the unfortunate battle of Bicoque he retired to Guienne 1522. In 1528 he re-entered Italy, took Pavia, and boldly besieged Naples, before which he died.

Folard, Charles, a French officer, born at Avignon 1669. His genius was roused by the reading of Cæsar's commentaries, and at the age of 16 he became a soldier. His father confined him in a monastery, but he escaped, and became aid de-camp to Vendome in Italy, 1702, who entrusted him with part of his forces. In 1705 he was wounded at the battle of Cassano, and in consequence lost the use of his left hand. In 1706 he defended Modena against Eugene, by whom he was taken prisoner at the battle of Blenheim. In 1714 he assisted in the defence of Malta against the Turks, and afterwards went in to the service of Charles XII. of Sweden, and was present at his death, at the siege of Frederickshall 1718. On his return to France he served under the duke of Berwick, and died at Avignon 1752, aged 83. He wrote some valuable commentaries on Polybius, in 6 vols. 4to.—a book of new discoveries in war—a treatise concerning the defence of places.

Folengo, Theophilus, fled from Bologna, and for some time was in the military profession, which he quitted for the society of the Benedictines in St. Euphemia monastery. He died 1544, aged 51. The best known of his works are "opus macaronicum," a popular work—orlandino, and chaos del triperuno, two licentious poems—on the three ages of man, &c.

Folkes, Martin, was born at Westminster 1690, and was of the royal society, London, and became its president 1741. He contributed much to the philosophical transactions, and was a great connoisseur of coins. He died in London 1754. He wrote a 4to volume on English silver coin, from the conquest to his own time.

Fonseca, Peter, a Portuguese writer, author of a system of metaphysics in 4 vols. folio. He died 1559.

Font, Joseph de la, a French comic writer, author of five comedies and some operas. He died 1725, aged 39, hurried to his grave by his intemperance.

FONTAINE, John de la, a celebrated French poet, born at Chateau-Thierry, 1621. He was admitted at 19 among the fathers of the oratory, whom he ſoon left, but he diſplayed no genius for poetry till the age of 22, when the accidental hearing of Malherbe's odes on the aſſaſſination of Henry roufed his powers into a flame. He read the beſt poets of Greece, of Italy, and of his country, and in the writings of Plato and Plutarch, collected all that morality which has enriched his fables. He married to pleaſe his parents, but though he had ſhown ſuch partialities to his wife as to entruſt her in confidence with his compoſitions, he left her ſoon with indifference to follow his patroneſs the ducheſs of Bouillon to Paris. Here he became gentleman to Henrietta of England, after whoſe death he was received into the houſe of the witty madam de la Sabliere, who jocoſely obſerved in parting with her houſehold, ſhe kept only three animals, her dog, her cat, and her la Fontaine. In the company of this learned lady he continued about 20 years, not, however, without paying annually formal viſits to his neglected wife, and upon the death of his patroneſs he refuſed invitations to ſettle in England. He was attacked by a ſevere illneſs in 1692, and then began to think of death and of religion. The prieſt who attended him reminded him that his tales had an evil tendency, and were frequent'y licentious, and hoſtile to good morals, and la Fontaine promiſed amendment. Though not a libertine he was indifferent to religious truths, and he informed the prieſt with great compoſure that he had the new teſtament which he thought a tolerable good book. He died 1695, and it is ſaid he was found with an hair ſhirt on, a proof of ſincere repentance according to ſome. In his character la Fontaine was a very abſent man, who, in the indulgence of his reveries, would often ſay the moſt unbecoming things, and do the moſt incoherent actions. In conſequence of his merit, it is ſaid the intendant forbad taxes to be levied on his family, an honorable mark of reſpect paid to genius. He wrote beſides " tales,"—fables—comedies—amours de Pſyche, a romance—letters, &c.

FONTAINE, Nicholas, ſon of a ſcrivener, was admitted at the age of 20 among the ſociety of port royal. In 1664 he was confined for four years in the baſtille, and at laſt finally ſettled at Melun where he died 1709, aged 84. He wrote " lives of the ſaints of the old teſtament," 4 vols. 8vo.—lives of ſaints in general, 4 vols. 8vo.—the figurative language of the bible, 4to—memoirs of the ſolitaries of Port-Royal, 2 vols. 12mo.—Chryſoſtom's homilies on St. Paul's epiſtles, tranſlated 7 vols. 8vo.

FONTAINES, Peter Francis Guyot des, a French critic, born at Rouen 1685. For ſome time a prieſt, he became a man of wit, and in 1724, he was entruſted by Bignon with the care of the " journal des ſavans." The ſeverity of his cenſures drew upon him the accuſation of an abominable crime, but, after ſome confinement, his character was cleared up. In 1731, he began the " nouveliſte du Parnaſſe, ou reflections ſur les ouvrages nouveaux," of which he wrote 2 vols, till the work was ſupreſſed for the ſeverity of its contents. In 1735, he began " obſervations ſur les ecrits modernes," which, after 33 vols. were completed, was alſo ſuppreſſed 1743. The next year another periodical paper, " jugemens ſur les ouvrages nouveaux," was undertaken; but after 11 vols. had appeared, death ſtopped the labors of the critic 1745. He publiſhed tranſlations of Virgil, &c. beſides thoſe of Pope, Swift, Fielding and others.

FONTANA, Dominico, an architect and mechanic, born at Milan 1543. His chief work was the ſetting up of the obeliſk, in front of St. Peter's, which had been buried for many years, and conſidered as an impracticable thing by all other mechanics. In 1592, he removed to Naples as an architect to the king, and died there 1607.

FONTANGES, Marie Angelique, ducheſs of, ſucceſſor to de Monteſpan in the good graces of Louis XIV., was beautiful as an angel, but ſilly as a gooſe, ſays abbé Choiſi. She died 1681, aged only 20.

FONTE-MODERATA, a Venetian lady, born 1555. Though placed in a monaſtery, ſhe married, and, after 20 years of conjugal happineſs, died in childbed 1592. Her memory was ſo retentive that ſhe could repeat verbatim a diſcourſe when only once heard. She wrote a poem called " il Floridoro," and another on the paſſion and reſurrection of Chriſt, beſides " dei meriti delle donne," in which ſhe maintains that the female ſex is not inferior in underſtanding to the male.

FONTENAY, John Baptiſt Blain de, a French painter, born at Caen 1654. His fruits and flowers are very fine, and the inſects on them have the appearance of real life. He was patronized by Louis XIV., who granted him a penſion. He died at Paris 1715.

FONTENELLE, Bernard le Bovier de, ſon of an advocate in the parliament of Rouen, by a ſiſter of Corneille, was born at Rouen 1657. Though ſo weak at his birth that his ſurviving was unexpected, he attained the age of 100. He died 1757. Before he reached his 20th year he had written a great part of his Bellerophon, a tragic opera. He did not, however, ſhine as a dramatic writer equal to his uncle Corneille, but in his other pieces he exhibits great powers, delicacy of wit, and profoundneſs of thought, ſo that Voltaire has obſerved that he was the moſt univerſal genius which the age of Louis XIV. produced. His " plurality of worlds " is a moſt faſcinating performance, in which he introduces a lady conveying the ſublimer truths of philoſophy in a dialogue, pleaſing, lively, and refined. As secretary to the academy of sciences, in which he continued more than 40 years, he devoted himself to the "history" of that learned body, and introduced elegance of language into the most abstruse parts of science. The "eloges" delivered on deceased members are perused with particular delight, and his apology for Descartes' virtues, though in favor of an exploded system, must be read with interest. No man more than Fontenelle deserved and enjoyed the respect and confidence of his contemporaries. In his temper he was mild and affable, and with the feelings of a true christian he observed that a man should be sparing in superfluities to himself, that he may supply necessities to others. Though originally poor, he acquired, by commendable economy, an independent fortune; but not despising the rest of the world for his superiority of mental talents, he said that men are foolish and wicked, but such as they are we must live among them. He wrote, besides the works already mentioned, pastoral poems—history of the French theatre to Corneille—Reflections on theatrical poetry, particularly tragedy, a judicious and valuable work—elements of geometry—of infinities—a tragedy, and six comedies—Endymion—moral discourses—the history of oracles—dialogues of the dead, &c.

Fontius, Bartholomew, of Florence, was librarian to Matthew Corvinus king of Hungary at Buda, and died 1513, aged 68. He wrote a commentary on Persius, and orations.

Foote, Samuel, a dramatic writer, called the English Aristophanes, was born at Truro, Cornwall, 1722. He was at Worcester college, Oxford, and then removed to the temple, but the law was too dry a pursuit for his volatile temper, and he went on the stage. He appeared first in Othello, but his success in performing the character of other writers did not please him, and he commenced author and actor in the Hay-market, where in 1747, he first appeared before the public in "the diversions of the morning." It was at first opposed by the Westminster justices, as representing characters in real life, but was altered to "Mr. Foote's giving tea to his friends," and for upwards of 40 mornings drew crouded audiences. The next year presented "an auction of pictures" which met with equal approbation, though it reflected on the popular characters of the day. From 1752 to 1761 his success continued uninterrupted, and the little theatre Haymarket was now considered as the regular summer theatre, after the close of the other two. In 1766, he, while at lord Mexborough's, broke his leg by a fall from his horse, and suffered an amputation, but the accident so interested the duke of York who was present, that a patent was obtained that year for the little theatre. In 1776, his attempt to introduce on the stage the duchess of Kingston, brought upon him the malicious accusation of unnatural practices. Though acquitted of this foul charge, yet the imputation weakened his constitution, and brought on a paralytic fit. He recovered, but the following year as he proceeded to France, he was taken ill, and died a few hours after at Dover, 1777. In his private character Foote was respectable, and the wit and humor of his conversation were very powerful. Dr. Johnson, as Boswell relates, met him for the first time at Fitzherbert's. Having no good opinion of the fellow, says he, I was resolved not to be pleased, and it is very difficult to please a man against his will. I went on eating my dinner, pretty sullenly affecting not to mind him, but the dog was so very comical, that I was obliged to lay down my knife and fork, throw myself back in my chair, and fairly laugh it out. Sir, he was irresistible. His dramas are 20 in number, mostly built on temporary topics, and full of personalities. He borrowed liberally from Moliere, but made all his own by his own peculiar powers of humor. His life has been published with anecdotes by Cooke.

Foppens, John Francis, professor of divinity at Louvain, edited Miræus' opera historica diplomatica, and compiled bibliotheca Belgica, 2 vols. 4to. &c. and died 1761, aged 72.

Forbes, Patrick, was born in Aberdeenshire 1564. He was educated at Aberdeen and St. Andrew's, and in 1618, raised to the see of Aberdeen. He died 1635, aged 71. His commentary on the Revelations appeared London 1613. He was a great benefactor to Aberdeen university.

Forbes, John, son of the preceding, was bishop of Aberdeen. He was expelled from the divinity professorship by the covenanters, and after two years' residence in Holland, he returned and ended his days at his estate at Corse 1648. His works, theological and historical, were published at Amsterdam, 2 vols. fol. 1703.

Forbes, William, bishop of Edinburgh, was born at Aberdeen 1585, and educated there. After studying at Leyden, and in Germany, he came to England, and declined the Hebrew professorship at Oxford. On the foundation of the see of Edinburgh by Charles I., Dr. Forbes was placed by the monarch to fill it, but he enjoyed his dignity only three months, and died 1634. He was a man of extensive learning, moderate in his opinions, and pacific in his temper, as his treatise to diminish controversies, fully proves.

Forbes, Duncan, was born at Culloden 1685, and studied at Edinburgh, Utrecht, and Paris, and on his return to Scotland 1710, practised as an advocate, and in 1725 he was made lord advocate, and in 1742, raised to be lord president of the court of sessions. In the rebellion of 1745, he opposed the pretender, but the refusal of government to refund what he had lost by his support of the royal cause, proved so disagreeable to his feelings, that it produced a fever of which he died 1747, aged 62. He wrote thoughts on religion,—a letter to a bishop on Hutchinson's writings, writings,—reflections on incredulity, 2 vols. 12mo.

FORBIN, Claude Chevalier de, a French naval officer, chief admiral to the king of Siam in the Eaſt Indies. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in Europe, on the coaſt of Spain, and in the ſervice of Lewis XIV. Though favored, he was neglected by the miniſters, and therefore he retired in diſcontent from the ſervice 1710. He died 1733, aged 77. His maxims to perſons in the ſea ſervice, were two, never to interfere with any thing not belonging to their employment, and to pay a blind obedience to the orders they received, however repugnant to their private opinions.

FORBONNAIS, Francis Veron de, inſpector general of the manufactures of France, was born at Mans 1722, and died at Paris 1800. He was well acquainted with commerce, and the real reſources of a kingdom, and he publiſhed various intelligent tracts on ſubjects of finance, politics, &c.

FORCE, Charlotte Roſe de Caumont de la, a French poeteſs, who died 1724, aged 70. Her caſtle in Spain, a poem—her ſecret hiſtory of Burgundy, a romance, &c. poſſeſs merit.

FORCE, James duke de la, ſon of Francis, lord of la Force, who, with his eldeſt ſon Arnaud, was murdered in his bed, on the night of St. Bartholomew. He was then nine years old, and was between his father and his brother in the bed, but being unperceived by the aſſaſſins, he eſcaped with his life, a circumſtance which Voltaire has recorded in the 2d canto of his Henriade. He fought under Henry IV. and eſpouſed the ſide of the proteſtants, againſt Lewis XIII. He made his peace with the king, upon which he was created marſhal of France, a duke, lieutenant general of the army of Piedmont, beſides a preſent of 200,000 crowns. He afterwards took Pignerol, and defeated the Spaniards at Carignan 1630. He died full of glory 1652, aged 89.

FORD, John, a dramatic poet, in the reigns of James, and Charles I. He was of the middle Temple, and wrote 12 plays between 1629, and 1636.

FORDUN, John de, a Scotch hiſtorian, about 1377, who wrote a hiſtory of his country called Scoti-Chronicon, a curious but not accurate performance.

FORDYCE, David, of Aberdeen, was educated there, and became profeſſor of moral philoſophy, in the mariſchal college. He travelled through Europe, and was drowned on his return, in a ſtorm on the coaſt of Holland 1751. He wrote dialogues concerning education, 2 vols. 8vo.—treatiſe of moral philoſophy—Theodorus, a dialogue concerning the art of preaching—the temple of virtue, a dream, &c.

FORDYCE, James, brother to the above, was born at Aberdeen, and educated there. He was miniſter of Brechin, and of Alloa, and in 1762, he removed to Monkwell ſtreet, London. He afterwards ſettled in Hampſhire, and died at Bath 1796, in his 77th year. He is author of ſermons to young women, 2 vols.—addreſs to young men, 2 vols. —addreſſes to the deity.—a ſermon on the eloquence of the pulpit—poems—ſingle ſermons, &c.

FORDYCE, George, nephew of the preceding, was born near Aberdeen, and educated in that univerſity. After ſome reſidence with his uncle, an apothecary at Uppingham, Rutlandſhire, he went to Edinburgh, and to Leyden, where he took his doctor's degree 1758. He ſettled in London, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a lecturer on the materia medica, and the practice of phyſic, and in 1770 he became phyſician to St. Thomas's hoſpital. He was, in 1787, made a fellow of the college of phyſicians ſpeciali gratiâ, an unuſual honor, and he died 1802, aged 66. His works are eſſays on fevers—on digeſtion—elements of the practice of phyſic—elements of agriculture, and vegetation, &c.

FORDYCE, ſir William, a Scotch phyſician, of great repute, who died in London 1792.

FORMEY, John Henry Samuel, of Berlin, miniſter of the French church there, and afterwards profeſſor of philoſophy, and ſecretary to the royal Berlin academy of ſciences. He died 1797, aged 86. He was author of abridgment of eccleſiaſtical hiſtory—hiſtory of philoſophy abridged, both tranſlated into Engliſh—Reſearches on the elements of matter—conſiderations on Cicero's Tuſculanum—the Chriſtian philoſopher—penſées raiſonables—Anti-Emile againſt Rouſſeau, and other works.

FORMOSUS, ſucceeded Stephen V. as pope, 891. He was very unpopular, and after death his body was dragged from his grave by the populace, and thrown into the Tiber.

FORSKAL, Peter, a Swediſh naturaliſt, who ſtudied under Linnæus. He went, in 1761, with Niebuhr to Arabia, and died there 1763, aged 27. He was author of thoughts on civil liberty, 1759, and from his papers Niebuhr publiſhed Icones rerum naturalium, &c. 4to.—deſcriptiones animalium & equæ, &c. 4to. &c.

FORSTER, John, a proteſtant Hebraiſt, born at Augſburg 1495. He was the friend of Luther and Melanchthon, and died 1556. His Hebrew lexicon was publiſhed 1564, folio, Bale, &c.

FORSTER, George, a naturaliſt, who accompanied Cook in his ſecond voyage round the world. He was profeſſor at Caſſel, and afterwards at Wilna and Mayence. He next viſited Paris, to enable himſelf to travel to Thibet; but died in the midſt of his preparations, 1792, aged 39. He wrote a tract on the Engliſh conſtitution—a journal of Cook's ſecond voyage, 2 vols. 4to. which he defended againſt Wales—a philoſophical journey along the Rhine, 2 vols. 8vo.—a journey through England.

FORSTER, Dr. John Reinold, father to the above, ſtudied at Halle, and was miniſter at Dantzic, and after being in Ruſſia came to England, and was tutor in German and French in in Warrington academy. He accompanied Cook in his ſecond voyage, and in 1775, was created LL. D. by the univerſity of Oxford. He loſt his public character in England, for publiſhing, contrary to agreement, an account of the plants diſcovered in his voyage. He died at Halle, in Saxony, 1799. He is author of obſervations made round the world—hiſtory of diſcoveries in the north—treatiſes on the byſſus of the ancients, and other tracts.

Forster, Nathanael, of Plymſtock, Devonſhire, was educated at Plymouth and Eton ſchools, and at Corpus Chriſti, Oxford. He obtained Hethe rectory, Oxfordſhire, and in 1750 was chaplain to Butler, of Durham, who made him his executor. He was, in 1752, chaplain to Herring the primate, and obtained a prebend in Briſtol cathedral, and Rochdale vicarage, Lancaſhire. He died 1757, aged 40. He publiſhed Platonis dialogi quinque, &c. 1745—reflections on the antiquity of Egypt—appendix Liviana,—popery deſtructive of the evidence of chriſtianity, a ſermon—diſſertation on Joſephus' account of our Saviour, &c.

Forstner, Chriſtopher, an Auſtrian lawyer, who died 1667, aged 69. He was engaged in the negociations of the peace of Munſter, and wrote de principatu Tiberii notæ politicæ ad Tacitum—collection of his letters on the peace of Munſter, &c.

Fort, Francis le, of Geneva, ſerved in Holland at the age of 16, and afterwards entered into the army of Peter I. of Ruſſia. He was entruſted, in 1696, with the ſiege of Azof, and diſplayed ſuch abilities that the emperor made him commander of his forces, and prime miniſter. His great genius was employed in new-modelling the army, and improving the affairs of his imperial patron. He died at Moſcow 1699.

Fortescue, ſir John, an Engliſh lawyer, of Wear Gifford, in Devonſhire. He was educated at Exeter college, Oxford, and Lincoln's Inn. In 1441 he was made king's ſerjeant at law, and the next year chief juſtice of the king's bench. His integrity and firmneſs recommended him to Henry VI. by whom his ſalary was raiſed; but his attachment to the houſe of Lancaſter proved the ſource of perſecution. In the firſt parliament of Edward IV. he was attainted of high treaſon, and he followed his maſter to Scotland, where he was nominated chancellor of England. He embarked for Holland in 1463, with Margaret, and employed himſelf in the compoſition of his book "de laudibus legum Angliæ," written for the inſtruction of young prince Edward; but not publiſhed till the reign of Henry VIII. He accompanied the queen back to England; and on the deſperate ſtate of the king's affairs he reconciled himſelf to the reigning monarch by writing an apology for his own conduct. He lived to nearly his 90th year. and was buried in the church of Ebrington, Gloceſterſhire.

He wrote beſides, "the difference between an abſolute and limited monarchy, &c.

Fortiguerra, Nicolas, an Italian prelate and poet, born 1674. He was ſo often diſappointed by Clement XII. who had promiſed him a cardinal's hat, that he fell ill in conſequence, and died 1735, aged 61. He wrote "ricciardetto," a burleſque poem in 36 cantos, in a ſhort time, to prove to ſome friends the eaſe with which he could write in the manner of Arioſto. This poem, though faulty, exhibits ſallies of pleaſantry and ſtrokes of genius. Fortiguerra tranſlated Terence into Italian 1736.

Foscari, Francis, a Venetian, doge 1423. He enlarged the Venetian dominions by the conqueſt of Breſcia, Bergamo, Crema, Ravenna, and other places; but theſe victories coſt ſo dear that the Venetians depoſed their unfortunate leader. His ſon ſhared his diſgrace, and was baniſhed, and the wretched father died two days after his depoſition, 1457, aged 84. The ſon alſo ſoon after died in priſon.

Foscarini, Michael, a Venetian hiſtorian. He continued Nani's hiſtory of Venice, at the public requeſt, and died 1692, aged 64. His work makes the 10th vol. of Venetian hiſtorians. He alſo wrote novels.

Fosse, Charles de la, a French painter, born at Paris 1640. He ſtudied in Italy, and painted the dome of the hotel of Invalids. Lewis XIV. gave him a penſion of 1000 crowns, and he became profeſſor and rector of the academy for painting. He was for ſome time engaged in adorning the duke of Montague's houſe, now the Britiſh Muſeum in London, and received a handſome offer from William, who wiſhed him to ſettle in England; but he declined. He died at Paris 1716.

Fosse, Antony de la, nephew to the above, was born at Paris 1658. He was ſecretary to the marquis de Crequi, and on his death, at the battle of Luzara, he brought back his heart to Paris, and celebrated his fall in poetry. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf chiefly by his tragedies. His Manlius, his beſt play, is conſidered by the French as equal to the tragedies of Corneille; but he is leſs known than he deſerves. He died in the retirement which he loved, 1708, aged 50.

Foster, Samuel, mathematician, born in Northamptonſhire, and educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge. He was elected in 1636, to the profeſſorſhip of aſtronomy in Greſham college. During the civil wars he formed one of the learned men who united for philoſophical purpoſes, afterwards incorporated as the royal ſociety. He applied himſelf to aſtronomy, and conſtructed and improved ſeveral mathematical and aſtronomical inſtruments. He died at Greſham college of a decline, 1652. The chief of his works are "the art of dialling," 4to.—four treatiſes of dialling, 4to.—miſcellanies, or mathematical lucubrations lucubrations — descriptions of several instruments.

FOSTER, James, a dissenting minister, born 1697, at Exeter, where he was educated. He began to preach 1718, but the disputes which prevailed in the West of England, about the trinity, rendered his situation unpleasant, and he removed to Melborne, Somersetshire, and soon after to Ashwick. He published in 1720 his "essay on fundamentals," and his sermon "on the resurrection of Christ;" but his finances were so low, that he determined to learn the trade of glover. He was, however, soon after received as chaplain in the family of Rob. Houlton, esq. and in 1724 succeeded at Barbican, Dr. Gale, a person by whose book on adult immersion he had been persuaded to be baptized. In 1731 he published his defence of the usefulness, truth, &c. of christian revelation against Tindal, and in 1744, after 20 years' service at Barbican, he was chosen pastor of the independents at Pinners' hall. He attended lord Kilmarnock after his trial in 1746, and died in consequence of a paralytic stroke 1753. He wrote besides "tracts on heresy," in a controversy with Dr. Stebbing—4 vols of sermons, 8vo.—2 vols of discourses on natural religion, and social virtue, 4to.

FOSTER, John, was born at Windsor 1731, and educated at Eton college, where under Plumptree and Burton, he distinguished himself as a superior proficient in Greek and Hebrew. In 1748 he was elected to King's college, and afterwards became assistant to Dr. Barnard, whom he succeeded in 1765, as master of Eton college. Though eminent in learning, he was deficient in manners, in temper, and in a perfect knowledge of the world, so necessary for such a situation, so that his authority became unpopular, and he at last resigned. His merits were rewarded by a canonry at Windsor in 1772. He went to the German Spa for the recovery of his health, and died there 1773. He wrote besides a prize dissertation on the doctrines of Epicurus, and the Stoics, Cambridge—an essay on the different nature of accents and quantity, with their use and application in the pronunciation of the English, Latin, and Greek tongues, with the defence of the Greek accentual marks, against Is. Vossius, Dr. Galy, &c. 8vo. 1762, a curious performance.

FOSTER, Michael, a learned judge, born at Marlborough, Wilts. He was educated at Marlborough school, and Exeter college, Oxford, and at the Middle Temple. In 1745 he was made one of the justices of the king's bench, and then knighted. He died 1765, aged 74. He published an examination of the scheme of church power, laid down in bishop Gibson's codex, 1735—report of some proceedings on the commission for the trial of rebels in 1746.

FOTHERGILL, George, D.D. eldest of seven sons, was born 1705, at Lockholme, Westmoreland. He was educated there, and at Kendal school, and Queen's college, Oxford. In 1751 he was head of St. Edmund hall, and vicar of Bramley, Hampshire. He died of an asthma, 1760. He was author of 2 vols. of sermons.

FOTHERGILL, John, an eminent physician, born 1712, at Carr-end, Yorkshire. He was educated at Sedburgh school, Yorkshire, and in 1718 bound to an apothecary at Bradford. He studied under Wilmot at St. Thomas's hospital, and then went to Edinburgh. He afterwards visited Leyden, France, and Germany, and in 1740 settled in London. He was a licentiate of the college of physicians London, and fellow of Edinburgh, and of the royal and antiquarian societies. He rose in fame and practice, so that his business brought him little less than 7000l. per ann. and enabled him to accumulate a property of 80,000l. He died of an obstruction in the bladder, in Harpur street, 1780. He devoted much of his time to natural history, and made a collection of shells and other natural curiosities, sold after his death to Dr. Hunter for 1200l. He formed a botanical garden at Upton in Essex, and liberally endowed a seminary of young quakers at Acworth near Leeds, for the education and clothing of above 300 children. He published some tracts, the best of which is "on the ulcerous sore throat," and was a great patron of learned men. He assisted Sydney Parkinson in his account of his South sea voyage, and at the expence of 2000l. printed a translation of the bible from the Hebrew and Greek original, by Anthony Purver the quaker, 2 vols. fol. 1764, and in 1780 published Percy's key to the new Testament, for the use of his seminary.

FOTHERGILL, Samuel, brother to the preceding, was an eminent preacher among the quakers. He travelled over England, Scotland, Ireland, and North America, to propagate his doctrines, and died 1773.

FOUCAULT, Nicolas Joseph, an antiquary born at Paris 1643. Within six miles of Caen, he discovered in 1704 the antient town of the Viducassians, of which he published an interesting account, with the history of the marbles, coins, inscriptions, &c. He discovered in the abbey of Moissac in Querci a MS. of Lactantius de mortibus persecutorum. He died 1721.

FOUCHER, Simon, of Dijon, died at Paris 1696, aged 52. He was author of a treatise on hygrometers—on the wisdom of the antients—letters on the history and principles of the academic philosophy, 6 vols. &c.

FOUCQUET, Nicolas, was procurator-general of the parliament of Paris, and super-intendant of the finances. His peculation was little calculated to repair the mismanagement of Mazarin, and when he had spent above 150,000l. of the public money in adorning his seat at Vaux, and attempted to rival his master in the affection of la Valliere, his ruin was complete. He was arrested in 1661, and and condemned to perpetual baniſhment. He died 1680, aged 65, in the citadel of Pignerol.

FOUCQUET, Charles Lewis Auguſtus, grandſon of the preceding, known by the name of mareſchal Belliſle, was born 1684. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the ſiege of Liſle, but after the death of Lewis he was confined in the baſtille, till his juſtification recommended him to the court. He was commander in Flanders in the war of 1733, and became the adviſer of cardinal Fleury. In 1741 he was created mareſchal of France, and in 1742 aſſiſted at Frankfort at the election of the emperor Charles VII. Being deſerted by the Pruſſians and Saxons, he effected his eſcape with great difficulty from Prague, but with ſagacious dexterity, ſo that he was created by the emperor member of the Golden Fleece, and a prince of the empire. He was taken priſoner in 1743 at Elbingerode near Hanover, and brought over to England. He afterwards ſerved in Provence, and was made peer of France 1748. He was made prime miniſter 1757, and died four years after, a ſacrifice to his zeal in the ſervice of his country. He died 1761, aged 77. He was a great character, reſpected in private life, and much attached to the glory of his country.

FOUGEROUX, Auguſtus Denys, of Paris, was nephew of Duhamel, and with him examined the quarries of Anjou, Britany, Naples, &c. and every where made valuable obſervations on the various productions of the natural kingdom. He died of an apoplexy 1789. He wrote memoir on the formation of bone — l'art de l'ardoiſier — l'art du tonnellier — l'art de travailler les cuirs dorés, &c.

FOULON, N. a French politician who adviſed the government to recover its credit by a general bankruptcy. He was placed over the finances at the beginning of the revolution, but became one of its firſt victims. He in 1789, was dragged with the greateſt inſult, and in the moſt excruciating manner to Paris, where he was hanged amidſt the acclamations of a ferocious populace.

FOUNTAINE, ſir Andrew, an antiquarian, born at Narford, Norfolk, and educated at Chriſt-church, Oxford. He ſtudied the Anglo-Saxon language, and publiſhed a ſpecimen of his great proficiency in his inſtructor Hickes' theſaurus, under the title of numiſmata Anglo-Saxonica & Anglo-Danica, &c. He was knighted by William, and afterwards travelled through Europe to collect valuable pictures, medals, ſtatues, and inſcriptions. He was the correſpondent of Swift, and he embelliſhed his tale of a tub, with excellent deſigns. Sir Andrew, as a connoiſſeur of medals and antiques, improved his property greatly by collecting for ſome of the largeſt cabinets in the kingdom. He was vice-chamberlain to Caroline, and in 1727 was made warden of the mint, which he held till his death, 1753.

FOUQUIER-TINVILLE, Anthony Quentin, a Frenchman of infamous memory, born near St. Quentin. From a bankrupt, he became the friend of Robeſpierre, and ſo ſanguinary was his conduct, that he was deemed by the tyrant, worthy to be the public accuſer. In this office he diſplayed the moſt vindictive character. The young, the aged, the innocent, were hurried with inſulting indifference to the ſcaffold, and in one inſtance, in four hours, 80 individuals were devoted to immediate death. When one of the gaolers obſerved that a perſon before the tribunal was not the accuſed, Fouquier ſaid with unconcern, that one was as good as the other, and the unhappy victim marched to the guillotine. On another occaſion, under a ſimilar miſtake, he exclaimed, it matters little, to-day is as good as to-morrow, and the wretched priſoner ſuffered death. The fall of Robeſpierre checked not this monſter, on the day of the tyrant's arreſt, he obſerved, on ſigning the condemnation of 42 perſons, that juſtice muſt have her courſe. At laſt puniſhment came, though late, Fouquier appeared before that tribunal where he had exerciſed ſuch bloody tyranny, and on the 7th May 1794, he was guillotined, aged 48.

FOUQUIERES, James, a Flemiſh painter, born at Antwerp 1580. He worked for the elector palatine at Heidelberg, and went to Paris, where he died poor through imprudence 1659. His landſcapes are ſo finely finiſhed as to be ſcarce inferior to Titian's.

FOURCROI, N. a French engineer, who planned the junction of the rivers Scheldt, Moſelle, Sambre, Oiſe, Rhine, and Meuſe, by means of canals. He publiſhed valuable tracts, and died 1791, aged 76.

FOURMONT, Stephen, profeſſor of Arabic and Chineſe at Paris, was born 1683. He had ſo retentive a memory that the moſt difficult paſſages became familiar to him. He was invited by count de Toledo to ſettle in Spain, which he declined. He ſucceeded Galland in 1715, as Arabic profeſſor, and was admitted into the learned ſocieties of Paris, Berlin, and London, and was afterwards ſecretary to the duke of Orleans. He died 1743. His works are "the roots of the Latin tongue in metre"—critical reflections on ancient hiſtory, to the time of Cyrus, 2 vols. 4to.—meditationes Sinicæ, folio —a Chineſe grammar in Latin, folio, &c.

FOURNIER, Peter Simon, a French engraver and letter founder, born at Paris 1712. In 1737 he publiſhed a table of proportions between letters to determine their height. He wrote alſo diſſertations on the riſe and progreſs of the topographical art. His great work is "manuel topographique utile aux gens de lettres," 8vo. 2 vols. He died 1768.

FOWLER, John, born at Briſtol, and educated at Wincheſter and New college, Oxford, went in 1559 to Antwerp and Louvain, where he learned printing, and employed his talents againſt the proteſtants. He was well ſkilled in Greek and Latin, a poet and orator, and a judicious judicious critic. He wrote, as well as printed, books in favor of his religion. He died at Newmark in Germany 1578.

Fowler, Chriſtopher, a puritan, born at Marlborough 1611, and educated at Magdalen college, and Edmund hall, Oxford. He in 1641 declared himſelf a preſbyterian, and drew crowds after him by the oddity of his geſtures and the violence of his appeals in the pulpit. He afterwards was vicar of St. Mary's, Reading, and then fellow of Eton, and an able aſſiſtant to the Berkſhire commiſſioners in the ejection of thoſe then called inſufficient miniſters. He died 1676, conſidered as little better than diſtracted.

Fowler, Edward, an Engliſh prelate, born 1632, at Weſterleigh, Glouceſterſhire. He was educated at the college ſchool, Glouceſter, and Corpus Chriſti college, Oxford. As a puritan he at firſt objected to conformity, but became afterwards one of the greateſt ornaments of the church. He was an able defender of proteſtantiſm, and appears as the ſecond of the London clergy, who refuſed to read king James's declaration for liberty of conſcience, 1688. He was made in 1691, biſhop of Glouceſter. He died at Chelſea 1714, aged 82. He wrote ſermons and various pieces on divinity, the moſt uſeful of which is his "deſign of chriſtianity," often printed.

Fox, Edward, an Engliſh prelate and ſtateſman, born at Durſley, Glouceſterſhire, and educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge, of which he was provoſt 1528. Wolſey engaged him as ambaſſador to Rome with Gardiner, to promote the divorce of the king from Catharine of Arragon. He was afterwards ſent to France and Germany, and in 1535 raiſed to the ſee of Hereford. He promoted the reformation, and if inferior to Cranmer in abilities, he was his ſuperior in dexterity. When in Germany he invited the proteſtant divines to unite themſelves to the doctrines of the church of England. He died in London 1538. He wrote "de verâ differentiâ regiæ poteſtatis et eccleſiaſticæ," &c. tranſlated into Engliſh by lord Strafford. His maxims were that "an honorable peace laſts long, but a diſhonorable peace no longer, than till kings have power to break it; the ſureſt way therefore to peace is a conſtant preparedneſs for war;" and "two things muſt ſupport a government, gold and iron,—gold to reward its friends, and iron to keep under its enemies."

Fox, John, a divine, born at Boſton, Lincolnſhire 1517. He was of Brazen-noſe college, Oxford, and afterwards fellow of Magdalen. In his younger years he publiſhed ſome Latin plays on ſcriptural ſubjects, but afterwards turned his thoughts to divinity, and to the reformation. He read the Greek and Latin fathers, ſtudied Hebrew, and peruſed every work from which he could reap information; but his ſecluſion alarmed his friends and encouraged his enemies. He was therefore accuſed of hereſy in 1545, and with difficulty eſcaped with his life by expulſion from college. In his diſtreſs he was received in the houſe of ſir Thomas Lucy of Warwickſhire, to whoſe children he became tutor. He afterwards came to London ſtill expoſed to the privations of a narrow income. His wants, however, ſays his ſon, were relieved by an unknown ſtranger, who gave him an untold ſum, and bade him hope for better times, which in three days arrived by his being admitted into the ſervice of the ducheſs of Richmond, and made tutor to her nephew lord Surrey's children. He lived at Ryegate in this noble family, and though Gardiner, in the reign of Mary, plotted his ruin, he remained unhurt by the influence of his pupil now duke of Norfolk. At laſt, he eſcaped to the continent, and paſſing through Antwerp and Frankfort he ſettled at Baſil, and there maintained himſelf by correcting the preſs for Oporinus. Here he formed the plan for his great work, and at the end of Mary's reign returned to England. His pupil ſettled a penſion on him, and Cecil obtained for him a prebend in the church of Saliſbury; but though he might have riſen high in preferment by the intereſt of his friends, he refuſed to ſubſcribe to ſome of the canons, and when urged by the primate, he produced a Greek teſtament, adding, to this only will I ſubſcribe. He was greatly afflicted at the ejection of his ſon from Magdalen college by the puritans; but while he exhibited the moſt perfect moderation, he dreaded the evils which party might bring upon the church. He died 1587, aged 70. He left two ſons, Samuel, afterwards fellow of Magdalen college, Oxford, and author of his father's life, and Thomas, fellow of King's college, Cambridge, and phyſician in London. Fox is deſervedly celebrated as the author of the hiſtory of the acts and monuments of the church, called "book of martyrs," publiſhed 1563, in one volume folio, and afterwards improved and enlarged, and publiſhed in a ninth edition 1684, in 3 vols. fol. This work was highly valued by the proteſtants, while the papiſts abuſed it under the name of Fox's golden legend.

Fox, George, the firſt preacher of the ſect called quakers, was born at Drayton in the Clay, Leiceſterſhire, 1624. He was bound by his father, a weaver, to a ſhoemaker and grazier, and the occupation of his youth was chiefly the tending of ſheep. In 1643 he began his wandering life, and after retiring to ſolitude, and frequenting the company of religious perſons, he became a public preacher. He inveighed, with ſullen bitterneſs, againſt the drunkenneſs, the injuſtice, and the vices of the times, he attacked the clergy, and the eſtabliſhed modes of worſhip, and aſſerted that the light of Chriſt, implanted in the human heart, was alone the means of ſalvation. Such doctrines produced perſecution, he was impriſoned at Nottingham in 1649, and during his laborious life, he ſuffered the ſame treatment eight times more, often with great ſeverity. He married married in 1669, Margaret, widow of Thomas Fell, a Welsh judge, nine years older than himself, but as she had to attend to a family, by her former husband, and as his avocations were of a spiritual kind, they did not long live together. In his zeal, Fox visited England, Ireland, and Scotland. He extended his travels to Holland and Germany, to the American colonies, and the West India islands, recommending in his life and conduct the merits of a meek, devout, and inoffensive character. He died in London, 1690. Though illiterate, he wrote much. His journal was printed 1694, his epistles 1698, his doctrinal pieces, about 150 in number, 1706. The name of quakers was first given to him and his followers at Derby, in consequence of the odd contorsions of their body.

Fox, Richard, of Grantham, Lincolnshire, was well educated at Boston school, and Magdalen college, Oxford, from which he removed in consequence of the plague, to Pembroke hall, Cambridge. He was recommended to the notice of Henry of Richmond, who on his accession to the English throne, raised him to the see of Exeter. His abilities were employed in various embassies on the continent, and he was translated to the see of Durham, and then to Winchester. He was a liberal patron of learning, and founded besides several free schools, Corpus Christi college, Oxford. He died 1528.

Fox, Charles James, an eminent statesman, born 13th Jan. 1749. He was the second son of lord Holland, and to high rank he added the more solid advantages of extraordinary natural genius, and strong powers of mind. These promising talents were cherished by his father, he was instructed to think with freedom, and to speak with readiness and with energy, and after a short initiation at Westminster school, he was removed to Eton, where he published the periodical paper called the Spendthrift, in 20 numbers. From Eton he removed to Oxford, and devoted himself so zealously to dramatic literature, that he is said to have read every play in the English language. After making the tour of Europe, he was elected even before he was of age, into parliament for Midhurst, and his first speech was in favor of ministry, against Mr. Wilkes, and the Middlesex election. After sharing the favors of the minister as a lord of the admiralty, and afterwards as a lord of the treasury, he was dismissed from his offices, and had the singular fortune before he reached his 24th year, of being the ablest supporter of the government during one session, and in the next of becoming one of its most eloquent opponents. During the American war he was a regular antagonist of the ministry, and on the removal of lord North he was made secretary of state. The death of lord Rockingham soon dissolved the new ministry, and Mr. Fox, after some time opposing the measures of lord Shelburne, returned to power by his well known coalition with lord North. This event is regarded as a stigma in his political life, as in the ardor of his zeal he had often declared, that he would not trust himself in the same room with lord North, but would employ all his powers to bring him to the scaffold for the flagitiousness of his public life. The memorable India bill brought on the downfall of the coalition, and the elevation of Mr. Pitt to the helm of the state. The French revolution was an event which Fox hailed as the harbinger of freedom, happiness, and prosperity, not only to France, but to neighbouring nations, but he witnessed the fallacy of the conclusion. Deserted by some of his associates, who regarded his systematical opposition as disloyal, he formed the design of withdrawing from his attendance in parliament, except on constitutional occasions, but the measure was censured, even by his warmest supporters. In his addresses at the public meetings at the Crown and Anchor tavern, which were now considered as substitutes for his parliamentary services, he gave offence to the ministry, and in consequence of his speeches there, his name was struck off from the list of the privy counsellors. In 1803, he returned to his parliamentary duty, and on the death of his rival Pitt, in the beginning of 1806, he was drawn from opposition, and by the advice of lord Grenville, placed as secretary of state for foreign affairs, in the number of those most capable of guiding the destinies of the empire in times of the greatest danger and difficulty. In this new situation, he had the opportunity of witnessing the chicane and perfidy of the French government, and in his negociation he experienced how ill calculated for the happiness and independence of Europe, was the political system of that people, whose extravagances and crimes had been once regarded as the ebullitions of freemen. Having lived to feel the disappointment which a generous mind must experience in a diplomatic intercourse conducted on the one part with frankness and sincerity, and on the other with artifice and duplicity, this illustrious statesman fell a prey to the insurmountable attacks of a dropsy. He died at Chiswick-house, 13th September 1806, after undergoing three times in five weeks the painful operation of tapping, and his remains were publicly buried on the 10th October following in Westminster abbey. Of this extraordinary character it must be acknowledged that he was one of the greatest men this country ever produced. As an orator his powers were gigantic, his eloquence irresistible, vehement and sublime. It was a torrent which in its impetuous force hurried along its hearers in spite of all opposition. His mind capacious and intelligent, at one view grasped the whole subject of debate, at one glance he saw the weak and strong parts of his adversary's defence, and with masterly dexterity he combated the most formidable opponent, and improved every advantage which in the field of debate lay exposed to his attacks. If he was less copious, less elegant, gant, and leſs ſententious than Pitt, if he wa deficient in the dazzling and flowery profuſion, in the lively ſallies of imagination of his great maſter Burke, he poſſeſſed the pathos, the forcible argument, the convincing language, the impoſing earneſtneſs which captivated and enchained every hearer. With the moſt retentive memory, he has been known after the lapſe of many hours, when the powers of the mind might grow languid, to anſwer the arguments of various ſpeakers, and with the moſt minute arrangement. His manner, if not graceful, was peculiarly animated and impreſſive, and the fire of his eye was rapid and commanding. His replies always exhibited him as very great, and with all the ardor of genuine oratory, he enlivened the debate, not only with new ideas, but with all the clearneſs of argumentation, and the extenſive information with which his comprehenſive mind was ſtored. In a profound acquaintance with the human character, and a mature knowledge of domeſtic and foreign politics, he was above all others ſupremely happy. In private life he was univerſally beloved. He was the convivial friend, the pleaſing companion, the man of integrity and honor. He poſſeſſed in a high degree the talent which diſtinguiſhes man, and the genius which elevates him, nor was he deficient in a portion of that virtue which riſes ſuperior to both. His faults, as Burke obſerved, though they might tarniſh the luſtre, and ſometimes impede the march, of his abilities, were not formed to extinguiſh the fire of great virtues. In his faults there was no mixture of deceit, of hypocriſy, of pride, of ferocity, or complexional deſpotiſm. As a man of letters, Mr. Fox is highly reſpectable. His letter to the electors of Weſtminſter, paſſed through ſeveral editions. Some copies of his verſes are preſerved, and ſhow great genius, and ſtrong poetic fire. His hiſtory of England from the revolution, to collect materials for which he viſited Paris during the ſhort interval of peace, after the treaty of Amiens, is ſoon to appear before the public.

Fox de Morzillo, Sebaſtian, of Seville, author of tracts de ſtudii philoſophici ratione—de naturâ philoſophorum, &c. He was invited to be tutor to Don Carlos, ſon of Philip III. of Spain, but was unfortunately drowned as he paſſed from Louvain.

Fracastorio, Girolamo, an Italian poet and phyſician born at Verona 1483. Two ſingular things are related of him in his infancy. When born, his lips adhered ſo cloſely together, that the knife of a ſurgeon was neceſſary to ſeparate them, and his mother when ſhe took him up was killed by lightning, and he remained unhurt. He was eminent as an aſtronomer and mathematician, and the friend of Bembo, of Julius Scaliger, who eſteemed him inferior only to Virgil, and other learned men. He died of an apoplexy at Caſi near Verona, 1553, and ſix years after the town of Verona honored his memory with a ſtatue. His chief poem is "Siphilis, or de morbo Gallico;" his medical pieces—de ſympathiâ & antipathiâ—de contagione & contagioſis morbis, &c.

Frachetta, Girolamo, a political writer, of Rovigno. His ſervices procured him enemies, and he retired to Naples, where he vindicated his conduct to the Spaniſh court, and was protected by Benevento viceroy of Naples. He died at Naples in the 17th century. His great work is "Il ſeminario de governi di ſtato & di guerra," which contains about 8000 military and ſtate maxims, highly eſteemed.

Fraguier, Claude Francis, of Pari-, taught belles lettres at Caen for four years, but on his return to Paris he quitted the order of the jeſuits 1694, for literary purſuits. He aſſiſted Bignon in the journal des Sçavans, and undertook a tranſlation of Plato. He expoſed himſelf unfortunately to the cold air of the night, which brought on convulſions in his head, and though he outlived the attack 19 years, he died at laſt of an apoplexy 1728, aged 62. His works conſiſt of Latin poems, with diſſertations concerning Socrates, &c.

Francesca, Peter, of Venice, was eminent in his repreſentation of night pieces and battles. He died 1443.

Francia, Franceſco, of Bologna, was originally a goldſmith, afterwards a graver of medals, and at laſt an eminent painter. His Sebaſtian tied to a tree, was an admirable piece, from which ſucceeding painters drew the improvement of their art. He died about 1518.

Francis, of Aſſiſi in Umbria, abandoned the profeſſion of his father as merchant, and founded one of the four orders of mendicant friars, which was approved and confirmed by Innocent III. 1210. His followers increaſed ſo rapidly, that in 1219 his order conſiſted of 5000 members. He afterward travelled to the Holy Land, to convert the ſultan Meledin, and offered to throw himſelf into the flames to prove the truth of what he preached. He died at Aſſiſi 1226, aged 44, and was canonized by Gregory IX. four years after.

Francis, of Paulo, a Romiſh ſaint, 1416, founder of the Minims. He retired to a cave, where his auſterities drew around him a great number of penitents, who built there a monaſtery. He enjoined perpetual abſtinence from wine, fiſh, and meat, with many bodily mortifications. He was invited to France to cure Lewis XI. by his preſence, but inſtead of curing the monarch, he died at Pleiſis du Parc 1507, aged 91.

Francis Xavier, of Xavier, at the foot of the Pyrenees, taught philoſophy at Paris, and became acquainted with Ignatius Loyola, whom he aſſiſted in the eſtabliſhment of the order of the jeſuits, and with whom and five others he made a vow to labor in the converſion of infidels. He embarked at Liſbon 1541 for Goa, and as the apoſtle of the Indies he preached on the coaſt of Comorin, at Malacca, in the Moluccas, and at Japan; but was cut off by diſeaſe 1552. He wrote five books of epiſtles, Pavia, &c.

Francis, de Sales, of Sales, near Geneva, ſtudied at Paris and Padua, and in his zeal is ſaid to have converted 70,000 proteſtants. In 1612 he was made biſhop of Geneva, and founded the order of the viſitation, eſtabliſhed by Paul V. 1618. He died at Lyons 1622, aged 56.

Francis, of Lorraine, emperor of Germany, was ſon of Leopold of Lorraine. He married in 1736 Maria Thereſa, the daughter of the emperor Charles VI. after whoſe death, 1740, he was aſſociated in the empire by his wife, and after the death of his opponent Charles VII. he was elected emperor 1745 Franciswas a great patron of literature, of the arts, and of commerce. He died ſuddenly at Inſpruck, 1765, aged 58.

Francis I king of France ſon of Charles of Orleans, and Louiſa of Savoy, ſucceeded Lewis XII. 1515. He claimed the Milaneſe as deſcended from duke Valentine his maternal grand father, but his progreſs was ſtopped by the Swiſs, whom he defeated in the dreadful battle of Marignan 1515, after obliging Maximilian Sforza to reſign his power into his hands. After making treaties with the Genoeſe and the pope, Francis in 1516 met Charles V. at Noyon, and ſwore eternal peace. This pledge was obſerved only two days, and Francis, diſſatisfied that his rival had obtained the imperial crown, ſought revenge in war. Though ſucceſsful in Navarre and Flanders, the French were defeated at Bicoque, Cremona and Genoa were taken, Toulon and Marſeilles were beſieged, and Provence was invaded. Francis flew to the relief of his ſuffering provinces, and began the ſiege of Pavia, but was ſoon after defeated, 24th February 1525, in battle, and made priſoner. On this occaſion he wrote to his mother, and declared that all was loſt except his honor. In Madrid, Francis was treated by Charles with ſeverity, and he was reſtored to liberty in 1526, only upon ſigning his renunciation to Naples, the Milaneſe, Genoa, Flanders, and Artois. The peace of Cambray 1529 put an end to the diſputes between the rival ſovereigns. Francis took for his ſecond wife Eleanor the emperor's ſiſter, and agreed to ranſom for a large ſum his two ſons ſtill detained as hoſtages at Madrid. Jealous of the power of his rival, Francis in 1535 ſeized upon Savoy, but at laſt a reconciliation was effected by means of Paul III. 1538. The peace was of ſhort duration, Francis attacked Italy, Rouſſillon, and Luxemburg, but though his general, the duke of Enghien, defeated the imperialiſts at Ceriſoles in 1544, his enemy ſupported by Henry VIII. invaded Picardy and Champagne. The proteſtant princes united their forces againſt the conqueror, ſtopped his career, and peace was reſtored. Francis died at Rambouillet 1547, aged 53. He had in conſequence of his debaucheries contracted the foul diſeaſe, which, after a continuance of nine years of increaſing pains, proved fatal. Greater as a warrior than as a king, his whole reign was diſturbed by a ſpirit of jealouſy, which he cheriſhed to the laſt againſt the power of his rival the emperor, but the protection which he extended to literature, and which procured for him the honorable title of father of letters, has eclipſed the weakneſſes of an adminiſtration too often guided by prejudice, and diſgracefully influenced by miſtreſſes and favorites. He was the founder of the royal college of Paris.

Francis II. ſon of Henry II. and Catherine de Medicis, ſucceeded his father on the throne of France 1559. He had married Mary Stewart of Scotland, and he died after a reign of 17 months, 1560, aged 17. His confidence in the Guiſes proved the ſource of much miſery to France.

Francis, duke of Alencon, Anjou, and Berri, ſon of Henry II. and brother of the preceding, placed himſelf at the head of the malcontents when his brother Henry III. aſcended the throne. He was ſeized by order of his mother Catherine de Medicis, but his brother reſtored him to liberty. He was at laſt crowned 1582, duke of Brabant, but for his oppreſſive conduct was obliged to fly to France for ſafety. He died there 1584, aged 29. He is known in Engliſh hiſtory as the ſuitor of queen Elizabeth in 1581, who flattered his vanity, but with unbecoming coquetry rejected his addreſſes, after ſhe had given him a ring as a pledge of her affection.

Francis, of Bourbon, was taken priſoner at Pavia with Francis I. but eſcaped. He died 1545, aged 55.

Francis de Bourbon, count Enghien, in the ſervice of Francis I. took Nice, and obtained the victory of Ceriſoles 1544. He was killed 1545, aged 27.

Francis de Bourbon, duke of Montpenſier, behaved with valor at the ſiege of Rouen, and at the battles of Jarnac and of Montcontour 1572. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf at Arques and Ivri, and died at Liſieux 1592, aged 50.

Francis, of Lorraine, duke of Guiſe, and of Aumale, was born 1519. His defence of Metz in 1553, againſt the arms of Charles V. is deſervedly commended. The next year he diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the battle of Renti, in which he defeated the Germans, and after ſome glorious campaigns in Italy and Flanders, he was named lieutenant-general. His next exploit was againſt Calais, which he took after a ſiege of eight days from the Engliſh, who had poſſeſſed it for 210 years, and this was followed by the fall of Thionville. He governed the kingdom under Henry II. and Francis II. and received from the parliament the glorious title of the ſaviour of his country. After the death of Francis II. he ſupported the cauſe of the catholics, and took Rouen and Bourges, and defeated his enemies at Dreux 1562. Preparing to beſiege Orleans, the chief town of the proteſtants, he was aſſaſſinated by a piſtol ſhot, by de Méré, one of the Huguenots 1563.

Francis de Borgia, St. duke of Candia, and viceroy of Catalonia, was grandson of Alexander VI. and after filling high offices in the ſtate, he embraced the eccleſiaſtical profeſſion. He refuſed the rank of cardinal, and died at Rome, 1572, aged 62. He was author of ſome pious tracts in Spaniſh.

FRANCIS, Lucas, of Mechlin, was painter to the kings of Spain and France. His portraits and hiſtorical pieces poſſeſſed merit. He died 1643, aged 69. His ſon Lucas, called the Young, acquired celebrity as an artiſt. He died 1654, aged 48.

FRANCIS ROMAIN, a Dominican of Ghent. He finiſhed the bridge of Maeſtricht, and afterwards was engaged by Lewis XIV. in the completion of the Pont-Royal at Paris, left imperfect by Gabriel. He was liberally rewarded by the French monarch, and died at Paris 1735, aged 89.

FRANCIS, James Charles, an eminent French engraver, liberally patroniſed at Paris. His merits raiſed him enemies, which, it is ſaid, haſtened his death. He died 1769, aged 52. He publiſhed Recueil des chateaux de Lorraine—Corps-de-Garde after Venloo, &c.

FRANCIS, Philip, D.D. ſon of an Iriſh dean, is known by his excellent tranſlations of Horace and Demoſthenes. He wrote alſo Eugenia and Conſtantia, two tragedies not very ſucceſsful, and for his ſervices as a political writer, it is ſaid, he was rewarded by government with the rectory of Barrow, Suffolk, and the chaplainſhip of Chelſea college. He died at Bath 1773.

FRANCIUS, Peter, of Amſterdam, after travelling over France and England, became 1674 profeſſor of rhetoric and hiſtory at Amſterdam. He wrote orationes—ſpecimen eloquentiæ exterioris—beſides poems in Greek and Latin, of conſiderable merit. He died 1704.

FRANCK, George, of Naumburgh, at the age of 18 received the poetic crown, for his Latin, Greek, German, and Hebrew poetry. He became profeſſor of medicine at Heidelberg and Wittemberg, and died 1704, aged 61. He is author of Flora Francica, 12mo. —ſatyræ medicæ, 4to.—epiſtolæ, &c.

FRANCK, Auguſtus Herman, of Lubeck, profeſſor of oriental languages, and of divinity at Halle. He founded at Halle an orphan-houſe, which, in 1727, contained 2196 children, and more than 130 preceptors. He alſo promoted the eſtabliſhment of a miſſion to propagate the goſpel on the coaſt of Malabar. He wrote methodus ſtudii theologici—introductio ad lectionem prophetarum—commentaria de ſcopo veteris & novi teſt.—book of devotions, &c. He died 1727, aged 64.

FRANCK, or FRANCKEN, Franciſcus, a Flemiſh painter, died 1616, aged 72. He executed his hiſtorical pieces from the ſcriptures, ſome of which poſſeſs great merit.

FRANCK, Franciſcus, ſon to the above, called Young Francis, died 1642, aged 62. His idolatry of Solomon, in the Notre Dame of Antwerp, is his beſt piece.

FRANCKENSTEIN, Chriſtian Godfrey, a native of Leipſic, diſtinguiſhed as an advocate. He wrote the life of Chriſtina of Sweden—hiſtory of the 16th and 17th centuries—and a continuation of Puffendorf's introduction to hiſtory, and died 1717, aged 56. His ſon James wrote de collatione honorum, &c. and died 1733.

FRANCO, Nicolo, a ſatiriſt, born at Benevento 1510. He was condemned to death at Rome 1569, for ſevere ſatires on ſome illuſtrious perſons of that city; but it is unknown whether he ſuffered.

FRANCOIS, Abbé Laurent, an able opponent of the French philoſophers, who died 1782, aged 84. His works were a book of geography—proofs of the religion of Jeſus Chriſt, 4 vols. 12mo.—defence of religion, 4 vols. 12mo.—examination of the catechiſm of an honeſt man—of the facts on which chriſtianity is founded, 3 vols. 12mo. &c.

FRANCOIS, Simon, a portrait painter, of Tours. He was ſelf-taught, and acquired great reputation. He died 1671, aged 65.

FRANCOWITZ, Matthias, the pupil of Luther and Melancthon, was born at Albano in Illyria 1520, in conſequence of which he aſſumed the name of Flaccus Illyricus. He taught Greek and Latin at Wittemberg privately, and was afterwards public profeſſor. He oppoſed the interim of Charles V., and was concerned in the drawing up of the centuries of Magdeburg. He died 1575. His beſt work is a key to the holy ſcriptures, 2 vols. fol. He wrote beſides, a catalogue of the witneſſes of the truth, &c.

FRANKLIN, Thomas, D.D. was born in London 1720, and educated at Weſtminſter ſchool, and Trinity college, Cambridge. He was in 1758 made vicar of Ware and Thundridge, and afterwards obtained the rectory of Braſted in Kent. He was alſo chaplain in ordinary to the king, and died 1784. He tranſlated Phalaris, Sophocles, and Lucian, and he wrote the earl of Warwick, and Matilda, two tragedies received with great applauſe, and alſo "the contract," a comedy in two acts. Voltaire's works appeared tranſlated under his name; but only two tragedies, the Oreſtes and Electra, were by him.

FRANKLIN, Benjamin, an American philoſopher and ſtateſman, born at Boſton, New England, 1706. He was well educated under his father, who was a tallow-chandler and ſoap boiler, and after being engaged in the buſineſs, he was bound to his father's elder brother, a printer. Eager after knowledge, he read attentively in the night, the works which he had printed in the day, and from Xenophon he derived that energetic ardor which at laſt raiſed him to fame and diſtinction. A difference with his uncle removed him from New York to Philadelphia, where he was noticed by the governor Keith, and encouraged to ſet up buſineſs for himſelf. With this view he came to London; but ſoon diſcovered that the promiſes of his patron were the unmeaning profeſſions of poliſhed life, and, after working as a journeyman printer, he, in 1726, returned to Philadelphia. He began buſineſs, and publiſhed a periodical paper, which was read with avidity. In 1730 he married a widow, whom he had courted before her firſt marriage, and the next year he began the public library of Philadelphia, which was enriched by the valuable contributions of the Penn family, of Collinſon, and others. His Poor Richard's almanack appeared in 1732, and ſo pleaſed the public, on account of the valuable maxims of prudence and economy which it contained, that not leſs than 10,000 copies were ſold in one year. He was, in 1736, made clerk to the general aſſembly in Pennſylvania, and the next year poſtmaſter at Philadelphia. In 1738 he formed an aſſociation for preſerving the houſes of Philadelphia from fire, and in the war of 1744, he ably promoted ſome popular meaſures for the defence of the province. In 1747, he addreſſed an account of his diſcoveries on electricity to his friend Collinſon, and explained the Aurora Borealis, and the laws of thunder and lightning, and not only recommended the propriety of guarding buildings againſt the effects of ſtorms, by means of conductors, but ſhowed that the lightning from the clouds is the ſame as the electric fire. Diſtinguiſhed as a philoſopher, he was equally ſo as a ſtateſman. By his advice the militia bill was paſſed, and he was, in conſequence, appointed colonel of the Philadelphia diſtrict. On his appearance in England, in 1757, as agent for Pennſylvania, he was received with reſpect by the public men, and was honored with a ſeat in the royal ſociety, and the degree of doctor of laws at St. Andrew's, Edinburgh, and Oxford. He returned home in 1762, and two years after he again viſited England. The ſpirit which now began to appear in America rouſed the attention of the government, and Franklin, as a man of knowledge, was called to the bar of the commons, and examined with reſpect to the ſtamp act. His conduct on this occaſion was firm and manly, and his anſwers clear. He returned, in 1775, to America, and was elected one of the members of congreſs, and he diſplayed the moſt active zeal, and propoſed the ſtrongeſt meaſures for full emancipation from the mother country. He next completed the negociations of America with France, and as the reſources of his country were low, he embarked with a cargo of tobacco, which he ſold at Nantes, to defray his expences. He was received with great diſtinction by the French, the people admired the ſingularity of his dreſs and the ſimplicity of his republican manners; the poets, and Voltaire particularly, paid reſpect to his merits, and the government, by ſigning a treaty of offenſive and defenſive alliance with him, declared war with England. When the independence of America was acknowledged, Franklin, who had continued at Paris, ſigned the treaty of peace in 1783, and advanced the intereſts of his country by forming new connections with Pruſſia and Sweden. He returned to America in 1785, and was received as a venerable father; he was made governor of Pennſylvania, and he applied the ſtrong powers of his mind to heal the differences in the province, by wiſe laws and conciliating regulations. This reſpectable man died full of years and of glory, 17th April, 1790, aged 84 years and three months, and his countrymen ordered, on the occaſion, a public mourning for two months The epitaph which he compoſed for himſelf is well known. His diſcoveries in electricity, and his ſervices in the emancipation of his country were depicted by the pen of Turgot in this bold line, placed under his portrait:

Eripuit cœlo fulmen, ſceptrumque tyrannis.

By his patient induſtry he roſe from obſcurity, and amaſſed a very large fortune, part of which he left for charitable purpoſes. He wrote an entertaining account of the firſt part of his life, containing valuable maxims for health, induſtry, and economy, which has appeared in two ſmall vols. 12mo. with ſome eſſays. His political, miſcellaneous, and philoſophical pieces, have been publiſhed in 4to. and in 8vo.

FRANTZIUS, Wolfgang, a German divine, profeſſor of divinity at Wittemberg, where he died 1620, aged 56. He wrote animalium hiſtoria ſacra—tractatus de interpretatione ſacrarum ſcripturarum, 4to. &c.

FRAUWENLOB, Henry, a German writer, who died 1317. He wrote in favor of the ladies, who, it is ſaid, attended his funeral, and poured ſuch quantities of wine into his grave, as almoſt inundated the church.

FREDEGARIUS, the earlieſt French hiſtorian, after Gregory of Tours, was called the Scholaſtic. His chronicle, in barbarous language, extends to the year 641.

FREDEGONDE, wife of Chilperic of France, was born in Picardy. She was in the queen's retinue, and by the influence of her perſonal charms, ſhe became the third wife of the weak Chilperic. Raiſed to the throne, ſhe ſacrificed the members of the royal family, and by the ſword, as well as by poiſon, ſhe cut off all thoſe whom, either on account of talents, influence, or birth, ſhe regarded as enemies or rivals. Chilperic was at laſt aſſaſſinated in hunting, that the guilty queen might indulge her criminal paſſion for her favorite Landri. She died 597.

FREDERIC I. ſurnamed Barbaroſſa, was born 1121, and in 1152 aſcended the imperial throne after his uncle Conrad III. He paſſed in 1155 into Italy, where after ſome difficulties on account of the ſuperiority which the pope claimed over him, he obtained the crown and conſecration from Adrian IV. His diſputes with the holy ſee were terminated by his cruſade againſt Saladin. With a numerous army he marched into the Eaſt, and after defeating the Greeks, and the Turks, he penetrated into Syria, where death ſtopped his victories. He died 1190, in conſequence of bathing imprudently in the Cydnus, where Alexander the Great, ſome ages before, had nearly fallen a ſacrifice to the ſame recreation.

FREDERIC II. grandſon of the preceding, was elected emperor of Germany, on the excommunication of Otho IV. by Innocent III. but he obtained peaceful poſſeſſion of his power, only after the death of his rival 1218. He was ſolemnly crowned by Honorius III. 1220, and promiſed to extend the papal power by undertaking a cruſade. This diſtant expedition was put off, till the fear of excommunication obliged him to ſet out for Jeruſalem in 1228. His invaſion of the holy land was ſo formidable, that Saladin, ſultan of Babylon, not only made a truce of 10 years with him, but yielded to him ſome Aſiatic cities. This conduct provoked the pope, who incited his ſon and his father-in-law againſt him. Frederic haſtened back to oppoſe this unnatural conſpiracy, and ſeizing Romagna, Ancona, Spoletto, and Benevento, defeated the plans of his enemies. His partizans bore the name of Gibelins, while thoſe of the pope were called Guelphs, and carried on their ſhoulders the impreſſions of two keys. At laſt, however, Frederic made peace with the Roman pontiff, 1230, to be enabled to reduce to obedience his rebellious ſon Henry, whom he degraded from the title of king of the Romans in favor of his ſecond ſon Conrad. In 1240 Frederic paſſed again to Italy, and reduced the Milaneſe, and Sardinia, and after defeating the Genoeſe and Venetians, he laid ſiege to Rome. The pope oppoſed his attack by the terrible denunciation of excommunication, but Frederic diſregarded this, and defeated the forces ſent to check his progreſs. The death of the pope ſoothed for awhile the enmities between Rome and Germany, but at laſt Innocent IV. had the courage to depoſe him, at a council at Lyons, 1245, and Frederic, harraſſed by the inſurrections of his ſubjects in Naples and Parma, ſunk under his misfortunes, and died in Apulia, 1250, aged 57.

FREDERIC III. ſurnamed the Fair, was elected emperor 1314, by ſome of the electors, though the majority placed the crown on Lewis of Bavaria. The battle of Micheldorff, 1322, proved deciſive againſt Frederic, who was taken priſoner, and died 1330.

FREDERIC IV. ſurnamed the Pacific, aſcended the imperial throne 1440, in his 25th year. He was crowned at Rome 1452, by Nicholas V. and was the laſt German prince who ſubmitted to that ceremony. He was a weak and ſuperſtitious prince, and ſuffered Hungary to rebel, and afterwards he fled from Vienna, ſatisfied to beg his bread from convent to convent. He died 1493, in conſequence of the amputation of one of his legs, which mortified.

FREDERIC I. the Pacific, king of Denmark, 1523, after the expulſion of Chriſtian, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the wiſdom of his meaſures, and by his alliance with Guſtavus I. of Sweden. After the conqueſt of Copenhagen, he reconciled to his government the Daniſh nobility, and rendered himſelf popular by his liberality, and by the introduction of Lutheraniſm among his ſubjects. He died 1533.

FREDERIC II. king of Denmark, after Chriſtian III., was the patron of learning and of learned men, eſpecially of Tycho Brahe. He was for ſome time engaged in war with Sweden, and died 1588, aged 54.

FREDERIC III. archbiſhop of Bremen, ſucceeded in 1648 as king of Denmark. He rendered his people more independent of the nobles, by making the crown hereditary. He died 1670, aged 61.

FREDERIC IV. ſucceeded his father Chriſtian V. as king of Denmark, 1699. He joined the czar Peter, and Poland, againſt Charles XII. of Sweden, but he was obliged to make peace. During the captivity of Charles in Turkey, Frederic drove the Swedes from his dominions, and died 1730, aged 59.

FREDERIC V. grandſon of the preceding, aſcended the throne 1746, and died after a reign of 20 years. On his death bed, he called his ſucceſſor Chriſtian VII. and thus addreſſed him: "It is a great conſolation to me, my ſon, in my laſt moments, to reflect that I have offended no one, and that I have ſhed the blood of none of my ſubjects."

FREDERIC AUGUSTUS I. king of Poland, was ſon of John George III. elector of Saxony. He ſucceeded to the electorate 1694, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf againſt the French, and defeated the Turks, in 1696, at the battle of Oltach. He was in 1696 elected king of Poland, but the glories of foreign wars were eclipſed by the ſucceſſes of Charles XII. of Sweden, and Frederic beaten at Riga, Cliſſow, and Frawſtadt, was ſtripped of his dominions, and conſented to ſee the crown of Poland placed on the head of Staniſlaus. The defeat of the Swedes at Pultowa proved favorable to him, he recovered the Poliſh throne, and maintained his power and independence till his death, 1733, in his 63d year. He was in his perſon very athletic, and poſſeſſed of prodigious bodily ſtrength. His court was for a long time one of the moſt brilliant in Europe.

FREDERIC AUGUSTUS II. ſon of the preceding, ſucceeded his father 1734. The laſt years of his life were embittered by the miſeries of war, and the king of Pruſſia, invading his dominions, obliged him to ſubſcribe to humiliating terms. Auguſtus indeed returned to Poland, but Saxony remained in the hands of the conqueror, till the peace of Huberſburg, 1763. Auguſtus died the following October. Reſpectable in private life, this monarch was unequal to the arduous duties of reigning.

FREDERIC, prince of Heſſe Caſſel, married in 1715 Ulrica Eleonora, ſiſter of Charles XII. of Sweden, and he obtained poſſeſſion of the Swediſh throne 1720, after the abdication of his wife, who had ſucceeded on the death of her brother. He made war againſt the Ruſſians, and died 1751, aged 75.

FREDERIC WILLIAM, ſurnamed the Great, elector of Brandenburg, was born at Cologne, on the Spree, 1620. In 1674 he joined againſt Lewis XIV. with Spain and Holland, and invaded Alſace, but his progreſs was checked by the intelligence that the Swedes had laid waſte ſeveral of his cities, and he returned haſtily to repel them, and ſeized the towns of Stralſund, Ferſchantz, and Griſpwald. Peace was no ſooner reſtored, than he directed his attention to improve the commerce of his dominions, and joined the Spree to the Oder by a canal. He died 1688, aged 68, highly reſpected by his ſubjects.

FREDERIC I. elector of Brandenburg, ſon of the preceding, was born at Konigſberg 1657. His ambition was flattered with the hopes of erecting his duchy into a kingdom, and his title was acknowledged at the peace of Utrecht. The Pruſſian dominions were increaſed under him by the acquiſition of Guelders, of the county of Tecklenburg, and of the principalities of Neuchatel and Valengin. Frederic died 1713, aged 60. He founded the univerſity of Halle, the royal academy of Berlin, and the academy of nobles.

FREDERIC WILLIAM I. king of Pruſſia, ſucceeded his father 1713. He reformed the expenditure of the kingdom, and of the 100 chamberlains kept for oſtentation by his father, only 12 were retained. He unwillingly engaged in war againſt Charles XII. of Sweden, from whom he took Stralſund. To encourage commerce among his ſubjects, he invited foreign artiſans into his dominions by liberal rewards, and created a large ſtanding army of ſixty thouſand men. The latter part of his life was clouded by an unhappy diſagreement with his ſon the prince royal. He died 1740, aged 52.

FREDERIC II. ſon of the preceding, was born 1712, and aſcended the throne of Pruſſia 1740. His conduct had been viewed with jealouſy by his father, and his attachment to muſic and to belles lettres was regarded as a mean propenſity; but when he attempted to eſcape from the harſh treatment, he was ſent as priſoner to Cuſtrin, where he ſaw the execution of Kar, the companion of his domeſtic ſufferings. On his acceſſion, Frederic laid claims to Sileſia, which had been long occupied by the German emperor, and all the attempts of Maria Thereſa to defend it proved abortive. His poſſeſſion was confirmed by the treaty of Breſlaw 1743. The following year war was re-kindled, and Frederic advanced with 100,000 men to the ſiege of Prague, which he took with 16,000 priſoners, and this was ſoon followed by the deciſive battle of Friedburg. The treaty of Dreſden 1745, reſtored peace to the continent, and Auſtria ceded to Pruſſia all Sileſia, together with the county of Glatz. In 1755 a new war, called the ſeven years' war, burſt forth, and while Pruſſia had for its auxiliary the Engliſh nation, Auſtria was ſupported by France and by the elector of Saxony, Ruſſia, Sweden, and Germany. Undiſmayed, Frederic laid the foundation for ſucceſs in the ſtrict diſcipline of his army, and in the fortitude with which he ſhared the fatigues of his ſoldiers. Though France attacked him from Guelders to Minden, and Ruſſia penetrated into Pruſſia, and the Auſtrians into Sileſia, Frederic on all ſides roſe ſuperior to misfortunes. Though defeated by the Ruſſians he routed the Auſtrians, and again ſuffered a check in Bohemia, but on the 5th Nov 1757, he avenged himſelf by the terrible defeat of the Auſtrians and French at Roſbach, and by an equally ſplendid victory the next month over the Auſtrian forces at Liſſa near Breſlaw. Theſe ſucceſſes appalled his enemies, the Ruſſians and Swedes retired, and Frederic ſupported by a liberal ſupply from England, and by an army of Hanoverians, penetrated into Moravia, and laid ſiege to Olmutz. Though checked by Daun, he advanced againſt the Ruſſians at Cuſtrin, and defeated them at Zorndoff. The battle of Hochkirchen was adverſe to his fortunes, and he alſo ſuffered a check at Cunnerſdorff againſt the Ruſſians, and in conſequence of this Brandenburg and the capital fell into the hands of the enemy, 1761. The defeat of Daun at Torgau gave a new turn to affairs, the country was evacuated by the enemy, and in 1762, a treaty of peace was concluded with Ruſſia and Sweden, and the next year with France and the Empire, by which Sileſia was for ever confirmed in his poſſeſſion. Still intent on enlarging his dominions, Frederic joined with Auſtria and Ruſſia, in 1772, in that unpardonable league which diſmembered Poland. In 1777, the death of the duke of Bavaria kindled the flames of diſcord between Auſtria and Pruſſia, Frederic placed himſelf at the head of his troops, but differences were ſettled by the peace of Teſchen 1779. The laſt years of Frederic's life were devoted to the encouragement of commerce and of the arts, juſtice was adminiſtered with impartiality, uſeful eſtabliſhments were created, and the miſeries of the indigent were liberally relieved. Frederic died 17th Aug. 1786, aged 75, and he met death with all the reſignation which philoſophy unaided by religion can ſhow. As Frederic was brought up in the ſchool of adverſity, he early learnt leſſons of ſtoicism and philoſophical wiſdom, and unyielding to the careſſes of proſperity he was taught not to ſink under the frowns of fortune. From neceſſity as well as from choice attached to literature, he cultivated the muſes on the throne, and liberally patroniſed the lovers of ſciences and of the fine arts. His evenings were generally ſpent in the eaſy ſociety of men of letters, and after the fatigues of the day he unbent the hero and the king to the wit, the ſcholar, and the literary diſputant. His invitations to learned foreigners were ſincere and honorable, and Maupertuis and eſpecially Voltaire were for awhile objects of his particular regard. Anxious to redreſs the grievances of his ſubjects he paid the minuteſt attention to their applications, and a word written at the bottom of each petition ſerved for his ſecretaries to convey either refuſal or reprehenſion, encouragement or promiſes. At five in the morning Frederic generally roſe from his bed, and after the day was divided between buſineſs, recreation, and literature, he retired to his chamber at ten in the evening, and as his meals were regular, and as he was through life a ſtranger to the licentious propenſities which too often diſhonor the great and the powerful, he enjoyed a ſtrong conſtitution with a placid evenneſs of temper. His conduct in war, the heroic firmneſs with which he withſtood his enemies, and the aſtoniſhing preſence of mind which he diſplayed in every difficult ſituation, not leſs than his wiſdom, and the paternal care with which he watched over the happineſs of his people, proved him to be a monarch of ſuperior excellence; but though he thus deſerved the appellation of Great, it is painful to obſerve the inconſiſtency of his principles, the wavering tenets of his faith, and the mighty influence of thoſe two dangerous paſſions by which he was guided, ambition and avarice. Great as a monarch, Frederic was an infidel at heart, and while he wiſhed to bind, to obedience to his government, the affection of his ſubjects by the impoſing rites of religion, and by the expectations of another life, he was himſelf a ſceptic in the moſt offenſive degree, and regarded the ties which unite men to an over-ruling providence only ſo far as they ſecured his power or contributed to his aggrandizement. As Frederic did not cohabit with his wife, whom he had married only in obedience to his father, without affection, he died without iſſue. His works are numerous and reſpectable. Four volumes in octavo were publiſhed in his life-time, and fifteen ſince his death. The chief of theſe are memoirs of the houſe of Brandenburg—a poem on the art of war, a compoſition of great merit —the hiſtory of his own time—the hiſtory of the ſeven years' war.

FREDERIC, ſurnamed the Wiſe, elector of Saxony, ſhared the councils of Maximilian, after whoſe death he might have been placed on the imperial throne, an honor which he refuſed, while he ſupported the election of Charles V. He was one of the firſt and moſt zealous friends of Luther, and contributed much to the eſtabliſhment of the reformed church. He died 1526 and was ſucceeded by his brother John, whoſe ſon John Frederic when ſovereign became a powerful protector of the reformers, and was chief of the famous league of Smalkalde 1536. In the war which followed this league John Frederic was taken priſoner by Charles V. and condemned to loſe his head, but the ſentence was reverſed on condition that he conſented to the renunciation of the electoral dignity. He died 1554, aged 51.

FREDERIC V., elector palatine, ſon of Frederic IV., married a daughter of James I. of England. He was elected in 1619, king of Bohemia, but oppoſed by Ferdinand of Auſtria, and though ſupported by France and by England, he was defeated the following year and totally ruined near Prague. Guſtavus, in his invaſion of Germany, promiſed to re-eſtabliſh him, but the death of that heroic chief at the battle of Lutzen 1632, weighed ſo heavily on his ſpirits, that he died a month after.

FREDERIC, Colonel, ſon of Theodore, the unfortunate king of Corſica, was in the ſervice of the elector of Wirtemberg. He came to England as the agent of the elector, but either unſucceſsful in his negociations, or overwhelmed with debts, he committed ſuicide by ſhooting himſelf through the head in the portal of Weſtminſter abbey 1796. He was author of ſome publications of merit, memoires pour ſervir a l'hiſtoire de Corſe, 8vo. 1768—a deſcription of Corſica, with an account of its ſhort union to the Britiſh crown, &c. 1798, 8vo. &c.

FREDERIC, William, an Engliſh Socinian, born 1663. He wrote a dialogue on the deity, and a confutation of the doctrines of trinity, which drew down the ſeverity of the commons upon him. He was fined 500l., his book was burnt, and he made a recantation in the four courts of Weſtminſter-hall.

FREEMAN, John, a painter, under Charles II. His life was attempted by poiſon in the Weſt Indies, and his conſtitution ever after retained the fatal effects. In the decline of life, he painted ſcenes for Covent-garden theatre.

FREGOSO, Baptiſt, doge of Genoa, 1478, was depoſed for his haughtineſs, and baniſhed to Fregui. He wrote, like Valerius Maximus, nine books of memorable actions—the life of Martin V., &c.

FREHER, Marquard, a German, ſtudied civil law in France under Cujacius, and was afterwards profeſſor of law at Heidelberg, and engaged in important affairs by the elector Frederic IV. He died 1614, at the age of 49. His books on law, criticiſm, and hiſtory, are very numerous and reſpectable.

FREIGIUS, John Thomas, a learned German, of Friburg. He taught the law at Friburg, and afterwards at Baſil, and was appointed rector of the new college of Altorf, 1575. He died 1583, of the plague, following to the grave a ſon and two daughters. Of his works, the chief are quæſtiones geometricæ, and ſtereometricæ logica conſultorum—Ciceronis orationes perpetuis notis logicis, &c. 3 vols. 8vo.

FREIND, John, an Engliſh phyſician, born 1675, at Croton, in Northamptonſhire. He was educated under Busby at Westminster, and came in 1690 to Christ-church. His abilities were already so distinguished, that he in conjunction with a friend published an elegant edition of Demosthenes, and Æschines de Coronâ, and about the same time revised the Delphin edition of Ovid's metamorphoses. Directing his attention to physic, he addressed a letter concerning the hydrocephalus to sir Hans Sloane in 1699, and another in 1701 de spasmi rarioris historiâ. In 1703 he drew the public attention to an useful work called "emmenologia, in quâ fluxus muliebris menstrui, &c" and in 1704 was elected chemical professor at Oxford. The year after he accompanied lord Peterborough in his Spanish expedition, and then visited Italy and Rome. On his return in 1707, he published an account of the earl of Peterborough in Spain, &c. as an able vindication of his friend since the raising of the siege of Barcelona, and during the campaign of Valencia; and the work passed rapidly to a third edition. At this time he was created M. D. and two years after he published his prælectiones chemicæ, dedicated to Newton. This work was censured in the acta eruditorum by the German philosophers, and drew forth a defence from the author. In 1711 he was made member of the Royal society, and went with Ormond as physician to Flanders. In 1716 he was chosen fellow of the college of physicians, and then had a controversy with Woodward, of Gresham college, in consequence of his publication of Hippocrates de morbis popularibus, and afterwards on the subject of the fever in the small-pox, in which more acrimony was shown on both sides, than decorum could approve. In 1722 he was elected M. P. for Launceston, and the eloquence of his speeches, together with his intimacy with Atterbury, drew upon him the suspicion that he was concerned in the plot of that unfortunate bishop, and consequently he was committed to the tower, 1722, from which he was bailed the June following. In his confinement he wrote a letter on some kind of small-pox, addressed to his friend Mead, and he formed the plan of his great work "the history of physic," the first part of which appeared in 1725, and the second 1726. He died of a fever 1728, in his 52d year. His Latin works were published together, London 1733, in fol. by Wigan, who added a Latin translation of the history of physic, with an elegant dedication to the queen. Dr. Friend's brother, Robert, was head of Westminster school, and published Cicero de oratore, and died 1754.

Freinshemius, John, a learned German, born at Ulm in Swabia 1608. He was professor of eloquence at Upsal, librarian to Christina of Sweden, and afterwards professor at Heidelberg, where he died 1660. To the knowledge of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, he united an intimate acquaintance with the languages of Europe. His critique on Florus, and his notes on Phædrus and Tacitus, are valuable, but he derives his greatest celebrity from his excellent supplements to Livy and Quintus Curtius, in which he has been most successful.

Freire de Andrada, Hyacinthe, a Portuguese, of Beja. He was in great favor with John IV. of Portugal, who wished to make him a bishop. He was a man of great levity of character, which probably prevented his advancement in the state. He died at Lisbon 1657, aged 60. His "life of don Juan de Castro," is esteemed as one of the best written books in Portuguese.

Fremont d'Ablancourt, Nicholas, retired to Holland at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and was appointed historiographer to the prince of Orange. Besides a defence of his uncle d'Ablancourt's Tacitus against la Houssaye, he translated some of Lucian's dialogues &c. and died in 1693.

Frenicle de Bessy, Bernard, author of a treatise on right-angled triangles—on combinations—on resolving problems by exclusions, &c. was intimate with Mersenne, Descartes, and others, and died 1675.

Freret, Nicolas, of Paris, was at the age of 25 admitted into the academy of inscriptions, in consequence of his discourse on the origin of the French. This treatise was considered as offensive to the court, and the author was sent to the Bastille, where the reading of Bayle's dictionary rendered him sceptical. He wrote letters "of Thrasybulus to Leucippe." in favor of atheism—examination of the apologists for christianity, &c. and died 1749, aged 61.

Freron, Elie Catherine, a French journalist, born at Quimper 1719. He was educated by the Jesuits, but in 1739 he left them, and began the life and profession of author. His "letters on certain writings of the times," appeared in 1749, and were continued to 13 vols. In 1754 he began his "année literaire," in 7 vols. to which he added yearly 8 vols. till his death in 1776. He was an able and acute critic, but his remarks on Voltaire offended the satirist, and he became the hero of his Dunciad.

Fresnaye, John Vauquelin de la, an early French poet, president of Caen. He died 1606, aged 72. He wrote "satires," inferior to those of Boileau and Regnier, but possessing merit—"the art of poetry"—two books of Idyllia, &c.
